EVERYBODY LIKES a beautiful complexion, and a soft, smooth skin; both are obtained by using 'Wright's Alconated Glycerine Tablet of Solidified Glycerine,' fragrant, transparent, and incomparable as a Toilet Soap. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments, or all the time, than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

ONE APPLICATION OF

BARRY'S

Pearl Cream

Makes the sallow and dark skin as pure and smooth as

ALABASTER.

Sold by all druggists, and at the depot, 26 Liberty St., New York.

Only 50 Cents per Bottle.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S POPULAR EDITION

OF

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS.

After Dickens, no English author of the day appeals so directly to all branches of the English-speaking race as Charles Reade. His hatred of class injustice, of petty social spites and prejudices, of official wrongs and abuses, and his warm sympathy with all the fresh and true impulses and instincts of humanity, secure for his works appreciative readers wherever the English language is spoken. Charles Reade's works all deserve the widest circle of readers within whose reach they can be brought.—New York Times.

Mr. Reade is one of the most vigorous of modern writers of fiction. And in all his works he has a high moral aim, as the exposure of some evil that demands correction.—New York Observer.

A SIMPLETON: A Story of the Day. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

THE WANDERING HEIR. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents; Cloth, 50 cents.

HARD CASH. A Matter-of-Fact Romance. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

GRIFFITH GAUNT; Or, Jealousy. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents; 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

FOUL PLAY. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

WHITE LIES. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH; or, Maid, Wife, and Widow. 8vo, Paper. 50 cents.

PEG WOFFINGTON, Christie Johnstone, and other Stories. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 30 cents. 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

The above in Sets, 5 Vols., 8vo, Cloth, $8 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

For Cleansing the Teeth.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Fresh Summer Books

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.

FLAMMARION'S ATMOSPHERE. The Atmosphere. Translated from the French of CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Edited by JAMES GLAISHER, F.R.S., Superintendent of the Magnetical and Meteorological Department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. With 10 Chromo-Lithographs, and 86 Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

II.

TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS. The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. (Uniform with Tyerman's "Life of John Wesley.")

III.

THE BAZAR BOOK OF HEALTH. The Dwelling, the Nursery, the Bedroom, the Dining-Room, the Parlor, the Library, the Kitchen, the Sick-Room. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. (Uniform in style and price with the "Bazar Book of Decorum.")

IV.

CASTELAR'S OLD ROME AND NEW ITALY. Old Rome and New Italy. By EMILIO CASTELAR. Translated by Mrs. ARTHUR ARNOLD. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

V.

LIFE OF ALFRED COOKMAN. The Life of the Rev. Alfred Cookman. By H. B. RIDGAWAY, D.D. With Portrait on Steel. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

VI.

I GO A-FISHING. By W. C. PRIME, Author of "Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia," "Tent Life in the Holy Land," "Later Years," "The Old House by the River," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

VII.

ANECDOTES OF PUBLIC MEN. By JOHN W. FORNEY. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

VIII.

MISS BEECHER'S HOUSEKEEPER & HEALTHKEEPER; Containing Five Hundred Recipes for Economical and Healthful Cooking; also, many Directions for securing Health and Happiness. Approved by Physicians of all Schools. Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

IX.

FARM BALLADS. By WILL CARLETON. Illustrated; Square 8vo, Cloth, Beveled and Illuminated, $2 00. Gilt Edges, $2 50.

THE NEW NOVELS

OF

THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

1.

STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "Birds of Prey," "Lovels of Arden," "To the Bitter End," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

2.

A SIMPLETON: A Story of the Day. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

3.

TOO SOON: A Study of a Girl's Heart. By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID, Author of "Patty," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

4.

INNOCENT. A Tale of Modern Life. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," "Chronicles of Carlingford," "John: a Love Story," "Brownlows," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

5.

WILKIE COLLINS'S NEW MAGDALEN. The New Magdalen. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "Armadale," "Moonstone," "Man and Wife," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

6.

"'HE COMETH NOT,' SHE SAID." By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "On Guard," "Walter Goring," "Theo Leigh," "Played Out," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.

THE HOUR AND THE MAN. An Historical Romance. By HARRIET MARTINEAU. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $800 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 6 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

DR. NOBLE'S GREAT DISCOVERY.—A certain cure for fever and ague, bilious fever, and chill fever. A tonic. Price $1 per bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 Sixth Ave. Sold every where. Agents wanted.

$72 00 EACH WEEK. Agents wanted every where. Business strictly legitimate. Particulars free. Address J. WORTH & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

WANTED—BOOK AGENTS, to sell new and popular books. Books that are admirably adapted to the season, viz: Anecdotes of Public Men, by John W. Forney; Farm Ballads, by Will Carleton; I Go a-Fishing, by W. C. Prime; Miss Beecher's Housekeeper and Healthkeeper; The Fishing Tourist, by Charles Hallock. Liberal inducements offered. For further particulars, inquire of or address

AVERY BILL,
Care of Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

$50 TO $150 PER WEEK guaranteed to intelligent and industrious persons, of either sex, to act as our Agents. Business very pleasant. Address THE WESTERN ART ASSOCIATION, Chicago, Ill.

LAFONTAIN'S BEAUTIFIER.—Removes TAN AND FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, AND FLESHWORMS. Price $1 00 per Bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 SIXTH AVENUE. Agents wanted.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

A BLUSHING damsel called at the office of a paper a few days since and inquired for "papers for a week back," and that innocent young publisher's clerk thought she wanted perhaps a sticking-plaster, instead of a bundle of papers suitable for a bustle.

At a public gathering lately one of the gentlemen present was called upon for a speech, and this is how he responded: "Gentlemen and women, I ain't no speecher. More'n twenty years back I came here a poor idiot boy, and now what are I?"

A minstrel, riding a pumpkin-colored sorrel, perpetrated a heavy sell on a toll-keeper one day. He rode up unobserved, and turning his horse's face about, directly opposite to the direction he wanted to go, called to the toll-keeper, who by this time had come out, "What is the toll?"

"Twenty cents," answered the toll-keeper.

"Too high," replied the solitary horseman; "can't pay it. Guess I will go back."

He turned his horse about and proceeded in precisely the direction he wanted to go, the toll-gatherer never dreaming of the sell.

The editor of an Illinois paper thinks fishing, as a general rule, don't pay. "We stood it all day in the river last week," he says, "but caught nothing—until we got home."

What plant is capable of giving out the most heat?—A fern is.

"I met, the other day," writes a foreign sportsman, "with an Englishman who travels some hundreds of miles every year to indulge in his favorite sport, trout-fishing. I believe that, provided his favorite stream were undisturbed, this enthusiastic fisherman would be but little concerned if the whole world were submerged in a second deluge, as may be judged from the following anecdote. One day he was exploring the banks of his favorite stream, accompanied by the landlord of the inn at which he was stopping. The latter happening to come too close just at the moment when his guest was throwing his fly, the hook caught the poor wretch's eyelid, causing him intense pain. The sportsman coolly took out the hook, readjusted the fly, and, as the innkeeper continued howling at the top of his voice, 'You can,' said he, in a whisper, 'put your eye down in your bill; but I'll trouble you to stop that noise, so as not to frighten my fish.'"

A child being asked by her Sunday-school teacher, "What did the Israelites do after they crossed the Red Sea?" answered,

"I don't know, ma'am; but perhaps they dried themselves."

During the recent "season" a little knot of ladies were discussing the subject of marriage. One of the party, a single young lady, said, "Matches are made in heaven."

"Very likely," was the quiet rejoinder of a married lady, "and they are often dipped in the other place."

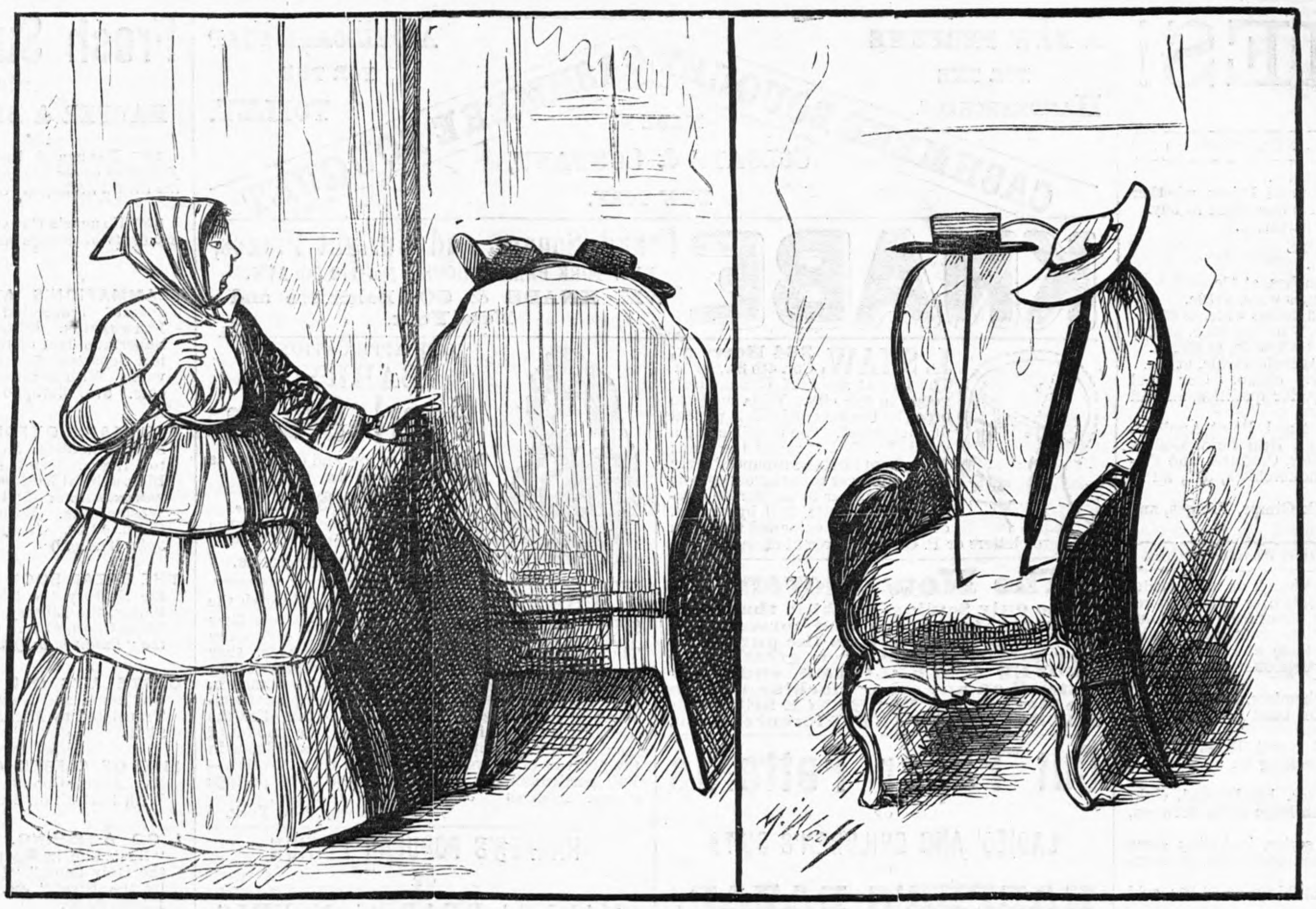
THE REAL RAILWAY DIVIDENDS—The scattered fragments of the passengers!

"How do you get along with your arithmetic?" asked a father of his little boy, who answered and said:

"I've ciphered through addition, partition, subtraction, distraction, abomination, justification, hallucination, derivation, amputation, creation, and adoption!"

A fool is surely the best company at a shooting party, because he keeps the game alive.

If a clerk wishes to borrow a novel from a friend, he had better not say he's a book-keeper.



MAKING A MOUNTAIN OUT OF A MOLE-HILL.

"Well, I declare, if there isn't Maria and that New Boarder Hugging in the arm-chair!" EXPLANATORY.

A LOSS.

How hard a thing it is to part
From those we love and cherish!
How deeply does it pain one's heart
To know all things must perish!

And when a friend and comrade dear
Is lost to us forever,
We feel how frail are all things here,
Since e'en best friends must sever.

I, too, have lost a friend, who broke
Its power when care was near me;
And troubles disappeared in smoke
When he was by to cheer me.

But as friends fall when valued most,
Like fruit that overripe is,
My loved companion I have lost—
That friend my meerschaum pipe is!

"I came off with flying colors," as the painter said when he fell from the ladder with a palette on his thumb.

THE KNAVE.

"You have played the deuce with my heart," said a gentleman to a lady who was his partner in a social game of whist at an evening party.

"Well," replied the lady, with an arch smile, "it was because you played the knave."

Quills are things that are sometimes taken from the pinions of one goose to spread the opinions of another.

It seems that it is not always safe to buy your fish even at the sea-side, for proximity to the briny waves does not assure freshness. Here is an incident from a well-known watering-place. The vendor of soles called a visitor's attention to his stock in trade, but found that the stranger would not deal, for the reason that the last fish purchased of the vendor was so bad that it had to be thrown away.

"Well, marm," was the defense, "it was your own fault, not mine; for I was calling them soles in front of your house for three days before you'd buy 'em."

EXCLUSIVENESS.

HOST. "Nice party, ain't it, Major Le Spunger? 'Igh and low, rich and poor—most people are welcome to this 'ouse! This is 'Liberty 'All,' this is! No false pride or 'umbug about me! I'm a self-made man, I am!"

THE MAJOR. "Very nice party indeed, Mr. Shoddy. How proud your father and mother must feel! Are they here?"

HOST. "Well, no! 'Ang it all, you know, one must draw the line somewhere!"

"Were you guarded in your conduct while in New York?" asked a father of his son, who had just returned from a visit to that city.

"Yes, Sir; part of the time by two policemen."

WHAT HE LACKED.—A few evenings since a coarse upstart having at a party exhibited his lack of gentlemanliness in the presence of a witty young lady, she remarked, "He's almost a perfect brute; all he lacks is instinct."

Poetry and advertising seem to have become blended, "as it were." A poet lately did this for twenty-five cents:

"Oh, come into the garden, Maud,
And sit beneath the rose,
And see me prance around the beds,
Dressed in my Sunday clothes.

"Oh, come and bring your uncles, Maud,
Your sisters and your aunts,
And tell them Johnson made my coat,
My waistcoat, and my pants."

A DANGEROUS PLAYTHING—A rattlesnake.

The men to suit every one to a hair must be the wig-makers.

DOMESTIC CONCESSIONS.—"I found it very inconvenient, and a great loss of time," said Châteaubriand, "to dine before seven o'clock. My wife wanted to dine at five o'clock, and insisted upon that hour. After many arguments and many heated discussions we finally compromised upon six o'clock—an hour which was very inconvenient to us both. This is what they call domestic concessions."

A Detroit boy stood an umbrella, with a cord tied to it, in a public doorway. Eleven persons thought that umbrella was theirs, and carried it with them the length of the string. They then suddenly dropped it, and went off without once looking back or stopping to pick it up.

What is that which has many leaves and no stem?—A book.

A sign on the door of a Paris lodging-house reads: "Music Lessons—Piano and Big Drum—from 8 o'clock A.M. to 10 o'clock P.M." Pleasant house to live in, we should think, especially for a poet.

There is said to be a man in New York so thin that he can keep cool at any time by standing in the shade of a lamp-post.

A Chicago railroad has provided its passenger trains with Bibles, securely chained and marked, so as to prevent their being stolen. This, of course, says a contemporary, is to prepare its patrons for the death which inevitably awaits them.

A coroner, while sitting on a drowned man the other day, trying to identify him, was informed by one of the jurors that "if the corpse had an impediment in his speech, he should say it was one of his neighbors, named Brown." A vigilant search failed to discover any impediment.

The young men of Chicago are said to be classified according to their skill as velocipedists into the "timid toddlers," the "wary warblers," the "go-it-gracefuls," and the "fancy few."

The minister of a rural parish having neglected to pray for rain, was waited upon by a deputation to remonstrate with him on the omission. "Weel-a-weel," he replied, after hearing what they had to say, "I'll pray for to please ye, but the feint a drap ye'll get till the change o' the moon!

LADIES AND HIGH LATITUDES.—Daughters of Earth in one point differ from their mother. A wad of false hair at the back of the female head maintains a high temperature at the poll.

A GRAPHIC PERORATION.—A Scotch minister recently, in discoursing of a certain class of persons who were obnoxious to him, concluded with this singular peroration: "My freens, it is as impossible for a sinner to enter the kingdom o' heaven as for a coo to climb up a tree wi' her tail foremost and harry a craw's nest; or for a soo to sit on the tap o' a thistle and whistle like a laverock."

Our Teutonic friend Johannes K—— entered one of our drug stores and thus addressed one of the clerks:

"Toctor, I feel sig all ofer, und de beebles dells me I better take one fissick."

"All right, Sir," says the clerk. "Will you have a dose of salts or some purgative pills?"

"Vell, vot it cost for dem saulds?"

"Ten cents, Sir."

"Und how much for dem fissicking pill?"

"I'll give you a dose at the same price."

After a vain search in his pocket for the required sum, he asked:

"Toctor, you tond got no second-hand fissicking pills, ain't you?"

JUSTIFICATION.

"See here, Dick. I hear that you are in the habit of taking my jokes and passing them off as your own."

"Shouldn't a man always be willing to take a joke from a friend?" responded Dick.

THE RETORT.

Several Irishmen were disputing one day about the invincibility of their respective powers, when one of them remarked, "Faith, I'm a brick."

"And indade I'm a bricklayer," said another, giving the first speaker a blow that brought him to the ground.

A clerk who had a mind for logic, applied it to a farmer with advantage, thus:

FARMER. "Got any cow-bells?"

CLERK. "Yes; step this way."

FARMER. "Those are too small; haven't you any larger?"

CLERK. "No, Sir; the large ones are all sold."

Rusticus started off and got as far as the door, when the clerk called him back.

"Look here, stranger; take one of these small bells for your cow, and you won't have half the trouble in finding her; for when you hear her bell, you will know that she can't be far off."

The logic was irresistible, and the farmer bought the bell.

Said an Irishman to the telegraph operator, "Do you ever charge any body for the address of a message?"

"No," replied the operator.

"And do ye charge for signing his name, Sir?" said the customer.

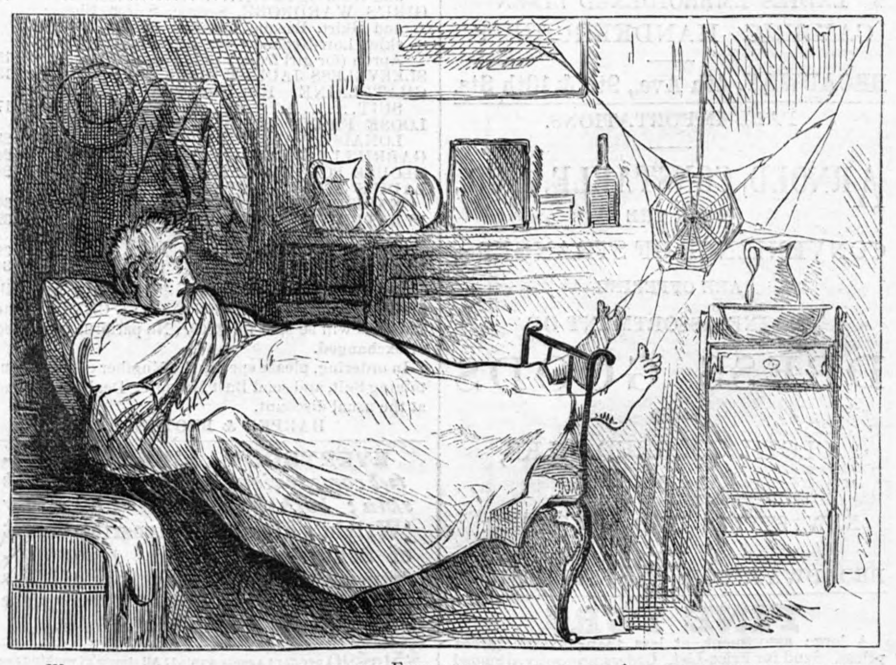
"No, Sir."

"Well, then, will ye please send this? I just want my brother to know I am here," handing the following: "To John M'Flinn—at New York—[signed] Patrick M'Flinn."

It was sent as a tribute to Patrick's shrewdness.

ANOTHER OUTRAGE.

AS IF THE LADIES COULDN'T CONCEAL THEIR CHARMING FACES SUFFICIENTLY WITH THE COLOSSAL FAN, THEY HAVE NOW ADOPTED THE HIGH ELIZABETH RUFF. THIS IS TOO MUCH.



WIGGINS, WHO HAS A DECIDED TASTE FOR ENTOMOLOGY, SAYS HE DOESN'T CARE ABOUT PURSUING THE STUDY UNDER THE ADVANTAGES THAT WERE OFFERED HIM AT A FRIEND'S HOUSE IN THE COUNTRY.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 39.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

FIGS. 1 AND 2.—ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT—BACK AND FRONT—WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

[Cut Paper Patterns of the English Walking Jacket Suit, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Hosted by Google

TOI JE T'AIME.

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

"ROBERT, toi je t'aime!"
I hushed my heart to hear
What siren voiced my name
In tones so silver clear.
Oh, thought too full of bliss!
Those notes could only fall
From lips I'd love to kiss,
The sweetest lips of all.

"Robert, toi je t'aime!"
It were no harm to see
(I quenched my meerschaum's flame)
Who sang so well of me.
Like moth to glittering light
My neighbor's candle drew
My footsteps through the night.
Ah, love! I thought of you.

The candle's beam was dim,
But by the moon superb
I saw a figure trim,
A face severe, acerb;
Not Lucia, but her aunt,
Who "practiced" in the dark,
And of my dreams gallant
Was scarce the shining mark.

"Robert, toi je t'aime!"
My darling, if you'll say
Just so much with my name
This sunny summer day,
From sweetest lips of all,
I'll hush my heart to hear
The accents as they fall
In tones so soft and clear.

ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

See illustration on first page.

THIS pretty double-breasted English walking jacket, which is copied from a model just imported from Paris by Lord & Taylor, is destined to be the popular wrap of the season. It is at once stylish and comfortable, and may be made of any thick material—such as camel's-hair cloth, diagonal, ladies' cloth, cashmere, etc., or of heavier beaver cloth or fur for winter. In the original the walking jacket is of olive camel's-hair cloth, the rest of the suit being of olive serge. The lapped over-skirt is a new and favorite garment, and will be found graceful and becoming. The jacket may be trimmed to suit the taste, with velvet, gros grain, or yak braid.

Cut paper patterns of the English walking jacket suit, comprising the walking jacket, lapped over-skirt, and walking skirt, will be furnished in nine sizes, even numbers, from 30 to 46 inches bust measure. To take the size, pass a tape measure entirely around the body, under the arms, across the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the bust, drawing it moderately tight. No other measure is needed. If the bust measure is an uneven number of inches—for instance, 35—send for 36 inches, and take the seams deeper than is allowed for in the pattern.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises three articles—double-breasted English walking jacket, lapped over-skirt, and walking skirt.

ENGLISH WALKING JACKET.—This pattern is in nine pieces—front, back, side form for the back, collar, sleeve, cuff, two pockets, and lappet. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting together. The holes show where to baste the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, to turn down the collar, to turn back the lapel in the front of the neck, to cut the button-holes and sew on the buttons, to place the pockets, and the size and form of the under part of the sleeve. The front of the jacket is double-breasted, and closes with button-holes and three buttons. A second row of buttons is sewed on the opposite side of the middle. There is a pocket on the left breast, and a larger one on each front near the bottom. The holes show where to place the pockets. The neck is finished with a collar and lapels, the collar being turned down in the line of perforations. The back is made half-fitting by middle and armhole seams. The middle is left open below the waist line from the notch down. The lappet-shaped piece is sewed in the armhole seam below the waist according to the notches. A deep cuff finishes the wrist of the coat sleeve. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back part of the armhole, holding the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. Baste up the jacket, and try on wrong side out; if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. Be very particular in cutting goods with a nap to have it run toward the bottom of the garment.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 3½ yards.

Number of buttons, 8.

LAPPED OVER-SKIRT.—This pattern is in three pieces—front, side gore, and back breadth. Cut the back with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid a seam. Cut the other parts lengthwise. Close the seams. The Watteau pleat is formed at the top of the skirt by the notches. Place the first two notches evenly together, turning the pleat toward the front; the next two notches, turning the pleat toward the back. The other two form the large pleat turned toward the middle of the back; the rest of the back breadth is gathered. The left front of the over-skirt overlaps the right, to correspond with the jacket. Place the right corner to the single notch at the top of the left side. The back is draped by a tape cut ten inches long, one end of which is sewed at the single hole, the other on the middle of the belt.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 4 yards.

WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—half of front gore, two side gores, and half of back breadth. Cut the front and back with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut two pieces each of the pattern given for the side gores. Put the pattern together by the notches, and pay no attention to the grain of the paper. The front gore is trimmed from the waist down with graduated folds from one to three inches deep; the rest of the skirt at the bottom is finished with a deep flounce cut eighteen inches, and headed by a three-inch fold. A four-inch wide fold is placed on each side of the front breadth the entire length from the waist down.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8 yards.
Extra for trimming, 6 yards.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

☞ A Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains more reading matter than an average octavo volume. The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for September 20 was sent out gratuitously an illustrated

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing further installments of "THE PARISIANS," by LORD LYTTON, and "PHINEAS REDUX," by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, and two pages of humorous illustrations.

An EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for September 27.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the English Walking Jacket Suit, illustrated on the first page of the present Number, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by Mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 623.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain an extremely choice variety of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of new and elegant Fall Dresses and Wrappings for Ladies and Children; Corsets, Lingerie; Watch-Stands, Lamp-Shades, Casters, Work-Baskets; Embroidery Patterns, etc., etc., together with rich literary and artistic attractions.

MOTHERS-IN-LAW.

OUR current light literature in all its departments furnishes hits at mothers-in-law. The fashion had its origin in England. The American witticisms are mere imitations. What foundation there may be for these slurs on a large class of English-women we do not know. That they are unjust in America we are sure. And yet every week one reads something which the writer manifestly thought to be smart, which, as it reaches the eyes of hundreds of the most self-sacrificing of our women, must give them pain, because it is an unnecessary and unjust aspersion of their whole class.

Sometimes the form of the joke is to put into the mouth of the son-in-law some severe hit at his wife's mother. It is noticeable that it is never the husband's mother, but always the wife's mother, that gets the blow.

It is time to pause and inquire into the justice of this. Is there any thing in the nature of the relationship to necessitate an antagonism between a woman and her daughter's husband? or, in point of fact, do these women conduct themselves in such a way as to justify these hits?

In a very large majority of instances, so far as the husband is concerned, he has to thank his mother-in-law for what is beautiful, attractive, and profitable for him in his wife: the man married the girl whom this woman raised. Now if mothers-in-law are such hideous things—so base, so mean, so impertinent—that a visit from them is to be dreaded, how is it that such hags are the mothers of such houris, and that such hateful women have been able to train other women to be so charming?

Daughters must be very precious to their mothers. When a gentleman selects a girl to be the object of his profoundest and most manly affection, to be the sharer of his fortune, and to be his other self, he must become an object of interest to the mother. She knows that it is in the course of nature and of grace that her daughter shall marry some one. If that husband prove to be true and noble and kind, it seems to be natural that the mother-in-law should love him with a very peculiar affection. Her own sons have come to her in the order of nature, but this new son has come a gift of God's gracious providence. So far as we have been able to observe, this has been almost invariably the case with mothers-in-law. Where they have been Christians it has been the rule without exception. Whenever, therefore, a man slurs his mother-in-law simply in virtue of her holding that relation to him, it would seem to imply something wrong in his own character or conduct. No true gentleman would give his wife any treatment he would not be perfectly willing to have her mother witness.

Ordinary delicacy should cause a gentleman to be as careful of speaking of his wife's mother as of his own. Wherever a man has had some seeming ground for regarding his mother-in-law as a nuisance, an investigation would probably detect that his wife had never thoroughly married him. A woman never thoroughly marries a man until she is ready to become so one with him that she shall consider how the observance of the wishes of others, even her own parents, shall promote his happiness and prosperity. At the moment of marriage, and by the very act, she removes herself from under the authority of her mother, to be under that of her husband; and every wise mother gives up her daughter thoroughly to the man who is to be the husband, and thereafter studies his wishes and his prosperity as much as those of her own daughter, and as feeling that they are really one. An occasional failure to do this on the part of mothers-in-law may have given rise to these caricatures of the whole class.

As human nature is constituted, it is always safer that when a young couple marry, the wife be taken to a distance from her home, and not to that of the husband's parents. They then cling to each other, each looking to the other for help and pleasure. It is the wife who is more in danger of trouble from her mother-in-law. A man has to dread trouble more from his own mother than from his wife's, and yet we have to see the first arrow of witticism shot from a woman's bow against her mother-in-law. It is his mother who is apt to torment the young wife with intimations of how she did when she first married.

But none of these disagreeable things happen where a man truly marries a woman, and she truly marries him, and the parents on both sides have correct ideas of the sanctity which belongs to this unity. Even as things are in society, how many a married man is indebted to his mother-in-law for taking a thousand burdens from his wife's shoulders and his own! It is the mother-in-law who assists in securing the new house, procuring the furniture, arranging it in its place, suggesting many an expedient for comfort from her own experience, and putting the machinery of the household in working order. To her the husband owes many an hour of his wife's society which otherwise would be absorbed by domestic drudgery; and when the little children come, it is the wife's mother to whom they seem nearest and dearest. It is she that nurses them most tenderly in the most trying portion of their lives. It is she who spends so many a wearisome hour in the nursery, that he and his friends may have his wife's company in the parlor or at the place of public amusement. A thousand touching stories of devotion upon the part of the wife's mother could be told, but we do not intend to be pathetic.

Whenever we hear a man making a disparaging insinuation with regard to his mother-in-law, we always feel like saying to him, "Sir, you never would have been any where if your father had never had a mother-in-law."

CRIMPS.

By GAIL HAMILTON.

I HAVE just been reading a harangue upon the folly of self-adornment in women. The writer admits that it is well enough for girls to crimp their hair, but after marriage they should give up their crisping-pins, and wear their tresses as nature made them. Recounting his reasons, the girls, he says, may seclude themselves from mortal eyes till such time as the crimps are ready to fledge into waves; but he thinks with horror of the husband who is forced to see his wife in all the hideousness of her hard-bunched hair. For him no illusion, not even the grace of nature's own provision; for him only deformity and the rough preliminaries of beauty.

Why should we talk? Let a girl who, by waving and puffing and crimping and clouding, by braids of bought hair, by tulle and crêpe and flower and ribbon and arrow, had made herself up into a pretty, picturesque little work of household art—let her, after marriage, flatten all her puffs, abandon braids and bows, wear only her own hair, combed as neatly as you please straight behind her ears, and her husband would be the first one to find fault—and her critic before mentioned would be the second! What! spare no pains to attract the man, and then take no pains to please the husband! Out upon the unwomanly woman!

In actual life women are too apt to let the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of family riches choke their love of pleasing the eye. A happy wife cares for her husband's comfort, his interest, his wardrobe, and appetite, but is a little too apt to neglect his taste. The requirements of his refined eye seem to her less imperious than the requirements of his refined palate. So her hair goes straight, not to say dishevelled; her collar lies in the drawer till after breakfast, perhaps till after dinner; and the trim and dainty woman becomes, not strictly untidy—for that she can never be—but a little careless and common. She is not a pleasing picture for freshness and harmony. Something romantic, poetic, winsome, has gone from her. She is stanch and sensible, and the heart of her husband doth safely trust in her; but she is not each morning a new surprise, and the faint, quaint little song sings itself no more.

Human nature is not changed by marriage, and the husband is not less a man because he is more a man. A husband object to crimps! Why, I can present to a jury of twelve men in twenty-four hours a man who offered his wife a handsome sum of money if she would crimp her hair every day for three months. There are women in whom the difference between plainness and prettiness seems to be a matter of straight or crinkled hair; and be sure there is no one who loves better to see a woman at her best than her own husband. He may laugh at her pains, but he rejoices in their outcome. He uses great swelling words of banter about her convolutions, but he would not on that account have her the less convolve. He is himself confined to sombre hues and severe outlines, and all his love of the beautiful in costume must find its gratification in her wardrobe. He does not wish her to be extravagant; but, within economical limits, he does wish her to be as pretty, as tasteful, as elegant, as possible. At least, if he does not, he hath, as the Scripture saith, no pre-eminence above a beast, and we need not trouble ourselves about him one way or the other.

Is it that a man's love, devotion, reverence, can not endure the shock of seeing the processes by which beauty prepares itself to go forth conquering and to conquer? I think he would rather hazard the preparations than dispense with the results. David Copperfield was not disenchanted at seeing Dora sharpen her weapons of war. "It was such a stupendous thing to know for certain that she put her hair in papers. It was altogether such an astonishing event to see her do it!" It is true that love idealizes its object, but ideality is strong. It is not to be crushed out in a curl-paper, nor twisted out by a hair-pin, nor scorched out with a hot slate-pencil. The woman who is justly idealized, whose nature is deep and firm and true, can not only hold her own in spite of all these little mechanisms, she can throw over them all the same charm that invests herself. The excessively fine lady who never admits her husband to the disarray of her dressing-room, who causes every detail of feminine garniture to be swiftly hustled out of sight at his approach, who presents herself before him only when each braid and curl and ruffle is properly adjusted—she is far more wrong than the woman who too carelessly rests on her reserved rights and just claims, and neglects the last touch of elegance or even tidiness. The latter at least pays to her husband the compliment of assuming that he is a rational being, and to herself tribute as a person of character and substance. The former virtually denies to herself the possession of any real qualities, and imputes to her husband the whimsies of a spoiled child. The love of any man whose love is worth having—a man hearty, sensible, honest, just—is not affected by any such insignificant matters. The divinity that doth hedge a woman is not broken in upon by the fine arts wherewithal she embellishes herself. A man must be very learned and abstruse, or very foolish, who thinks that all the hair he sees on the fashionable female head grew there. The boy in school knows that the little girl's hair does not friz down her forehead by the light of unassisted reason. The thousand little innocent artifices of the toilette are an open secret, and wait for no marriage vows to be revealed. A man is not deceived and disappointed in his wife because she wears a bandeau on her head, but because she is insincere at heart. A loyal and loving soul, sturdy, brave, intelligent, sympathetic, need not fear disenchantment. Witchery itself has no spell more potent than hers. The wife, tender and true, wise and worthy, may deck herself with what grace she may, at any cost required. To the heart in which she is enthroned, she shall ever and forever be

Hosted by Google

"fairer than whom all men praise,
And godlike for her grace of hallowed hair,
And holy habit of her eyes, and feet
That make the blown foam neither swift nor white."

Her husband will rejoice in each fresh blooming of her beauty to the world, and will never complain that he has also and alone to see its closely folded bud. Nay, rather, if he is the man I take him to be, the manly man, he has a more abiding inward joy in the bud that belongs only to him and opens before him, than in the full-blown flower whose blossoming, indeed, he desires and enjoys, but whose blossoming is for all the world!

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT.

THE English walking jacket, of which we give a cut paper pattern, is a stylish and serviceable garment, which takes the first place among the imported fall styles. It is an easy-fitting, convenient wrap, to be worn over fall and winter suits, and is plain enough for traveling, shopping, etc., yet sufficiently handsome to be worn with all but the most dressy street toilettes. It is most largely imported in the thick, soft, shaggy cloth now called camel's-hair cloth, but formerly known as chinchilla, and in heavy diagonal cloths showing wide vertical ribs. Dark olive, blue, bronze, slate, and myrtle green cloths are preferred this season to black ones. The trimming is usually bands, revers, cuffs, etc., of velvet or of repped silk of the shade of the cloth, piped or corded on the edge, or else headed with the new yak braid. The buttons are of steel or pearl, colored to match, or else of oxidized silver. If a more dressy garment is preferred, cashmere or camel's-hair is used, with silk and fringe or yak lace for trimming. This wrap may be made of the material of the suit, though this is seldom done, as it is more economical to have a cloth jacket of some neutral tint, that may be worn with various dresses. In the suit illustrated the jacket is of olive green camel's-hair cloth, with a dress of serge of the same shade. The waist of this costume is a basque of simple shape. The open-front over-skirt, of which a pattern is given, is lapped below the belt, has a funne-shaped Watteau fold on each side, and the long back breadths are very simply draped. The skirt, of walking length, is trimmed according to the manner shown in the picture.

FRENCH COSTUMES.

Costumes for the street form an important part of fall importations. They are made with skirts long enough to touch the floor when worn in the house, but are drawn up by rings and drawing-strings before going out; and when a mantle is added, the street suit is complete. The redingote reappears as we described it last week. A basque and over-skirt are also retained, in altered shapes, however, and there is an effort to simplify ornament, and use more flat trimmings on skirts that now cling very closely to the figure, and are decidedly abridged in width.

To begin at the foundation: the lower skirt measures about three and a quarter yards around the bottom, and is worn over a support or bustle almost as long as the back breadths. This support, called the Pompadour bustle, gives the stylish gradual slope behind from belt to foot, very different from the abruptly projecting tournure lately worn, and leaves the sides and front perfectly smooth and clinging. The skirt trimming promotes this appearance of close front and oblique back drapery by being lengthwise and flat in front, horizontal and in rippling wavy flounces behind. For instance, the three front breadths of many skirts are innocent of ruffles even across the foot, but have perpendicular puffs of reversed pleats, or flat side bands, or else shirred puffings extending from waist to toe. On the back breadths are five or seven flounces, or else a Spanish flounce with many ruffles, or perhaps three large panier puffs are placed, one after another, down the back breadth, or it may be there is but one puff, draped into shape by an elaborate scarf sash. Another simple fancy, that promises to be popular, is that of putting a single straight fold of the material, five or six inches wide (after being doubled or lined), down the two front seams of the skirt, and placing a row of buttons quite close together thereon. This fold forms a pretty side trimming; there are then three narrow gathered flounces across the foot of the front breadth, and one or two wide flounces on all the other widths. French dress-makers do not line silk skirts. They merely face them with stiff crinoline, and cover the crinoline with substantial mohair poplin that does not wear out easily by friction on the floor; a thick passementerie cord is set on the edge instead of the usual worsted braid. The top of the skirt is sewed as plainly as possible to the belt in front and on the sides, having only a small pleat under the seams, and the back breadths have two large box-pleats.

Among over-skirts the round, long, apron front now worn is again seen, but suffers a change by being opened up to the belt behind. This opening is trimmed up each side; the back breadths are not draped in the middle, but are formed into two long points by being caught up very high on the sides. The open-front over-skirts are best understood by the illustration on the first page of the present number of the Bazar. There is also a novelty, called the châtelaine over-skirt, consisting of two plain breadths of the silk about a yard long, lined with thinner silk, but utterly untrimmed, attached to the belt in box-pleats, and worn hanging from the back and sides, just as châtelaine trinketry hangs in front. Add the scarf-like fronts of the new mantilla, and the wearer of all this flying drapery, each piece of which moves separately as she walks, is a fit subject for the caricaturist's pencil. Yet ladies just returned from abroad are thus arrayed, and consider themselves well dressed.

Basques have attained the perfection of shape, and are not radically changed. The revers, with coat collar and ruff, are its conspicuous features, and appear on both single and double breasted jockey basques. Many open over vests in the way seen in Fig. 4, on the first page of Bazar No. 38, Vol. VI. The ruff and round revers, with the back turned up, is very stylish. Broad backs formed of four pieces of the same width are found among the new dresses oftener than those with wide side bodies and narrow middle pieces. Thick cords are again used in the armholes and as edging for the front of basque skirts, instead of a piping fold. The lower part of the basque is formed into fanciful lappets, or else has two hollow pleats, is either square or pointed, and is often edged with lace or fringe, while the front is plainly corded.

The châtelaine basque is a decided novelty, and accompanies the châtelaine over-skirt already described. It has a plain châtelaine front sloping over the hips, and held there by whalebones that extend to the cord which edges it. The back has two long swallow-tails, with bows on the end, and the whole is very like a gentleman's dress-coat. The coat collar and coat sleeve complete the resemblance. This basque is becoming to very full figures.

The demi-polonaise, with long pointed front, rounding shorter behind under a basque, is the style chosen for dresses that are to be worn both in the house and street. It is made close-fitting and single-breasted, but has the inevitable revers and collar.

BLACK SILK SUITS.

Black silk suits remain the most desirable dresses for fall and winter, and are designed for house and street alike. A stylish model from one of the best Parisian houses has four lengthwise graduated puffs, each about six inches wide at the bottom, down the front breadths. These puffs are not gathered, but are held in reversed scant pleats, and are edged by a milliner's fold. On the back are five bias gathered flounces that cover the skirt. A Pompadour bustle holds the flounced breadths out in a narrow graceful slope, and draws the front widths close to the person. With this is the demi-polonaise just described, trimmed with a bias band, piping, and yak lace. The coat sleeves are trimmed to represent a deep cuff, and the neck has a revers and collar. A second suit has the front breadth covered with an entire breadth of silk, puffed, and held in twenty very full reversed pleats, while the side breadths are covered with shirred puffs. In the back is a deep Spanish flounce with ruffles and side pleating. A black silk house dress with demi-train has three clusters of crescent-shaped pleatings, forming puffs on the front breadth, with rows of fringe and passementerie, made entirely of jet, separating the puffs. This skirt has no flounces, but its back breadth is formed into three puffs, one after the other, down the skirt. The pretty basque has a ruff and collar of black silk, lined with pale blue.

An elegant carriage dress of plum blue silk has a straight fold with black and gilt Japanese buttons upon it passing down the two front seams. A box-pleating trims the foot of the front breadth, and two wide flounces ruffled on the edge are on the back breadths. There are two hanging châtelaine breadths behind, by way of an over-skirt, and a sloped silk piece is sewed under the folds, giving the effect of a polonaise. The basque is pointed behind, and has three cords on the edge. A low rounded revers trims the front of the corsage, and there is also a standing English collar of the silk. Coat sleeves with two pointed cuffs piped on the edge. A black silk dress is made in the same manner, with pearl or else jet buttons on the fold.

COLORED SUITS.

Dark camel's-hair or cashmere over dresses with silk skirts of the same shade are preferred to suits wholly of colored silk. Various shades of olive are most largely imported in these. Ostrich feather bands shaded beautifully are the handsomest trimming for camel's-hair, and these are much associated with yak braid. Bands of peacock's feathers are also used. Mantles, basques, and over-skirts of camel's-hair will, it is said, rival the now prevailing redingote. One very stylish costume for midwinter has an olive silk skirt trimmed with three clusters of side pleatings headed by shell pleats of camel's-hair of a lighter shade. The over-skirt, with apron front and two long points behind, is open up the back to the belt, and trimmed all around with a band of ostrich feathers and the new curled fringe; many horizontal rows of yak braid trim the apron. The double-breasted jockey basque of camel's-hair has a silk rounded revers, collar, and silk coat sleeves. To complete the suit is a pretty mantilla, with hood and cape behind, and long square fronts with a cunning little pocket in one end. Horizontal rows of yak braid are on the whole mantle, an ostrich boa trims the throat, and a feather band and fringe finish the edge. A dark brown bronze silk suit has four bias lapping folds, each six inches deep, crossing the three front breadths. Behind is a Spanish flounce laid in scant kilt pleats, and edged with wide box-pleating. The tight polonaise is draped only on the sides, and has a cape buttoned on just back of the revers. Oxidized silver buttons. A suit of reddish-brown camel's-hair is most peculiarly fashioned. It has a blouse or chemise Russe, with a yoke-like collar of velvet, and a girdle. The round apron over-skirt is draped by a velvet sash placed low down in front and back. The lower skirt has a deep flounce laid in two or three scant side pleats, with a lengthwise velvet band between the clusters of pleats.

RUFFS.

Double ruffs are in fashion, and crêpe lisse ruffs are fuller and higher than ever. They consist of two rows of double and even triple box-pleating, with the clusters of pleats touching; they are three inches high behind, and slope away in front to one inch. A single ruff costs $2 50, and is bound with soft lutestring ribbon, which is grateful to the neck, on which the burden of style and too much dressing for comfort rests at the present moment. Other double ruffs have side pleating inside with double box-pleating outside. These are sold by the yard for $2. When made of Malines, the single ruff costs $2 25.

Black and white mixed ruffs are new, also those with jet beading on the edge. Imagine a box-pleated frill of black Malines (fine tulle) with tiny jet beads on the edge, and inside this a pleating of white tulle. These are worn with black dresses by ladies in colors, and cost $3 50 a yard. White tulle ruffs with dots of black chenille on the edge are $1 75 for the single ruff, or $2 by the yard. More stylish still are the all-black, double, box-pleated ruffs of tulle edged with jet. We repeat, these are designed for ladies in colors. For those who wear mourning are black crêpe lisse ruffs at $2 50 a yard.

Among laces Valenciennes remains the popular choice, and the fancy now is to arrange high lace ruffs of very fully pleated Valenciennes with standing collars, revers, and bows of repped silk, pink, blue, or pale green. Very handsome lace ruffs with a silk collar turned up behind and showing revers in front, and tabs or jabots of Swiss muslin with lace, cost from $15 to $30. These are too elaborate for description, and are worn to complete elegant toilettes for the house.

Exquisite sets of ruff and wristlets are made of finest Valenciennes and sheer muslin, arranged in box-pleats, while between the pleats, and quite separate from them, are square tabs of insertion and lace, in which a tiny white wire scarcely thicker than thread is sewed to keep them erect: these cost $10. Plain hemmed muslin ruffs in thick box-pleats are considered distingué, and are inexpensive, costing only 35 cents for the single yard required for the close coat sleeves and neck of high-throated dresses. Muslin ruffs with hem-stitching done by machinery and an edging of Italian lace are also pretty, and cost far less than those hem-stitched by hand.

The regular Elizabethan ruff, so often announced, has at length appeared. It is two frills of pleated muslin, one standing and the other flaring out horizontally or else turned down on the shoulders. A narrow ribbon passed around the neck separates the ruffles, and is tied in a long-looped bow with ends flowing below the belt. The ribbon is from one to two and a half inches wide.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. LORD & TAYLOR; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.; and A. T. STEWART & CO.

PERSONAL.

THE venerable Dr. PUSEY has republished a volume of Plain Sermons, originally contributed by him forty years ago to a publication very notable in its day, Tracts for the Times. The contributors to that remarkable series were Dr. PUSEY, the two KEBLES, Dr. NEWMAN, and ISAAC WILLIAMS. Dr. NEWMAN'S secession stopped the republication of the works, and Dr. PUSEY now republishes his separately. Dr. NEWMAN'S sermons are regarded by English critics as among the finest specimens of pure English in the language.

—Mlle. TORRIANI, Mr. STRAKOSCH'S new prima donna, is a daughter of the Swedish consul at Hamburg, and was born in that city.

—President M'MAHON lives a retired, unostentatious life, unpretending in manner and plain in dress, and seldom appears in uniform. His most marked characteristics are a love of children and fondness for study. He made a triumphant entry into Milan in 1859 with a little girl, who had offered him a nosegay, perched upon his holsters. He is probably as well versed in military history as FAIDHERBE, and is often busy with a child and map upon his knees. His favorite amusement is riding. In society he is shy, almost sad, and seems ill at ease. He likes to saunter about the boulevard, with his hands in his pockets and a cigar eternally in his mouth, when he is not on horseback; and he is seen to most advantage at home, surrounded by his family.

—"Howard Glyndon" (Miss REDDEN), the deaf-and-dumb writer, is at WHIPPLE'S school, at Ledyard, learning the process of lip-reading.

—Queen VICTORIA'S place at Osborne is her private property, purchased by her and the Prince Consort some thirty years ago. It contains about 5000 acres of wood and farm land, and the drives through the parks and the views are charming. It is very rarely shown to the public. Her Majesty and family while in Osborne attend service every Sunday morning at Whippingham Church, an ugly little chapel built in the palace park by the Queen and Prince ALBERT. The royal pew, a large square inclosure, is plainly furnished with a row of stiff chairs upholstered with blue velvet. Her Majesty's seat differs from none of the others, but is placed immediately under a fine mural tablet to Prince ALBERT, erected in memory of the best of husbands, "by his broken-hearted widow, Queen VICTORIA."

—General DI CESNOLA, American consul at Cyprus, whose remarkable collection of antiquities, on exhibition in the branch of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, in West Fourteenth Street, has excited the admiration of archæologists, as well as the public generally, was honored by a banquet a little time since at the Union League Club, prior to his return to Cyprus, at which he told the story in brief of how the collection was secured for New York through the public-spirited liberality of a gentleman well known to the cultivated people of this country as a connoisseur in and promoter of art. General DI CESNOLA said: "The results of my archæological discoveries when placed in easy reach of the scientific world brought to me my remuneration in the thorough appreciation of the first men of learning in the Old World. My dream ever was, since the poverty of my native country prevented it from securing the CESNOLA collection, that the land of my adoption should possess it. But that dream seemed to fade away, when one morning a tall, elegant man, with sympathetic and intelligent eyes, made his appearance at my house in London, and with his quick perception of the importance of securing the collection for New York, changed the fading dream soon afterward into a reality. We all recognize in him the brilliant host of this evening, Mr. W. T. BLODGETT. Let it not be said, gentlemen, that we have put our hands to the plow and then looked back. The beginning of our art museum is looked at across the Atlantic with mingled interest and incredulity. A smile of derision at first met the announcement that a private American citizen had snatched from Europe the Cyprus collection in order to adorn his own native land, and for the benefit of the American student."

—Ex-Senator FOOTE relates a very odd scene that occurred in Washington in the winter of 1858. "General NELSON (who was afterward killed in private combat at Louisville by General JEFF. C. DAVIS), when walking to the Capitol one morning, accidentally encountered an Englishman of rather eccentric appearance, who inquired in cockneyish style the way to the room in which the Supreme Court of the United States was holding its sittings. After the desired information had been supplied, a sort of miscellaneous conversation sprang up between General NELSON and his supposed London acquaintance. He resolved to go with him to the Supreme Court room that he might there see more of him. While sitting there it struck him that a very funny banqueting scene might be gotten up if he should draw up a card of invitation to the aforesaid son of 'the fast-anchored isle,' requesting him in the name of several distinguished members of Congress—easy to be obtained—to accept that very evening a social repast to be given in honor of her Majesty Queen VICTORIA and the British people. This invitation had been very courteously accepted, and when I reached the designated place of social réunion I found an exceedingly gay and splendid company assembled. The English guest was, of course, occupying the seat of honor, and at different seats of the table were to be seen Vice-President BRECKINRIDGE, WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Colonel ORR (the late Minister to Russia, who was then Speaker of the House of Representatives), LEWIS D. CAMPBELL of Ohio, the celebrated HUMPHREY MARSHALL of Kentucky, ALBERT PIKE, the erudite lawyer, the brilliant colloquialist, General NELSON himself, and this reminiscent. Dinner had already commenced when I reached the arena of action, and the first glass of wine was about to be drunk. A sentiment preceded it, which, being in honor of her gracious Majesty the Queen of the British realm, called her loyal subject to his feet, when, without the least embarrassment, in as easy, dignified, and graceful a style as either Lord CHESTERFIELD or Lord PALMERSTON could have exhibited, he poured forth an impromptu response which was in all respects a perfect masterpiece of its kind. The whole company was manifestly thrown aback by a display so unlooked for. After a while the wine began to circulate very freely; glass after glass was drunk with hearty good-will, while choice anecdote, brilliant repartee, and songs, both merry and pathetic, served to enliven the occasion. Just as the company was rising from the table, Mr. SEWARD, who had already contributed at least his full quota to our entertainment, rose, and with more than usual gravity asked to be permitted to offer a sentiment, to which all the company assenting, he said: 'Gentlemen, it has been my fortune to occupy a seat in Congress, as you all very well know, for many years, during which period I have made one of many genial meetings like the present. I lament to say, gentlemen, that it has uniformly happened heretofore on such occasions that the concord and agreeable hilarity of the dinner scene have been more or less marred by the unhappy introduction of irritating sectional topics. To-day nothing of the sort has occurred, a circumstance to me exceedingly gratifying. I now give you, gentlemen, the following sentiment: May many such pleasant banquets as this hereafter occur among us, and may none of them be interrupted or rendered less agreeable by the introduction of sectional topics!'"

—Lady ACTON, who died recently in England, formed a remarkable link with the past. She was eighty-seven years old. Her husband, Sir JOHN ACTON, had he been living, would have been one hundred and thirty-seven years old; and Lady ACTON, two years ago, could have heard from her husband personal reminiscences of the Scotch rising in aid of the "young Pretender" in 1745, and told all about what was said in England concerning our war of the Revolution.

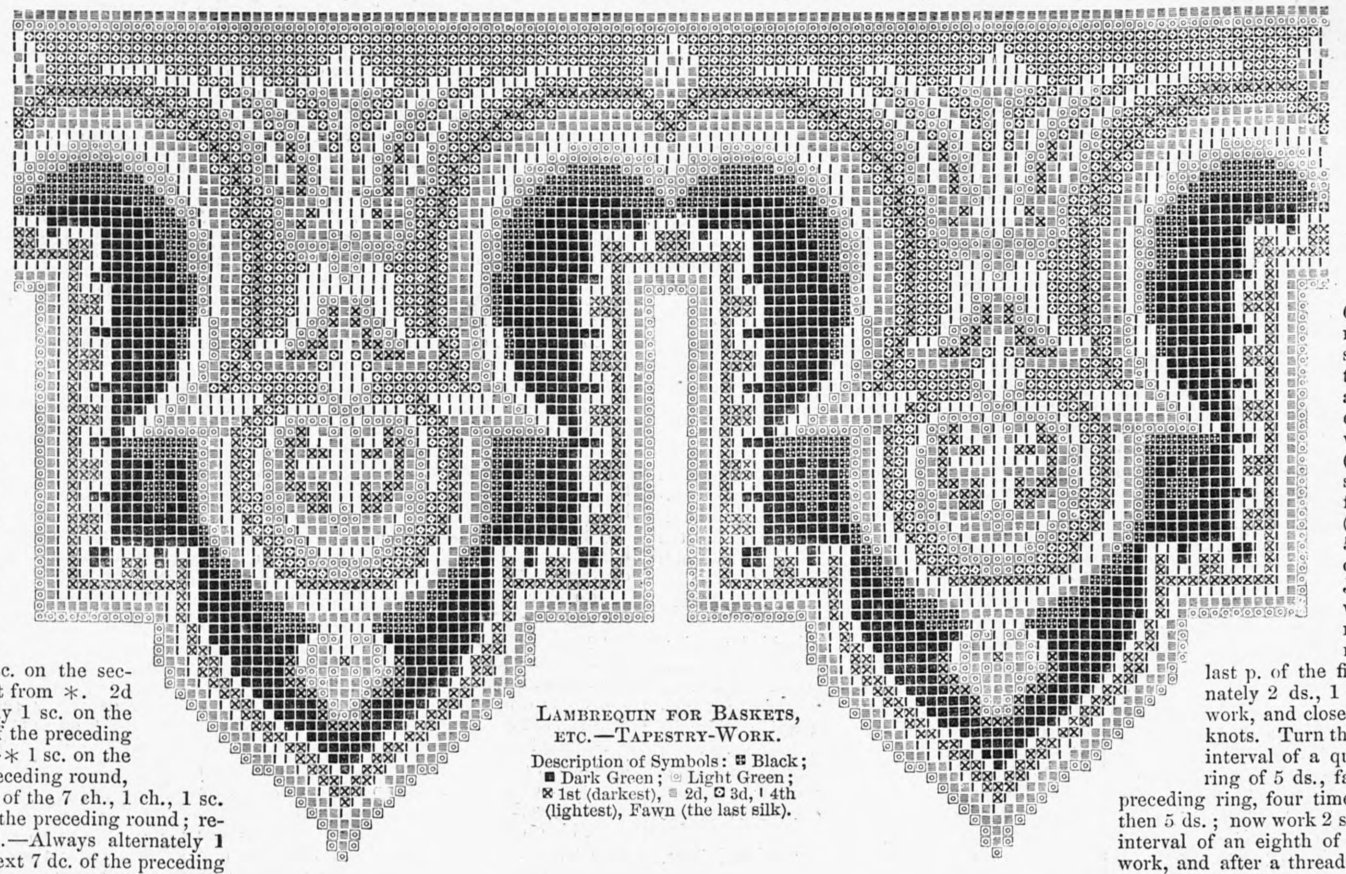
—Miss MARY CAMPBELL, of Avondale, Ohio, during a stay of three months at Pittsburg last spring, visited the jail every Sunday afternoon and directed the musical exercises. She sang finely, and so delighted the prisoners that they presented to her a silver goblet, inscribed, "Presented by those unfortunates whose sufferings she has alleviated by her inspiring songs and unselfish kindness."

—The late SAMUEL APPLETON, of Boston, left a large estate. A favorite nephew, to whom he had bequeathed a large proportional amount, died before him, and by the terms of his will a half-sister, between whom and Mr. APPLETON there was no blood-relationship, became entitled to these bequests. The executor called Mr. APPLETON'S attention to the fact, thinking that he might wish to make some change in the disposition of his property. After taking the subject into full consideration, his reply was: "If in the other world there is any knowledge of what is done in this, I should not like to have my nephew, whom I so loved and trusted, find that my first act on learning the death was the revocation or curtailment of a bequest made in his favor, and which, if he had survived me, would have eventually benefited her who was nearest and dearest to him. The will must stand as it is."

Hosted by Google

Lambrequin for Baskets, etc. Tapestry-Work.

THIS lambrequin is suitable for ornamenting baskets, étagères, etc. It is worked with worsted and silk in the colors given in the description of symbols; the canvas may be coarse or fine, according to the width desired.



LAMBREQUIN FOR BASKETS, ETC.—TAPESTRY-WORK.

Description of Symbols: ▪ Black; ■ Dark Green; ▫ Light Green; ⊠ 1st (darkest), ▪ 2d, ⊡ 3d, ⁞ 4th (lightest), Fawn (the last silk).

Mignardise and Crochet Edging for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

FOR the edging shown by Fig. 1 crochet on one side of a piece of mignardise gimp, such as shown by the illustration, 5 rounds in the following manner: 1st round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on the next loop of the mignardise, ∗ 2 ch. (chain stitch), 5 dc. (double crochet) on the second following loop, 2 ch., 1 sc. on the second following loop; repeat from ∗. 2d round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the middle of the next 5 dc. of the preceding round, 7 ch. 3d round.—∗ 1 sc. on the first of the 7 ch. of the preceding round, 1 ch., 7 dc. on the middle of the 7 ch., 1 ch., 1 sc. on the last of the 7 ch. of the preceding round; repeat from ∗. 4th round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the middle of the next 7 dc. of the preceding round, 7 ch. 5th round.—∗ 1 sc. on the next sc. of the preceding round, and on the next 7 ch. work one point consisting of 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 5 dc., 1 sdc.; repeat from ∗.

For the edging shown by Fig. 2 crochet on one side of a piece of ordinary mignardise two rounds as follows: 1st round.—1 sc. on the next loop of the mignardise, ∗ 5 p. (picot — consisting of 7 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), 1 sc. on the same loop on which the first sc. was worked, three times alternately 2 ch., 1 sc. on the next loop, then 15 ch., 1 sc. on the same loop on which the last sc. was worked, 17 ch., 1 sc. on the same loop, 19 ch., 1 sc. on the same loop, 17 ch., 1 sc. on the same loop, 15 ch., 1 sc. on the same loop, three times alternately 2 ch., 1 sc. on the next loop; repeat from ∗. 2d round.—∗ 1 sc. on the middle of the next 5 p. worked in connection in the preceding round, 1 p., 1 sc. on the same p. of the preceding round on which 1 sc. has already been worked, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. loop of the preceding round, 1 p., 1 sc. on the following ch. loop, 1 p., 1 sc. on the next ch. loop, 1 p., 1 sc. on the same ch. loop on which 1 sc. was worked last, 1 p., 1 sc. on the next ch. loop, 1 p., 1 sc. on the following ch. loop, 3 ch.; repeat from ∗. On the other side of the mignardise crochet two rounds as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the next loop, 2 ch. 2d round.—1 dc. on each stitch of the preceding round.

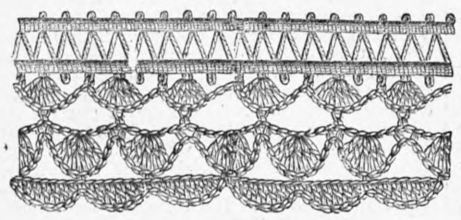


Fig. 1.—MIGNARDISE AND CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

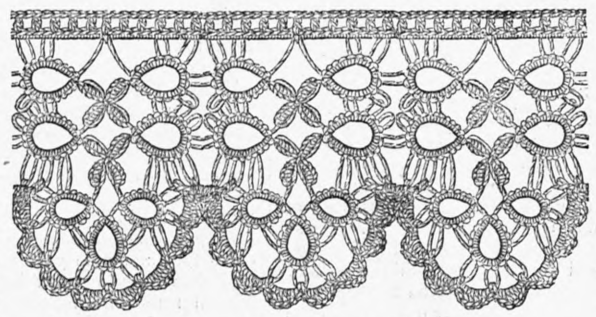

TATTED AND CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Tatted and Crochet Edging for Lingerie, etc.

THIS edging is worked with tatting cotton, No. 60. First work the separate figures inside of each scallop of the edging in tatting as follows: Leave a thread end several inches in length standing, and work one ring of 5 ds. (double stitch—that is, 1 stitch left, 1 stitch right), four times alternately 1 p. (picot), 3 ds.; then 1 p., 5 ds.; turn the work, and close to this ring work 2 Josephine knots, each of which consists of 6 stitches right. Turn the work, 1 ring of 5 ds., fasten to the last p. of the first ring, six times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 5 ds.; turn the work, and close to this work 2 Josephine knots. Turn the work, and after a thread interval of a quarter of an inch work 1 ring of 5 ds., fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring, four times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 5 ds.; now work 2 similar rings after a thread interval of an eighth of an inch each. Turn the work, and after a thread interval of a quarter of an inch work 2 Josephine knots, but after the first of these fasten on between the 2 Josephine knots worked last. Turn the work, and close to this work 1 ring of 5 ds., fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring, six times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 5 ds. Turn the work, 2 Josephine knots; after the first of these, however, fasten on between the 2 Josephine knots worked first. Turn the work, and work 1 ring of 5 ds., fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring, four times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 5 ds. Cut off the thread and tie the ends tight together, after a thread interval of half an inch each. This completes one figure. The following figures are worked in the same manner, but instead of fastening to the middle p. on the first and second rings, fasten to the middle p. on the seventh and sixth rings of the preceding figure. Having worked the requisite number of such tatted figures, border them on the upper and under edges with 3 rounds in crochet-work as follows: On the upper edge crochet the 1st round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on the knot which joins the thread ends of the next figure, ∗ 5 ch. (chain stitch), 1 sc. on the next p., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the next p., 1 sc. on the next p. of the following tatted figure, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the next p., 5 ch., 1 sc. on the knot which joins the thread ends of the next tatted figure; repeat from ∗. 2d round.—1 sc. on each ch. of the pre-

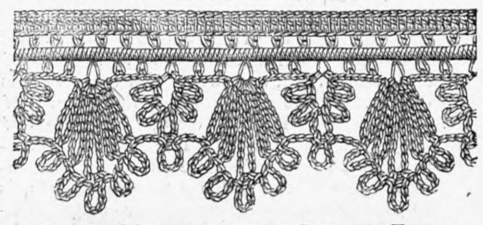

Fig. 2.—MIGNARDISE AND CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

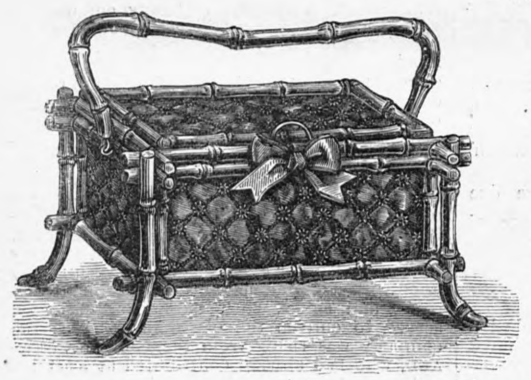

BRONZED BAMBOO WORK-BASKET.

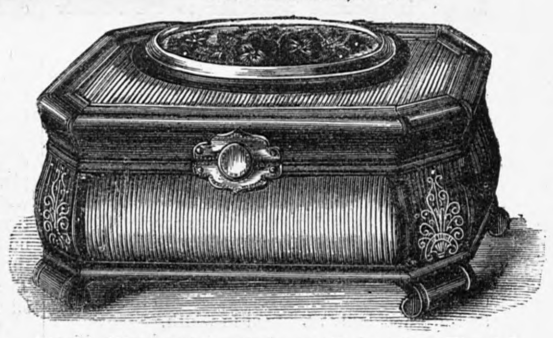

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED JEWEL-BOX.—[See Fig. 2.]

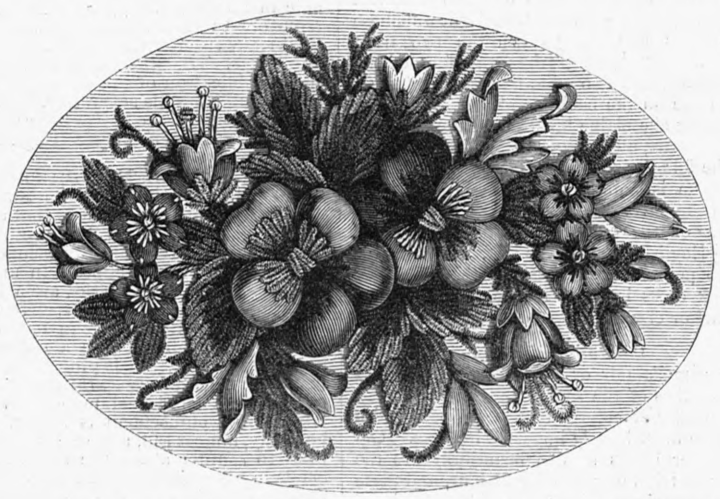

Fig. 2.—MEDALLION FOR JEWEL-BOX, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

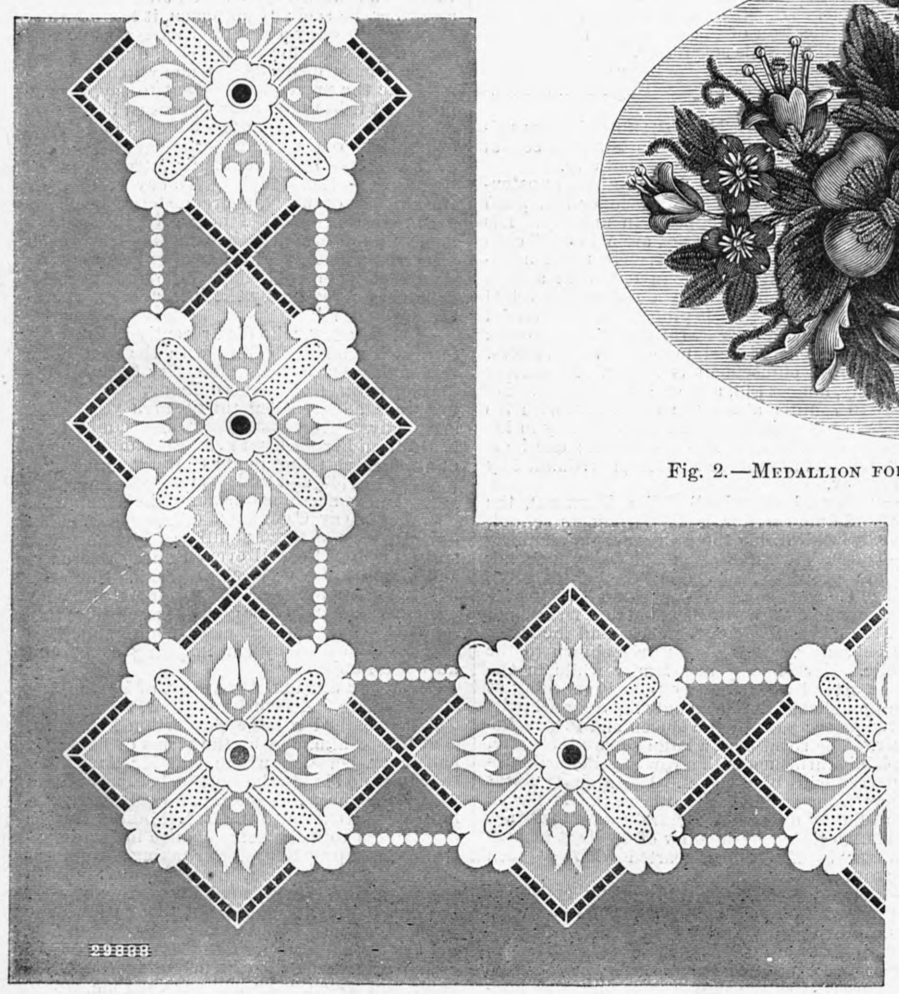

Fig. 1.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR HANDKERCHIEFS.—WHITE EMBROIDERY.

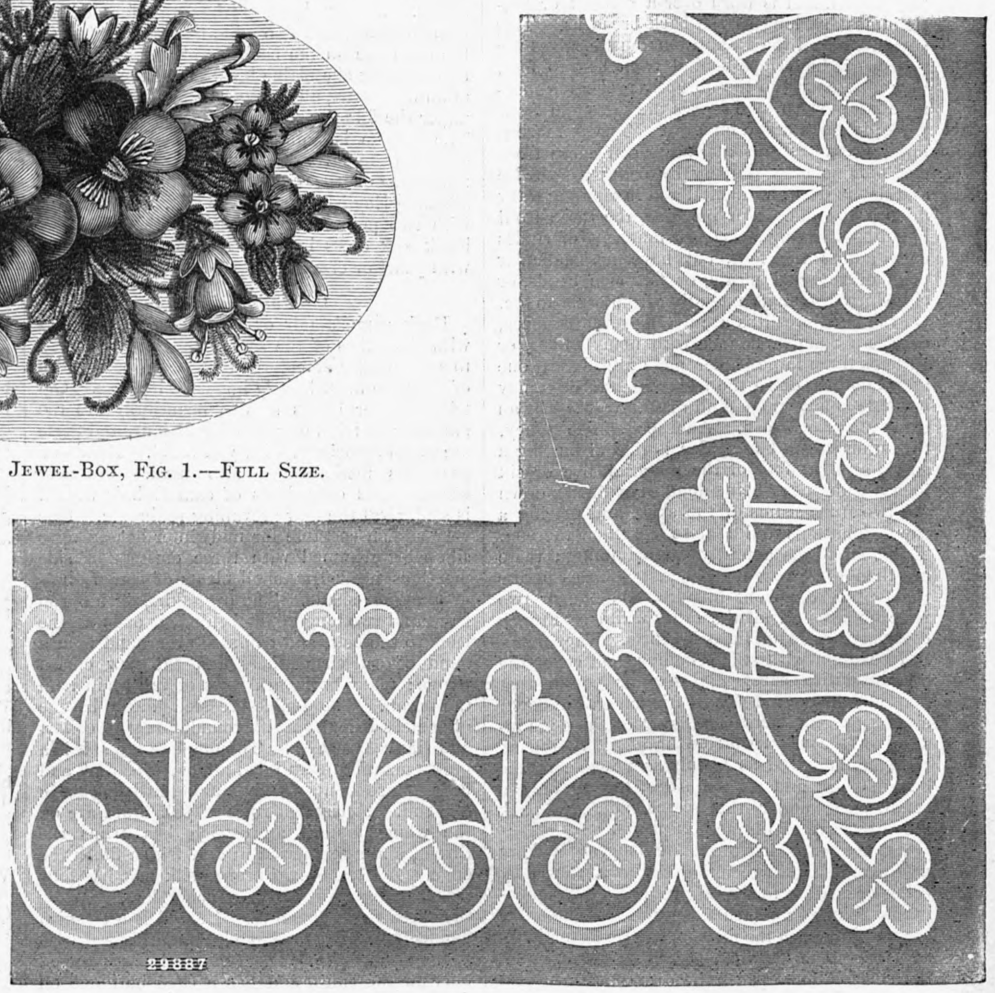

Fig. 2.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR HANDKERCHIEFS.—WHITE EMBROIDERY.

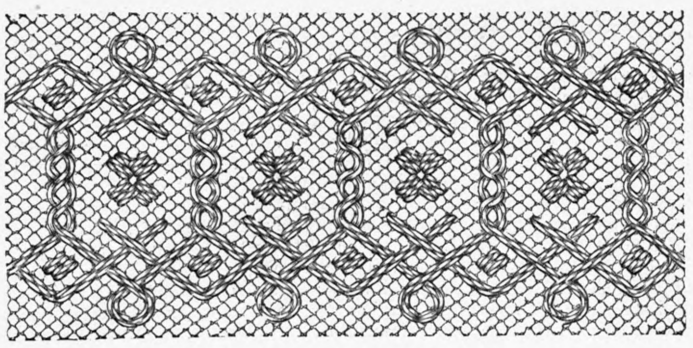
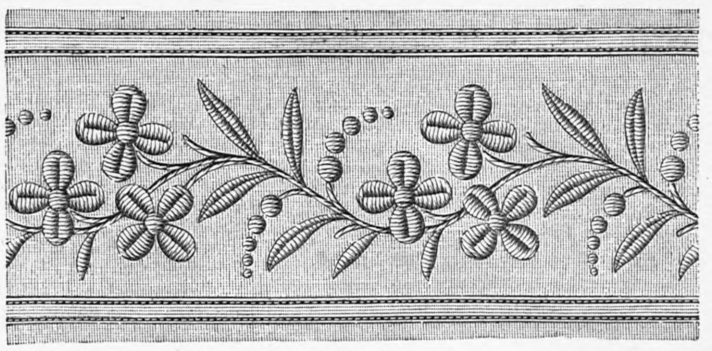
Hosted by Google



BORDER IN DARNED TULLE FOR NECKERCHIEFS, ETC.

ceding round. 3d round. — Always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet) on the next st. (stitch), 1 ch., with this pass over 1 st. of the preceding round. For the under edge crochet the 1st round.— ∗ 1 sc. on the second p. on the sixth ring of the next figure, 1 dc. on the first p. of the sixth ring and on the third p. of the fifth ring, seven times alternately 3 ch., 1 sc. on the next p., then 3 ch., 1 dc. on the first p. of the third ring and on the fifth p. of the second ring, 1 sc. on the fourth p. of the second ring, 3 ch., and repeat from ∗. 2d round.—On each ch. scallop of the preceding round work one point consisting of 1 sc., 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 3 dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc.



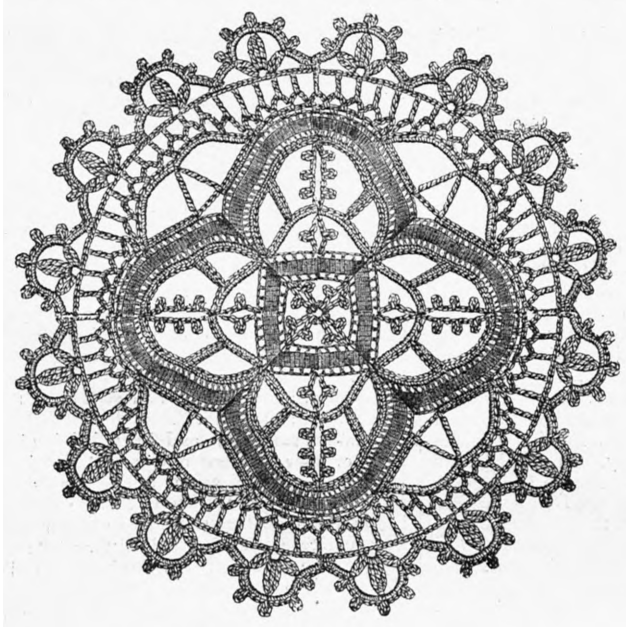
BORDER IN WHITE AND HALF-POLKA STITCH EMBROIDERY FOR LINGERIE.

Stand simulating an Easel with Portfolio, Figs. 1 and 2.

BOTH stand and portfolio are of brown stained and black polished wood, and are richly carved. The portfolio is designed for holding music, steel engravings, etc., and consists of two equal halves, which are joined by means of brown cords and tassels. The front of the portfolio is elaborately ornamented in raised application embroidery; the embroidery is worked on dark brown cloth. For the flowers of the middle spray apply white cloth; for the bell-flowers light red cloth, and for the star-shaped figures purple cloth; for the different leaves of the foliage apply green and brown cloth in several shades, and work the veins of the leaves and the point Russe sprays alternately with green and brown saddler's silk. The dots inside of the white flowers are worked with yellow silk in satin stitch, and the veins and slits with green silk in point Russe. For the stamens of the bells use blue silk, for the centre of the star figures gold beads, and for the veins gold thread. The ears are worked with maize saddler's silk and gold cord.

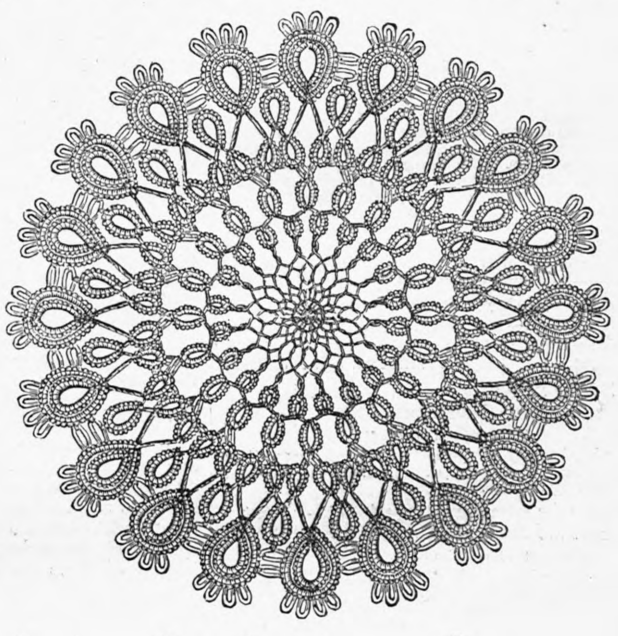
Rosette for Cravat Ends, for trimming Lingerie, etc.—Tatting and Lace Stitch.

THIS rosette may be used for various purposes, according to the size of the cotton with which it is worked. The original is worked with tatting cotton, No. 100, and with one thread (shuttle). Work, first, the outer edge of the rosette in the following manner: ∗ One ring of 12 ds. (double stitch—that is, 1 stitch left, 1 stitch right), 1 p. (picot), 12 ds.; on this ring work 1 ring of 7 ds., 1 p., 3 ds., 1 p., 7 ds., 1 p., 2 ds., 1 p., 1 ds., fasten to the p. of the first ring, 1 ds., 1 p., 2 ds., 1 p., 7 ds., 1 p., 3 ds., 1 p., 7 ds.; turn the work, and after a thread interval of half an inch work 1 ring of 4 ds., twice alternately 1 p., 2 ds., then 1 p., 4 ds.; turn the work, and close to this work 1 ring of 9 ds., fasten to the last p. of the second ring (double ring), 9 ds.; turn the work, and close to this work 1 ring of 4 ds., fasten to the last p. of the third ring, twice alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 4 ds.; turn the work, leave a thread interval of half an inch, and repeat 19 times from ∗, fastening the rings together, however, as shown by the illustration. Cut off the thread and tie the ends together. Inside of this circle work one more



ROSETTE FOR LINGERIE, ETC.—POINT LACE BRAID AND CROCHET-WORK.

Fig. 1.—STAND SIMULATING AN EASEL WITH PORTFOLIO.—[See Fig. 2.]



ROSETTE FOR CRAVAT ENDS, FOR TRIMMING LINGERIE, ETC. TATTING AND LACE STITCH.

Fig. 2.—APPLICATION EMBROIDERY FOR STAND, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

Hosted by Google

round, as follows: * One ring of 7 ds., fasten to the middle p. of two rings, observing the illustration; care should be taken, however, that this ring comes underneath a double ring of the first round, in a straight direction; 7 ds.; turn the work, and after a thread interval of an eighth of an inch work 1 ring of 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds.; turn the work, leave a thread interval of an eighth of an inch, and repeat nineteen times from *. Fasten the ends of the thread. The inside of the rosette is filled with lace stitches.

Embroidered Jewel-Box, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 612.

THIS jewel-box is covered with heavy red faille; the upper and under edges and the feet are covered with red Russia leather, which is ornamented with bronze trimmings. The lock, the rim of the lid, and that of the medallion are also of bronze. For the foundation of the medallion use gray faille, and work the flowers of double crape in the natural colors, as shown by Fig. 2. The flowers are applied hollow, and are then fastened by means of the veins, which are worked in point Russe with chenille. The leaves are partly applied in crape, and partly worked with chenille. The vines and sprays are worked in point Russe. The inside of the box is lined with gray silk.

Bronzed Bamboo Work-Basket.

See illustration on page 612.

THE frame of this work-basket is of bronzed bamboo bars. The covering consists of light blue satin, stitched in diamonds. On the intersecting points of the lines the material is ornamented, as shown by the illustration, with point Russe stitching of saddler's silk of the same color, and with a small button covered with light blue floss silk. The lining is plain satin, as is also the outside of the bottom. The basket is finished with a blue bow.

Corners of Borders for Handkerchiefs.—White Embroidery.—Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 612.

THE handkerchief border shown by Fig. 1 is worked on batiste. Before basting the material on a foundation furnished with the design, underlay it with the same material in the full width of the border. The parts of the design figures that appear all white are worked in satin stitch, and the dotted parts are filled with back stitches. The hem stitch seam is overcast very fine. Finally, cut away the underlaid material from the wrong side, as shown by the illustration.

The border shown by Fig. 2 is worked in a similar manner. Underlay double material in the width of the border, and overcast all the outlines and the veins of the design figures. Finally, cut away the superfluous material from the wrong side.

Border in Darned Tulle.

See illustration on page 613.

THIS border is designed for trimming neckerchiefs, lingerie, etc. The design is darned with glazed cotton.

Border in White and Half-polka Stitch Embroidery.

See illustration on page 613.

THIS border may be worked on fine linen as well as on Swiss muslin, nansook, or batiste. It may be used for trimming lingerie.

Rosette for trimming Lingerie, etc.—Point Lace Braid and Crochet-Work.

See illustration on page 613.

THIS rosette is suitable for setting together tidies, trimming lingerie, etc. It is worked with point lace braid and twisted cotton, No. 80. For the inside of the rosette arrange a piece of point lace braid in a small square, the four sides of which should be three-quarters of an inch long each on the outer edge; lay the braid in a pleat at each corner, and fasten the ends on each other. For the figure in the centre of the rosette make a foundation of 5 st. (stitch), close these in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and on this crochet as follows: * 1 sc. (single crochet) on the foundation st., 2 ch. (chain stitch), 1 p. (picot—that is, 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), 2 ch., fasten to the open-work edge of a corner inside of the square, 2 ch., 1 p., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. worked first., 1 sc. on the foundation st.; repeat three times from *, then cut off the thread and fasten it. On one corner of the square fasten the end of a piece of point lace braid, and crochet 2 rounds, as follows: 1st round.—1 sc. on the open-work edge of the corner on which the point lace braid is fastened, * 11 ch., 1 p. turned downward, 2 ch., fasten to the open-work edge in the middle of the next side of the square, 2 ch., 1 p. turned downward, 2 ch., 1 sc. on the ninth of the 11 ch., 8 ch., 1 sc. on the edge of the next corner; repeat three times from . 2d round.—12 sc. on each ch. scallop consisting of 8 ch. in the preceding round. In connection with the work finished thus far, and observing the illustration, crochet on one side of the projecting point lace braid, gathering the latter at the curves, the 3d round in the following manner: 12 sc. on the open-work edge of the braid, 7 ch., fasten to the fifth of the 12 sc. worked last in the preceding round, 7 sc. on the last 7 ch., 12 sc. on the open-work edge of the braid, three times alternately 2 ch., 1 p. turned downward; then 2 ch., fasten on between 2 of the 12 sc. worked last on one ch. scallop in the preceding round, three times alternately 2 ch., 1 p. turned downward; then 2 ch., 1 sl. on the twelfth of the 12 sc. worked last; 12 sc. on the edge of the braid, 7 ch., fasten to the eighth of the 12 sc. worked before the last 12 sc. in the preceding round, 7 sc. on the last 7 ch., 12 sc. on the edge of the braid, fasten on the next corner of the square, between 2 sc. This completes one scallop; the other three scallops are worked in a similar manner, and at the end of the round the braid and thread are cut off and fastened. On the outer edge of these scallops crochet the 4th round.— A quarter of an inch from the hollow of a scallop work 1 sc. on the edge of the braid, twenty-one times alternately 1 ch., 1 sc. on the edge of the braid, working so that after the last sc. a quarter of an inch yet remains to the hollow of the scallop; then 4 ch., repeat three times from ; finally, 1 sl. on the first sc. of this round. Cut off the thread and fasten it. 5th round.— 1 sc. on the sixth single ch. between 2 sc. in the preceding round, nine times alternately 4 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch., then 10 ch., 2 qc. (quadruple crochet), the first of these on the last sc. before the next 4 ch. in the preceding round, and the second on the first sc. of the next scallop, working off the upper veins of these qc. not separately, but together, drawing the thread through once; 10 ch., 1 sc. on the sixth single ch. between 2 sc. of the next scallop; turn the work, and on each of the ch. scallops worked previously work 14 sc.; again turn the work, and equally distributed on these 28 sc. work nine times alternately 1 sc., 4 ch.; repeat three times from ; finally, 1 sl. on the first sc. in this round. 6th round.—2 sl. on the next 2 st. of the preceding round, 4 ch., which count as first stc. (short treble crotchet); then, always alternately, 3 ch., 1 stc. on the next ch. scallop of the preceding round; finally, 3 ch., 1 sl. on the fourth of the 4 ch. which count as first stc. in this round. 7th round.— 5 ch., with these pass over 7 st. of the preceding round, 2 stc. on the next st.; the upper veins of these stc., however, are not worked off separately, but together, 5 ch., 3 tc. (treble crochet) on the same st. on which 2 stc. have already been worked; these 3 tc. are also worked off not separately, but together; 5 ch., 2 stc. like the first two on the same st. on which the 2 stc. and 3 tc. were worked, 5 ch.; with these pass over 7 st. of the preceding round, 3 sc. on the next 3 st. in the preceding round, and repeat fifteen times from . 8th round.— 5 sc. on the next ch. scallop of the preceding round, 1 p., 3 sc., 1 p., 3 sc. on the following ch. scallop, 1 p., 3 sc., 1 p., 3 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 1 p., 5 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 1 sc. on the middle of the 3 sc. in the preceding round; repeat fifteen times from *; finally, 1 sl. on the first sc. in this round.

ROYAL EPITHETS.

THE most elevated title which has ever been conferred upon kings and queens is the unworldly title of "Saint." Royal saints are comparatively numerous in the earlier history of Christian nations. Each of the kingdoms into which England was divided before its final unification under the kings of Wessex had its own saints. Royal saints, however, have become fewer and fewer as Christendom has grown older. This decrease of saints upon thrones is not, of course, the result of any increased wickedness of sovereigns as such; it is simply the necessary outcome of the gradual absorption of the ancient popular and democratic right of conferring canonization into the one person of the Pope.

The most saintly of all the canonized kings of whom we have any clear historical picture was the honest and lovable Louis IX. of France. We need no hagiographer by profession to bear witness to his marvelous sanctity; it comes out clearly enough in the somewhat worldly but awe-struck and admiring Joinville. There has been no "saint" upon the English throne since the death of Edward the Confessor. The canonization of Henry VI. was seriously proposed. Indeed, the people carried their part so far that statues of him were venerated, and he was for some time treated as a saint; but the accession of the rival house of York to the throne, and the impossibility of satisfying the Pope, prevented the meek and simple king from leaving his name upon the English list of sainted monarchs.

The Church of England, after the Restoration, was greatly inclined to canonize Charles I.; and until a late period he was constantly spoken of as a martyr, and there is at least one church in England called after his name. Mr. Carlyle, on the other side, has given his canonization to Oliver Cromwell. Some kings have had the title "saint" in one place and among certain persons, but have been no saints in other places and to other persons. This is remarkably the case with one of the greatest kings who ever reigned, and to whom the church probably owes more than to any earlier or later monarch—Charles the Great. The German Cæsars were able to reckon one undisputed saint among them, Henry II., who was elected in the year 1002. His wife shared the honor of canonization, probably from the fact that they had no children, and that she retired into a convent after the emperor's death. Austria has had her Saint Leopold (the Margrave), and Hungary her sainted Stephen, Ladislaus I., and Margaret. A full list of the kings and queens who have borne this epithet would leave too little room for the monarchs who appear in history with more earthly titles.

Probably the nearest epithet to that of "Saint" is that of "the Pious," which was borne by Charles the Great's weaker successor in the empire, Louis the Pious. Among Sweden's fourteen Erics (the name is the same as the German Heinrich and our Henry) she possesses in the ninth of the list an Eric the Pious. The ninth Eric of Sweden, like the ninth Louis of France, also bore the title of saint. Hungary and Spain are the only other nations which now occur to us as having given the epithet of Pious to either of their kings. Stephen the Pious, who died in 1308, was the first King of Hungary. The claim of Philip III. of Spain to his epithet of Philip the Pious has been vindicated by Archdeacon Churton in the interesting essay prefixed to his translation of the poet Gongora.

Perhaps the most desirable title any king could covet after that of "Saint" or "the Pious" (or perhaps before them) is "the Good." It was borne by many sovereigns between the eleventh and fifteenth centuries. Richard the Good, Duke of Normandy, the grandfather of William the Conqueror, died in 1026. Norway a few years later lost her Magnus the Good. Charles the Good, Count of Flanders, was assassinated before the altar of St. Donatus, in Bruges, early in the eleventh century. John the Good of France (the second French John), died in London in 1564. Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, whom the Council of Basle declared "First Duke of Christendom," has had the grounds of his title set forth by Comines. This mighty prince, who died at Bruges in 1367, was at once the patron of art, the developer of commerce, and the friend of scholars, and Erasmus compared him to those great ancients who were the ideal princes of the men of the Renaissance. George the Good was for a time, among a certain class of Englishmen, proposed as a fit designation for George III. The title has been given, with a fuller assent and on clearer grounds, to one who was not a reigning sovereign—the late Prince Albert.

The epithet which still demands the severest scrutiny of historical criticism in many of its specified applications is undoubtedly that of "the Great." There are a greater number of regal claimants for this than for any other title. Ancient history is full of them; as Cyrus the Great, Alexander the Great, Pompey the Great, Herod the Great, and many more. The Roman empire had on its Eastern throne, which was founded by a Constantine the Great, a Theodosius the Great, and a Justinian the Great. It was destroyed by a Mohammed the Great (the second). The German Cæsars, of whom a Charles the Great was the first, include in their list Otto the Great (the first) and Henry the Great (the fourth). The epithet is also borne by the fourth Henry of France. Russia had her Vladimir the Great in her first Christian king, and her Peter the Great; Poland her Casimir the Great (the third), Navarre her Sancho the Great. In the last year of the tenth century there were three contemporary monarchs with this epithet, Otto, Vladimir, and Sancho. Prussia has had her Frederick the Great, whose right to the epithet has been demonstrated with such pious admiration by Mr. Carlyle; and Hungary her Louis the Great (the first). The French le Grand seems better suited to the fourteenth Louis of France than the English word Great. Most of the sovereigns whose names have come down to us with this suffix have either been great conquerors, founders of great reigning houses, or great legislators who have marked an epoch in the political history of their peoples. Three kings have borne this title in England, Alfred, Canute, and William I.

"The Bold," a character of great esteem in the chivalrous Middle Ages, was borne by Boleslaus, the second duke and first king of Poland. The kingly crown was placed on his head by the German Cæsar, as presumed secular head of the Christian world. Burgundy had two Bolds—Philip, who died in 1404, and the famous Charles (called as often le Téméraire, or the Rash), under whom the great middle kingdom burst in pieces. The Bold princes were sometimes described by the suffix of the name of the king of beasts, as Louis VIII. of France, Louis the Lion; Henry the Lion; Duke Boleslaus I. of Poland, the Lion-hearted; and Richard the Lion-hearted of England. Philip the Bold's son is known as Duke John Fearnaught, or the Fearless; and Philip III. of France as Philip the Hardy. Such epithets as the Grim, borne by Kenneth IV. of Scotland, and by Ivan IV. of Russia, who first took on himself the title of Czar, mark the passage from the good use of strength to the bad use of it. We find among the kings of Castile a Pedro the Cruel, who died in 1369. The Emperor Henry VI. had received the same epithet in the end of the twelfth century.

Two kings of France have been decorated with the title which was coveted by James, the "British Solomon"—Robert the Wise (the second), in the end of the tenth century, and Charles the Wise (the fifth), the son of that John who died in England. Castile had her famous Alfonso the Wise, who reigned during the latter half of the thirteenth century. As late as the middle of the eighteenth century Spain called her Ferdinand IV. the Wise. Sancho III. of Castile is known as the Beloved, an epithet granted for a time to the wretched Louis XIII., but afterward recalled. It was borne earlier and more justly by a predecessor, Charles VI.

The moral epithets bestowed upon monarchs demand, in many cases, a critical reinvestigation. A great number of kings have been distinguished by their mere physical qualities. Thus we find a Spanish Sancho the Fat (the first) in the tenth century; he was preceded by a Frankish Charles the Fat in the ninth century. Portugal knows her Alfonso II. as the Fat. France had among her Capetian kings a Charles the Handsome (her fourth Charles), and a Philip the Handsome (also her fourth Philip). The latter is sometimes called the Fair, the epithet bestowed also upon Philip I. and upon the Austrian Frederick III. Some kings have taken their epithets from their physical defects, as two monarchs of the ninth century—Michael the Stammerer, on the throne of the Eastern Cæsars, and Louis the Stammerer, who was crowned Western Emperor by the Pope at Troyes. The Emperor Albert I. was known as Albert the One-eyed; the English Richard III. as Crookback; the Spanish Henry III. as the Sickly; and Boleslaus III. of Poland as the Wry-mouth. The sainted Emperor Henry is sometimes marked down as Henry the Lame. I might increase the list with kings known as the Black, the White, the Red, the Curly, the Gouty, the Short. All such titles are chiefly important to us as rough but characteristic expressions of contemporary criticism.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

A Chance for Mr. Barnum.—Gladstone's marvelous Brain-Power.—Criminal Selfishness.

THERE was at one time an intention on the part of your enterprising nation to purchase Shakspeare's House at Stratford-on-Avon, and carry it, body and bones, or, rather, carcass and joists, ceiling and window, roof and floor, across the Atlantic. I thank you for it, since that offer of yours induced us, though tardily, to become ourselves possessed of the sacred edifice, which is now national property. Well, you can't have Shakspeare's House, but you can now become possessed, for a trifle of £2400, of the very identical shop at Wagga Wagga in which the claimant to the Tichborne estates carried on his trade as a butcher. The walls, we are told, are enriched by little maxims for getting on in the world, in his own handwriting, and the whole desirable residence is redolent of him. It is advertised in the English papers for the sum I mention, but perhaps may be had a little cheaper on account of a recent decrease in our fat friend's chances of success, and therefore of his popularity. Indeed, his case is looking so shady that even his attorney withdrew from it last Friday. And think in what a state that case must be which will not hold an attorney!

Our Parliament has broken up, and Mr. Gladstone, adopting a practice he has borrowed from the United States without due acknowledgment, is already "stumping" the country. In addition to the Prime Ministership he has taken upon his Atlas-like shoulders the post of Chancellor of the Exchequer (without the salary), and it really seems as if he were bent upon destroying himself by overwork.

Mrs. Battle, in the Essays of Elia, used to "unbend herself over a book"—that is, in reading one—but Gladstone unbends himself, after unparalleled intellectual exertions, in writing a book, generally upon some abstruse subject of theology or disputed classical question. One's admiration for him is profound, even when we can not but differ from his opinions. He has certainly effected greater reforms than any English minister, and yet we now see him hated by the Tories, in whose teeth he has carried them, and deserted by the radicals, whom, as yet, he can not make up his mind to coalesce with. Old teaching, old prejudices, still weigh with him. The taint of aristocracy is on his soul (though not in his blood), and when the opportunity arrived last session for advancing young liberal members, who had only their talents and their merits to recommend them, he must needs put in office a man like the Duke of St. Albans—ignorant, dissipated, feeble, but "the hereditary Grand Falconer of Great Britain!" That so great a man as Gladstone should be so base a "snob," in the sense in which Thackeray uses the term, is most deplorable. All that his best friends can say is that he is not so subservient to noble names as he was; but in the mean time the democracy (as well they may be) are outraged with their idol. In spite of the floods of eloquence which he is now pouring forth, fresh and brilliant though they be as ever, the conservatives will, in my opinion, have a majority in the next Parliament; and, when they have got it, will either make a bid for popularity in a measure so democratic that the liberals will not dare to outbid them, or will give way once more to Gladstone, converted (for the fourth time) to liberal principles, and prepared to go very much farther down the steps toward universal suffrage than he has yet ventured. Only, when you see him, thin, pale, stern, a man without an amusement, and whose so-called relaxations would tax the powers of most men to the uttermost, the question that always suggests itself is, Can he live to do it? For my part, whenever I behold him it is with a sense of pain, as when I look at some wondrous acrobat, high over the heads of all men, attempting new feats every day, one of which must necessarily in the end destroy him. There is a terrible story of the late Grand Duke Alexander of Russia, a barbarous martinet and tyrant, who compelled one of his officers, whose horse had been unruly, to leap it over a pile of stacked bayonets. The noble animal accomplished the leap, to the admiration of all beholders save one; but the brutal duke compelled him to repeat it again and again, until the charger fell, transfixed and tortured. And similarly does Gladstone seem to be compelling his own gallant intellect, which has carried him so well over such huge obstacles, to attempt feats it is impossible to perform, and in which at last it must needs break down and perish.

Common ruffianism, as I fancy, judging by reports of your Western roughs and rowdies, we are more successful in controlling in this country than you are in the United States; but there is a certain diabolical selfishness which now and then manifests itself in England for which there seems no remedy. Some weeks ago a little child fell into the ornamental water in Regent's Park—which is known to be nowhere more than four feet deep—and three men (so called) declined to rescue it from death, upon the ground "that they were not going to wet their clothes." Again, last week a child fell out of its mother's arms into a river, and two men (?) who were fishing close by declined even to reach out their rods for the little thing to grasp at, upon the ground that "the top joints might come off" and be lost. In both cases the little victims were drowned, and there is no law that can punish these wretches for their conduct. In Prussia it is said that when even a very youthful offender is convicted of any act of diabolical cruelty, he is shut up for life, on the very intelligible ground that with such a nature it is impossible he can ever become a good citizen, but must needs grow up a curse to the community. Why should not this principle be generally adopted? Many a murderer, as it seems to me, is less deserving of the fate he meets with than such miscreants as I have described. What do you do with them? or are you so fortunate as to possess no such fiends in human form? The answer I have received from one eminent law-maker, to whom I have put this question, is that no one will take "the moral responsibility" of having men put to death in such cases. But if that is the only objection to an amendment in the criminal code, I do not say that I will answer (personally) for its removal, but let us form a company, divide the responsibility, and hang the villains.

It is a point of honor with some special correspondents never to own themselves in the wrong, even in the case of a hypothesis; but I will honestly confess to you that I have heard a report which would indicate that my theory respecting Bauer (the Russian supposed to have been assassinated in London by a political club of his fellow-countrymen) has broken down. The firm of which he was the traveling representative have, I am privately informed, become bankrupt, and lay their embarrassments in part to the absence of certain papers which they profess were in the missing man's possession. This, to my mind, looks very like preconcerted collusion, and spoils an incident sensational enough to have redeemed commercial life from the charge of commonplace for years to come.

As if in compensation for this loss, there comes a story from Lucknow, in India, of a native child who, having been carried away into the jungle by a wolf, was suckled by its four-footed consort, and presently returned to the bosom of his own family with some very strange tastes and habits, one of these being the snapping and biting at his father and mother; they have appealed to the British government to take them under its protection, and provide for the hybrid. What a chance is here for your Barnum! What opportunities for a showman, with ever so little acquaintance with Pinnock's Rome or Magnall's Questions, to make a little classical capital out of Romulus and Remus! Another story, which, if not so strange, has at least the merit of truth to recommend it, comes from our Indian empire, concerning the relations there between master and servant. It is not now permitted for an officer to chastise his native attendant, and if this happens in the presence of a witness, the "sahib" is fined five pounds. A certain young ensign having cause to be displeased with his native, accordingly called him into his bath-room, and addressed him in these words: "I have sent for you here, where there can be no witnesses, to give you a precious good thrashing." "But, sahib, you must not; it is forbidden." "What do I care? Nobody will ever know, for nobody can see or hear us." "Oh, sahib" (very pitifully), "but is that really true?" "Yes, it is." "Very good" (with rapid change of manner); "then I shall thrash sahib." And he did it. R. KEMBLE, of London.

Hosted by Google

THE ROMAN CATACOMBS.

THE Catacomb most generally visited is that of San Sebastiano, and the one most deserving of deep study is the Catacomb of San Calixto. About four miles eastward of Rome, between the Via Appia and the Via Ardeatina, under heaps of all sorts of débris and rubbish, close to cypress groves which deepen the sad solemnity of the landscape, lies hidden the largest and most remarkable of Christian cemeteries. It was a refuge for the persecuted, a dwelling-place for martyrs, a rest for the dead, a temple for the living, the assembly of those bold innovators who brought a new light into the world and a new sentiment into life. I advise my readers not to visit these sanctuaries without taking with them the books and maps of the celebrated Catholic archæologist, Bossi. As the explorer of American woods—that land of the future—advances armed with his short hatchet in those untrodden paths, cuts down the trees, drives away the reptiles, roots up the brush-wood, and creates by his labor a habitation for his family, so the archæological explorer of a subterranean world plunges into shadow, into the asylum of birds of the night, into crumbling dungeons, between labyrinths of grottoes, liable to be crushed by fragments from the fragile walls, to be lost forever in some corner of those cities of the dead, in that tomb of palpable darkness, mingling his bones with those traces he wished to snatch from the silence of sad and ungrateful forgetfulness.

The first thing which astonishes one on descending into the tombs is the gigantic labor of those who excavated them, without having either the mechanical or chemical means of our civilization. Though it is said these subterranean cities were opened for quarries, their especial peculiarities, their galleries placed one over the other—there are even as many as five stories of tombs—their disposition, that preserves a certain regularity, reveal a perfectly conceived and matured plan to which the construction of these passages has been submitted, probably by the early propagators of the new creed, who left there the germs of those doctrines which were to feed the souls of future generations. Even the nature of the soil has been studied with scientific attention. They have carefully avoided the argillaceous clay and chalk, the overflow of water, and all places that easily retain moisture; they have dug the tombs and temples in soft granular stone—volcanic, but hard and consistent, less accessible to damp, forged by the creating fire, and suited to all kinds of durable building. For it was essential to preserve these asylums not only from the fury of men, but from the calamities incidental to nature.

To this end the early Christians sought the protection of the laws. And the Roman law protected before all and above every thing in the world the places sacred to sepulture. The soil which was the property of the dead was undisturbed by the living. If land was sold, bequeathed, or given away, neither sale, testament, nor donation was valid to alienate the sepulchre, which was always excepted—always held in the possession of the families who placed there the ashes of their kindred. Thus the Christians could open graves in the depths of the earth, raise lofty monuments, and, under the title of adjacent ground, annex much land to the sepulchre—like the sepulchre, sacred. The Christians, profiting by the protection of the law for their cemeteries, took land, opened subterranean galleries, and there deposited the treasured remains of those of their sect and of their family. A series of Roman arches constitutes the true nucleus of the Catacombs. Thus by a superstitious respect of pagans for the rights of property, the Christians obtained a home for their worship and a resting-place for their dead. The same emperors who persecuted the Christians as believers respected them as proprietors. Collective property, such as was the property of the early Christians, had a legal existence in the code of laws and in the sanction of the tribunal. If there were confiscations, as in the reigns of Valerian and Diocletian, they were passing, exceptional, and interrupted; soon effaced by a restitution which proved the lasting nature of the right, as the restitution of Galieno and of Magencius. Yet, notwithstanding, the empire pursued illicit societies, and declared as such those religious communities which sacrificed to their dogmas the integrity of their lives. And Rome, which acknowledged the epilogue and synthesis of the ancient world, which admitted into her temples all the divinities worshiped among Asiatic peoples—Rome rejected the God of the Israelites and the God of the Christians; doubtless the other gods were, like her own, gods of nature, while the God of the Jew and the Christian was the God of the spirit, come to displace the material and powerful goddess of the earth—the goddess Rome. Notwithstanding this hatred, confirmed by so many persecutions, Rome respected all benevolent associations having for their object the interment or the praying for the dead, not questioning as to their religious belief when that tended to recognize immortality. Protected by this respect of the Roman people for the dead, the early Christians prepared their temples and cemeteries.

And the burial-places of the primitive Christians were necessarily very extensive. The Romans burned their dead, and collected their ashes in vases of marble or porphyry, while the Christians, who believed not only in the immortality of the soul, but also in the resurrection of the body, buried their dead entire in the sepulchres. Thus the cities of the dead soon assumed proportions as colossal as the cities of the living; and under triumphal arches, under the magnificent circus, under the temples containing the gods they believed eternal, under palaces where emperors reigned who thought themselves omnipotent—beneath all these there extended cities of tombs toward the four points of the horizon—cities with their streets, their cross-ways, their squares; cities of the dead, who, notwithstanding, quickened a new spirit destined to destroy ancient Rome and to build upon her ruins another civilization.—Old Rome and New Italy, by Emilio Castelar.

THE ROYAL YACHT CLUB-HOUSE, COWES, ENGLAND.

See illustration on double page.

THE accompanying beautiful engraving of the Royal Yacht Club-House, at Cowes, in the picturesque Isle of Wight, will interest our yacht-loving readers who like to see how such things are managed in England. What with international yacht races and boat matches, a strong sympathy prevails between the two nations in all that pertains to the nautical craft, and each is glad to take any useful hint from the other.

The Royal Yacht Club-House, or "Castle," as its owners delight to call it, is a pretty ivy-covered house standing in a well-kept garden, with a landing-place for boats, and a flight of steps just outside its gates. The only portion of the building which gives any excuse for its name is the row of sham castellated battlements overlooking the sea. It is here that all day long during the regatta week the yachtsmen and their friends congregate with telescopes and field-glasses to watch the progress of the races. However exciting it may be to those on board the competing vessels, the spectacle of a yacht race to those on shore is a quiet piece of enjoyment which need not be hurried over. One can turn out to see the start before breakfast, and then, after leisurely partaking of that necessary meal, return to witness the first round, go away again to smoke, chat, read, or sleep, and in the afternoon gather once more upon the water's edge to see the victorious yacht shoot up to the flag-boat and hear the ringing cheers with which its crew are greeted. The race over, the "Castle" quickly becomes the centre of attraction. There are crowds of men, women, and children, all appareled in costumes more or less nautical, and all eager to congratulate the winners on their success, or to condole with the losers on their ill luck. Boats arrive in quick succession from the various yachts, and the general topic of conversation is the behavior of the craft engaged in the race just settled. Those who have backed the winners are proportionately elate, while those who have lost are busily engaged in weaving ingenious theories as to the unforeseen causes which have brought about their discomfiture. Meanwhile refreshments are in great demand. There is a pleasant clatter of plates, knives, and forks, with now and then the pop of a Champagne cork, and this will go on until the shadows of evening remind people of the necessity of retiring early if they would be up in time to see the start next day.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

MANY curious topics were discussed by the savants of the Association for the Advancement of Science that recently met in Portland, Maine. Some of these topics were of popular interest, though perhaps not of great practical utility to the community. One learned professor presented two lengthy papers on the Brachiopoda, of whose embryology he has made close study by a long-continued series of microscopic observations; and naturalists will be grateful to him for the new light shed upon this creature. It may content unscientific people to know that the brachiopod is a molluscous animal, or small shell-fish, about the size of a filbert, found in deep water. It belongs to a very ancient genus, and has continued unchanged from the earliest geological periods. It is doubtful whether it will help us better to endure the variations of temperature to know the possibility that the sun, while mainly gaseous, may have a liquid crust. But it was learnedly suggested that this crust may consist of a continuous sheet of descending rain, not of water, but of the materials whose vapors are known to exist in the solar atmosphere, and whose condensation and combinations are supposed to furnish the solar heat. The startling question was mooted by one grave philosopher, whether the mammoth is still a living animal, the idea being suggested by the statement of a Russian convict in Siberia, who encountered on the banks of a river huge animals twelve feet high and eighteen feet long—how the creatures were measured was not mentioned—with tusks four feet in length. On account of this interesting discovery the convict was pardoned at the request of scientific men! "How a toad eats his dinner" was a subject which aroused the attention of the scientists; but the American toad is such a glutton that he can scarcely be considered as belonging to first-class society. A story was told of an old toad devouring twenty-three squash-bugs with great gusto, and then putting down ninety-four caterpillars on top of them, after which he retired under the piazza to digest his feast. Those who are fond of clams may be interested in the fact that the association, having in prospect a genuine clam-bake at the termination of the session, listened breathlessly to a paper showing that heaps of shells of fresh-water clams, similar to those found on the marine coasts, have been discovered on the shores of our interior rivers. Limestone with traces of fire, fragments of pottery, flints, and arrow-heads are found in the heaps. In one case traces were found of an ancient genuine fresh-water clam-bake.

"Deaths from Marasmus" is a conspicuous title in the reports of the Bureau of Vital Statistics. Infant consumption is a pitiful disease; and it has been for the comfort and possible relief of the poor, pale, pinched-looking little children that certain excursions have been arranged this past summer. Recently about seven hundred mothers and sick children were taken on board the barge Republic for a sail up the Hudson, and then a short distance down the bay. It was sad to see the effects of diseases engendered by scanty and innutritious food, lack of proper care, and confinement in the unwholesome atmosphere of tenement-houses. But the poor little creatures seemed to enjoy every moment, and from the fresh air to receive a new lease of life.

About fifty of the "Thousand Isles" have been recently purchased by persons from various parts of the country for summer residences. Several cottages have been already erected, among which is that of Mr. Pullman of palace-car fame. These islands vary in size from one to ten acres each, and are covered with evergreen trees.

A colored preacher in St. Augustine was overheard by a Northern lady giving to an attentive assembly an account of the deluge. He closed his fancifully embellished history as follows: "And de rain come down in big spouts, and come up to de do'-step of de houses, and 'gin to cober de flo', and den de sinner be scaret, and knock at de do' ob de ark bery hard. And de big lion hear de racket, and roar, and de dog bark, and de ox bellow, but Noah keep on readin' de Bible. And de sinner say, 'Noah, Noah, let us come in.' And Noah say, 'I bery sorry, but I can't let you in, for de Lord hab lock de do' and trow away de key.'"

The Austrian Emperor—so goes the story—visited the American Department at the Vienna Exposition, examined, among other things, the American wine, looked at the labels, asked their qualities, and whether there was any special variety not grown in Europe. This question inspired one exhibitor from California. The golden-necked bottle was all ready in cooling ice, the Champagne glasses stood by, when the Emperor sauntered along that way. "What wine is this?" he asked. "Champagne. Will your Majesty test our American wine?" And the Californian raised a glass, and put the knife to the cord. The imperial monarch paused an instant, looked the audacious American full in the face, smiled, said "No, thank you," and passed on.

Some remarkable feats of climbing have taken place this year among the tourists who have visited the Alps. M. De Dechy, a Hungarian, was the first this year to climb the Dent Blanche. Accompanied by two guides from Zermatt, he bivouacked on the Wandfluh, and the following day reached the summit of the mountain, descending the same evening to Evolena. This is the first time that the ascent has been made from the valley of Herens. The Dent Blanche is 13,434 feet high, and was first ascended by two travelers in 1862. Dr. Dubi, of Berne, went up the Jungfrau in eight hours and a half, returning to the little Schiedegg by the Silberlucke and the Guggi glacier. M. Haberlin, a French gentleman, ascended the Finsteraarhorne by quite a new route. M. Lavater, of Zurich, member of the Swiss Alpine Club, climbed to the summit of the Grand Combin, one of the peaks of the Great St. Bernard, accompanied by two guides, this being the first successful ascent of that mountain this year.

A new invention is the swimming collar, a thin, light, India rubber tube, which is placed around the neck, and inflated by means of a small tube long enough to reach the mouth. The collar is inclosed in a case of elastic cotton, which sustains the outward pressure. The collar weighs about two ounces, but its buoyancy will raise a person's head above the water, and float him safely.

An exchange mentions, as an indication of the capacity of the Chinese for civilization, that a Chinese cook in San Francisco fell in love with his employer's daughter, but his passion not being returned, he fired three pistol-shots at her heart. If such deeds as this are tests of civilization, the Chinese have considerable progress yet to make before they can compete with New Yorkers of the same type. A short time ago a man in this city shot a woman because she would not marry him. She had declined to marry him—first, because she did not like him; secondly, because he was a bad man; thirdly, because she was engaged to another man; and fourthly, because the man himself had one wife with whom he was living. One would naturally suppose that these reasons were sufficient to warrant a woman to refuse marrying a man without being shot for it.

Texas must be a good place to emigrate from, if it produces any assortment of creatures like one which was recently sent to the First Assistant Postmaster-General at Washington. It was a centipede measuring eight inches in length—not alive, but inclosed in a hermetically sealed bottle of spirits. Before it was sealed up, however, it inflicted a bite upon a fisherman, causing his death in a few hours.

About eight hundred men are now engaged in cutting granite at Dix Island for the New York Post-office.

The highest prize given by the Vienna Commissioners is the grand diploma of honor, the second the medal of progress, the third the medal of merit, the fourth the honorable mention. Four of these have been awarded in this country for excellence in methods and for progress of education—namely, to the National Bureau of Education, to the State of Massachusetts, to the city of Boston, and to the Smithsonian Institution, Washington. Four others have been awarded to private individuals for machinery of different kinds, for progress in iron manufactures, and for dentistry. There was much competition in sewing-machines, one of which received a medal of merit, and several others medals of progress. Some fifty exhibitors in the American machinery department will receive medals.

The Court Journal informs us that Van Amburg's trained elephant, "Hannibal," broke open the wagon of a stall-keeper, who followed the show, and gobbled down six thousand gingerbread cakes, seventy pounds of assorted candy, and forty pounds of French kisses, mottoes and all. He still lives.

Wellington, South Africa, is given as the town which is to lay the foundations of an educational institution patterned after the Mount Holyoke Seminary. The plan originated in one of the prominent pastors of Cape Colony reading the life of Mary Lyon, the founder of Mount Holyoke Seminary. He felt that Africa needed just such an institution; his people—chiefly English and Scotch residents—agreed with him. Accordingly they sent to Mount Holyoke for a lady who would undertake this great work in a distant land, pledging her salary and the expenses of the voyage. It was decided that one lady should not go alone; two were found, both graduates of Mount Holyoke and experienced teachers, who were willing to go. Their passage-money has been forwarded, and about the middle of September they will sail for Cape Colony.

A very curious method for photographing the apparent contact of Venus with the sun has been invented. The photographic plate is in the form of a disk, fixed upon a plate which rotates upon an axis parallel to that of the telescope. Before it is placed another disk, forming a screen, in which is a small aperture, in order to limit the photographic action to the edge of the sun. The plate which carries the sensitive disk has 180 teeth, and is placed in communication with an escapement apparatus actuated by an electric current. At each second the pendulum of a clock interrupts the current, and the plate turns one tooth, so that at each second a fresh portion of the photographic plate is exposed. Thus in as many seconds 180 images of the sun and the planet can be obtained. When the series relating to the first contact is obtained, the plate is withdrawn and another substituted, which gives the second contact, and so on for the four.

They have long Sabbath services in London, if we are to judge from a recent advertisement in an English newspaper: "St. James's Church—On Sunday next the afternoon service will commence at half past three, and continue until further notice." This must be rather severe in warm weather.

Slavery seems still to exist. A woman with three small children presented herself, not long ago, at the office of the Commissioner of the Poor, in Leavenworth, Kansas, in a fearfully ragged condition, and asked for assistance. She said she had been held in bondage by parties on the east side of the river, in Missouri, and on attempting to escape was taken back to her old quarters and terribly beaten. She made her escape for the second time, but could get away only three of her children, two boys having been taken from her.

USEFUL RECIPES.

OYSTER STEW.—Carefully drain the juice from one quart of oysters, removing them from the liquor with a spoon, not piercing with a fork. Measure the juice, and if not half a pint in quantity, add water enough to fill the measure. Place over the fire in a porcelain stew-pan, adding a piece of butter the size of a large walnut. When it comes to a boil carefully remove all scum that may arise. Put in the oysters, and let them heat through, not cooking enough to shrivel them; add a little more than half a pint of cream, let it all scald through again, remove from the stove, and season to suit the taste. New milk will do instead of cream, and the stove should be very hot, so as to cook them quickly.

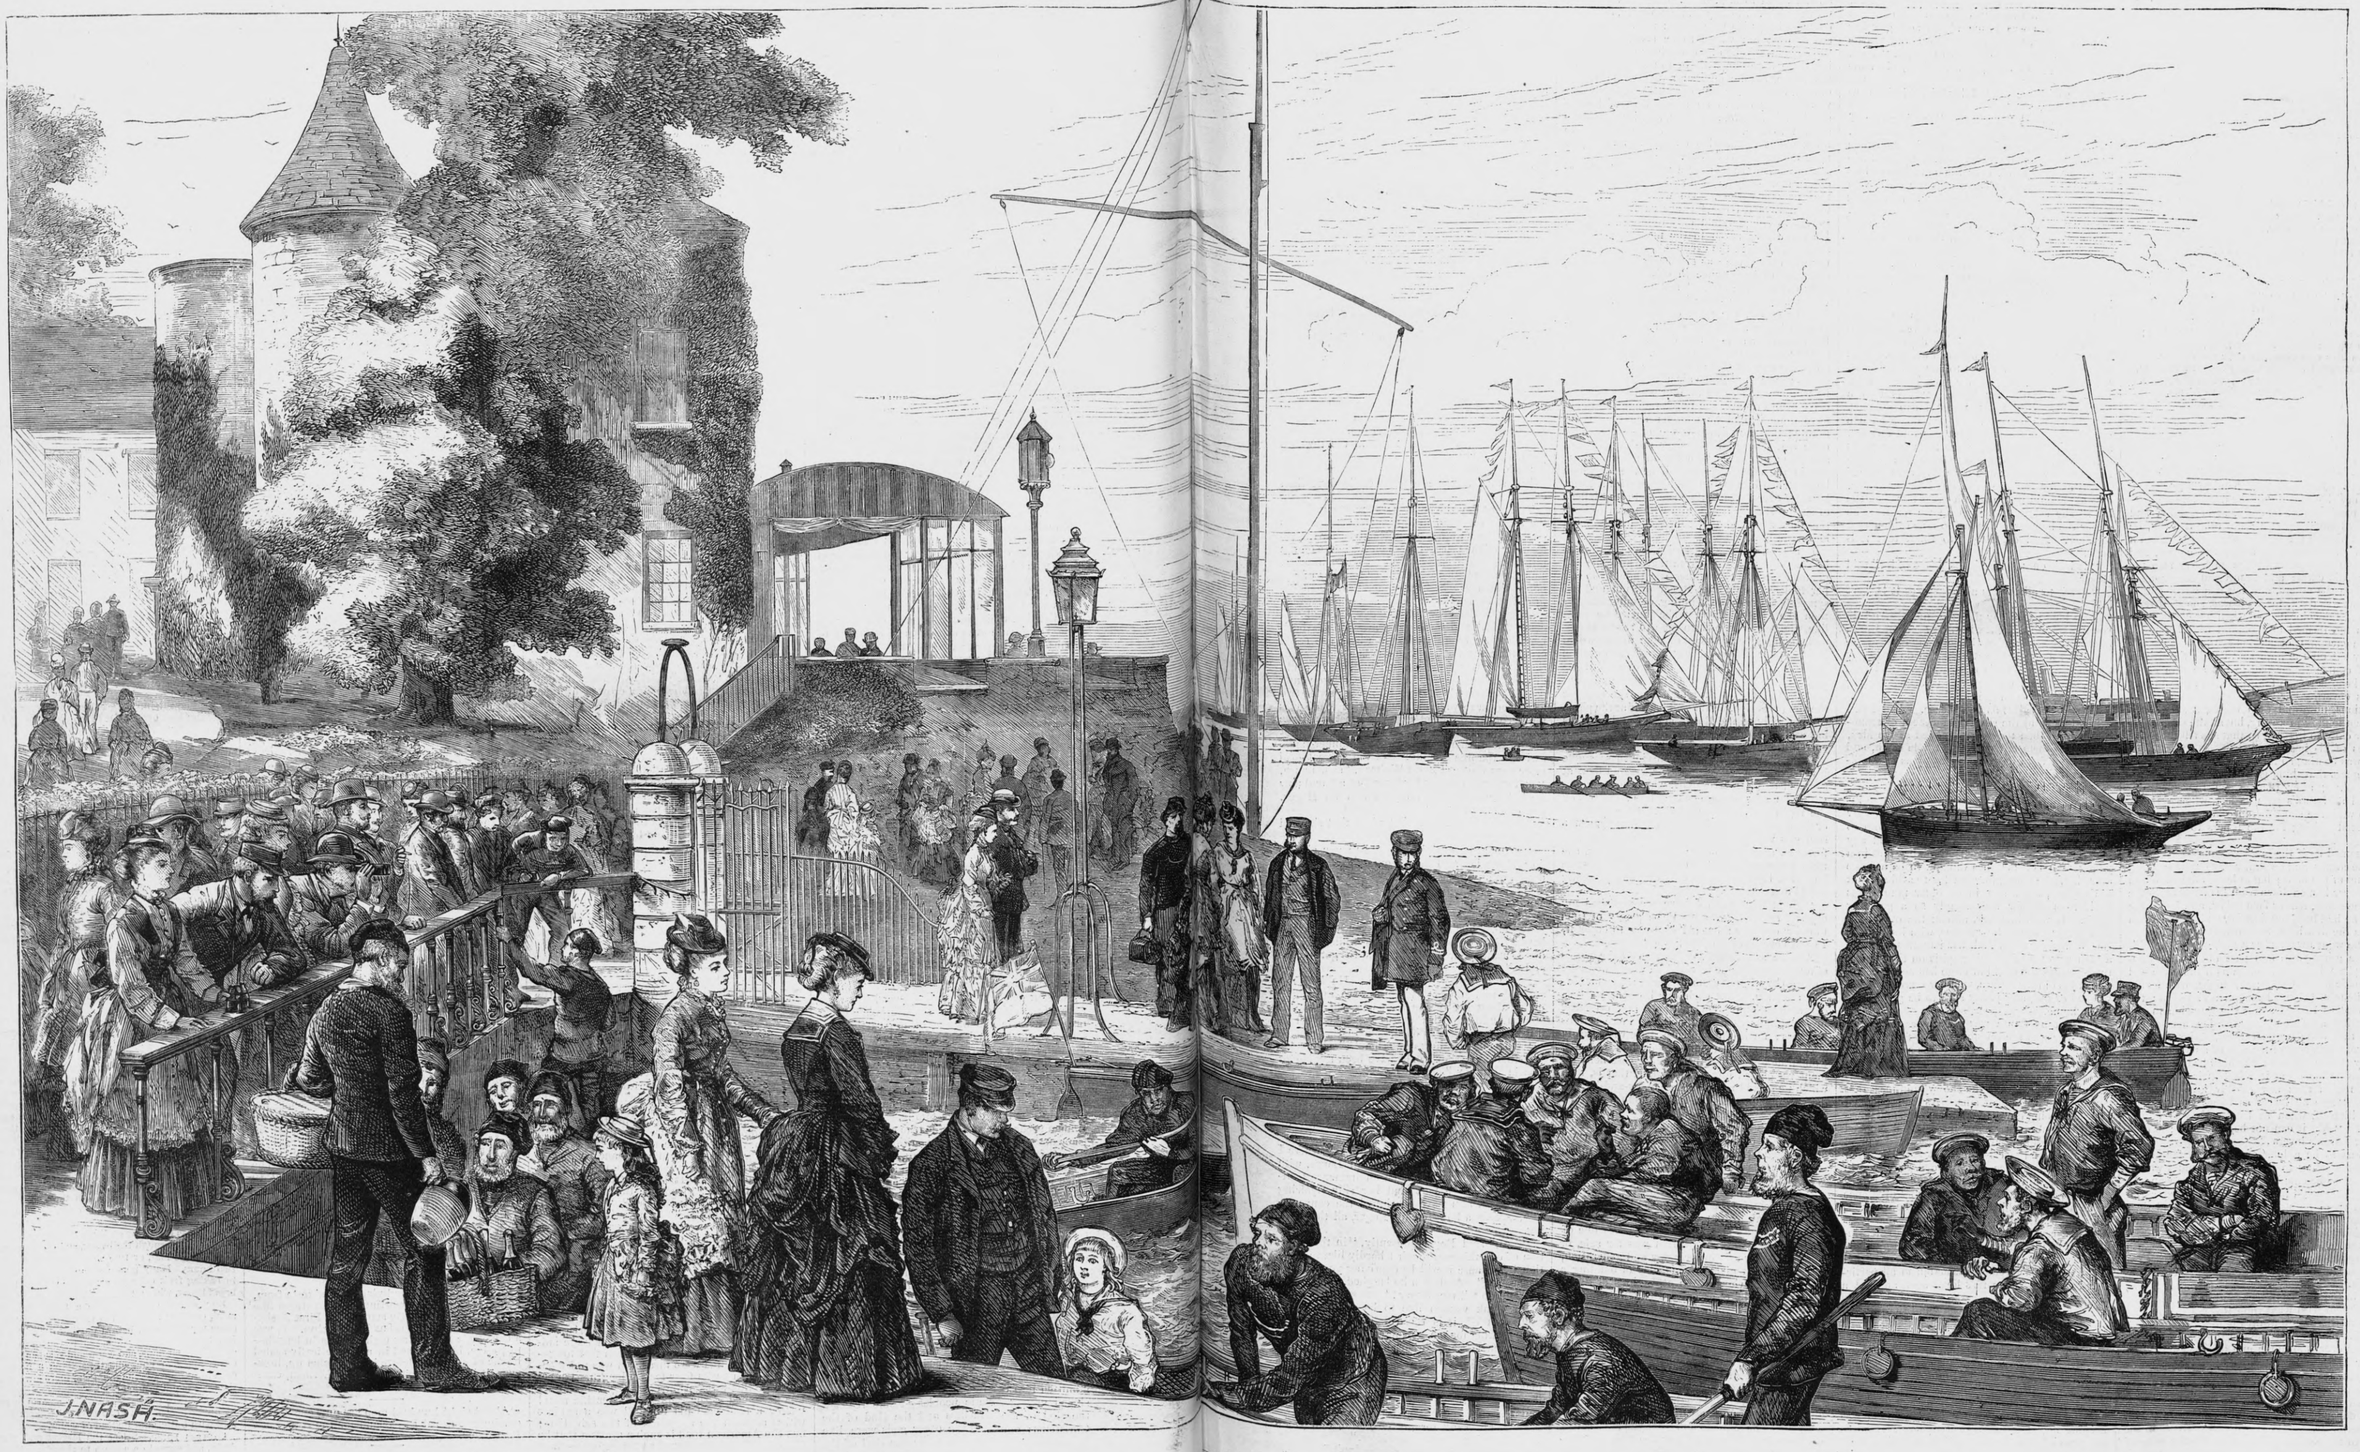
FRUIT CAKE, EXCELLENT.—The day before the cake is to be made stone and cut fine the raisins, wash the currants (and see that they are carefully dried, or the cake will be heavy), and cut the citron into small thin slices. To every pound of brown sugar allow three-quarters of a pound of butter, three pounds each of currants and raisins, one pound of citron, one pound of sifted flour, five nutmegs grated, half a tea-spoonful of cloves, half an ounce of cinnamon, twelve eggs, and half a tumblerful of best brandy. Wash the butter well, remove all the water, and when the butter has been well creamed add slowly the sugar; when these have been made perfectly light, stir slowly in the beaten yolks of the eggs, alternating the flour and well-beaten whites; then the cinnamon and cloves; mix a small quantity of flour through the fruit, to prevent it going in lumps through the cake. Now stir in the fruit, a small quantity at a time, alternating it; and when it has been long and well stirred, so it is certain to be mixed through the batter, add the brandy. Bake in one large loaf, or two small ones, in a slack oven two hours. Many persons who have not experience in baking fruit cake prefer sending it to a cake or bread baker, where it is certain to be well done.

BUCKWHEAT CAKES.—Make a thin mush of corn meal, cooking it about ten minutes; allow it to become perfectly cool before putting the cakes to rise. In mixing the cakes take a pint of the mush to a quart of buckwheat flour, add water and yeast as in ordinary cakes made of buckwheat. Making a mush of the corn meal prevents the raw taste there always is when the meal is put in uncooked.

BUCKWHEAT CAKES, No. 2.—Three parts by measure of buckwheat flour to one part of Graham flour, and mix with buttermilk instead of water.

OYSTERS FRIED.—Select the largest and plumpest, drain, and spread on a cloth to absorb all the liquor; beat until light the yolks of two or three eggs; dip in an oyster, then into rolled cracker, again into the egg, and then in cracker. Have the butter perfectly hot, and enough in the dripping-pan to cover the oysters, just as in frying doughnuts or fritters. Lay them in one at a time; when brown, turn and brown the other side. Cooked in this manner they are less greasy than where there is only fat enough to fry them in the ordinary way.

Hosted by Google



THE ROYAL YACHT CLUB-HOUSE[illegible]WES, ENGLAND.—[See Page 615.]

Hosted by Google

THE ASH POOL.

THE wet wind sobs o'er the sodden leas,
And wails through the branches of leafless trees,
As mourning the seed in the fallows lost,
And the pale buds peeping to die in the frost,
When winter asserts his lingering reign,
And his sceptre glitters on hill and plain.
Drearily meadows and uplands lie
'Neath the low long sweep of sullen sky;
And sad and still as the hushed green Yule,
'Neath the straggling boughs lies the Great Ash Pool.

Black and cold, and stagnant and deep,
No silvery fins from its waters leap;
No brown wings' flutter, no pattering feet,
Tell that life in its banks finds safe retreat;
No lily-buds to its surface cling,
But docken and nightshade around it spring;
The very trees that about it stand
Are twisted and gnarled as by witch's hand.
And the ghost of a story of sin and dule
Like a mist hangs over the Great Ash Pool.

When June's soft magic is on the earth,
And the rose and the violet spring to birth—
When the bright becks dance 'neath the bright leaves' shade,
And the wild birds carol from glen and glade—
Not a sunbeam glints on its breast to play,
Not a murmur welcomes the golden day;
No children loiter beside its brink,
No shy fawn lingers its wave to drink.
The old trees' shadow is deep and cool,
Yet no lovers keep tryst at the Great Ash Pool.

Yet once by its waters wild vows were spoken,
In passion heard, and in falsehood broken;
Two bright heads over its margin bent,
When the moon to its depths soft radiance lent;
A little while and one face lay there,
With its blue eyes glazed in their last despair,
Eyes that stared upward, through weed and slime,
With their story of sorrow and shame and crime.
So, in glory of summer, or gladness of Yule,
A curse hangs over the Great Ash Pool.

BY-AND-BY.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

WHEN Laura gave her hand to Roger Gregory that evening in the dark, and he kissed it passionately, tenderly, reverentially, and she only trembled and did not take it away, he thought himself the luckiest man alive. Then a lantern came swinging round the corner, and the whole party were bidden to hurry into the great picnic carts; and Laura and Roger came up to join the others, and felt it a blessing that the night was dark, for, as it was, she still trembled, and the color had forsaken her cheeks, and he was too flushed and radiant with his joy to like the encounter of curious eyes.

They sat on the high seat beside the driver, and of course Roger had to put an arm about her to keep her from falling off, and all the way he was covering her silence with jests and exclamations, now and then telling a story, now and then joining in a song, but all the time holding her close to himself, so that she felt the great plunges of his heart, and thrilled to think that heart was beating so for her.

"I guess that thing is settled," said Mrs. Gifford, looking after them, when they had descended at Laura's gate at last, whence Roger was to walk the short distance home, and where they stood waiting for the others to be out of sight.

It seemed as if the great wagons never would turn the corner, and be shut away by the bending branches of the elms; but at length they did, and then Roger looked down from his height into the face, the sweet, tender face below, and heard the words he had been longing for, and pressed upon the lips the first long, fervent kiss of love.

As he went away, after a while, over the hill, past the grave-yard, and past old Squire Benham's place, it seemed to him as if the earth had been made for this hour; the night, with its sacred silences, belonged to him and Laura; the little birches rustled along the way-side in the sweet wind, as if trembling with joy themselves; a bird that woke in the thicket, and sung over and over again some fragment of its song, seemed only their confidant; the high heaven full of stars, as he looked at it, lifted their love into a loftier region than any earthly love can ever reach. "Are all lovers as happy as this?" he asked himself, when at length he was falling asleep. "Ah, it can not be," he said; "they are not Laura's lovers!"

It was to be a long engagement, for Roger was just starting in business, and must wait a while before he could have the home he wanted; and until he could have things very nearly as he wanted them he preferred to wait. And then there are great pleasures in a long engagement, he told himself: there is the certainty of possession, the delight of homage, the perspective into the happy future; and he went to work with a will. Of course the engagement was happy enough. Laura was not a girl accustomed to so much in the past as to be exacting now, and she was content with what time Roger had to spare her, and there were always letters twice a week from his place of business in the city, to which he went every morning; and then the other side of her life was such a different thing that this engagement seemed like a glimpse into a possible paradise, and gave her heart to toil along over all the rather dismal present. For Laura was a dependent in the family of a cousin, a sort of superior drudge there, with an overseer in the place of the cousin-in-law, who, for the sake of her own girls, was rather jealous of Laura's grace, of her pleasant ways, and of her face, which, if not really lovely, yet was apt to seem so beside the decidedly plain faces of the girls of the cousin-in-law, who accordingly made her place no sinecure.

Still, if this home had always been dismal when compared with that of the expected future, Laura was not so discontented with it as to be willing to leave it unworthily, and though she had not been without lovers, she had never given one of them a thought till Roger Gregory came upon the field; and with Roger she fell so instantly and deeply in love that in very shame she had to counterfeit a coldness that caused him to exert every effort to overcome it, and that made him value her far more than if she had been, so to speak, an easy prey. Nevertheless, if the home was not quite unhappy to Laura, it was hard; it was constant care and constant work, and she was losing bloom and growing thin and pale, when Mrs. Gifford, the village busybody, said boldly one day to Roger, "Well, Mr. Gregory, so I hear you are going to be married?"

"One of these days, I hope," said the contented Roger.

"Well, I trust Laura'll be alive when one of these days comes, that's all!" said Mrs. Gifford. "She's wearing out in the service." And then as she went on, and paused to turn and look after Roger, and think over the amazement that had filled his eyes at her words, she softly said to herself, "I shouldn't wonder if that thing was settled now, at any rate," and went her way.

So it was not such a long engagement after all; for the very next season there was a quiet little wedding, a quiet little journey, and Laura was settled at last in a home of her own. To be sure, it was a modest home—a tree-embosomed cottage, out of whose long windows you stepped into an old-fashioned garden, with lilac alleys and bending apple-trees, with beds of stately hollyhocks, blue Canterbury-bells, red London-pride, and rows of great white day-lilies, that made the air almost too sweet to breathe. And here Laura looked forward to unexampled bliss. "It isn't good enough for you," Roger said, when he brought her home. "It is only a make-shift. But it is the best I can do now. By-and-by we will see. If you don't have a great house on the hill, with gas and furnace, and hot and cold water, before I am many years older, why, then I deserve to have Squire Benham's wife wear silk and my wife wear alpaca!"

But as for Laura, she was satisfied with this. "What should we do with a great house on the hill?" she said. "This is all we need. The cozier the happier. We are so much the nearer together. And oh, Roger, to think that it is ours!"

"It isn't ours. That's the deuce of it!" said Roger.

"Well, to all intents and purposes it is, isn't it?"

"So long as we pay the rent, puss. And do you think I am content with that? Then you're mightily mistaken, Mrs. Gregory, my love! And the first thing I shall set myself to do is to buy this house for a basis of operations, and that done, we will lay our galleries to attack the big house—the house on the hill."

"Well, dear, just as you please. And I will help all I can by the most rigid system of economy." And then they both laughed at the idea, laughed at themselves and the whole earth, and went about from day to day, happy as two children at their play.

But Roger meant all he said, and much more. He was going to be a rich man, and to have his wife a rich woman. He had a singular vanity that he called pride, and that forbade him to rest while there was in his neighborhood any body better off than himself—a quality that in a young man is sometimes thought to be a noble ambition, a reaching forward for the things that are beyond, but which, in an older man, bares itself to a plainer view simply as a grasping spirit. It was, however, almost the only fault that Roger possessed, or rather, with its auxiliaries, it was, for every fault has its parasites; and a man who has a grasping spirit on the side he turns toward the world at large has necessarily a selfish bias in his nature, whether thoroughly developed or not, and pretty sure to be guessed at in his home.

But not by Laura was such guessing done, not by her was the possibility of a fault in her idol suspected. To her Roger was a model and a marvel of a man. He had some of those qualities that always win women—the charming manner, the ready wit, and the showy kindliness that covers a multitude of sins. As Laura looked after him going down the garden walk, and pausing at the gate to wave another farewell—looked at the handsome figure, the sparkle of the eyes, the waving of the crisp hair—it seemed to her that the human race had reached perfection in him, and nothing finer could be subject to mortality. Nor would it have made any difference if she had been told the truth—that he was simply an ordinary man: a Claude Lorraine glass makes every landscape picturesque. It is, indeed, to be questioned if at the last, and in spite of every thing, she ever admitted to herself that he was not a supreme satisfaction in all particulars. Hers was a wife's loyal soul, and not a critic's.

At the beginning the novelty and the freedom of her life absorbed her so much that she had not time to think of those little minutiæ of devotion in which a discriminating consideration would have showed her that Roger failed; and then it was such a delight to do for him that it never occurred to her to think whether or not he was doing for her. Of course he was doing for her; he had made this home for her, and he was keeping her in it—self-apparent facts. And so she proceeded, after the fashion of typical good wives, to develop the selfish side of her husband by every service in her power. She never disagreed with him, to begin with. Roger's word was law: if he had pronounced the sky pea green, pea green it would have been for Laura. She never kept him waiting one instant. He might keep her waiting for hours. She had sixty excuses ready for him. If he did not come down in the first train, dinner was delayed for him; and if the cook objected to this postponement that hindered her early evening visits, Laura dismissed that cook and prepared the dinner herself—prepared such a dinner as the cook would never have dreamed of, and that made Roger inclined to wish there were no other cook—until she could find a handmaiden whose ideas agreed with her mistress's hours. She wanted Roger's home to be the most attractive place in all the world to him, independently of her own presence in it. She kept it, then, neatly, as a good engineer keeps his machinery: not a particle of soil or dust any where to be seen, flowers always about. When he came home in the evening there were lamps lit in the distant part of the house, but he entered a twilighted region of open windows, muslin curtains that the breeze was blowing out in an atmosphere of honeysuckle, mignonette, and roses, and it might have seemed to him, had he given himself time to think about it, that his cottage was built just upon the outskirts of Eden.

And so it did seem for a while—so it always did, in fact—only he soon ceased to give himself that necessary time. He was busy with his work, always driving forward as if there were worlds to conquer, and only to-day to do it in. He was off at seven in the morning; he was away till seven in the evening. As soon as dinner was over there was somebody to be seen on a matter of importance to him, or else somebody came to see him. Then Laura sat alone, unless a neighbor came in—the busy Mrs. Gifford, or one of the plain cousins, who thought Laura's house a dull place—till Roger slammed the front-door at last, and declared himself too sleepy to sit up another moment. But that was all in the natural way of business; it did not occur to Laura to grumble about it. If she wished he would come home at four and take her to drive before dinner, she never thought he might have done it had he chosen; she took it for granted that he wished it too, and would have done it if he could. Sundays she had him, at any rate: at church with her in the morning; and in the afternoon—well, if in the afternoon he stretched himself on the lounge with a handkerchief over his face, then she had the privilege of sitting silently beside him with a fan to keep the flies away, and felt herself uncommonly blessed in that.

It is true, Laura's married life was getting to be something different from that which she had planned for it. Sometimes she thought it was her fault—thought that Roger did not find her sympathetic, or understanding, or entertaining; then she read books that she fancied he must like, and which he had no time to read himself, and told him about them at dinner; and he would interrupt her with some such irrelevant question that she saw he had not listened to a word she said. Or else she practiced some song, and spent laborious hours over it; and when she thought the time was ripe, would seat herself at the piano to sing, only to see Roger get up and take his hat and go off on some errand that had just occurred to him in the middle of it.

Once or twice his own consciousness smote him as the remembrance of the grieved look at some of these interruptions, which he had seen without noting, came back to him; and so, on the night when he had completed the purchase of the cottage, he explained to her that his whole soul was wrapped in the effort to advance their fortunes, and if he ever seemed indifferent, she must understand that it meant nothing, that he loved her better than he ever did, and presently would demonstrate it.

"By-and-by, when I have accomplished my object," he said, "there will be plenty of time to enjoy our love; but if I stop now to enjoy it, I shall never do the other thing."

And he saw Laura brighten so at the words of tenderness that he resolved he would never let a day go by without assuring her of the old steadfast affection. But each day brought its own distractions and preoccupations, and presently love-making was forgotten in the more serious business; for in the one case there was already a complete achievement—Roger had won the woman he loved; but in the other case achievement yet eluded him—the fortune, that is, with which he should retire and enjoy, by-and-by, the daily companionship of this woman whom he loved.

One evening, at length, as they lingered a little unusually over dinner, Roger broke the silence of a tremendous thinking that he had kept up.

"I have made the beginning, Laura," he said.

"The beginning, dear?"

"I have the money in hand for the first quarter's payment for the house on the hill."

"You don't mean so!"

For the house on the hill was the only one of all the houses on the hill that was for sale, or likely to be for sale in their day and generation, and Roger had given up his idea of building a new house in view of the attractions of this—the property of old Squire Benham, who had placed himself beyond the scope of Roger's envy by dying, and by leaving so many heirs that nobody could afford to keep the mansion. And though he knew it would be years before he could maintain it after Squire Benham's generous fashion, Roger's soul had gone out in longing for that house, and now he had a chance to have it.

"Yes," he said, "we have lived carefully; no fine clothes, no company, no stable bill; and with what I have made and what you have saved, we have just enough to pay the first quarter: that is, I can mortgage this house to the bank for just half its worth—for twenty-five hundred, say—and I have five hundred in hand, three thousand in all, just the sum for a first payment on the terms they propose, with interest and three other like payments to come. What do you say to it?"

"The house on the hill!" answered Laura, reflectively. "I have thought it would be beautiful ever since we talked about it. The view is so perfect—the lawn and the elms, and all the intervale, and the blue and snowy mountain-tops beyond."

"And such rooms as there are in that house, and such a hall!"

"But it would take us a long while to furnish it properly, I have been thinking," said Laura, doubtfully.

"Well," said Roger, balancing his tea-spoon on the edge of his cup with nicety, "as soon as the first payment is made the place is ours, you know."

"And we need not move in at once," said Laura, rather eagerly.

"No. I was going to say we can lease it, and all of the rent money that there is over the interest we have to meet can go toward the future payments; and in the mean time we can be gradually collecting the furniture for it, piece by piece, and then another year's rent after it is all paid for will buy the carpets."

"With those we have already, and straw mattings for the bedrooms, yes. But do you really feel, Roger darling, as if you want to leave this dear little place? Don't you feel any attachment to it?"

"Oh yes; I always shall. I don't intend it shall go out of my hands either. I shall pay off this mortgage some day. But I care much more for that one on the hill. I set my heart on it, or something like it, when I was a boy. And when I heard of Squire Benham's first attack of apoplexy I said to myself, 'Now I'll have that house!'"

"Oh, Roger, I don't believe it! It isn't a bit like you!"

"Indeed it is. Exactly like me. I didn't kill him. Pshaw! I didn't even wish him out of the way. But as long as he was getting out of the way, I didn't see why I shouldn't get into it. I said I'd have the house, and I will. I've got the best wife in the town; I don't know why I shouldn't have the best house in the town to put her in!"

"Oh, Roger!"

But some things are more easily done than others.

The next day the cottage was mortgaged, and the money was paid to Squire Benham's executors, and there were three notes given for the remainder of the price, secured on the house on the hill, falling due in consecutive years, with interest. Laura was appalled when Roger told her of the notes, which she had not understood about before, but he laughed at her, and said, "Strict economy is the order of the day, and all will come right," and went gayly away to his business, leaving Laura to decide where she could economize any further than she had done. But there were many ways, she found. She could dismiss the second girl, for instance. Two young people by themselves, she said, never needed two other people to wait on them. But to dismiss the second girl meant that she must wash the breakfast cups herself, take care of the parlor herself, make her own bed, set the dinner-table, assist at the fine ironing. "I did a great deal more than that at Cousin Walter's," said Laura, "and was not doing it for myself at all, and now I shall be doing it for myself and for Roger. Oh, of course I can!"

And she told Roger that night that she had dismissed Nora.

"What!" he exclaimed. "Are you able to do without her? I said economy, but I didn't dream of any thing like that."

"I'll try," she said. "It isn't hard; and I can do it in half the time that Nora took, at all events."

"Well, I don't know. Are you sure it isn't hard? You might try it for a while. But I don't want your pretty hands to get coarse and—"

Laura flushed with pleasure. He had not stopped to see whether there were any thing pretty about her or not for so long! She felt paid in an instant for the work of years to come, if it had been twice as hard.

"Oh, nothing hurts my hands," she said. "If there did, they would have been spoiled at Cousin Walter's."

"So they would. Well, well; Cousin Walter and Cousin Walter's wife shall see you go in and out of a home such as they never hoped to have. And after that there will be plenty of time by-and-by for hands to get white again."

"And do you think of any thing else where I can turn an honest penny?" asked Laura, with delight. For this was such an immense testimony on Roger's part that her silly rejoicing heart would fain have continued the conversation, already a long one for Roger, all the evening.

"Yes," said Roger, presently, "in the abolition of one thing—though I hardly like to mention it, because it will be depriving you of such a pleasure." And then he laughed.

"Oh, do tell me, Roger!"

"I think women like to be martyred," he said. "Well, it is those dainties you are always making for me. I notice you seldom taste them yourself—which is suspicious, by-the-way. You brought four cookery books into the house for your dowry; and as you were determined to make them useful, I have been as steadily eating my way through them as any bookworm, and I shall come out at last with a ruined digestion, all ready for my chrysalid, and you'll be a blooming Grahamite widow."

"Don't talk so, Roger dear—don't."

"You are afraid the evil fates may happen to hear, you little heathen. Well, seriously, I think we can do without all the tarts and sugar-cakes and jellies."

"Oh, I don't like to have you, Roger."

"I knew you wouldn't," he answered. "But do as you please. Only remember I don't want any of them. Was that John or Thomas Flint here? John? Oh yes, then, I know what he wants. I must go down immediately and clinch that matter."

Hosted by Google

It was, perhaps, as hard a thing as he could have asked her to do; for a well-laid and inviting table was one of the auxiliaries she most relied upon. But plain bread and meat and such things as the garden furnished must be the fare now; and she varied it with surprising preparations of the same vegetable, a relish of hot herbs, with charming salads of nasturtiums and cresses and every thing from purslane to pumpkin blossoms. She made the pumpkin blossoms attractive by telling him they were a favorite Mexican salad, and how baskets of them were tumbled down in the market at Jalapa, high up on the table-lands of perpetual summer; and a plain doughnut really seemed a little nicer when she called it an alpistera, as the Spaniards do. And Roger of course did not miss the dainties: though, to tell the truth, Laura did herself; for she had always been the victim of a capricious appetite, and frequently, having been unable to eat at table, would afterward be glad of the toothsome thing left in the pantry from yesterday. But now she must take what there was or go without—and she frequently went without. Not that Roger would not have been horror-stricken at any deprivation of the kind, had he known it; but he never did till it was too late.

But Laura was not a person to do things by halves, and having begun to economize, she carried the system through to its last results. Now that there was no fancy cooking, certainly she could do the plain cooking herself; and the cook followed Nora, and had been gone for weeks before Roger found it out. Laura used to have her fire laid overnight for kindling in the morning, and the table ready for Roger's breakfast, whose smoke ascended in a morning sacrifice to him before he came down; then she had the day before her for her sweeping and dusting; the simple dinner was put upon the table the moment she heard the train leave the station; and she had just as much of the evening as she wanted to "clear away" in, for Roger never was at home, of course, but always off clinching an old bargain or making a new one. But Roger did not murmur much when he did discover the cook's departure. He was working hard, he thought, and Laura was his helpmeet, and, when all was said, her work was easier than his, and without an atom of mental wear and tear about it: still he told her to be very sure and not overdo herself.

Books and music, of course, went with Nora and the cook, and all the pleasure Laura had left was the pleasure of serving Roger—the greatest of pleasures, she would have told her cousin Walter's wife. But, nevertheless, books and music were missed, and Laura felt her horizon narrowing about her like the contracting walls of the prisoner's cell in the story. They took no paper, and they ceased their subscription to the book club. "It is only for a year or two," said Roger. "We can soon read up again, and have a library of our own to boot by-and-by." They had no company; they never took an excursion. As for passing the night in town for the sake of theatre, or opera, or concert—as for taking Laura in with him to a matinée—Roger would have thought himself crazy to propose such a thing. "Time enough for all that by-and-by," he said. She sat at home with her sewing in the endless lonesome days; she saw other not long married people taking their pleasure as they went—going down the street together pleasant afternoons with their luncheon-baskets for the sailing parties on the lake, driving by on long summer rides, sitting together in the twilight. She wished, in spite of herself, that her life and Roger's were the same as that of these other husbands and wives, who were in less haste to be rich, but was sure it must be best, as Roger chose it. Meantime she had enough sewing to occupy her, for she had become an adept in seating trowsers, and binding collars and cuffs, and making vests out of the tails of discarded coats, and putting new bosoms into old shirts. And so another year and another passed, and Roger had but one more payment to make on the house on the hill.

"I declare," said Mrs. Gifford once, "I wonder if Laura Gregory's satisfied with the life she leads! She never sees any body once in a dog's age, and nobody sees her, unless it's of a Sunday, or they meet her wandering round in that old grave-yard on the hill-side. There she goes now! Well, 'tis a pretty spot. I used to go there myself when I was single and—and love-sick. I don't believe she's had a new thing since she's been married. And yet every body says Roger's making money, and none of his name were ever called close that I heard of."

There was reason in such conjectures, to be sure, if not right; for certainly Laura had had but one or two new things in these years, except some trifles bought with the balance of her little trousseau money. She had turned her one silk gown upside down and wrong side out; she had made every thing over, and she always flattered herself that she would present a very respectable appearance, till she stood in the fashionably dressed congregation, when she was often vexed and mortified enough—not for her own sake, but lest Roger should draw comparisons, and think her clumsy and devoid of taste.

It was only lately that Laura had taken to wandering in the old hill-side grave-yard. The place was a tangle of blossoms and briers, birds and bees in the sunshine—a bright and lonely place, and just sad enough in its solitude to seem consonant with her own feelings; for Laura had lost her old elasticity and expectancy. Every thing in her life was right, because Roger liked it, but she no longer took much individual joy in it; it was all something hard and sordid, and Roger, busier than ever, hardly gave her a look, hardly a word. That he loved her just the same she knew, though it was all by fits and starts, but the waiting for the expression of that love was weariness. She was afraid that when the time came in which he could rest and look at her, read with her, talk with her, idle with her, he would have forgotten how—would have ceased to care to do it.

"I don't know," she said, one afternoon, as she came down from the tangled grave-yard on the hill. "Perhaps I shall come here soon not to go home and get dinner again. Roger doesn't seem to mind this cough, and I hardly like to speak about a doctor; but then—but then he would miss me so!" Ah, that "but then" spoke volumes; it meant that Laura did not much care, for her part, whether she went or not.

"I shall have to ask you for a little money," said Laura one evening. She had been hesitating and coloring and halting in her speech for two or three days past, as now it suddenly occurred to him while he stood hat in hand.

"A little money?" said he, mischievously. "Couldn't you get along without it?" and he laughed. "When did you ever ask me for any money before? Oh, Laura, have I ever given you any money for your own use in all these four years that we have been married?"

"I haven't needed any, dear. I had a bill, you know, at the store here, to get any thing I wanted."

"Yes, I know the bill. It has not been fifty dollars a year. I never did give you any money, did I, Laura? I never thought!" And he threw himself on the sofa in dismay at his heedless carelessness.

"Well, you are going to give me some now," she said, brightly. "And I shouldn't ask you," she said, coming round and sitting down on the hassock at his feet, "for—for myself. I want it for—and—I—oh, Roger, don't you know?" And she hid her face on his knee.

For a moment Roger was silent in bewilderment, and then the truth slowly dawned on him. "I have been a fool!" he cried. "Are you ever going to forgive me, my darling?"

The next morning Roger did not go to town, but he went and brought the doctor to see Laura; and the cook came back that week, and the second girl too, eventually; and Laura went about, or lay on the sofa, as she chose, but with the strangest sense you can imagine of the world's revolving on another axis since she was being taken care of. Roger came down in an earlier train every day, and brought her grapes and wine himself, and sat by and saw her eat and drink. "What a wretch I have been!" he said. "I who love you so to treat you so! I thought you were just as happy as I—"

"Why, so I am, Roger dear."

"But I have done nothing to make you so—taken you nowhere, given you nothing, not even time or attention."

"You have been so busy," said Laura.

"Well, it shall be so no more!" he cried. "We have begun all over again new; and the next act in this beginning shall be a new wardrobe for you."

"Oh, by-and-by," she said.

"'Who waits at the house of By-and-by shall stay at the house of Never!'" he said. "I have learned that much. You shall have it now, and have it made up now. Things have gone so well with me that I can make the last payment on the house on the hill to-morrow, if I will, and have enough left to furnish it, and we will move in the moment you are well. Think, Laura, what a strange house it will be with a cradle in it, and people tiptoeing round for fear they shall wake the baby!" And Laura lay there and laughed at all his boyish ecstasies, and felt the least in the world as if she had died and gone to heaven.

"Laura," said Roger, some months afterward—months of such perfect, peaceful happiness that he had wondered where his wits had been when they let him deprive himself of such joy through those money-making years—"Laura, I didn't sleep an hour last night. I never can tell you how I felt. What if you had died while I was so intent on my object that I couldn't see any thing ailing you! I should never, never have forgiven myself!"

"Oh no, no, you mustn't say so, Roger," she whispered. "Because I may die yet. It is more than likely. I ought to tell you Dr. Phillips says that—"

"Stop! stop!" cried Roger. "I will not hear a word of such talk!"

"Perhaps it would be better, dear," said Laura. "Sometimes it seems to me as if this were too good to last. And, whatever happens, I want you always to remember how happy this time has been." But he stopped her words with kisses.

It was indeed too good to last. That same night the lights were seen flashing all about the cottage in the garden by the ever-wakeful and watchful Mrs. Gifford, and Roger was descried running in wild haste through the street, and pulling at Dr. Phillips's bell. Mrs. Gifford rose once or twice more in the course of the night, only to see the lights still burning; and at sunrise she saw Dr. Phillips come out and gently close the door, and Nora come behind him to shut the parlor blinds.

"I am afraid—I am afraid that case is really settled," said Mrs. Gifford. "I have been expecting it. I must run across, and see what can be done." And she ran across presently, and ran up stairs, as the weeping Nora bade her, to find Roger Gregory prostrate on the floor, and clasping the wax white hand that fell over the side of the bed, as if it still would help him, and Laura lying before her with her little dead baby on her breast, ready for her house on the hill at last—her house on the hill: a narrow, narrow house, in which there was no room for Roger!

For, truly, "Who waits at the house of By-and-by shall stay at the house of Never."

A CANADIAN WINTER.

THE extreme cold of a Canadian winter is revealed in various ways. In the cemetery at Quebec there is a vault covered with turf, and fitted up with stone shelving, which is used as a temporary depository for those who die during winter, and can not be properly interred until frost and snow have disappeared. So deeply does the frost penetrate into the ground that any line of curb-stone, or stone basis for a railing, which is not founded on masonry at least three feet deep, will be dislodged and lean over on one side at the first thaw. In the small garden plots at Montreal you may, at the approach of winter, see shrubs covered up with mats to preserve them from the frost, such shrubs bearing the winters of Scotland with impunity. Yet, with this peculiarity of climate, Canada is a healthy and comparatively pleasant country to live in. What is a determinate and settled cold, against which you can take precautions, in comparison with that changeableness all the year round prevalent in milder latitudes, where you can never tell what kind of weather—wet, dry, foggy, or windy, cold or warm—to-morrow will be, and where coughs and sore throats, as a result of a raw, moist atmosphere, are at certain seasons the order of the day!

Among the remarkable effects of the severe frosts of Canada is the strange appearance of familiar objects in the market-place. The pigs, though slaughtered weeks or months before, stand erect on their stiff legs; the meat feels like wood, sounds the same on being struck, and must be divided with a saw. Fish likewise; and many a little heap of salmon and cod sawdust have I seen—nay, made—in the process of preparing dinner. I was once left, in all the inexperience of my first winter, without a servant. It was January, when a steady frost had set in, but on a Saturday, our principal market-day, when unfrozen meat was often brought home. I had consequently little difficulty in roasting a sirloin of beef, and making a tureenful of soup, sufficient provision, I thought, for the next day's dinner. But the cold increased that night; the thermometer fell to twenty degrees below zero (or fifty-two degrees below freezing-point), and at breakfast-time we found every thing frozen. The eggs were frozen into a state in which, though apparently unchanged, they can neither be beaten nor cooked; some cold partridge utterly defied all attempts to cut it, a little of the breast, when chipped off by repeated blows with a chopper, tasting like ice; and, worst of all, the bread was tough as India rubber. The milk left on the previous night was solid, and our ink was in cakes. I rejoiced over my foresight in having prepared dinner the day before, but this self-approval did not last long. The cold roast beef was as uneatable as so much stone, and I was dismayed by the discovery that, after placing it in the oven of a large kitchen stove for some time, the outside began to char, though I could by no means cut off even one slice. I next tried placing it in front of a blazing coal fire in a warm room, but with like result. Clearly, the beef must be abandoned (I had long since given up all hope of going to church), and soup and pudding relied on. With some exertion and a chopper, the soup was broken up into what looked like lumps of brown rock, and by-and-by dissolved; the milk also melted in time for use; but the partridge, after being soaked in cold water—the quickest solvent—was not thawed till evening, and the beef not till the next day. Such inconvenience may be averted by timely precaution; and I came afterward to consider the winter frost a boon to housekeepers, enabling them to keep on hand a store of perishable food, which may be securely kept in its frozen state as long as the cold weather lasts. It may be thought that the severity of the climate would be felt unpleasantly, but such is not the case, owing to the dryness and stillness of the atmosphere, and to the power of the sun. I repeat, the winters of Canada are far from unpleasant. The brilliant sunshine, the great length of the day in winter, and the exciting quality of the air have a peculiarly exhilarating effect, very beneficial to most persons; and the means adopted for warming the houses insure a degree of comfort seldom attained in the homes of milder countries.

PARIS GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

THIS is the season for sea-side gatherings, and from every port in America crowds are pouring across the Atlantic to swell the visitors of the fashionable watering-places all over Europe, especially in Germany and France. I have harped so long on one theme that I fear you will hardly bear with me if I venture to refer to it once more, even should I promise that this will be my last scolding, at least for a long, long time. But anger is often a proof of love, and it is on this theory that I act with you, dear American culprits. So you must brace your courage to endure a few more bitter truths from a friend. I was so enraged, so personally pained and disgusted, on reading an article in the Gaulois a few days ago that I resolved to take the only vengeance on the writer in my power—namely, to let you hear in what terms the so-called respectable portion of the French press treat the people who have enriched them and their Paris for so many years, and who, whatever be their faults, are at least deserving of the respect gentlemen owe to virtuous and honorable women. I wish all the Americans had but one ear, that I might shout this vile and dastardly article into it, and with one blow destroy their illusions about these "charming Frenchmen," as Nero wished to cut off the heads of all the Romans with a single stroke. I will make no comments on the criticism, which I translate, but just remind you that the Gaulois is the recognized organ of the empire, which made a point of not only receiving every American who came to Paris well dressed, but literally circumventing them with flattering attentions, and doing all that court favor could do to entice them to come to Paris, and to keep them there once they came. Of course a great number of these guests at the Tuileries were persons whom you whom I am addressing never met in a drawing-room in your own country, and therefore it is not to be wondered at if they provoked ridicule by their vulgarity, and contempt by the coarseness of their manners. But that the mass of American women, or even the minority of them, justified even approximately the revolting picture drawn by the Gaulois scribe I most emphatically deny. As a rule Americans bear an excellent character among trades-people (the best proof of this is the eagerness with which the latter seek their custom), while as women they are held in general esteem. I have known the best and the worst from all parts of America, and I have had ample opportunities of judging of the opinion of Europeans concerning them, and I can with truth declare that they stand exceptionally high as regards morality and virtue. It is only in Paris, that politest city of Europe, where a public writer could be found to apply such language to the daughters of America as is used by the Gaulois. I hope it may have at least the effect of opening your eyes to the value of French compliments and Parisian hospitality, and that it will tempt you to make acquaintance with other countries on this side of the ocean, where, if you are kindly received, you may trust to not being calumniated and caricatured behind your back. London society is not so brilliant, and English watering-places are not so gay as their neighbors over "the silver streak of sea;" but, believe me, if you want to make friends, and above all, if you want to make a home, you have infinitely a better chance of doing it in England than in France. Now here is the extract, the original of which I inclose for the editor's verification:

"For some years past we have been suffering from a downright invasion of Americans. The transatlantic 'misses' swarm over on us in battalions, and mount to the assault with imperturbable tenacity. They inundate our salons, our theatres, and our race-courses. There, dressed out in gaudy colors, talking loud, gesticulating boldly, their eyes painted black, and their faces most learnedly [savamment] bedaubed, their fair or dark hair audaciously rolling about in luxurious tufts, they attract all eyes. The blasé Parisian is specially excited by the bizarre fact that these young maidens resemble not only married women, but married women bent on amusing themselves. This fires the sensuality of those youths who are tired of cocottes with their vapid gossip, and who find here the same women, but no longer stupid. The little Yankees, who are up to fun, allow themselves to be made love to, even very assiduously. They gratuitously compromise themselves, and you into the bargain. They will dance with you all night at a ball, and they will let you take them home next morning tête-à-tête in a coupé, while the family follow in a separate carriage. Who knows? Perhaps the freshness of the dawn, and the excitement of the dance, and the supper to boot, may tempt you to snatch a kiss or two from that virginal brow which hides the calculating spirit of a usurer. The affair, you think, will end here! What they want is a husband. After a fortnight of this flirtation, which, considering the wide-awake character of these gaillardes [stagers, prancers], you believe to be perfectly innocent and fair, the father, brother, or uncle—perhaps all three—are announced at your door one fine morning. These correct gentlemen, dressed in black coats and white chokers, inform you coolly that you have compromised their daughter, sister, or niece, and that they expect you to make reparation to the innocent. You protest. They retort that the robe of maidenhood is worn but once, and can tolerate no stain; that your assiduities have greatly depreciated the value in the market of goods estimated at so much— Well, you are caught. After all, seeing the extravagant style of living and dress kept up in the family, you make up your mind that it is a good bargain, and you sign the agreement. There is, no doubt, a good fat money-bag from the salt pork business of Cincinnati or the petroleum springs of Oil Creek. Unhappy man! you take the leap in the dark, and lo! you find, too late, that there are eight children to divide among, that the dot is a pittance, and you are saddled with a doll that can only prattle, and dress herself for other people—a woman to be looked at, and no more. And meantime messieurs the Yankees are laughing at you in their goat-beards."

This is an extreme specimen of the general tone of the Paris press about Americans. I leave further comment to your own reflections.

COMET.

AUTUMN COSTUME.

See illustration on page 620.

THIS elegant costume is of dark blue camel's-hair and silk. The silk skirt is trimmed with a silk flounce, headed by a scalloped band of camel's-hair, bound with silk, and studded with buttons; a notched ruche separates the band and flounce. The camel's-hair polonaise has a double-breasted front, with rounded revers and silk kilt-pleated flounce; the back has two straight breadths hanging à la châtelaine, also a bow and ruffles of silk; silk pleating on the sleeves, and a bow on the shoulder. Blue velvet bonnet, with gray ostrich plumes and groseille roses.

HOUSE DRESS.

See illustration on page 620.

THIS house toilette for early autumn is composed of olive green silk, trimmed with olive brown of a darker shade. The skirt shows the new fancy for outlining the narrow front breadth by trimming down the front seams. The front breadth in this instance is slightly puffed on the lining, and is held by a chain of puffs, with bows at intervals. The back breadths form a puff at the top, and are trimmed below with a Spanish flounce, on which are bands of brown velvet; a puff with bows forms the heading. The châtelaine bodice slopes over the hips, and is corded on the edge. Sleeves of puffs and ruffles. Muslin collarette, turned up behind.

Hosted by Google

AUTUMN COSTUME.—[SEE PAGE 619.]

HOUSE DRESS.—[SEE PAGE 619.]

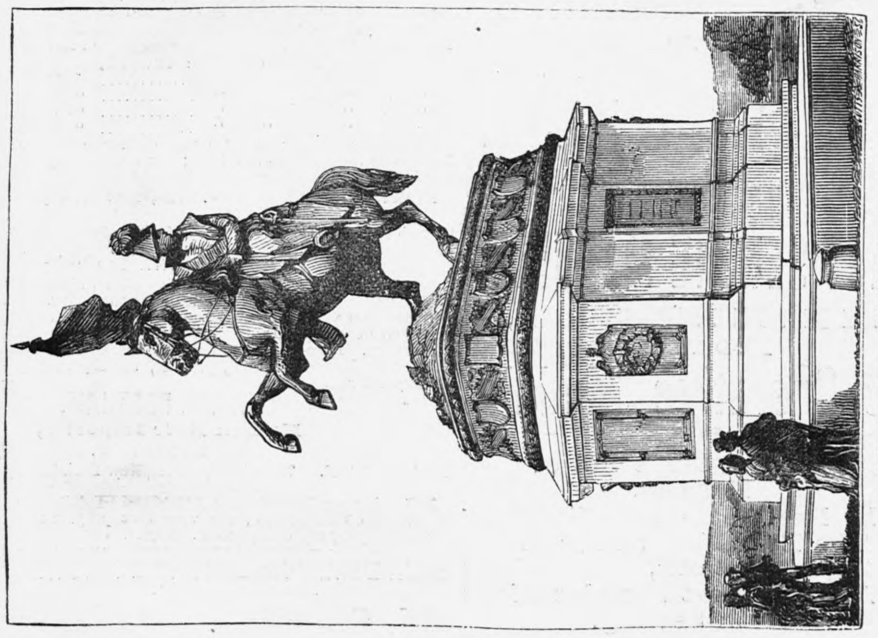
Hosted by Google

MONUMENTS AT VIENNA.

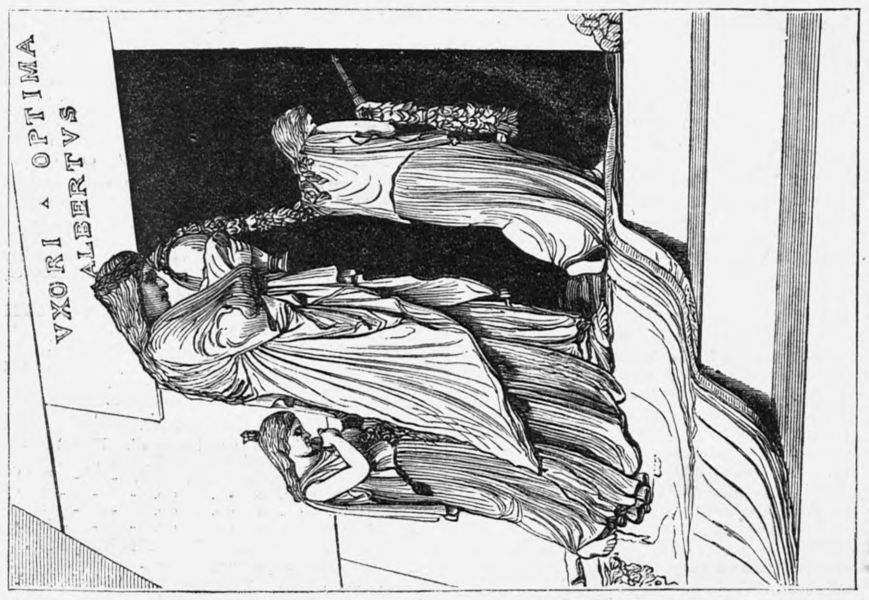
HERE we have some more of the chief monuments of Vienna. To begin with the statues. Those of Prince Eugène of Savoy and the Erzherzog Carl—the Archduke Charles—are situated in the platz facing the Hofburg, or imperial palace, right and left of the broad alley leading to the Burg Ring. Both are the work of the well-known sculptor Fernkorn, and the marble pedestals were designed by Van der Null. The Archduke is represented at the moment when, seizing the flag of the regiment, he led the grenadiers of Zach to the battle of Aspern. The base of the statue bears shields, blazonry, and medallions; repeated on the pedestal is the Austrian eagle, and laurel wreaths inclosing the names of his victories. Inaugurated in 1860, the general effect is very imposing, though were we disposed to be hypercritical, the horse and his rider rather recall "Napoleon crossing the Alps," the work of David, not the true one of Paul Delaroche. The statue of Prince Eugène, inaugurated in 1865, and intended as a pendant to the preceding, is hardly so satisfactory, the horse supporting himself on his tail in the orthodox manner, as may be seen in the statue of George III. in Pall Mall, and many other equestrian masterpieces of the sculptor's art. The statue of brave old Marshal Schwarzenberg, who led the allies at the battle of Leipsic, in 1813, is in the Schwarzenberg Platz. It is the work of Rauch, and represents the marshal in the act of sheathing his sword.

The tomb of the Archduchess Marie-Christine, wife of Duke Albrecht of Saxe-Teschen, in the Church of the Augustines, where all the hearts of the imperial family are preserved in silver urns, is the masterpiece of Canova, and was erected by her husband in 1805. It consists of a pyramid of gray marble; in the centre is the opening of a funeral vault, toward which two processions are tending, one led by Virtue, bearing the ashes of the Archduchess, accompanied by the children carrying torches to illumine the inner gloom. Behind, Benevolence ascends the stairs, supporting the tottering steps of an old man, whose grief is shared by a little girl. On the other side a lion and guardian angel keep guard, mourning the loss they have sustained; while, faithful to the motto, "No cross, no crown," Happiness bears the Archduchess's medallion aloft, as an angel presents the palm branch of triumph. All the figures are full-length statues with the exception of the last two, which are in bold relief, and the entire composition reflects all the classic beauty for which Canova was so renowned, without the effeminacy which marred the effect of many of his works.

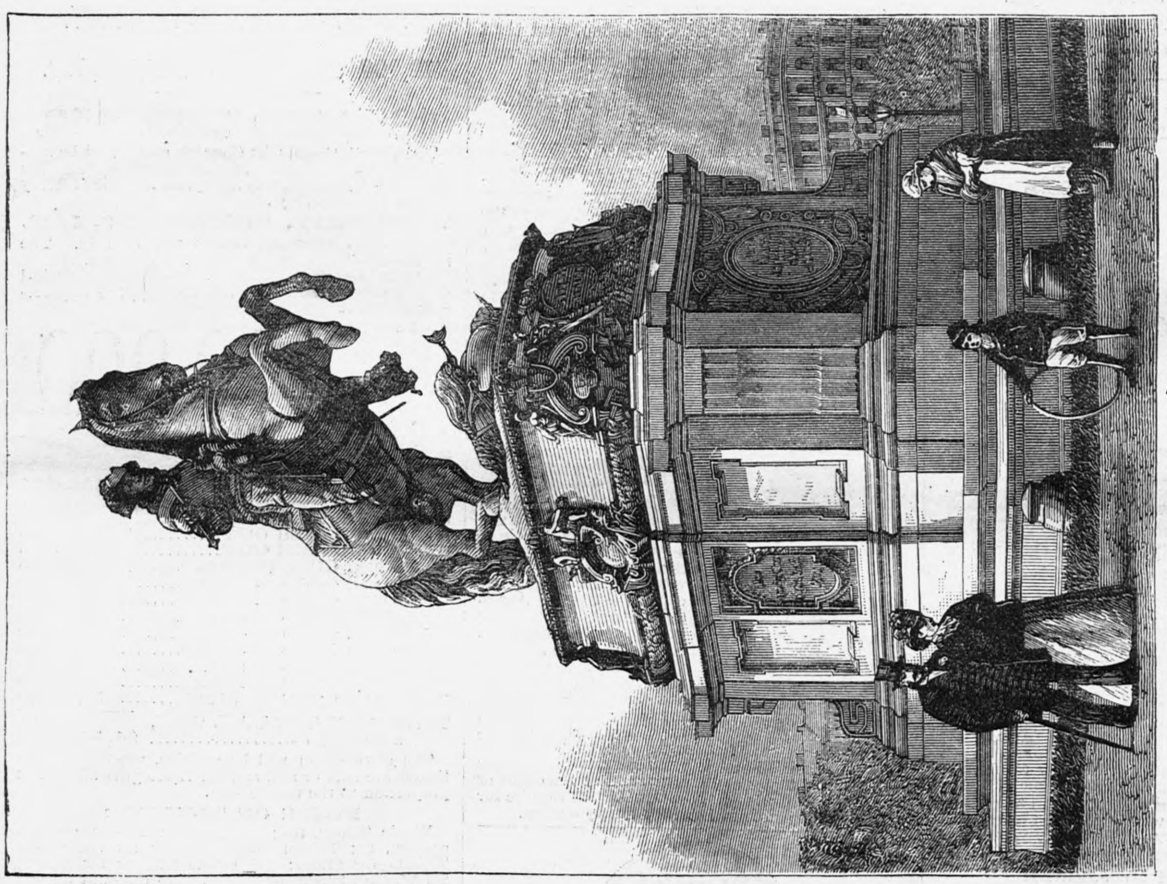
The Fountain of the Archduke Albrecht is in the Opera Gasse, and was constructed in 1869. The sculptures, by Meixner, represent, in the middle, Vienna and the Danube; to the right, the Inn, the Enns, the Traun, the Theiss, and Raab; and to the left the Drau, the March, the Mur, the Salzach, and the Save. Vienna is in truth a magnificent city, and well deserves the title of the Austrian Paris.



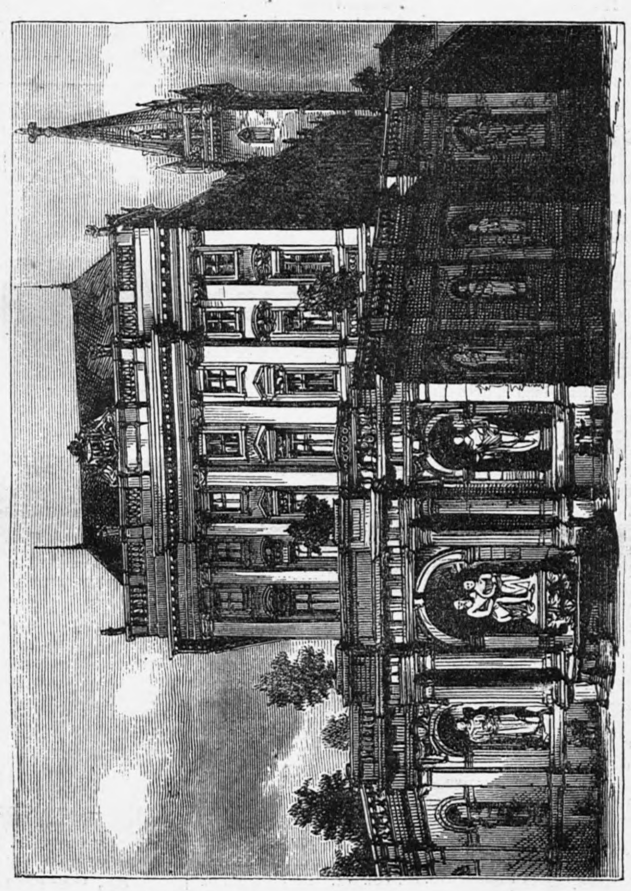
STATUE OF THE ARCHDUKE CHARLES.



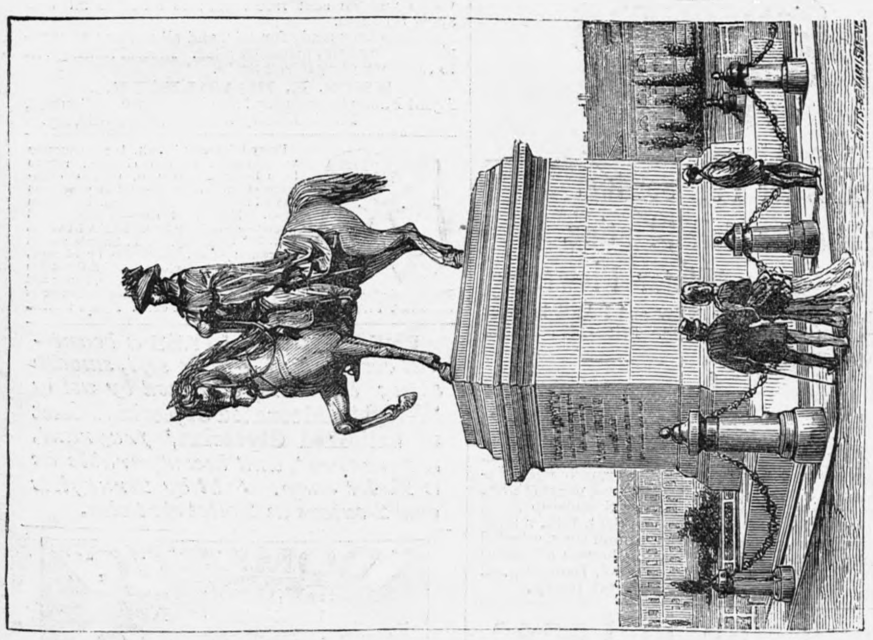
MARBLE GROUP ON THE TOMB OF MARIE-CHRISTINE IN THE CHURCH OF THE AUGUSTINES.



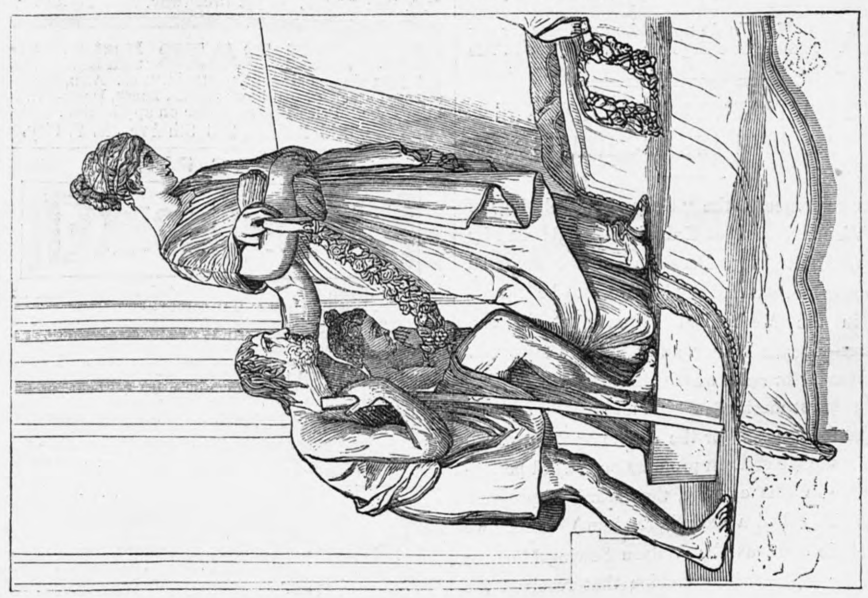
STATUE OF PRINCE EUGÈNE OF SAVOY.



FOUNTAIN OF THE ARCHDUKE ALBRECHT.



STATUE OF PRINCE SCHWARZENBERG.



MARBLE GROUP ON THE TOMB OF MARIE-CHRISTINE IN THE CHURCH OF THE AUGUSTINES.

MONUMENTS AT VIENNA.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CONSTANCE.—Get a polonaise of silk the color of the dark stripe in your sample; have sleeves of the striped silk, and put flounces of the dark silk in place of those of muslin. Or else you can have a dark silk sleeveless jacket, with vest and sleeves of striped silk, and an apron over-skirt of the dark silk. An elegant black silk costume will be best to wear to "several day weddings and sociables," as it would be less conspicuous than a dark blue, slate, or myrtle green suit. We do not reply by mail.

BROWNIE.—Read late papers to "Ugly Girls."

A. M. F.—Read about fall redingotes in Bazar No. 38, Vol. VI. Make such a garment edged with a bias fold, and put rows of folds of the material on the skirt of your Henrietta cloth. Make kilt suits for your little boy, with pleated Highland skirt and jacket. The pattern is illustrated in Bazar No. 39, Vol. V.

ELLA.—Shell jewelry is worn in deep mourning, but is not as appropriate as jet. It will probably continue in fashion.

MRS. J. P. T.—Make your alpaca by Double-breasted Jockey Basque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI., and trim according to illustration. Oxidized silver buttons look well on fine black alpacas.

MRS. S. M.—A description of the sewing silk veil and its merits was given in a late number of our New York Fashion articles.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Make your black silk with a demi-trained skirt, with two deep flounces behind and several narrower ones in front. Then trim the front side breadth downward, and add a puff and sash behind. The basque should be simply corded on the edges, and worn with a high ruff of Valenciennes and light silk like those described in our articles on New York Fashions. Your gray pongee made by jockey basque pattern, and trimmed with bias repped gray silk or gray velvet and oxidized buttons, will be stylish. Make a black cashmere redingote by description given in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 38, Vol. VI. It is too soon to alter your velvet cloak, though you may find some hints about wraps in another column of the present paper.

E. E. E.—Your silk is good quality of olive brown. Make with double-breasted basque, and trim by illustration of that suit in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI.

IGNORAMUS.—Get a redingote of olive brown or iron gray cashmere or camel's-hair and a silk skirt of the same color for your wedding traveling suit in October. Your round hat of chip, felt, or velvet must be of the same color, with a long ostrich plume of the natural ostrich, or else shaded. Read about lingerie in our New York Fashions. Get dark slate (blue-gray) or else deep blue silk for your demi-trained dress. Read future numbers of the Bazar for hints about your black silk. Use very little lace on a black silk suit, but quantities of jet galloon, jet fringe, and trimmings of the material. For visiting and church get a velvet bonnet of becoming color, trimmed with repped silk of a lighter shade and two demi-long ostrich feathers finely shaded.

ROY LEWIS.—Put two box-pleated flounces on the skirt of the black alpaca, and set buttons on each box-pleat. Long belted sacques with sleeves and a cape are admired for blue water-proof cloaks. Trim the skirt of the black silk as you suggest. At present very little lace is used on basques. The edge of the basque is merely piped or corded. Use lace for a ruff or on coat sleeves only. A linen redingote will not be warm enough for traveling, especially to the White Mountains, in September. Get serge, "diagonal," de bège, camel's-hair, cashmere, or any warm woolen fabric.

Q. S. G.—Your satine will look well trimmed as you suggest. Consult paper containing illustration of the pattern for quantity of material required.

NEDLA.—Your pretty striped batiste would look well trimmed with ruffles of the same with white muslin ruffles underneath. Large pearl buttons.

A. G.—Make your pearl-colored wedding dress by design given on page 573 in Bazar No. 36, Vol. VI. If you object to the expense of lace, use pleated crêpe lisse or else Chambéry gauze.

AMELIA G.—Get a suit of brown de bège at 75 cents a yard, and make by patterns given in Supplement of Bazar No. 36, Vol. VI.

A CONSTANT READER.—The bride should wear her veil at the reception given her on the evening of her wedding-day.

INTERESTED READER.—Do not have your bridal veil fall over your face, but wear it in the manner shown on page 573, in Bazar No. 36, Vol. VI. Black vests of the material of the full-dress coat are worn at church weddings. White vests are out of fashion for dressy occasions, and are not worn as semi-dress except at midsummer.

MRS. R. L. M.—We do not make purchases for our readers. There is no charge for answers given in this column.

VIENNA PREMIUMS AGAIN, AND THE AMERICAN SEWING-MACHINES

BY reference to the "General Regulations of the Vienna Universal Exhibition," published by Archduke Regnier, President of the Imperial Commission, we find medals were to be awarded, in the Mechanical Department, in two classes—one for MERIT, and one for PROGRESS. The medal for merit was for the article possessing the greatest merit of its kind and class; and the medal for progress for the article or thing which had made the greatest progression toward perfection. (In this country, the award of progress would be called a second premium.) Hence we conclude that, as the Wilson Sewing-Machine was the only sewing-machine that received the Grand Medal of Merit, when the awards were made at the Vienna Exposition, it must have been the best sewing-machine on exhibition; although other sewing-machines that received medals for progress should not be considered very inferior machines. At the great American Centennial Exposition of 1876, they may have so improved as to equal the world-renowned Wilson Shuttle Sewing-Machine.—New York Tribune, Sept. 8th 1873.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DEAFNESS AND CATARRH.—A Lady, who had suffered for years from Deafness and Catarrh, was cured by a simple Indian Remedy. Her sympathy and gratitude prompt her to send the recipe, free of charge, to any one similarly afflicted. Address MRS. M. CLARA LEGGETT, Jersey City, N. J.

HAIR!!!

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, corner Fourth Street,
Branch Store, 345 Sixth Avenue,

Begs leave to call the attention of the ladies to his superb stock of Human Hair Goods, of the best quality of hair only, without any intermixing whatsoever, of his own importation and manufacture.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

RETAILED AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

I can offer to the public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors.

All goods WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.

Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE Removed to 345 6th AVENUE,
Bet. 20th and 21st Streets.

Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

Fashions Opening!

Fro- Smith's Illustrated Pattern Bazaar.

1360—THE REDINGOTE—FAMED for beautifying any style of figure.
Is a complete costume with any kind of skirt. Double-breasted and rolling-collar. Requires only eight yards of twenty-seven-inch goods. All sizes. Price of pattern, with a CLOTH MODEL, 50 cts. Mailed.

172—WAIST—Is a new and bewitching design. The back sets out just enough to give a modest, graceful effect. In any material. All sizes. Price of pattern and CLOTH MODEL, 25 cts. Mailed.

We give a perfect CLOTH MODEL with every pattern, which shows just how to put the garment together after being cut by the pattern. They are PERFECT GUIDES.

Immense Premiums Given!
Smith's Illustrated Pattern Bazaar
Only ONE DOLLAR a Year.

PREMIUM to every subscriber of patterns of their selection to the value of One Dollar, Free, OR, in place of Patterns, you may choose ONE of the following beautiful Oil Chromos, viz.: WHITTIER'S "BAREFOOT BOY," 10x14 inches; "THE UNWELCOME VISITOR," 13x17 inches; "THE MATRON," 13x17 inches; "THE PET LAMB," 14x17 inches. Two stamps must be enclosed for postage on each chromo. These pictures sell readily for from $1 to $3 each. Send two stamps for Catalogue of Styles.

CLUB.—One Chromo Extra will be given to the person who sends us three subscribers at one time. Two extra for five, etc.

"SMITH'S INSTRUCTION BOOK," or, "Secrets of Dressmaking" in Ladies' and Children's Garments will be ready in a few days. Price, 10 cents. Mailed.

A. BURDETTE SMITH,
P.O. Box 5055. 914 Broadway, New York City.

THREE PAIR Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1 00. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, Dress-Trimmings, &c. Price-List sent free on application.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

WEBSTER'S PATENT
BUTTON HOLE WORKER

Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.

Is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented. So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent by mail to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN Dress Shields will absorb moisture and protect the Dress thoroughly. The Perforated Premium Buckskin Undergarments are recommended by all Physicians. Send for circulars. D. C. HALL & Co., 44 West Broadway, N.Y., Sole Agents and Manufacturers.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON
Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 39 East 33d St., N. Y.

VIENNA
PREMIUMS.

THE WILSON SHUTTLE
SEWING-MACHINES
Received the Grand
PRIZE MEDAL
AND MEDAL OF HONOR
FOR THE
BEST SEWING-MACHINE,
THE BEST MADE SEWING-MACHINES,
AND THREE
Co-Operative Medals
FOR
The Best Made Set of Harness,
The Best Made Side Saddle,
The Best Boot and Shoe Work,
And the Best Samples of Cloth Sewing.

No other Sewing-Machines received Premiums on their merits, which we will prove by evidence at our office, and that all reports relating to the contrary are false.

Machines Sold on Easy Monthly Payments.
SALESROOM:
707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
And all other Cities in the United States.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

PRATT'S
Patent Combined Ladies' Brace and Skirt Supporter, with new Flexible Adjustment. By this valuable improvement the cap of the Brace is retained extended over the point of the shoulder, overcoming all liability to work up, giving expansion to the Chest, and promoting full and thorough respiration. It relieves the Waist of an unhealthy burden by suspending the weight of undergarments from the point of the shoulder. For sale by all the principal dealers in the United States and Canada, and at the Office of the Company, CLEVELAND, OHIO. ☞ Inquire for Pratt's Brace and Skirt Supporter.

TARRANT'S
SELTZER
APERIENT.
Trade Mark. Patented.
Sold by all Druggists.

Seeds for Fall Sowing.
Bulbs for Fall Planting.
Plants for Winter Flowering.

Embracing every thing NEW and RARE in great variety, and at LOW RATES. Price-Lists mailed free to all applicants.

Peter Henderson & Co.
Seedsmen, 35 Cortlandt St., New York.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MADAME GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, near 26th St., having arrived from Paris per Steamship Saint Laurent, will exhibit on Thursday, Sept. 18th, a most recherché assortment of Bonnets, Round Hats, selected carefully by herself in the leading houses of Paris; also, English Round Hats from C. W. Brown's, and others. ☞ Admission by Card only.

Novelties in Laces.
SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

LAFONTAIN'S FRENCH COMPLEXION BEAUTIFIER removes TAN AND FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, AND FLESHWORMS. Price $1 00 per Bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 SIXTH AVENUE. Agents wanted.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS, in any quantities. Send for Circular.
MME. L. CENDRIER, 636 Broadway, N. Y.

Human Hair Switches.
Retailed at same price as I charge Hair Dealers.
All long, even, fine, first quality Hair. Warranted not Dyed.

22 inches long, weight 2 ounces.....only $4 50
24 " " " 2½ " ..... " 8 75
26 " " " 3 " ..... " 12 00
28 " " " 3½ " ..... " 15 00
30 " " " 4 " ..... " 20 00
32 " " " 4½ " ..... " 25 00
Heavier Switches made to order at same rate per ounce.

Long Stem Switches (3 stems in each). No short, crimped hair or combings in (as practised by firms who make a lower priced article of inferior material). Long hair on outside, and 16-inch straight hair inside.

Best Make in the World.

Weight 3 ounces, 32 inches long,.....only $9 00
" 4 " 32 " " ..... " 12 00
" 5 " 32 " " ..... " 15 00
" 6 " 32 " " ..... " 18 00

Purchasers (if they wish to) may exchange for all Long Hair Switches at any time; but my Long Stem Switches are generally used for present fashion.

Heavy Long Single Curls, naturally Curly.

22-inch hair, $3 00; 24-inch, $3 50; 26-inch, $4 50 each.
Best quality French Friz Weft.....$0 50 per yard.
Naturally Curly " " ..... 1 00 " "

☞ Don't fail to send for my Illustrated Price-List of Hair Goods, Hair Jewelry, Hair Pictures, &c. I will send all Goods by Express, C.O.D., and allow privilege of examining, to prove the truth of above statements. If money is sent with order, Goods will be sent by Registered Mail, prepaid, thereby saving all Express charges.

CHAS. V. PECKHAM,
Human Hair Importer,
687 BROADWAY,
Established 1843. Near Amity Street, New York City.

☞ Ask your Druggist for PECKHAM'S LEUCOTHEA, the very best preparation for beautifying the Complexion. Try it.

GRANDEST SCHEME EVER KNOWN.

4th Grand Gift Concert
FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE
PUBLIC LIBRARY OF KENTUCKY.

12,000 CASH GIFTS, $1,500,000.

$250,000 FOR $50.

The Fourth Grand Gift Concert, authorized by special act of the Legislature, for the benefit of the Public Library of Kentucky, will take place in Public Library Hall, at Louisville, Ky.,

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1873.

Only Sixty thousand tickets will be sold. The tickets are divided into ten coupons or parts.

At this Concert, which will be the grandest musical display ever witnessed in this country, the unprecedented sum of divided into 12,000 cash gifts, will be distributed by lot among the ticket-holders.

$1,500,000

LIST OF GIFTS.

ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		$250,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		100,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		50,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		25,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		17,500
10 CASH GIFTS	$10,000 each	100,000
30 CASH GIFTS	5,000 each	150,000
50 CASH GIFTS	1,000 each	50,000
80 CASH GIFTS	500 each	40,000
100 CASH GIFTS	400 each	40,000
150 CASH GIFTS	300 each	45,000
250 CASH GIFTS	200 each	50,000
325 CASH GIFTS	100 each	32,500
11,000 CASH GIFTS	50 each	550,000
TOTAL, 12,000 GIFTS, ALL CASH, amounting to		$1,500,000

The distribution will be positive, whether all the tickets are sold or not, and the 12,000 gifts all paid in proportion to the tickets sold.

PRICE OF TICKETS:

Whole tickets, $50; Halves, $25; Tenths, or each coupon, $5; Eleven Whole Tickets for $500; 22½ Tickets for $1,000; 113 Whole Tickets for $5,000; 227 Whole Tickets for $10,000. No discount on less than $500 worth of Tickets at a time.

Full particulars may be learned from circulars, which will be sent free from this office to all who apply for them.

Tickets now ready for sale, and all orders accompanied by the money promptly filled. Liberal terms given to those who buy to sell again.

THOS. E. BRAMLETTE,
Agent Public Library Ky., and Manager Gift Concert,
Public Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

Every baby must have it. IS THOROUGHLY WATER-PROOF, protects clothing, retains linen diaper, avoids pins, permits circulation of air. Recommended by physicians and all mothers whose children have worn them. Made in 4 sizes—1, smallest; 4 largest—exclusively by EUREKA DIAPER CO., 532 Broadway, N. Y. Sample mailed on receipt of $1. Sold also by Stewart, Claflin, Lord & Taylor, Arnold & Constable and first-class Infants Clothing, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA DIAPER; see they bear stamp of EUREKA PATENT DIAPER CO. Take no other. Agents wanted.

EVERYBODY LIKES a beautiful complexion, and a soft, smooth skin; both are obtained by using 'Wright's Alconated Glycerine Tablet of Solidified Glycerine,' fragrant, transparent, and incomparable as a Toilet Soap. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS.
AGENTS WANTED.
SEND FOR CATALOGUE.
Domestic Sewing-Machine Co., N. Y.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.
DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

DR. NOBLE'S GREAT DISCOVERY.—A certain cure for fever and ague, bilious fever, and chill fever. A tonic. Price $1 per bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 Sixth Ave. Sold every where. Agents wanted.

Hosted by Google

WATERS' CONCERTO PARLOR ORGANS

are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. The CONCERTO STOP is the best ever placed in any Organ. It is produced by a third set of reeds peculiarly voiced, the EFFECT of which is MOST CHARMING and SOUL STIRRING, while its IMITATION of the HUMAN VOICE is SUPERB. Terms liberal.

A GREAT OFFER. HORACE WATERS & SON, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of 100 PIANOS and ORGANS of first-class makers, including WATERS', at extremely low prices for cash, or part cash, and balance in small monthly payments. New 7-Octave first-class PIANOS, all modern improvements, for $275 cash. Organs $55, $75. DOUBLE-REED ORGANS, $100; 4-STOP, $110; 8-STOP, $125, upwards. ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES MAILED for one stamp. A large discount to Ministers, Churches, Sunday-Schools, Temperance Societies, Lodges, etc. AGENTS WANTED.

A SINGLE APPLICATION OF

BARRY'S

Pearl Cream

Brings back to the ladies of Forty all the lovely

Charms of Twenty.

Sold by all druggists, and at the depot, 26 Liberty St., New York.

Only 50 Cents per Bottle.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. IV.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER..... No. 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK..... " 11
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)..... " 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)..... " 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old).... " 29
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)..... " 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt).. " 35
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER..... " 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
GENTLEMAN'S SHORT DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP..... " 46
PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 48

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postilion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old).... " 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER..... " 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)..... " 6
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 20
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER.. " 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)..... " 25
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)..... " 50

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)..... " 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT.... " 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 17
LOOSE-FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 23
GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT. " 24
BLOUSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 28
LADIES' AND MISSES' BATHING OR GYMNASTIC SUIT..... " 30
PLEATED WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 32
DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 32
ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT..... " 39

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$72 00 EACH WEEK. Agents wanted every where. Business strictly legitimate. Particulars free. Address J. WORTH & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE & CO.

HAVE NOW OPEN THEIR

FALL IMPORTATION

OF NEW AND BEAUTIFUL

CARPETINGS,

COMPRISING MANY VERY ELEGANT PRIVATE DESIGNS,

Prepared and Colored under their supervision, and adapted to the taste of the AMERICAN MARKET.

Strangers visiting the city are invited to give the assortment an examination.

BROADWAY, COR. 19TH STREET, N. Y.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,

FOR THE

CONVENIENCE OF STRANGERS,

HAVE NOW OPEN

A FULL ASSORTMENT OF

DRESS GOODS

AND

CLOTH COLORED SILKS,

&c., &c.,

NEW STYLES AND COLORINGS.

BROADWAY, COR. 19TH STREET, N. Y.

Ehrich's

REAL LACES, EMBROIDERIES, BLACK SILKS, AND MOURNING GOODS, LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S UNDERWEAR, SHAWLS, FINE FURS, HATS, FEATHERS, RIBBONS, SUITS, &c., &c.

FIRST-CLASS GOODS at Popular Prices.

Samples sent free on application.

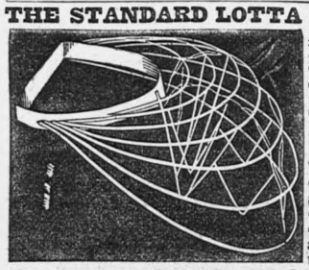
Goods shipped C.O.D., with full privilege of examination.

Our Fall Price-List will be ready on Sept. 15th.

EHRICH & CO.,

287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, New York.

THE STANDARD LOTTA BUSTLE.



ASK YOUR STOREKEEPER FOR IT.

A diploma has been awarded by the American Institute to A. W. Thomas, Patentee & Manufacturer for the lightest, strongest, most durable, comfortable, elastic, and cheapest Bustle in the market. The wearer can sit in any position whatever without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree, it closing entirely up on sitting, and returning with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault). No ladies' wardrobe complete without the Standard Lotta Bustle. For sale every where. Ask for Nos. 10, 11, 15, 18, 22, &c., comprising the various sizes and styles. Patentee and Wholesale Manufacturer, 91 White St., N.Y.; & 801 Race St., Phila.

BAZAR

Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

For $5 and $2.

The Patent Brass Hair-Curler, heated on any Gas-Burner, and Furnace for heating Crimping-Iron. On exhibition at the Fair of the American Institute, New York City, and recommended by first-class hair-dressers. Send Stamp for Circular to F. IMHORST, No. 20 Amity Street, New York.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

FOR 1873.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

A repository of biography and history, literature, science, and art, unequaled by any other American publication.—N. Y. Standard.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

There never was any paper published that so delighted the heart of woman. Never mind if it does cost you a new bonnet; it will save you ten times the price in the household economy it teaches.—Providence Journal.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

Dr. Gardiner Spring's Sermons.

WITH A FINE STEEL PORTRAIT.

PULPIT MINISTRATIONS; OR, SABBATH READINGS. A Series of Discourses on Christian Doctrine and Duty. By the late Rev. GARDINER SPRING, D.D., Pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church in New York. With a Steel Portrait of the Author. 2 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

In these volumes the author has arranged those productions which his own judgment has approved as the most edifying and best fitted to be popular in the family, conveying his maturest thoughts and most finished illustrations of divine truth. We anticipate from these sermons extensive and permanent usefulness; for they are not ephemeral, but exhibit truths that will be as dear to God's people and useful to the Church in the millennium as they are now.—New York Observer.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any address in the United States, on receipt of Six Dollars.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments, or all the time, than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, Cor. 4th St., N. Y. The largest stock of Human Hair goods in the city. Wigs made to order by the best artists. A perfect fit guaranteed. The invisible wig a specialty. No. 1, round the head; No. 2, from forehead to nape of neck; No. 3, from ear to ear across crown; No. 4, from ear to ear across forehead. Goods sent C.O.D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

FINE FURS.

A large assortment, at less than manufacturers' prices. Send for Price-List. Orders promptly attended to and sent C. O. D., with privilege of examination.

J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

WANTED—BOOK AGENTS, to sell new and popular books. Books that are admirably adapted to the season, viz: Anecdotes of Public Men, by John W. Forney; Farm Ballads, by Will Carleton; I Go a-Fishing, by W. C. Prime; Miss Beecher's Housekeeper and Healthkeeper; The Fishing Tourist, by Charles Hallock. Liberal inducements offered. For further particulars, inquire of or address

AVERY BILL,
Care of Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Fresh Summer Books

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.

FLAMMARION'S ATMOSPHERE. The Atmosphere. Translated from the French of CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Edited by JAMES GLAISHER, F.R.S., Superintendent of the Magnetical and Meteorological Department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. With 10 Chromo-Lithographs, and 86 Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

II.

TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS. The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. (Uniform with Tyerman's "Life of John Wesley.")

III.

THE BAZAR BOOK OF HEALTH. The Dwelling, the Nursery, the Bedroom, the Dining-Room, the Parlor, the Library, the Kitchen, the Sick-Room. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. (Uniform in style and price with the "Bazar Book of Decorum.")

IV.

CASTELAR'S OLD ROME AND NEW ITALY. Old Rome and New Italy. By EMILIO CASTELAR. Translated by Mrs. ARTHUR ARNOLD. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

V.

LIFE OF ALFRED COOKMAN. The Life of the Rev. Alfred Cookman. By H. B. RIDGAWAY, D.D. With Portrait on Steel. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

VI.

I GO A-FISHING. By W. C. PRIME, Author of "Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia," "Tent Life in the Holy Land," "Later Years," "The Old House by the River," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

VII.

ANECDOTES OF PUBLIC MEN. By JOHN W. FORNEY. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

VIII.

MISS BEECHER'S HOUSEKEEPER & HEALTHKEEPER: Containing Five Hundred Recipes for Economical and Healthful Cooking; also, many Directions for securing Health and Happiness. Approved by Physicians of all Schools. Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

IX.

FARM BALLADS. By WILL CARLETON. Illustrated. Square 8vo, Cloth, Beveled and Illuminated, $2 00; Gilt Edges, $2 50.

X.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON: Its Negotiation, Execution, and the Discussions Relating Thereto. By CALEB CUSHING. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

THE NEW NOVELS

OF

THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

1.

STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "Birds of Prey," "Lovels of Arden," "To the Bitter End," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

2.

A SIMPLETON: A Story of the Day. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

3.

TOO SOON: A Study of a Girl's Heart. By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID, Author of "Patty," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

4.

INNOCENT. A Tale of Modern Life. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," "Chronicles of Carlingford," "John: a Love Story," "Brownlows," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

5.

WILKIE COLLINS'S NEW MAGDALEN. The New Magdalen. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "Armadale," "Moonstone," "Man and Wife," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

6.

"'HE COMETH NOT,' SHE SAID." By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "On Guard," "Walter Goring," "Theo Leigh," "Played Out," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.

THE HOUR AND THE MAN. An Historical Romance. By HARRIET MARTINEAU. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

8.

LONDON'S HEART. By B. L. FARJEON, Author of "Grif," "Joshua Marvel," "Blade-o'-Grass," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

They tell of an old lady in Middlebury who walked over a bridge that was marked "dangerous" without seeing the sign, and when informed of the fact on the other side, turned back in great alarm and hastily recrossed it.

"Now, Willie dear," says Fanny, "do have a little courage. When I have a powder to take, I don't like it any more than you do, but I make up my mind that I will take it, and I do."

"And when I have a powder to take," replied Willie, "I make up my mind that I won't take it, and I don't."

If your errand-boy takes an unusually long time to bring your morning mail from the post-office, don't reprove him for being slow till you find out how many postal cards he has had to read.

Why is a dressing-gown the most lasting garment in a gentleman's wardrobe?—Because he never wears it out.

To what would a man, taking breakfast with his betrothed, be most likely to object?—To any butter (but her).

A printer was boasting, the other day, about his wonderful ability to set type.

"I know what you can't set," said a comrade.

"What is it?"

"Two hens on one nest."

A Southern paper has this among its personals: "St. Paul is away out West with Minnesota. St. John will spend the summer in New Brunswick. Elmira is in New York. Elizabeth is in New Jersey. Marietta is in Ohio. Charlotte is in North Carolina. Augusta is down here in Georgia. They don't intend visiting each other this season."

Best Size for a Man—Exercise.

"Who made you?" was asked of a small girl. She replied, "God made me that length," indicating with her hands the length of a new-born infant, "and I growed the rest myself."

The best Thing to take before singing—Breath.

At a Venture.—Ladies who affect the Grecian bend should obviously row "bow" when indulging in that graceful exercise.

A gallant major has named his Scotch terrier Penny because it was one sent to him, and has continual mills with the cat. Its original name was Penwiper, from its resemblance to the numerous articles of that kind which his lady friends seemed to think the first necessity of a soldier's life. It is needless to say that he is a bachelor.

A House of Detention—A pawnbroker's shop.

Malapropiana.—Mrs. Malaprop, good soul! proposes to distribute tracts among teetotalers, who, she regrets to hear, are living in a state of spiritual destitution.

Ship's Bread—Rolls (O lor!).

Not a Teetotaler—One who must have his glass before he can do a day's work: a glazier.

An Irishman was asked if Lola Montez ever smoked. "Yes, Sir, she did," he exclaimed, "and so does every volcano. Perhaps you'll show me the lovely crater that don't smoke!"

POOR SUFFERER.

Interesting Invalid. "Doctor, I want my Husband to take me to Paris. Now do tell me, what Complaint ought I to have?"

[And that's what the bill was for.

A wag, in what he knows about farming, gives a plan to remove widows' weeds. He says a good-looking man has only to say, "Wilt thou?" and they wilt.

How to rise in the World—Go up in a balloon.

A colored debating society in Trenton, Tennessee, has just debated the question, "Which is the most profit to man—money or education?" One of the debaters argued that if it had not been for education the world would not have been half so large as it is. This clincher was met, however, by the argument that "If it wasn't for money, how you gwine to ride on de kyars?" It was at once decided in favor of money.

A Nautical Monogram—The crest of the wave.

Couldn't stand it.—An uncouth child of nature writes feelingly anent a popular topic: "I could stan' bein' called a liar an' a thief," says he, "or even be told that the ole man kep' a hoop-skirt factory; but when one of them loafin' goslin's come aroun' me a-sayin' as I had suthin to do with that ere Betsey nor I is Out, I jes riz on my hind-legs and combed him down."

A good sermon is like a kiss—it requires but two heads and an application.

You can use a postage stamp twice. The first time it will cost you three cents, the second time fifty dollars.

Bus Conductors—Lips.

The Japanese have solved the problem, "How to make the men go to church." The Kiyobusho has published the names and ages of six women who have been appointed preachers. Attention is to be paid to these teachers, as they "are rich in knowledge." Their ages range from fifteen to fifty-seven. It is expected that they will have a considerable following.

NURSY-PURSY.

[This poem, written by a child aged only five years and three months, is printed more as a literary curiosity than for any other reason. A kind of tender pathos may be observable here and there, which in a child so young is, at least, surprising.]

Who wore a hideous high-crowned cap,
Who called me tootsy-wootsy chap,
Yet used my little head to slap?
Dear nursy-pursy.

Who said she'd watch, then meanly slept,
And pinched me spiteful when I wept,
And for my pap her stale crusts kept?
Dear nursy-pursy.

Who gazed into my heavy eye,
And said, "A powder we must try;
This horrid child, he lives too high?"
Dear nursy-pursy.

Who, when I yelled, cried, "Hold your din!"
Or choked me with a drop of gin
(It wasn't spasms, but a pin)?
Dear nursy-pursy.

Who on my toddlums let me run
Much sooner than she should have done,
Which I've grown up a bandy one?
My nursy-pursy.

Moral.—Drat her!

One who always gets Bread when he kneads it—A baker.

A burning Shame.—An ingenious scientist announces that he has discovered diamonds to be combustible at a much lower temperature than is usually supposed. We don't care much if they are. We haven't any diamonds, and if we had we shouldn't get fooling about a furnace with them. If the gentleman will state at what temperature we can with safety manufacture or steal them, he shall have our thanks.

NOT ABOVE THE SNOW LINE.

A newly married man took his bride on a tour to Switzerland for the honey-moon, and when there induced her to attempt with him the ascent of one of the highest peaks. The lady, who at home had never ascended a hill higher than a church, was much alarmed, and had to be carried by the guides with her eyes blindfolded, so as not to witness the horrors of the passage. The bridegroom walked close to her, expostulating with her respecting her fear. He spoke in honey-moon whispers, but the rarefaction of the air was such that every word was audible. "You told me, Leonora, that you always felt happy, no matter where you were, so long as you were in my company. Then why are you not happy now?"

"Yes, Charles, I did," replied she, sobbing hysterically; "but I never meant above the snow line."

A See-Saw—A sword-fish.

One who makes his Way in the World because he prepares for a rainy Day—A crossing-sweeper; only he does not always find it answer, surely.

A Slip of the Pen—Reporters' copy.

"Bridget! Bridget! why don't you bring up the lemonade?" said Mrs. S——, on the Fourth of July, from the top of the kitchen stairs.

"Why, ma'am," said Bridget, wiping the sweat from her red face with her checked apron, as she put her head round the staircase partition—"why, ma'am, you see, the ice I put in the lemonade is so hard that it hasn't melted yet, though it's stirring it over the fire I've been for the last fifteen minutes or more!"

A Poser for an Oculist—A window-blind.

"Vegetable pills!" exclaimed an old lady; "don't talk to me of such stuff! The best vegetable pill ever made is apple-dumpling. For destroying a knawing in the stomach there is nothing like it. It always can be relied on."

IF.

If sunshine were sold by the pound,
If paupers could feed on clover,
If the world were square, not round,
If the Tichborne case were over,
If one grew beefsteaks in the garden,
If mutton were picked from trees,
If pheasants were sold for a "farden,"
If eels had gout in their knees,
If tailors ne'er sent in their bills,
And workmen ne'er asked for their wages,
If doctors ne'er ordered us pills,
If pines were as cheap as greengages,
If wise folks at times were not fools,
And fools were not always so wise,
If the school-board had sensible schools,
And blind men could see without eyes,
If pigs could fly nimbly as swallows,
If swallows could grunt like swine—
Why, of course, you'll discover what follows
From such suppositions as mine!
If I had but a subject to rhyme on,
I'd choose it for better or worse,
Instead of thus wasting your time on
Such very ridiculous verse.

It is on record that Adam, the first man to receive a land grant, died poor and miserable.

A well-dressed dog wears a collar and pants in the summer.

"Who dat hit me? Where's dat lantern?" were the exclamations of an astonished Elmira darky after being thrown something like a hundred feet by a locomotive.

THE MEDAL SCHOOL-GIRL OF THE PERIOD.

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.

Hot-house Plant with Medals. "Can't come out to play. I have to study my Philosophy and my Greek. I want to keep the Medals."

Out-of-door Plant. "Fiddle! you'll need your Health soon more than your Philosophy: besides, my Papa says there are too many Greeks in this Country now."

LESSONS IN PATIENCE.

Mr. Biggs, having accepted an Invitation from his Fiancée and his future Mother-in-law to go shopping, is put under a test of Endurance by waiting two mortal Hours while the whole stock of Goods is shown without a single Purchase. Of course this must all be done over again in some other Store.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 40.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. XIX.

THE woman who thought she could take the sulphur vapor bath at home in her own bath-room, finds that her experience reads like a chapter from the Danbury News man. A bouquet of burning matches would furnish the perfume inhaled in the process, and the vapor reaching her face in puffs has left it pale and brown in spots, as if she were a subject of that much-lamented disease, mask. That she escaped with hair only partially tinged, and any eyebrows to speak of, is due to Nature's guardian care, which prompted the struggle for life half a minute sooner than pride was inclined to give up. And the fumes lingering about the premises have induced the gravest suspicions on the part of her neighbors. She is inclined to think that if her face will only return to its former brownness all over, she will forego her dreams of brow of Parian whiteness and cheeks like peaches.

Taking a sulphur vapor bath is a matter to be cautious about, even when administered by the best hands. It is not well to take it in the damp, "breaking-up" weather of March, for the bath opens the pores, and catching cold with several grains of sulphur in the body is next to salivation by mercury. The effects are that one feels heavy and aching, the eyes grow weak, and teeth grumble, while any latent rheumatic pains wake up to sharp reminder of one's imprudence. But when the weather grows warm and settled, these baths are a luxury and medicine combined.—They are the most effectual purifiers of the system, and by searching out all waste particles and removing them, leave the skin as new and fair as a baby's. I have seen old and darkened complexions restored by them in a way that seemed little short of miraculous. They are of benefit in such neuralgias as result from impurity of the blood, and scrofulous affections are powerfully dealt with by them. The time is not far distant when every town that has a public hall will also have its public baths. Before that time, however, physicians must learn moderation in their charges for these remedial agents. Outside of our large cities sulphur vapor baths are $5 each, and they are only given in series, as prescribed by the judgment or humor of the physician. When will people learn the laws and habits of their own bodies, so that they need not be at the mercy of every specialist who chooses to make money out of their emergencies? For the benefit of outsiders I will say that the charge for these baths in the best establishments of New York is not higher than $2 50 at most for the single bath, and great reduction from this is permitted in different houses.

The essential difficulty of giving the sulphur vapor treatment is that the powerful fumes must be kept from the face, as it would be dangerous to breathe a particle of them. For this object the bather enters a wooden box, with a cover having a hole in it that just fits the neck. He takes a seat on a chair in the box undressed, and the cover is adjusted so that only the head is left out. Cloths are closely wrapped about the neck to prevent the least escape of gas, and a wet sponge laid on the top of the head, or, what is better, a very wet towel folded round the back of it, turbanwise, to the top, thus cooling the base of the brain, the sensitive upper part, and the carotid arteries at the side. This must be frequently wet with cold water during the bath—a precaution which removes all danger of apoplectic seizures by heating the blood. The sulphur-charged steam is then let into the box by pipes, and in three minutes the perspiration flows from the body as if the luckless victim were melting away. In the best establishments an attendant fans the bather all the time the steam is let on, to cool the head, into which the heated blood rushes in a way that makes the wet towel smoke directly. The bath lasts fifteen minutes, after which the vapor is turned off; and when the steam in the box has had time to condense, the cover is unjointed, and the bather is treated to a scrubbing with soap and warm water, which gradually cools and cleanses the body. Then cooler water is poured over the bather, and after wiping, he is wrapped in a fresh sheet and lies down to pleasant dreams. All the descriptions by Eastern travelers of the luxury of the bath come true in this last stage of enjoyment. One feels rejuvenated, entranced, and sinks away into a sleep, light, ineffable, whose inception seems a prelude to paradise. One's eyes close to keep out the sordid surroundings of the bathing-room, usually in the basement; and every idea, or rather sensation—for the brain is too torpid and passive to think—is bliss. Quite as beautiful is the return to consciousness, sense after sense regaining double brightness as softly and steadily as the unfolding of a flower. In this state of purity and light one learns to reverence one's physical self. A body that at its best feels so glorious and happy, ought not to be exposed to disturbances of appetite and the contact of gross things. We need to be very much more refined in our living, eating, and breathing. We ought to wear cleaner clothes, choose very much nicer meats and fruit than we are at present content with, and place our dwellings out of the reach of the least impurity of air. In this altered and steadied frame dispositions to evil will lose their sway. Irritable temper will be soothed, despondency flee as by magic, and fiercer passions lie asleep as at the stroking of their manes. Once for all, if any should read this page who are so unfortunate as to know the battle with unnatural desires, which make life less blessed and lofty than it was meant to be, let them have recourse to this efficient ally. It will restore one from the horrible depression which craves alcohol or opium, it will rescue one from the perilous excitement of overwrought nerves or too much brain-work, and banish those morbid feelings which consciously or unconsciously incline to impurity of imagination if not of life. The purity of the body and that of the soul are too closely woven for any one to dare neglect them.

In the old time saints used to subdue the body by prayer and fasting. The modern way is by prayer and bathing. It is hard enough to keep a peaceable, firm, and sweet habit of soul without letting loose on it the humors and insanities of the body. These are in no way so quickly quelled as by the warm baths, and this is why I say that they ought to be part of the public buildings of every village, and as cheap as they can be made, that here the drunkard may find a stimulus which has no reaction, the emotionally insane a sedative that will clear his brain and steady his nerves; where the exhausted watcher by the sick may recruit, and the overwrought student, lawyer, or physician find support without recourse to perilous stimulants. The doors of such a place in a large city should stand open night and day, like those of the churches. Men sooner build their sepulchres than spend money for the conditions of life.

Women need the bath for all these purposes no less than men. The feeble mother will find no soothing for her jarred nerves or lightener of her burdens like the well-applied bath. Strange to say, the vapor bath does not weaken. It only washes away the worse particles of the body that weigh it down, and whose loss leaves it as if winged. I have known an invalid of years take it twice and thrice a week, gaining strength by it every time. If harm comes by it, it is because the head is not kept cool by fanning (and this the patient should insist on), or because the final sponging was not gradual enough. There is harm in every remedy if used unskillfully. It is the doctor's province to direct in such matters, always premising that the best and wisest physicians prefer to teach their clients the rules of health and of treatment, and very, very seldom refuse to give the reason and theory of their orders. It is safe to be shy of the perception and methods of a doctor who doesn't like to tell what medicines he gives, and why he gives them. The keenest and best medical men are impatient to have others see and understand the truth like themselves.

But, to leave this graver strain, it is not a little amusing to hear the requests for a way in which to give a sulphur vapor bath to the face alone.

Fig. 1.—CASHMERE MANTELET.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-3.

Fig. 2.—CASHMERE MANTELET.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-3.

Hosted by Google

Somebody wants a fair complexion, and fancies it may be gained by bleaching the face after the manner of an old Leghorn bonnet in a barrel. Aside from the assurance of being choked to death, no mode can be devised of whitening and refining the face by applications to it alone, when all the conditions of health are not obeyed in other ways. Carbolic acid may heal pimples, and glycerine masks soften the skin; but the lovely red and white, with lips like currants, and skin like the flesh of young cranberries, can not be had unless the blood is pure, the food regulated, plenty of exercise and sunshine taken, and the best order kept by all the bodily functions. Cosmetics may produce the desired effect, but the face will not stay so if the system is not right. Take the point of bathing. The reason why so many young women have rough faces is because they neglect to cleanse the skin of the body, but wash their faces every day. The pores are so clogged by secretions that morbid matters break out on the face, where they have more chance. The ladies of King George's court were perfectly logical when they refused to wash their faces lest it should spoil their complexions. They seldom washed their bodies or their linen, and it was dangerous to give their festering blood an outlet by cleaning a spot for it. The full-blooded girls whose complexions give them trouble need not eat fat meat save in the depth of winter, nor drink milk. They may take these in after-years, if they grow thin and weak from the nursing of children or by hard work. Their systems can turn the grapes and pears they ought to feed on, the fish, chicken, and lean meat, and the nutty oatmeal and wheat cakes (not mushes), into fat enough to round their elbows, and strength enough to make their walk like the figure of a dance. They must try daily bathing, or rather scrubbing with soap and hot water, followed by cold, taking a matter of ten minutes a day, at most, if they know how to move. Very likely they will need a few bottles of Saratoga water or several doses of salts to clear the blood, adhering religiously to a Graham diet the while, or their last state after this medicine will be worse than the first. After taking the sulphur vapor baths they must go out-of-doors, and finish bleaching themselves in the sun. By living in it five hours a day they may gain the lovely painted marble of the English girl's face, who reaps all day in the harvest field.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

☞ A Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains more reading matter than an average octavo volume. The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for September 27 was sent out gratuitously an illustrated

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing a thrilling story, complete, of the East India Mutiny, with a striking illustration; another illustrated installment of "PHINEAS REDUX," by ANTHONY TROLLOPE; and several humorous illustrations.

An EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for October 4.

SURROUNDINGS.

THERE are few natures, if any, mentally or physically strong enough to resist the influences of surroundings, which are a kind of fate in themselves, and in great degree determine our intellectual reach and our moral altitude, compel our imaginations, and decide religion, love, and friendship for us, as well as our physical status. As in the garden we see all manner of tiny insects that have drawn their hues from the leaves upon which they feed, so the minds of individuals take shape and color from their surroundings; and in so far as these surroundings are of a superior kind, ennobling rather than belittling, so far will this shape be removed from deformity and fashioned after the line of beauty, and this color be warranted fast. All history takes cognizance of the effects of climate upon race and temperament, and sets down the indolent will and the swarthy physique to Southern latitudes, carrying enterprise and energy over to the blonde Northern nations; mountainous regions boast a brave, sure-footed people, with no consumptive tendencies—since climbing demands entire and healthy expansion of the lungs—while to dwellers by the sea are meted out a quickened intellect and contempt of dangers. But climate is only a wider surrounding, which moulds us after its own methods, and there is no doubt but the surroundings of a more intimate nature have as decided effects upon character and constitution. They, in a great measure, dictate our preferences and habits, since, unless we conform more or less to the world about us, life resolves itself into a warfare. But the fact is that we do conform unwittingly; the influences are as certain and subtle as those of the sun and air. We are set in our surroundings like a picture in its frame, and if they happen to harmonize with our inherent qualities, well and good; if not, we must make the best of it.

The nature of a young child, malleable like gold, is worked upon by the atmosphere into which it is born, and if that atmosphere lacks mental stimulus, in most cases the young mind will suffer; and, in like manner, even the mature mind, transplanted among uncongenial surroundings, will insensibly adapt itself to the condition of things, for with the Romans one must do as the Romans, and in order to imitate them acceptably, one must adopt their manner of thought and being. In most communities it is the prevailing religious creed that governs; the members are hedged in by the surrounding doctrine of infallibility, of free-will, or predestination, as the case may be, and are rarely invited to search for truth in any other direction; thus one's surroundings come to have a tendency to warp and color and often to restrict one's views. It is what Neighbor Grundy thinks which regulates our thought, what she does that decides our behavior. We can as easily travel beyond our surroundings as we can get beyond our atmosphere without dying, when we would perhaps merely change them. The most timid and selfish among us might find herself as heroic as JEANNE D'ARC if the surroundings demanded it; the most reserved feel the spirit moving her to preach with the tongue of men and angels, if those whom she had been bred to hold in esteem in her little world were wont to "speak in meeting." Our surroundings are at once our inspiration and our opportunity—they bid us be up to the occasion. To be sure, the opportunity and inspiration may be meagre, and the occasion small, since the stream may not rise above its source, but they are the result of the things that teach us, that surround us, just as certain plants are the product of certain soils, and could adapt themselves to no other condition without variation.

Without sensible effort our tastes become the outgrowth and assimilation of our surroundings, be they æsthetic or otherwise. One to whom high behavior and noble sentiments are a daily lesson and example is heir to a natural nobility; to one born, as it were, in a library, learning would seem to be the mother-tongue. Living constantly among beauty and romance engenders beautiful and romantic ideas. As there are peculiar formations of mind belonging to those who dwell in mountainous districts and to those who inhabit valleys, it would be strange indeed if the neighborhood of a renowned river, a storied water-fall, crowned with rainbows, or a historic ruin, made no lasting impression on mind and matter. On the other hand, those whose glimpse of heaven is only as wide as the narrow street, whose "ample spirits" are confined among brick walls and importunate industries, naturally experience the narrowing influences, unless they take care to change the situation to "larger fields and pastures new," just as a plant in an earthen pot too small for its capacity, though holding the secret of growth and expansion in its germs, yet shrivels and fails of development because of its cramped surroundings. Yet the little Edelweiss finds material for a beautiful life underneath the mountain snows, and the May-flower blushes fragrantly on the borders of the bitterest winter; so perhaps the surroundings of each one of us are better adapted to work out in us those purposes for which we were created than any others that we might choose.

MISPRISION OF FELONY.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

A CRITIC, speaking of Miss PRESTON'S Love in the Nineteenth Century, says: "In one of Julius's letters there are some sharp words denouncing the current newspaper fashion of printing 'personal' paragraphs about female writers. Miss PRESTON, through Julius, thinks that such publicity is 'enough to make these poor creatures curse the day they ever put pen to paper, or whatever it is women do when men curse.' We can not see why women should fare better than men in this respect. By the act of public appearance, as writers, they invite public criticism and comment; they know what awaits them before they make their début, and deliberately put aside the veil which has hidden them. Public curiosity about writers is a fixed fact; and we venture to submit that women are at least equally responsible with men for it."

So when a woman decries the plunder of her purse, impartial Justice might exclaim, "We can not see why women should fare better than men in this respect. By the very act of owning money they invite acquisition. They know what awaits them before they drop the bills into their pockets, and they deliberately become the objects of thievish observation. Greed of money is a fixed fact, and we venture to submit that there are female thieves as well as male thieves." But would impartial Justice lock up its office and go home to dinner feeling that it had expounded the whole duty of man?

Come now and let us reason together. You say, cool critic, you can not see why women should fare better than men in this respect. They should not. Men and women are on precisely the same ground. When a woman prints a book, sells a bonnet, makes a shoe, she does it not as a woman, but as an author, trader, shoe-maker. Nothing is due her professionally that is not due a man in the same business. If a female writer tries to disarm criticism, if a milliner claims to work fewer hours, if a seamstress excuses bad work, by pleading her sex, she displays ignorance of first principles. Let us heartily agree, then, that in the literary world there shall be no distinctions of sex so far as concerns prerogatives, emoluments, and exemptions. A woman shall claim nothing that would not belong to a man in her place.

What then? "By the act of public appearance as writers they invite public criticism and comment." Upon what? Upon themselves? When a man publishes an article in Harper's Magazine he invites public criticism and comment upon his eyes and hair, his clothes, his habits, his family history, his courtship and marriage, his school escapades, and his last year's journey, not simply on his article in the Magazine! The Lord have mercy on us, and incline our hearts to break this law, if this, indeed, is law! But who will have the temerity to assert it? Who dares say that when a man makes public property of a portion of his thoughts, he makes public property of himself and all his surroundings? Many act on the assumption, undoubtedly. There is a literary parasite, an insect that has no life in itself, but fattens and flourishes on those who have. These parasites never did any thing, but they feed on those who have wrought. Their stock in trade is the personal history, habits, ways, of men whose achievements have made their history interesting. They have no more judgment, discrimination, taste, than a mosquito, and they keep up as ceaseless a buzz. But hitherto they have lived by sufferance. Even Punch, in the far-off days when American slavery was the stumbling-block of English freemen, used to parry our thrusts at British peasants, miners, and paupers by the true refrain, and when these literary barnacles were befouling the keel of many a good ship, it was satisfactory to reflect that they were an Ishmaelitic race, acting against every unwritten law. But now a Daniel has come to judgment and promulgates a new law—that not the paragraphist but the victim is at fault! To publish an article is not simply to render yourself liable to pillaging, it is to invite it. It is to invite every one to your house, to describe in print your personal appearance, your breakfast-table, and your garden-plot. To print a story is to throw open every door, and ask all comers to profane the sanctities of your home forever.

> "Slaves for want of legislation
> Are not quite like slaves by law;"

I question whether most writers do "know what awaits them before they make their début, and deliberately put aside the veil which has hidden them." On the contrary, they are profoundly ignorant of it. A young man or a young woman, inexperienced both in life and letters, thinks little of himself when he first ventures into the arena. His article possesses his soul. All his interest and thought centre there. He does not dream that any thing will wrest him personally from profound obscurity, or that his personality will have the smallest interest for the world. He is far more likely to fancy himself in hiding, even if hearing the nations praising him far off. It is only practical experience of the idle persistency and trivial curiosity of the world that teaches him how hard it is to hold his privacy intact.

And how is it with those who never make a public appearance as writers, who never deliberately put aside the veil which has hidden them, but who, on the contrary, draw a veil around them by assuming a name? Do they thereby invite or repel personal public comment, and is their invitation or repulsion heeded? If a pseudonym means any thing, it means an abnegation of personality. The author who assumes a name intimates unmistakably that he desires his personality to be dissevered from his authorship; and any attempt to go behind that assumed name and connect it with the life of any person whatever is an impertinence. George Eliot is a man, unless womanhood is indubitably induced from his writings; and though the world may have badgered him into acquiescing in his imputed womanhood, the world was wholly prying and ill-bred in doing so. George Eliot is George Eliot, and nobody else, and the public has no more right to ascribe George Eliot's traits or works to any Mrs. A or Mrs. B who is supposed to be George Eliot than if Mrs. A could not write her own name.

That women violate personal rights as often as men must, I fear, be admitted. That they suffer more from its violation than men can not, therefore, be conceded, and is not to the point if it could. It is hard to see that women show more judgment, discrimination, delicacy, than men. They can not be depended on to respect individual existence, to refrain from encroaching upon private ground. I do not know that it has ever been denied that coarseness in woman is coarser than coarseness in man. Nor seems there any reason to believe that a man, pure, sensitive, noble, is not as easily wounded as the female of his kind. Roughness is not the rule of one sex, and softness of the other. Refinement in both sexes is annoyed and disturbed by rudeness in either.

But rudeness is indeed rampant when we have learned to submit to it—I do not say in silence, since that may be the only resource left to dignity, but without mental protest. Fools may rush in where angels fear to tread, but so long as they are recognized fools all is not lost. But when authority which has always been considered respectable begins to justify impertinence, we are indeed far gone in trespasses and sins.

Nevertheless, though hand join in hand, wickedness is not ennobled, good-breeding is not degraded. Politeness may be utterly lost out of the world, and privacy be debarred those who have had the misfortune to please the world. Newspapers may stagnate into the belief that public curiosity about writers is a fixed fact, and that it is of no use to set any bounds to its exercise. Just the same it remains that men and women do not by the act of writing become outlaws from social courtesy, with no rights that people are bound to respect. People have no more right to pry into the affairs of an author than into those of a blacksmith. Etiquette should shield the one as closely as it shields the other. The writings of a writer belong to the public. It has a right to comment upon them as often, as long, as severely, as it chooses. Every thing but the writings of the writer belongs to himself. The world, the public, the newspapers, have no authority to comment upon it one way or another. Of personal matters praise and blame are equally out of place. Paragraphs may itemize, since the courts take no cognizance of these verbal crimes; but they remain crimes, and not mere characteristics of the age. The courtesies of the press are even more strenuous than the courtesies of the parlor, their violation being as much more obnoxious as it is wide-spread, as much more vulgar as it is done in cool blood, as much more cowardly as it is removed from immediate punishment. Curiosity about writers, as about every thing else, is a fixed fact; but it is only a vicious and vulgar mind that would indulge its curiosity at the expense of every delicate instinct, all social confidence, and all possible claim to "the grand old name of gentleman."

To say that one shall not write without thereby offering up all his individual possessions to greedy and indiscriminate ears is to inflict a cruel and unusual punishment, which is contrary to statute law, and should deliver its perpetrator over to imprisonment in the county jail during life or good behavior.

I suppose that one of the pleasantest emoluments of the author's office is the > "Thanks untraced to lips unknown,

> That greet him like the odors blown
> From unseen meadows newly mown"— the sense of sharing in subtle sympathies far off, and an all-pervasive friendliness. But to be preyed upon by vapid and frivolous inquisitiveness, to be offered up on the altar of senseless and silly gossip, whose only alleviation is its falseness, may be borne so long as respectable people frown upon it. But when the slaughter is counted no slaughter, but a proper rite of natural religion, it is time to raise the standard of revolt.

Hosted by Google

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

REDINGOTE MATERIALS.

ROUGH-SURFACED camel's-hair is now the accepted fabric for redingotes and wraps, just as cashmere has been for the last four winters. There are various camel's-hair materials shown, some of which are almost as rough-looking and thick as Irish frieze, though smooth and indeed "slippery" to the touch; these are the most expensive, and will be the most stylish goods for over dresses and mantillas. The camel's-hair felt is new this season, and far thicker than any kindred fabric worn last year. It is a yard and a quarter wide, at $4 a yard. Chamois is a heavy but loosely woven flannel-like stuff, with the shaggy fleece of camel's-hair and a Cheviot stripe: the price is from $4 to $5. "Camel's-hair diagonal," very fine and soft, is woven in the broad vertical lines raised above the surface in the style so conspicuous this season: this is $4 a yard, and is especially desirable. The plain and simple camel's-hair, with the familiar twill of last season, is made also much heavier, softer, and warmer, and is the standard goods for polonaises: the price is from $3 to $4. Camel's-hair serge, in imitation of this, but itself an excellent fabric, is rougher than that used last year, and costs $2 25. These goods are all shown in the deep blue, bronze brown, myrtle green, olive, and slate colors now fashionable, and the silk counters furnish rich failles at $4 a yard to match each shade, and serve as skirts beneath over dresses of these woolens.

Other twilled fabrics are shown in the retail stores at prices ranging below $2 a yard for double-width goods. Among these re-appear vigogne, or undressed cashmere, at $2, and excellent all-wool broad diagonals—in double, triple, and quadruple lines—at the same price. This fancy for twilled goods has restored serges to favor, and they are brought out in variety. The English serges, all wool, yet harsh to the touch, in wide open twills, cost from 70 cents to $1 50 a yard, and are excellent for serviceable suits. Self-colored striped serges are shown for polonaises, and cost from 70 cents to $1 25. Cashmere serge at 90 cents a yard is as thin and pliable as cashmere, yet has the broader diagonal lines of serge. Heavy serge flannel is 85 cents. The fancy for navy blue serges, so dark that they are almost black, promises to equal that of four years ago. Winter de bège, both plain and striped, is $1 10—a soft stylish fabric, said to be durable. Repped goods have fallen into disfavor, yet the excellent velours épingeline is still commended for its service, and is pliable enough for the soft draperies of the period: price $1 75.

A few striped goods are shown for house dresses, wrappers, and morning suits. The novelty among these is serge of dark cloth—colored ground with a relief of bright stripes; for instance, one stylish pattern is indigo blue with white stripes, another myrtle green with crimson stripes, a third bronze brown with blue stripes. These cost from 50 cents to $1 50 a yard. Bazar No. 38, Vol. VI., contains instructions for making and trimming redingotes and wraps of the materials just described.

CLOTH SUITS.

Diagonal cloth and the smooth-surfaced ladies' cloth made up in suits of jaunty shape are among the early importations. Black-blue, bronze brown, and myrtle green are the colors, and the trimming is black silk cording, with facings and pipings of the same. They consist of a jockey basque opening over a vest brightened by steel buttons, and edged with two silk cords; a plain round over-skirt with a scantily gathered ruffle on the edge piped with black. The skirt is cut off at the bottom, and finished by a kilt-pleated flounce headed by bias folds. A coat collar, and coat sleeves with close, stiffly lined cuffs, complete the trim costume.

SERGE AND ALPACA SUITS.

Imported serge suits are made with demi-polonaises and simply trimmed skirts. One model of olive serge has velvet bands and ruffles extending up the back breadth, and fastening over the short back of the demi-polonaise. A ruffle and bands trim the front breadth, and the half-polonaise hangs in long points on each side.

The most tastefully made black alpacas are without flounces this season. The skirt has five or six bias bands (piped on each edge) placed straight around it, and these are crossed at intervals of nearly half a yard by diagonal bands of the same width and piping. The diagonal bands extend beyond the horizontal ones, and are finished on each end by a button. A simple redingote with belt, coat sleeves, coat collar, and ruff of the material completes the suit. Another pretty design for alpaca dresses is a double-breasted jockey basque with an apron over-skirt open up the back to the belt, and two rows of kilt pleating on the lower skirt. To give this a jaunty air the new blue steel buttons are used on the basque, or else oxidized silver ones. The lower row of kilt pleating is only half the width of the upper one. An abundance of trimming, such as gathered puffs and ruffles, gives a very common look to the finest alpacas.

HINTS TO DRESS-MAKERS.

A revers collar in front, with a box-pleated ruff behind, is a stylish way of finishing the neck of basques, and indulges at once both the prevalent caprices for the ruff and the gentleman's coat collar. Basques now have the wide English back formed of four broad pieces of the same width at the waist, and the waist is not defined by buttons. Two cords on the edge of basques are far more stylish than any finish of lace or fringe, though the latter is sometimes placed on the back, while the fronts are plainly corded. Instead of full postilion pleats, plain lappets are sewed in the seams, or else the square jockey basque is laid in pleats that are pressed flatly, and held down by two lengthwise rows of buttons. Sleeveless jackets, especially those of black or dark-colored velvet, will be again fashionable, and are already worn with grenadine and silk dresses, accompanied by sashes of velvet. These velvet basques are tight-fitting, and are more ornamented than the simple ones worn last year. They are sometimes merely scalloped and needle-worked around the armholes and basque edge, and a velvet ruff is invariably added; others are rich with jet galloon, jet fringe, and lace, while a more stylish fancy still is to border them with a band of ostrich feathers; some are gay with colored embroidery. The new blue steel beads are mingled with jet fringes for trimming black silks and velvets. A black velvet revers collar, with a velvet ruff, lined with colored silk, is sold for wearing with various dresses: price $25. The silk or woolen ruff is now as universal for finishing the neck of dresses as bias bands have been hitherto. Instead of lining this ruff with a color, it is best to have it entirely of the color of the dress, and wear inside a silk ruff of any color that may be becoming, and still another ruff inside this of white muslin, lace, or crêpe lisse.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH CALICO SUITS.

Beautiful suits for morning, either for house or street, are made of the new dark calicoes. Those with black grounds brightened by a shell or star of yellow, or else dark blue with stripes or lightning-struck lines of white, make up most stylishly. They have the double-breasted redingote, belted, with two rows of smoked pearl buttons down the front, and a single skirt with two lapped, gathered flounces.

TROUSSEAU DRESSES.

Autumn is the wedding season, and the modistes are already busy with trousseaux. Creamy white faille, with tulle pleatings and orange garlands, makes a lovely dress for youthful brides. A model just completed has the rather long demi-train edged with a full box-pleated ruche of tulle, above which is a bias silk flounce held in diagonal pleats by a ruche. The three front breadths are covered from the belt to the knee with three tulle puffs, one puff covering each breadth, and are finished below by three side pleatings of tulle. The puffs are held to the silk by garlands of orange blossoms passing down the four front seams; the two front garlands end in clusters near the foot, while the two back ones sweep down the sides and around the train, forming a heading to three box-pleatings of tulle that pass above the silk flounce. The basque is pointed in front, with a jockey basque behind, and is edged with two cords; the square neck has tulle pleatings inside, and the short sleeves have puffs turned upward in box-pleats, making a short high shoulder. The corsage bouquet has a spray that runs down to the point of the basque, and another running over the left shoulder. Tulle veil, not hemmed. Coronet of orange blossoms, with a high pointed cluster on the left side and three trailing sprays.

The bride-maid's dress is of white silk, with an over-skirt and pleated flounces of finest French muslin, trimmed with garlands of blush-roses.

GLOVES.

Artists in gloves have prepared kid gloves of invisible colors to match the dark costumes with which they are to be worn. Forty different shades of darkest hues are displayed, including the new black-blue, bottle green, olive, invisible brown, slate, and plum colors. Good taste as well as style prescribes gloves of simplest fashion, utterly without ornament, made with long wrists fastened by three or four steel buttons, and depending for beauty on their fine color and perfect fit. Embroidery is only seen in the short gloves fastened by one or two buttons, to which ladies of conservative tastes still cling. The gloves for general use with various dresses are autumn leaf colors of every hue of the forest, also the blue-gray slate-color, olive, and plum. A novelty to wear with semi-dress black suits at church, visiting, and the theatre is palest blue gloves; for the same purpose bluish lavender, Nile green, with more blue than the gosling-color, and buff are also retained. For fall dress are chalk and creamy white, pearl, and the palest gas-light pink. Short gloves, with but one button at the wrist, are $1 65; with two buttons, $2; the stylish longer gloves fastened by three buttons are $2 50; and with four buttons, $2 75. Full-dress evening gloves, reaching almost to the elbow, and fastened by six buttons, are $3 25. Misses' gloves, numbering from five to six and a half (in smaller sizes than ladies' gloves of corresponding numbers), are $1 65 for those with two buttons, and $2 for three-buttoned gloves. What are called infants' gloves cost $1 25 or $1 50, and are double-stitched.

Undressed kid gloves are brought out in darker slate grays and olive browns. Those with two buttons are $1 75; the longer and more desirable ones, fastened by three buttons, are $2; and those more stylish still, by four buttons, are $2 25. The long-armed glove, equal in length to those fastened by six buttons, yet closed and fitting the arm as if moulded there, and snugly fastened by one button at the wrist, is very handsome, and costs $2 25.

Substantial gloves for fall and winter are made of English calf-skin, with double-stitched seams, and the deep flaring Sandringham cuff, prettily scalloped like the petals of a tulip, and ornamented with feather stitching: price from $2 25 to $3 a pair. There are also calf-skin gloves warmly lined with plush, yet not clumsy, for children's and school-girls' use. Beginning with children's No. 1 sizes, and enlarging to ladies' sizes, they cost from $2 upward; these are in all dark colors, and supply the want of warm black gloves for mourning. For fall and early winter are heavy lisle-silk gloves made with regular seams like a Balbriggan stocking: price $2. For equestriennes are doeskin gloves, white, buff, fawn, and brown, double-stitched, with the pretty Sandringham cuff, for $2 25. Others have a good gauntlet that the hand passes through, and do not need buttoning. Soft fine cloth gloves, all wool, and of French manufacture, are long-wristed and snugly fitted like kid gloves by four seams in the fingers. Those with two buttons cost from 70 cents to $1; with three buttons, from 75 cents to $1 25. These are in slate gray, leaf brown, and black, the latter are comfortable for mourning; they are also in children's and misses' sizes, plain, scalloped, stitched, or merely bound, and are well worth the price—from 50 to 80 cents. Blue and scarlet cloth gloves for children have appliqué, pinked, and embroidered tops, fastened by one button; of German manufacture, these cost 50 cents; the better-finished French gloves are 80 cents.

TOILETTE ARTICLES AND PERFUMERY.

A new coarse dressing comb of buffalo horn, which will be prized by ladies with thick tresses, has the teeth uniform in size, and passes through the hair much more easily than the old-fashioned comb with its nearly useless division of semi-fine teeth. Hair and tooth brushes are shown with the bristles securely fastened and riveted to the back to prevent them from loosening.

Among the new perfumes in vogue are the Butterfly Orchis, one of the most bewilderingly fragrant bouquets ever compounded; the Meadow Queen, which is scarcely less delicious; Hawthorn Bloom; the Wild Flowers of India; the Crown Bouquet; and High Life Bouquet. These are the productions of the Crown Perfumery Company, which has just received the grand prize medal at the Vienna Exposition for its perfumery and toilette soaps. The Jean Maria Farina cologne still preserves its supremacy; but this, like Lubin's extracts, is so successfully counterfeited that it is almost impossible to obtain the genuine article, the very labels and bottles being imitated to perfection. Very good American colognes are found in market, though the imported perfumes are generally superior, owing, it is said, to the grape spirit which is used in their manufacture, and which itself differs in fragrance according to the district from which it comes, as the Johannisberger grape differs from that of the Italian vineyards. A very refreshing use is made of cologne, toilette vinegar, and bay-rum by means of an atomizer, or elastic bulb syringe, by the compression of which the perfume is thrown over the face in a fine spray. For this purpose it should be mixed with equal parts of water, too free a use of the pure liquid being injurious to the complexion.

For information received thanks are due Miss SWITZER; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and THOMSON, LANGDON, & Co.

PERSONAL.

PI Y MARGALL, late Prime Minister of Spain, has a name which is explained thus: Y is a Spanish word meaning "and;" PI Y MARGALL means Pi and Margall, and shows also that the surname of his father was PI, and that of his mother MARGALL. If such a system prevailed among us, and a Mr. Otard married a Miss Eau, their son might properly be called Brandy and Water.

—The memory of WASHINGTON is to be treated with respectful tenderness in Japan. A Jeddo publisher proposes to issue a life of our favorite patriot in forty-four volumes, profusely illustrated in the highest style of Japanese art. G. W. is to be represented in clothes made by DEVLIN & Co., with a mustache, carrying a cane, and accompanied at a respectful distance by a small dog. He is gazing at a lady whose best point is her walk—the Grecian bend.

—M. FAUVRE'S collection of pictures—one of the best in Paris—was sold recently in that city, and realized the handsome sum of $103,000. In the collection were six paintings by EUGÈNE DELACROIX, which sold for the following-named prices: "The Two Foscari," £3180; "The Entombment," £2400; "Horses leaving the Water," £1024; "Ophelia," £1360; "Lion devouring a Caiman," £800; and "Arab Musicians," £840. Ten pictures by JULES DUPRÉ were also sold, at prices ranging from £220 to £1524.

—Two wills have recently been admitted to probate quite different in character. ELIAS DURAND, the Philadelphia botanist, gives his botanical library to the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences, and his collection of specimens to the Jardin des Plantes, in Paris, to be added to a large collection he presented to it in 1869. JOHN R. BURROUGHS, of Hartford, taking another view of things, left to the city a fund of $1000, the interest to be annually spent upon a Thanksgiving dinner for the inmates of the poor-house.

—The wife of Sir CHARLES TREVELYAN has recently deceased. She was the sister of the late Lord MACAULAY, and his lordship's literary executor.

—News comes that the King of Greece has bestowed on the Sultan of Turkey the order of the Redeemer, and received an autograph letter of thanks in return from the aforesaid potentate. But isn't this rather a queer gift to make a Turk? What he will do with it is a conundrum.

—VICTOR EMANUEL is going to Berlin about the middle of September to visit the Emperor of Germany, and we may soon expect to hear of more royal merry-makings like those of the Shah's visit. It is to be hoped, however, that the Italian monarch will conduct himself better than the "king of kings" is reputed to have done.

—Queen VICTORIA'S daughter, the Princess ALICE of Hesse, is living quietly at Secheim, and recovering from the shock caused by the tragic death of the little Prince FRITZ, who was killed by falling from a window. This kind of death is not so uncommon. Cases of somnambulists who precipitate themselves from roofs and windows are of frequent occurrence; and lately Mr. LAMONT, one of the wealthiest and best-known brokers of New York—just the one who might have been expected to betake himself sedately to bed at the proper hour—took the window-seat instead for a couch, fell out, and was killed, for all the world like the poor little prince.

—When the summer songsters go, the winter ones come, only the latter need finer plumage. Our operatic nightingales are gathering in two camps, marshaled by STRAKOSCH and MARETZEK, and headed by NILSSON, TORRIANI, CAMPANINI, and CAPOUL on one side, and LUCCA, DI MURSKA, and TAMBERLIK on the other. NILSSON, however, very nearly failed to be on time, having barely escaped drowning on Lake Geneva. She is here now, and safely housed with her husband at the Clarendon Hotel.

—We have a queen among us, after all. This is a Piute queen, SARAH WINNEMUCCA by name, who reads English, writes poetry, and dresses like any Englishwoman. But she is the daughter of the old Piute chief, and therefore the whole tribe do homage to her, for much the same reason that other nations bow down before their kings and queens.

—Mr. GREELEY'S daughters, IDA and GABRIELLE, with their aunt, Mrs. CLEVELAND, and her daughters, MARGARET and CECILIA, have been spending the summer at the old Chappaqua homestead, which is now occupied by Mr. GREELEY'S brother, and beguiling their loneliness by the writing of books, which is mere recreation in a family which takes to literature as ducks do to water. Miss IDA GREELEY has made her entrance into journalism through various sketches and translations which recall her father's vigorous Saxon; while her cousin, Miss CECILIA CLEVELAND, is engaged on a volume called the Journal Leaves from Chappaqua, which it is said will contain much new and interesting information, naturally from the most authentic sources, concerning the great editor and his family.

—It is announced on good authority that the engagement between JOAQUIN MILLER and Miss HARDY, the daughter of Sir THOMAS HARDY, is broken off—that is, if it ever existed. The young lady is on the Continent with her parents, and Mr. MILLER is about to return to America.

—Mr. GLADSTONE'S eldest daughter, AGNES, is about to marry the Rev. EDWARD C. WICKHAM, head-master of the Wellington College.

—The Marquis of Lothian is setting a good example to literary dogs in the manger, who neither use their rare books nor allow any one else to do so, which some of our own bibliomaniacs would do well to follow. He is not only allowing the Early English Text Society to print his unique Anglo-Saxon homilies of the tenth century, but he is also printing, at his own cost, a selection of the most interesting political letters among his ancestors' correspondence for presentation to the Roxburghe Club. This latter work is being edited by Mr. DAVID LAING, the founder and honorary secretary of the Bannatyne Club.

—The late Bishop of Winchester had correct ideas about the pleasantest way of living. "I should like," said he once, "to get up late, and having breakfasted at leisure, go out for a pleasant ride, and then read the last good novel for the rest of the day with my feet upon the fender." But then, suddenly, that wonderful look of earnestness coming over his face, which all who knew him well can never forget, he added, almost to himself, "If there were no work to be done."

—The Duchess of Magenta, better known as Madame M'MAHON, is visiting London. It is said that the visit is strictly private, and without any ulterior motives.

—Mr. KINGLAKE is still at work on his history. He is now in search of materials to complete his account of the famous battle of Inkermann.

—The wealthy and wicked Duke of Brunswick knew that a penny saved is a penny earned as well as our own FRANKLIN. One evening at a circus he bought a programme, price three sous, and gave a four-sous piece in payment. After waiting a long time for the change, he at last, on receiving it, let it fall from his palsied hand, when he groped about for it till it was found, and then deposited it carefully in a safe place in his pocket-book.

—It seems to be an open question whether the Polaris crew may have been picked up by some whaler, or whether they were murdered by the Esquimaux who were found in possession of the camp where they had wintered, on Littleton's Island. The missing band numbers thirteen—an ill-omened number, which the superstitious, who will not sit down thirteen at table, will connect with their misfortune. The chiefs of the expedition are all old arctic travelers. Captain SIDNEY O. BUDDINGTON who has a wife and two daughters, is a native of Groton, Connecticut, and is about forty-six years old. He has been at sea thirty-two years, twenty-two of which have been passed in the arctic regions, and has made five voyages around Cape Horn, three around the Cape of Good Hope, and thirteen to Baffin Bay. The chief mate, HUBBARD C. CHESTER, who is a native of Noank, Connecticut, has spent most of his life on the water, and has only visited his family thrice during the last eleven years. The second mate, WILLIAM C. MORTON, of Jersey City, who has been an arctic navigator for twelve years, and was a member of the first GRINNELL expedition, distinguished himself by discovering Dr. KANE'S open polar sea in 1854. Dr. EMIL BISSELS, the chief of the scientific corps of the expedition, is a young German, a graduate of Heidelberg University, and a nephew of the astronomer BISSELS. He was a member of the Prussian arctic expedition. EMIL SCHUMANN, the chief engineer, is also a German, and is about thirty-eight years old.

—The Rev. CHARLES KINGSLEY, the brilliant author of Hypatia and Alton Locke, is coming to America this winter. Strange to say, he does not come to make money by lecturing, but only to gratify his own and not other people's curiosity.

—The Dean of Canterbury, the Rev. R. P. SMITH, is one of the guests of the American Evangelical Alliance, and is now staying in New York, at the Brevoort House. He is the bearer of a letter from the Archbishop of Canterbury, expressing his hope that this General Conference may promote unity in the forms of Christian belief.

Hosted by Google

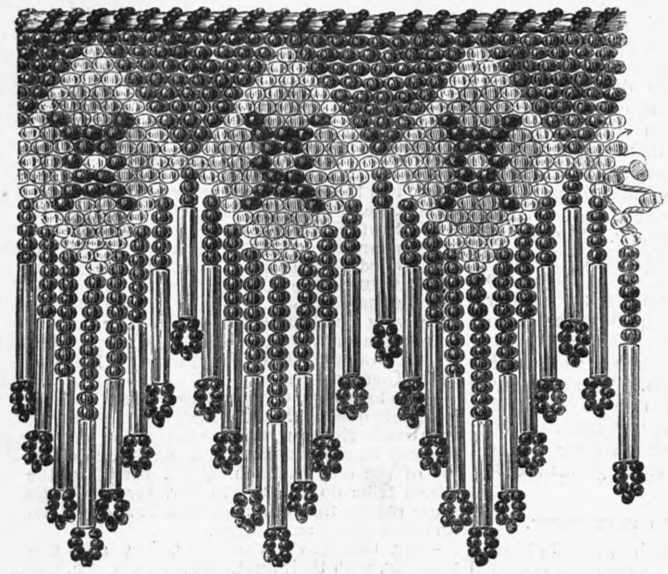

Fig. 2.—BEAD MOSAIC LAMBREQUIN FOR CASTER, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

Fig. 1.—CASTER WITH BEAD MOSAIC EMBROIDERY. [See Figs. 2 and 3; and Figs. 4 and 5, Page 629.]

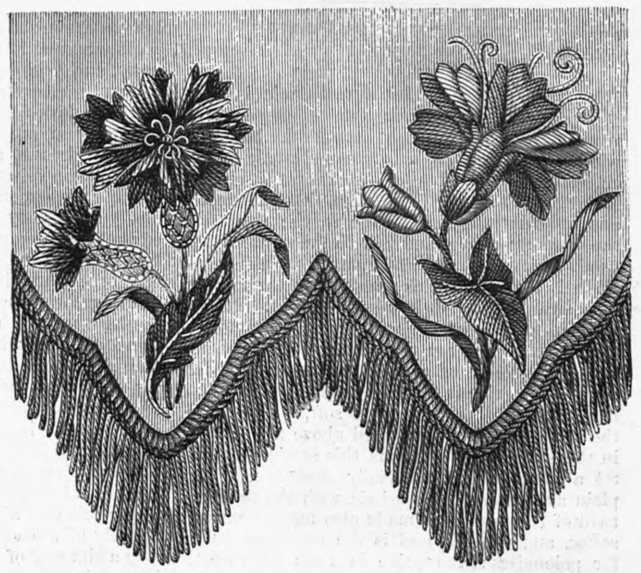

Fig. 3.—LAMBREQUIN FOR CASTER.—SATIN AND HALF-POLKA STITCH EMBROIDERY.—FULL SIZE.

Caster with Bead Mosaic Embroidery, Figs. 1-5.

THIS caster is of carved brown stained and black polished wood. The upper and under edges are trimmed with a lambrequin and a border in bead mosaic. Fig. 2, and Fig. 5, page 629, show full-sized sections of the lambrequin and border, together with the manner of working them. Always fasten the bead taken up to the projecting bead of the second following row and pass over the next bead. Edge the lambrequin and border on the outer edge with white silk cord fastened on with overhand stitches of fine black beads. Instead of this trimming, the lambrequin shown by Fig. 3, and the border Fig. 4, page 629, may be used. The latter are worked on light—for instance, fawn-colored—cloth with saddler's silk of the natural colors of the flowers and leaves in satin and half-polka stitch.

Work-Basket with Embroidered Medallions, Figs. 1-4.

THE frame of this basket is of black varnished cane bars, lined with maroon satin, and ornamented on the outside with embroidered medallions. The lower part of the basket closes with a flat lid, which is covered on both sides with quilted satin, and is furnished with bands for holding various sewing utensils, as shown by Fig. 4, page 629. For the medallions use maroon velvet, and on this apply a star of light blue silk, which is fastened on in point Russe with fine gold cord and with knots of white silk; Fig. 2 shows this medallion in full size. The medallion shown by Fig. 3 may be used alternately with the preceding one. The star is applied in black velvet, the rays are edged with gold cord, and all point Russe stitches and knots are worked with gold thread. The medallion on the middle of the lid is ornamented with a monogram, and on the inside of the lid is fastened a mirror. On the corners of the basket set maroon silk tassels.

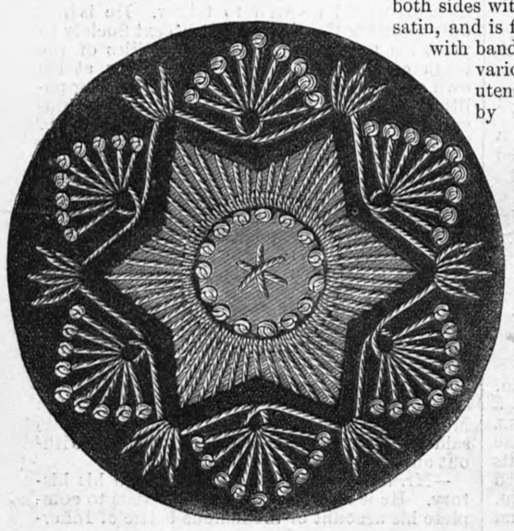

Fig. 2.—MEDALLION FOR WORK-BASKET, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

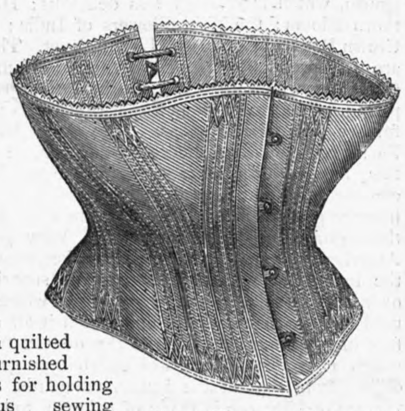
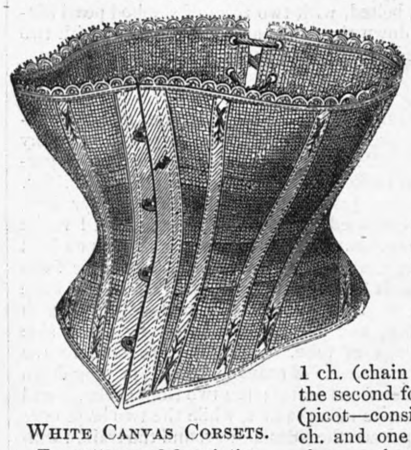


GRAY ENGLISH LEATHER CORSETS.

For pattern and description see Suppl., No. V., Figs. 20-26.



WHITE CANVAS CORSETS.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 13-19.

Fig. 1.—WORK-BASKET WITH EMBROIDERED MEDALLIONS.—CLOSED.—[See Figs. 2 and 3; and Fig. 4, Page 629.]

Designs for Tapestry Foundations, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE designs are suitable for centres of rugs, for covering traveling-bags, etc. The material should be coarse or fine, according to the size desired for the embroidery. The colors are given in the description of symbols.

Crochet Insertions for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 629.

THESE insertions are worked with fine or coarse cotton, according to the purpose for which they are designed. They are worked with twisted crochet cotton, No. 80, in the original.

Fig. 1.—This insertion is worked in two equal parts, consisting each of three rounds, lengthwise, on a foundation of the requisite length: 1st round.—∗ 1 dc. (double crochet) on the next foundation st. (stitch), 1 ch. (chain stitch), 1 dc. on the second following st., 1 p. (picot—consisting of 5 ch. and one single crochet on the first of these), with this pass over 1 st. of the preceding round; repeat from ∗. 2d round.—1 sl. (slip stitch) on the middle st. of the first p. in the preceding round, ∗ twice alternately 2 ch., 1 p. downward (that is, 5 ch., drop the st. from the needle, insert the latter in the first of the 5 ch., and draw the dropped st. through); then 5 ch., twice al-

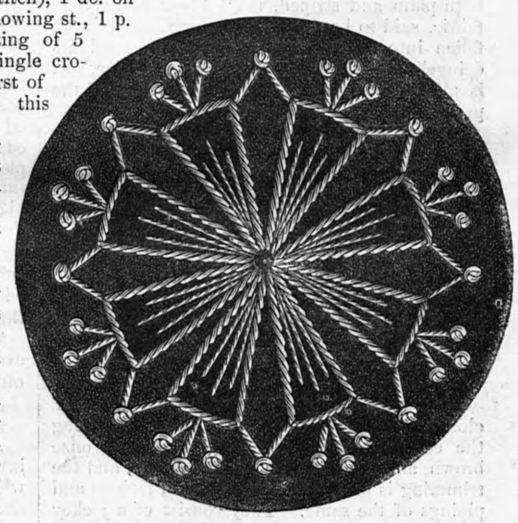


Fig. 3.—MEDALLION FOR WORK-BASKET, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

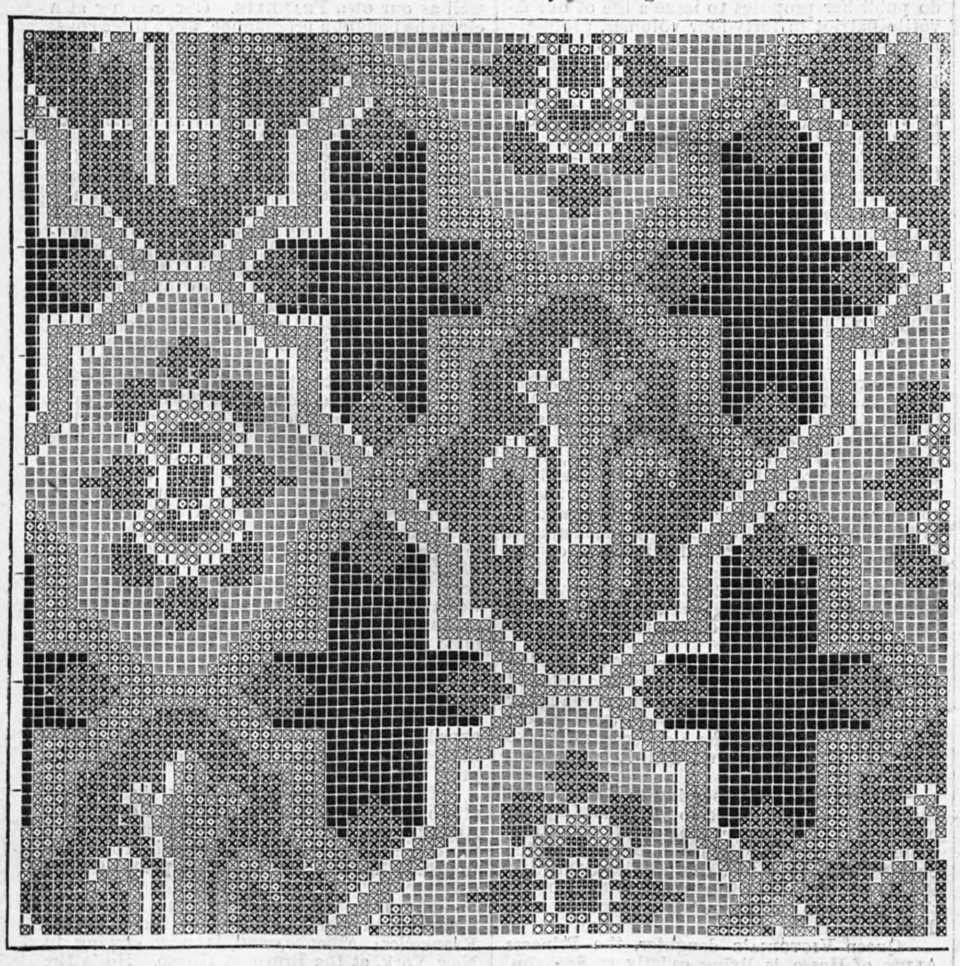

Fig. 1.—DESIGN FOR TAPESTRY FOUNDATION.

Description of Symools: ■ Medium Green; ⊠ Maroon; ▪ Red; ⊞ Black; ⧈ Violet; ⧉ 1st (darkest), ⧇ 2d, ⁞ 3d (lightest), Fawn (the last silk).

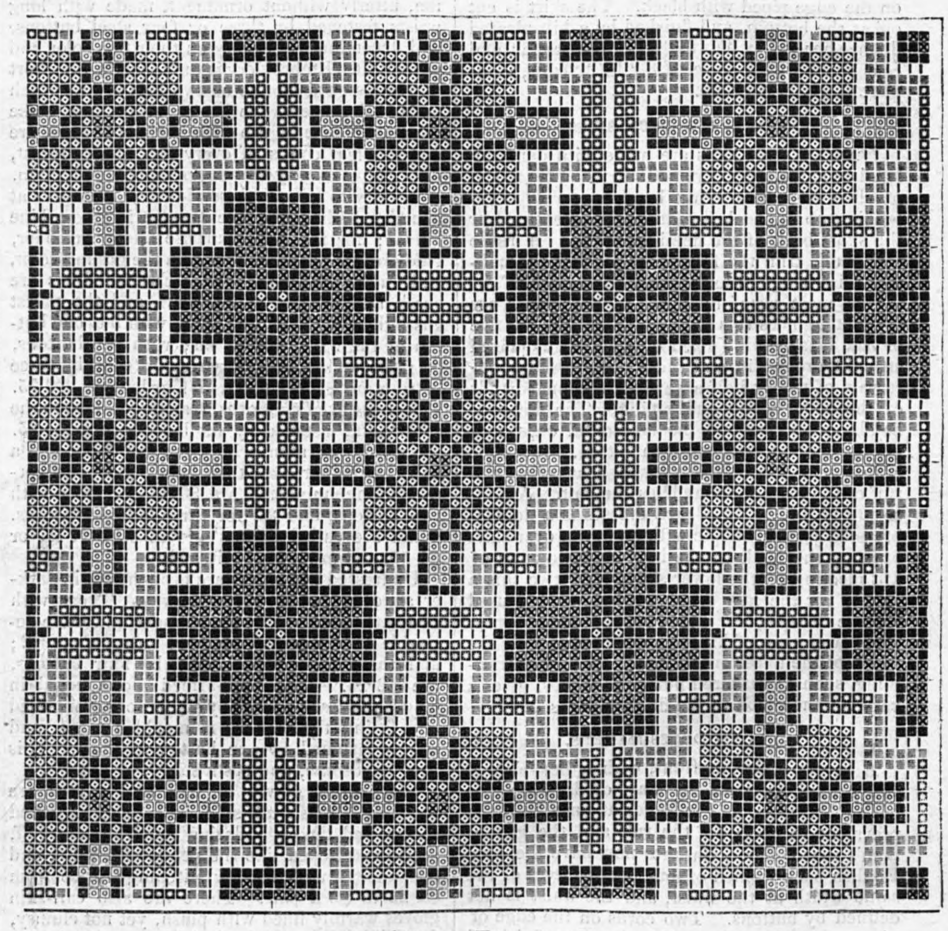

Fig. 2.—DESIGN FOR TAPESTRY FOUNDATION.

Description of Symbols: ■ Black; ⊠ Green; ⧈ Red; ⧇ Violet; ⧉ 1st (darkest), ▪ 2d, ⁞ 3d (lightest), Wood Brown.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—BROWN CLOTH TIGHT-FITTING BASQUE.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 4–8.

Fig. 2.—BROWN CLOTH TIGHT-FITTING BASQUE.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 4–8.

Fig. 4.—WORK-BASKET WITH EMBROIDERED MEDALLIONS.—OPEN.—[See Figs. 1–3, Page 628.]

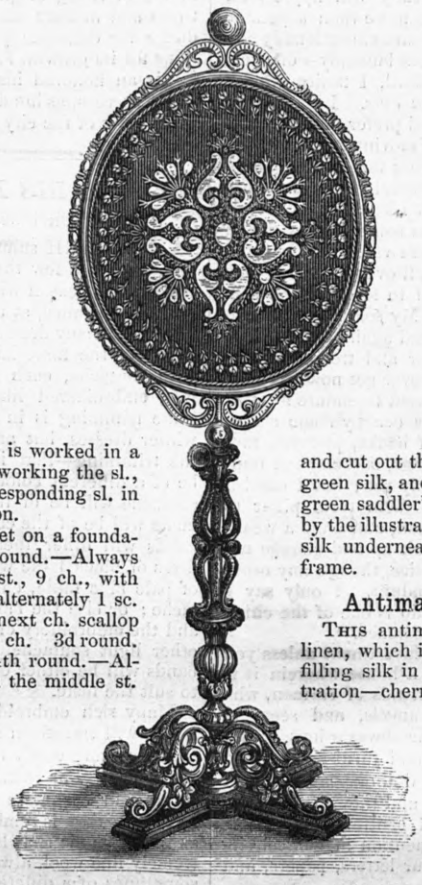
smoothly with Russia leather, and the bars are ornamented with inlaid gold arabesques. The upper and lower cases are covered with red velvet, and edged with a fringe of fine and coarse gold beads. The illustration plainly shows the manner of stringing on the beads. On the surface of the upper medallion a monogram may be worked with gold cord and gold thread, or embroidered with silk.

ternately 1 p. downward, 2 ch., then 1 sl. on the middle st. of the third following p. of the preceding round; repeat from ∗. 3d round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on the first sl. of the preceding round, ∗ 1 ch., twice alternately 1 p., 2 ch., then 1 sl. on the middle of the next 5 ch. worked in connection in the preceding round, twice alternately 2 ch., 1 p., then 1 ch., 1 sc. on the next sl. in the preceding round; repeat from ∗. The other half of the insertion is worked in a similar manner, but in the third round, in working the sl., always fasten at the same time to the corresponding sl. in the 3d round of the first half of the insertion.

For the insertion shown by Fig. 2 crochet on a foundation of the requisite length as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the next foundation st., 9 ch., with these pass over 5 st. 2d round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop in the preceding round, 9 ch. 3d round.—Like the 2d round. 4th round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop in the preceding round, 5 ch. 5th round.—7 sc. on each ch. scallop in the preceding round. Then crochet on the foundation st. of the insertion one round more like the 5th round.

Watch Stand.

THE stand is covered and cut out the outlines carefully. Underlay the cloth with green silk, and work the point Russe stitches and knots with green saddler's silk, as indicated on the pattern and shown by the illustration. Finally, baste on another piece of green silk underneath, and then fasten the embroidery into the frame.



LIGHT SCREEN WITH APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.
For design see Supplement, No. XIII., Fig. 62.

Light Screen with Application Embroidery.

THE frame of this screen is of oxidized steel and gold bronze, and is sixteen inches high; the foundation of the screen is of green cloth. To make the screen first transfer the design, of which a quarter section is given by Fig. 62, Supplement, to paper; paste the latter on the wrong side of the cloth, Antimacassar with Russian Embroidery.

THIS antimacassar is made of fine gray or unbleached linen, which is ornamented in point Russe embroidery with filling silk in various bright colors, as shown by the illustration—cherry, green, and blue are used in the original. In the same manner may be worked covers of sofa-cushions, large and small tidies, etc. Tidies should be bordered all around with colored fringe.

Faille, Swiss Muslin, and Lace Fichu-Collar.

See illustration on page 637.

FOR the foundation of this collar cut of double Swiss muslin a straight strip thirty inches and a half long and an inch and a half wide, which is sloped off from the middle toward the ends to a width of an inch. On the upper edge of this foundation set lace three-quarters of an inch wide, and on the under edge a Swiss muslin ruffle trimmed with lace. This ruffle is two inches and a quarter wide and sloped off on one edge from the middle toward the ends to a width of an inch. Besides this the ruffle is arranged in treble box-pleats in the middle, and in double

WATCH STAND.

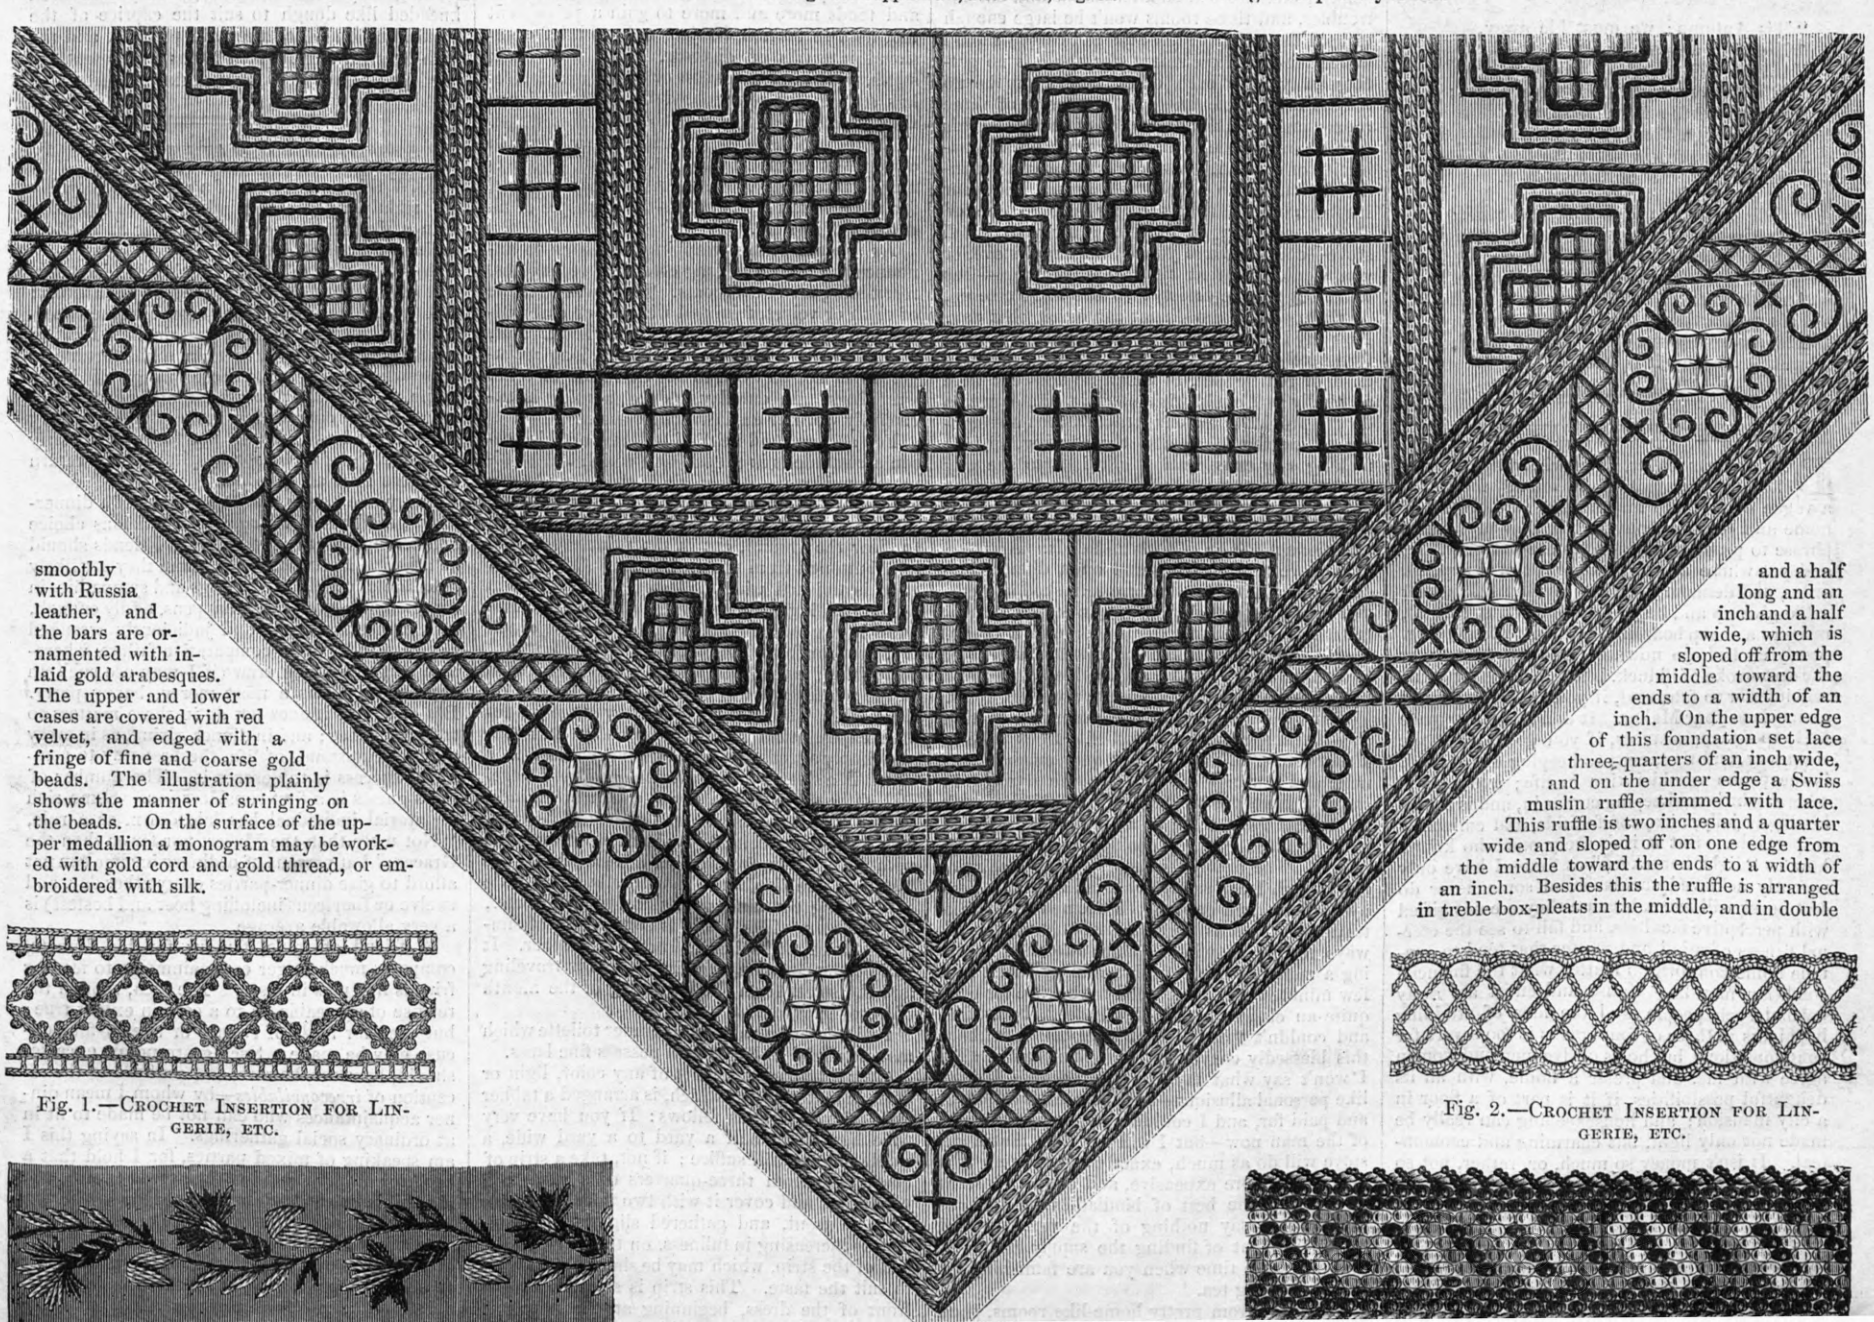

Fig. 1.—CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Fig. 2.—CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

box-pleats toward the ends. Cover the foundation on the outside with three folds of purple faille, each three-quarters of an inch wide, which overlap each other a quarter of an inch wide each. The seam of the lower fold and of the box-pleated faille ruffle, an inch and three-quarters wide, is covered with a roll of the same material. The faille ruffle is fringed out three quarters of an inch wide on the under edge. A bow of faille finishes the collar.

Point Lace Edging for Lingerie, etc.

See Illustration on page 637.

FOR this edging transfer the design to linen, baste the point lace braid on the linen, and fasten the braid at the intersecting points with several stitches. For the bars stretch the thread from one outline to another, overcast it, and work a picot at each corresponding point. Work the lace stitches as shown by the illustration.

Crape Hood.

See Illustration on page 637.

THIS hood is made of gray crape and figured black tulle, and is trimmed with black lace, a white lace ruche, and a bow of gray gros grain ribbon. On the back edge of the hood are fastened ends of double crape, which are trimmed with black lace. Gray silk gauze veil.

THE ROBIN'S GOOD-BY.

BY FRANK J. OTTARSON.

"'TIS Autumn," Robin-Redbreast said;
"I may not longer tarry here:
The sky is gray, the flowers are dead,
And nature mourns the dying year.
When Spring returns, my mate and I
Will come again to rear our young,
And vocalize a melody
That never poet wrote nor sung.

"'Tis Autumn, and the sun is dim,
As if his fire were nearly gone;
The breeze wails out a mournful hymn,
And all the land is sad and lone.
'Tis Autumn, and the fading leaves
Sail slowly down upon the wind,
Leaving, like Death, when he bereaves,
The living germ of Hope behind.

"'Tis Autumn: over land and main
A veil of azure haze is thrown,
As if the parent Heaven again
Had claimed our planet for its own,
And the blue vestments of the sky
For dim, uncertain boundaries given,
Till scarcely can the straining eye
Tell which is earth or which is heaven.

"'Tis Autumn: even Greenwood's green,
Wherein we built our little nest—
For danger sure is never seen
Where loved ones lie in sacred rest—
Her green is faded; Winter's snow
Thick o'er the ground will soon be tossed,
To shield the graves we see below
From bitter wind and biting frost.

"'Tis Autumn: we must hie away,
Nor fold a wing by day or night
Until we hear the Gulf waves say,
'Come, welcome Robin, here alight;
Here, where the roses blush and glow
All through the warm and drowsy year,
And rich magnolia perfumes flow
In floods upon the atmosphere.

"'"'Tis Autumn: Bobolink has come;
The mocking-bird your welcome sings;
Bob tells about his Northern home,
And pleasant news of Robin brings.'"
And Robin said, "The Southern wind
Is whispering, 'Birdie, do not wait;
Tell sparrow sweet your nest to mind,
And hasten—it is getting late.'"

LIGHT HOUSEKEEPING.

DO you, dear reader, know what "light housekeeping" means? Have you any idea, even a vague one, of the magnificent possibilities of home and comfort conveyed in that mysterious phrase to people whose purses are not plethoric, and yet whose aspirations are all of a superior order, and demand attention and consideration?

To give up and be poor in downright earnest, retire to a cheap boarding-house, live on nothing, poorly cooked, go nowhere, and see no one, at the first stroke of ill luck, is to acknowledge yourself inferior to fate, and, if you have any wits, is an insult to your Maker. It don't cost any more to keep up appearances, if you go to work the right way, and that, next to keeping out of debt, is the prime consideration in life; and here is where light housekeeping comes in, and is so exceedingly jolly, nice, comfortable, and eminently respectable. But it isn't every one who knows how to "light housekeep" at first—I have only recently achieved success—and some never do and never will learn, because they are not gifted with perceptive faculties, and fail to see the eternal fitness of mind and matter that tend to genuine home comfort, no matter what the financial condition may be. Cause and effect are away beyond such people, and the idea of attaining happiness in three or four rooms is too severe for contemplation; but hosts of live men and women agree with me, and prefer a home, with all its delightful possibilities, if it is part of a floor in a city mansion; and housekeeping can really be made not only light, but charming and economical. It isn't money so much, or, rather, not so much money, that is requisite as tact and taste and a desire to produce grand results from apparent nothings. It may be in a culinary way, offering the beloved partner of your joys and sorrows an ambrosia, made of ordinary materials enough, but flavored with a nameless divine something that makes it very good eating, and calls forth the honest praise that is so dear to the heart of woman, or it may be in organizing your parlor, which in light housekeeping is dining-room, library, and serving-room as well, a very attractive spot, that to the eye of love at least will appear a bower of beauty and the abode of all the human virtues. The easiest and, to my mind, the only way to thoroughly accomplish and enjoy light housekeeping is to take furnished rooms. They are, to be sure, more expensive than unfurnished ones, but there are many compensations, and in the long-run will be found to pay. They are generally cared for, more or less scrupulously, as the case may be, and you have no responsibility other than you choose to assume. The maid-of-all-work is your servant pro tem., and yet you are spared the annoyance and expense of regaling inevitable cousins and followers from your small larder. I suggest furnished rooms for another reason that people addicted to moving periodically will appreciate. You can't in this city live more than a year in the same house, unless you are exceptionally and rarely blessed in a permanent landlady—one never rents rooms of a landlord, I notice—and I have yet to find that rara avis. I think they are nomadic as a race, and prefer a roving life. The burden and anxiety of moving furniture once or twice a year is something fearful to contemplate, independent of the general wreck our household gods undergo. Don't I know to my sorrow and inexpressible grief that some seventy-five or eighty dollars' worth of rare vases that had followed my varied fortunes all over the world were in one fell swoop reduced to food for the ash-barrel at my last move? My sole consolation is that they can never be moved again, and I sha'n't have them to pack in fear and trembling, and this is the only joy I shall ever get now from my "things of beauty," supposed to endure forever.

My movable possessions occupy some six or eight trunks, exclusive of books, pictures, music, and a few scattering bags, baskets, and bundles which are of no earthly use; but I cherish them tenderly, and drag them from pillar to post, because I am a woman, and have a weakness for traps. I can pack up and change my field of action at short notice, though any other pastime is preferable, I admit. I only say I can, and the ability so to do is one of the chief blessings of my present existence.

Furniture is not a good investment unless you are the sole proprietor of a house wherein it is secure from the ruthless hands of carmen, who are veritable destroying angels, and seem to thrive on and enjoy their devastations. But to return to my subject and furnished rooms. Three will suffice for any well-disposed and not too presumptuous couple, and they should be in a private family, in a good, central locality—one that will sound well to mention in genteel circles, and look well on your letters, papers, and parcels.

Of course a man and wife must have similar tastes and desires, and be mutually agreed and helpful, or there will be altercations and endless troubles, and three rooms won't be large enough to hold them. No semi-attached couple should undertake this experiment, for there is no getting away from each other; there can be no retreat or private refuge in a ménage of three rooms, and the chief requisites of success in this rather novel mode of living are peace and unanimity of opinion. You can't make up your individual mind to a beefsteak dinner, and your stubborn but doubtless better half to one of chops, and both be gratified; for your small stove—and of course you have a small stove, or you wouldn't be at light housekeeping—has room but for one variety; so one must give up, or there will be no dinner for either that day. Now my better half is not at all stubborn, and, fortunately for him, likes what I do—except a dash of red pepper, to which he does not take as kindly as I could wish—and he allows me to do the providing for our establishment as seemeth to me the best; also the cooking, without making any exasperating allusions to the way his ancestors prepared the same viands; and he always says my results are tip-top—beat Delmonico's all to nothing, especially in soups and refections made up of odds and ends. An atom of a stove that would stand on a dinner-plate does our cooking, and we are refreshed and edified with all sorts of good things, served in irreproachable style, and cleanly beyond a doubt. Such truly beatific coffee and oysters, such rare, tender, and juicy steaks, such golden brown and fleecy omelettes, such superlative waffles, toast, Welsh rare-bits, etc., as are generated in that tiny machine almost pass belief. I can bake in a tin oven, small but hot, and very much in earnest, and I can broil on a genuine broiler; in short, I have yet to discover the thing I can't do, except roast a pig or a turkey, and I could manage those even, by cooking them in installments. The outlay for fuel is almost incalculable, though I can safely say it is less than a penny an hour, and can not be deemed a wild extravagance. It is clean, no trouble, and is always ready; so, without more ado than applying a match, I can refresh a hungry friend in a few minutes, and never need have a fire for even quite an elaborate spread. Indeed, I wouldn't and couldn't "do" light housekeeping without this blessedly convenient and inexpensive ally. I won't say what my stove is, because I don't like personal allusions—and, besides, it is bought and paid for, and I couldn't make any thing out of the man now—but I will say this, that a gas stove will do as much, exactly as well, only it is very much more expensive, and entails constant fusses with the best of landladies on the gas question, to say nothing of the vexation and disappointment of finding the supply cut off at mid-day some time when you are famishing for a cup of strong tea.

But aside from pretty home-like rooms, good wholesome food well cooked and tastefully served, and the general economy of the arrangement, housekeeping; and the steadily increasing popularity of the fashion among our best and most sensible people speaks volumes for it. There is no privacy, no home life, in boarding. You are tied to hours, and the bondage becomes irksome after a while. Your friends come and go, but you have no realizing sense of having entertained them, though your heart may be full of genuine hospitality. You are constantly receiving attentions and favors, and are at a loss how to reciprocate; in short, you want and must have a home of your own, no matter how small, so it is a happy and well-ordered one, where you can welcome your friends, and be comfortable after your own devices; and I, from my own heart-felt experience, suggest as a relief from all these ills a trial of light housekeeping. Where and when the idea of revolutionizing the conventional modes of living originated I can't say, but the times and modern conveniences, and a growing desire for domestic pleasures, have been propitious for its growth, and to-day light housekeeping is an honored institution and an acknowledged success, as hundreds of happy, cozy homes in all parts of the city will testify.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

ALTHOUGH summer dresses are still worn, we see a few things here and there which the present season will bequeath to its successor. For instance, at the sea-side and the watering-places many dresses have been trimmed with bands of the material cut in points and edged with soutache, each point containing a small leaf, embroidered likewise in soutache. The same trimming is in course of preparation for winter dresses, but arranged as follows: either the trimming—that is to say, the bands—will be of a different color from the dress while the soutache will be of the same color, or the soutache will be of the color of the dress while the bands will differ therefrom. For instance, a dress of black faille will be trimmed with bands of pale blue faille, embroidered with black soutache; or else the bands will be of black faille, and the embroidery of pale blue, violet, or some other light soutache. For woolen dresses the bands will be either of the material or of faille, to suit the taste.

Many rich embroideries are in preparation, which will transform simple woolen dresses into toilettes more costly than the most elegant velvet robes. For instance, there is executed in vigogne or cashmere what is called India embroidery—that is, embroidery as fine and close as that of India shawls. This is wrought in extremely fine wool, always of the same color, but sometimes of a different shade from that of the woolen fabric.

Jet is certainly not a novelty, but it will be worn every where during the coming winter, and tends more and more to gain a permanent foot-hold in fashion, subject only to brief occasional intervals of disfavor. Just now black stuffs, with alternate satin or velvet and lustreless stripes, are rejuvenated by embroidering a vine of jet on each side of the lustreless stripe. Galloons, head-dresses, bonnets—every thing, in a word—is trimmed with jet. Steel, which is much more costly, will be necessarily reserved for the few, but jet is accessible to people of all degrees of fortune.

As regards winter wrappings, I hasten to announce the revival of long cloaks or redingotes, resembling men's overcoats. These will be made of cloth or velvet, trimmed with fur or embroidery, and will generally have a pointed hood. But, thanks to the eclecticism of fashion, long redingotes will not be worn to the exclusion of other wrappings. In our day, indeed, nothing is exclusively worn or exclusively forsworn.

For autumn and négligé toilettes of this season a costume is in preparation which will be almost a uniform. It is made of slate gray double cashmere (rather thick), or else of light cloth. This costume is composed of a dress short enough to clear the ground, cut in the princesse shape, and buttoned from top to bottom. The under edge is finished with a pleated flounce, set on with a heading, trimmed with rolls of silk. The wrapping is composed of a sort of robe de chambre, open in front from the belt to the bottom, tight-fitting in the back, and long enough to reach to the heading of the flounce on the bottom of the dress. The bust is covered by three graduated capes, much longer behind than in front, and simply edged, like the wrapping, with a roll of silk. The sleeves of the wrapping are very large, and show those of the dress, which are almost tight. The whole is trimmed with steel buttons. The dress has a belt of gray leather, ornamented with steel hooks, from which are suspended the watch on one side, and the umbrella and a little leather bag containing the porte-monnaie, etc., on the other. The whole is convenient, of simple elegance, and suited to brave the weather. It will be the costume par excellence for traveling and the street from the beginning of the month of October.

I will describe an autumn dinner toilette which may be useful to ladies who possess fine laces.

Over a trained silk skirt of any color, light or dark, it matters little which, is arranged a tablier over-skirt of lace, as follows: If you have very wide lace, from half a yard to a yard wide, a single flounce will suffice; if not, take a strip of black tulle from three-quarters of a yard to a yard wide, and cover it with two flounces, set on plain in front, and gathered slightly, but constantly increasing in fullness, on the sides, to the end of the strip, which may be shorter or longer, to suit the taste. This strip is set plain on the front of the dress, beginning at the belt; the ends are then drawn up behind, so as to diminish its width under the arms, and are suffered to fall over here and there by bows of ribbon formed of two loops without ends. Wide sash of ribbon like the bows.

The waist of this dress is neither high nor low, but is heart-shaped both in the front and behind, so as to show the neck and the upper part of the back. It is covered with two very large pieces of lace; the straight edge of each piece of lace is fastened around the top of the long sleeve, the scalloped edge being turned toward the neck, and the folds of the lace being fastened here and there to the dress. The lace thus disposed simulates a sort of sleeveless jacket; and the arrangement easily transforms a simple dress into an elegant toilette.

For the trimmings of dresses there is in preparation English embroidery wrought on faille, with silk of the same color as the foundation. This kind of trimming will favor the combination of colors, which is far from being abandoned. I will cite an example: Skirt of mauve faille, trimmed with a flounce of light gray faille, ornamented with English embroidery worked with gray silk. This flounce is set a little above the under edge of the skirt, and is plain and narrow in front, and gradually becomes fuller and wider on the sides and back. Above the flounce the front of the skirt is trimmed with five rows of insertion of gray faille, wrought with the same English embroidery. These insertions are set on the skirt in such a manner that the mauve color of the latter shows through and forms a transparency. Over-skirt, open and very much cut away in front, of gray faille, edged with a flounce of the same, trimmed with English embroidery. This over-skirt is draped behind in a pouf, and caught up on each side, over the mauve skirt, by three large bows of ribbon, half gray and half mauve, arranged in such a manner that the mauve loop and end rests on the gray over-skirt, while the gray loop and end falls on the mauve skirt. Behind, under the pouf, is set a large mauve ribbon bow.

Almost every lady wears now around her waist a number of hooks, from which she suspends a multitude of articles—her fan, watch, parasol, porte-monnaie, reticule, etc. These hooks vary in cost, from the most modest steel to the richest enameled and jeweled silver. The fashion is so general that its mention is indispensable.

Steel spangles are in preparation, of all possible shapes—birds, suns, crescents, stars, butterflies, flies, etc. They will be used to embroider silk and tulle dresses for dinners and balls.

The hair is still dressed extremely high, which necessitates the continuance of the absurd little bonnets now worn. The braids, curls, loops, and crêpes of themselves alone make a sort of helmet or shako, and the bonnet has to accommodate itself thereto as best it may, whence results the toques and hats which we see turned up on one side and flattened on the other, and looking very much as though they had been kneaded like dough to suit the caprice of the scaffolding on which they are perched, and the high Spanish comb which forms its present appendage.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

DINNER-PARTIES.

FEW things to a man of a certain age, with a rightly constituted mind, are more enjoyable than a pleasant dinner-party, either at his own table or that of a friend.

A dinner may fail from a cook being incompetent or tipsy, a pastry-cook false or unpunctual; and the compassion of the guests is some consolation to their unfortunate entertainers. But bad wine is something more than a misfortune to those who receive it; to those who give it it is a crime. Fortunately for myself, my acquaintance with persons committing such offenses is very limited; and as I happen not to be particularly well off, I gladly accept hospitalities in return for those I am able to offer.

Every one knows that the success of a dinner-party greatly depends upon the judicious choice and arrangement of the guests. Friends should be asked to meet those with whom they are likely to assimilate, and have feelings and sympathies in common, though it often happens, oddly enough, that a most carefully and judiciously arranged selection turns out a comparative failure, whereas a sort of scratch crew (if I may use such an expression) forms a most merry, happy party. But of course it does not do in these matters to trust to chance; and in dinner-giving, as in every other circumstance of life, the best way to command success is to deserve it. The number of one's guests is a first consideration. Some rich dictatorial individual has laid down, as a rule, "Not more than the Muses, nor fewer than the Graces;" but persons of ordinary income can not afford to give dinner-parties every other day, and twelve or fourteen (including host and hostess) is a very allowable average.

A friend of mine, famous for his dinners, compares much larger entertainments to feeding friends like pigs in a sty. The idea, though the reverse of agreeable, is to a certain extent true; but even for feeds of twenty or twenty-four excuse may be made. Such gastronomic excesses should, however, be rare, and confined to the reception of irreconcilables—by whom I mean dinner acquaintances who can not be made to fit in at ordinary social gatherings. In saying this I am speaking of mixed parties, for I hold that a bachelor dinner should never exceed twelve, and if possible be confined to nine or ten.

I shudder at the remembrance of one of more than thirty I recently partook of at a certain club. It was like a first day's dinner at the table d'hôte of a foreign hotel. After all there is very little necessity to crowd men together, for irreconcilables, as a rule, consist almost invariably of the softer sex.

Digitized by Google

ous dowager, who overweights any ordinary festive meeting, who is offended if not taken down to dinner by the martyr host (in preference, perhaps, to one of the most agreeable women present), and who patronizes fellow-guests, probably as greatly her superior in position as they are in good-breeding? She is an irreconcilable who at a very large dinner-party is comparatively harmless. Even she will not expect necessarily to be first among so many, and she has fuller scope for discourse respecting her aristocratic proclivities and family connections than where she is better known, and therefore less appreciated. But in addition to the dowager there are certain old maids, not very producible in limited circles, who may with advantage be judiciously dotted about in large gatherings, and also exigeantes mammas with marriageable daughters, who give large parties themselves, and like and expect to be asked to the same in return. Of course one of the component parts of an entertainment of this sort is the padding—by which I mean a certain number of dull, heavy men whom it is necessary to ask, because they, or their fathers or mothers, give agreeable dinners, or because their acquaintance is in some way or other valuable or useful, though they come to your house apparently for no other purpose than, like Sir Thrifty's friends, "To stare about them and to eat." Then perhaps one, or possibly two (if you place them some distance apart) really clever men and good talkers, and your party is complete—irreconcilables, padding, lion or lions.

The good talker, especially if he has no rival present, enjoys himself to his heart's content. His audience, like the House of Commons, is very easily amused, and he has no one to cap his somewhat threadbare anecdotes and ancient jokes, which in other company he would not venture to produce. Indeed, some effective talkers are never so much in their element as at a large dinner-party; like certain actors or orators, they require a full audience to stimulate them to exertion, and think that in the presence of only five or six listeners they comparatively "waste their sweetness on the desert air." Even a very large party, judiciously composed, may be a success, though not of the highest order.

The most charming dinners are where all share in the conversation to a less or greater degree, the lead being taken by two or three good raconteurs, who do not monopolize, but direct, suggest, and control the talk.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

An ex-King's Will.—More of the Tichborne Case.—Mr. Wise and his Balloon.

A SOVEREIGN prince, even when he has lost his sovereignty, is no "small potato" in Europe, and when he has an income of a million pounds a year, one would think he would die at least "much respected." Charles Frederic Auguste William, however, whilom "by the grace of God" Duke sovereign of Brunswick and Lüneburg, has not been so fortunate. He has died one of the richest men in the world, and yet no human creature cries, "May he rest in peace!" or if they do, it is only on the principle that if he goes to heaven, all men are safe from the alternative. What tricks he played to make the angels weep, before he was cast from his throne, it is needless now to dilate upon; but as he was kicked out of it at a time when people were by no means so particular as they are now as to the behavior of their rulers, we may be sure it was not for nothing that he became a private person. The last scene in which he played in his own capital was a retreat from the opera amidst a shower of dead cats and Continental eggs, and from that time he became a wanderer over the face of the earth, touching no soil that he did not disgrace. The sovereign powers to whom he appealed, though zealous enough for divine right, refused to countenance his re-establishment, and he revenged himself by coming to live in their dominions. Such was his infamous conduct that even the courts of Europe—so tender to the vices of the great—were one by one closed against him, with the exception of an occasional police court; for, with wealth above the dreams of avarice, he mingled with the basest and most vile. His gold and, above all, his jewels were a curse to him, for he was alarmed for their safety every hour of the day and night, and took the most extraordinary precautions to protect them. The enemies he had made for himself by his oppressions put him also in constant dread for his own worthless life, and he lived in such fear of poison that his gold and silver dishes came to table locked, lest their contents should have been tampered with. No man, however, harmed him. Once only did justice seem to be overtaking him, when he was taken up by an English policeman by mistake, under the impression that he was one of the swell-mob. As Dickens said (in one of the recent letters in Forster's Life), "That man ought to have been made an inspector for his sagacity." Thus outraging every law of God and man, this princely pest lived on, a wonder and a warning, but no longer with the power to tyrannize over a subject people, and now has died, leaving a will behind him as marvelous and wicked as his life itself. At the moment of his death he was probably "worth" twenty-five millions of pounds sterling, or one hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars. All this, with the exception of £40,000 which he has bequeathed to a Mr. Smith, of Chelsea, his executor, is left to the city of Geneva. There is nothing to be said against so respectable a municipality thus unexpectedly becoming the richest in the world, but the terms of the bequest exhibit a hateful spirit. In the first place, five physicians, the most celebrated that can be procured, are to examine his intestines to search for petrified according to the latest method, as being the best for preserving his precious carcass, while the funeral is to be conducted with all the pomp and splendor befitting a sovereign prince. His shameful expulsion from that eminence rankled in him to the last; and while making provision for such "a monument and equestrian statue" as should put all other such into the shade, "to be constructed ad libitum out of the millions of our succession in bronze and marble by the most celebrated artists," he enjoins upon his heirs to make no sort of compromise with his "unnatural relations," Prince William of Brunswick, the ex-King of Hanover, and the Duke of Cambridge. They are to make every effort to put themselves in possession of his property in Hanover, in Prussia, and in America, but especially to do their best to recover that fortune "taken from us by force, and kept since 1830, in our duchy of Brunswick." His design in leaving all this wealth as he has done was probably to this end: since a city, the representatives of which can not die, has a much better chance of prosecuting a claim which may be resisted for a series of years than any mere individual. At all events, he has left all to Geneva, with one million of gold and bank-notes to start with by way of balance at his banker's. His intentions up to 1869 had been, it seems, to make the Prince Imperial of France his heir, and thrice, it is asserted, has the ex-Empress gone to Geneva incognita to visit him in person, and beseech him to return to his first resolve. How fortunate is it for the sake of liberty and order that she failed, for with such a fortune what intrigues and conspiracies might not have been set agoing! Fancy if the poor, proud Comte de Chambord had got hold of it, or the Orleanists, or, in fact, any royal pretender! The first purchase that would have been made with it would have been votes in the Assembly; the second, an army to have enforced its will. Though this wealth, therefore, might have been left to better hands (to mine or yours, for instance), it might also have been left to much worse; and we can only hope that after the duke's monument is finished, the rest of the money may be put to better purpose. In the mean time I look for another Alexandre Dumas to write for us a new Monte Cristo in the biography of this princely scoundrel and beggarly millionaire.

It is difficult to ascend from such a topic as the ex-Duke of Brunswick to that of "maternal instinct," but perhaps you would like to hear what Dr. Kenealy, in the words which conclude (at last) his speech for the defense of the Tichborne claimant, has to say about it. "The maternal instinct is everlasting and all-subduing in the human heart and soul—a true and divinely implanted feeling, which you and I, gentlemen of the jury, ought not to resist; and I call upon you, in the name of that instinct, to declare your verdict—a verdict which will delight the whole realm of England—that the defendant is Roger Tichborne." This praise of the parental feeling is the more praiseworthy in Dr. Kenealy as the learned gentleman himself once so far forgot his "paternal instincts" as to beat one of his own children within an inch of his life, for which offense he was cast into prison.

I know that it is not your business to give me information, but vice versa, yet, if you wouldn't mind, I should very much like to know whether Professor Wise and his companions do really intend to cross the Atlantic in a balloon. Our Mr. Coxwell, the aeronaut, tells us that they will not only not do so, but if the accounts of their preparations are correct, that they will not even rise with the occasion, but by remaining upon terra firma be spared from committing a very elaborate and expensive suicide. There is a nursery poem which occurs to my mind as applicable to this experiment:

"Three wise men of Gotham put to sea in a bowl;
If the bowl had been stronger, my tale had been longer."

I don't say the bowl will not cross the sea in this case, but if it does, I will undertake to go back in it.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

MAINE and Massachusetts chiefly supply our markets with that favorite crustacean, the lobster. A considerable quantity of lobsters is every year caught on the rocky shores of Long Island and New Jersey, but the great centres from which they are sent are Portland and Boston. The Maine fishery is very extensive, most of the towns on the coast and near the mouths of many of the rivers being interested in it. Canning lobsters is a flourishing business. It is stated that not far from 8,000,000 cans will be packed this season in Boston and Portland, all which will find a ready market in various parts of the world. A Maine company recently established a "canning" factory in Nova Scotia, where the number boiled varies from one to three thousand daily, according to the success of the fishermen. No part of the lobster is poisonous, although the flesh does not agree with every person. The cartilaginous stomach is too tough to be eaten, and some other parts are rejected. But lobsters should always be eaten fresh; if stale, they often cause sickness. These creatures are very combative and quarrelsome, and it is dangerous for one not acquainted with their habits and mode of attack to handle them. They often lose a claw or a leg in their contests with each other, but the missing member is soon reproduced, a new one sprouting up from the old stump. An immense quantity of lobsters is consumed annually in London, most of which are from the English coast and from the coasts of Norway and Scotland. Artificial storing ponds have been constructed, where they may be kept in good condition for a month or more. Near Southampton is one capable of holding 50,000 lobsters.

---

two ago, while a party were ascending the mountain during a storm, in the hope of witnessing the sun rise next morning, there came a sudden crash and an instantaneous stoppage of machinery. The main eccentric shaft of the engine was broken short off, rendering all further progress by rail impossible. It was night, raining in torrents, blowing a gale, and "dark as Egypt." To remain where they were was to imperil the lives of the whole party. Summoning all the strength and courage possible, they attempted the ascent, and after great exposure and exertion they reached the Summit House, exhausted but thankful.

The euphonious cognomen of Gregg belongs to an Ohio man who would not pay his washerwoman. After repeated but vain applications to collect the bill, the woman sued him before a justice for the sum of $19 62. Mr. Gregg promptly put in an appearance, acknowledged the correctness of the bill, but put forward as an offset to it the following bill:

Mrs. —— —— To JONAS H. GREGG, Dr.

To damages done to his feelings in compelling her daughter to break off her engagement with him..... $19 62

The legal contest was ended by the case being dismissed in favor of Mr. Gregg, but whether the engagement was renewed or not is not recorded.

Clergymen and all other good people who visit the sick or the sinner for benevolent purposes may learn a lesson from the story told of a well-meaning but dolorous English minister who went to visit the sick-room of a worldly friend. As his gloomy visage appeared in the doorway, the sick man started up in bed, exclaiming, "Why, what's the matter? You look as if your religion didn't agree with you!"

"A youth to fortune and to fame unknown," aged four and a half years, and residing in Minneapolis, Minnesota, develops an extraordinary love for horses. The other day he unfastened a horse and buggy that was standing before a store, and drove off. A man attempted to stop him, but the young Jehu requested him to "clear the track," as he "knew what he was about." After driving a short distance the horse took fright. A police officer tried to stop him, and was considerably injured. Finally the vehicle struck a post, and parted from the horse. The boy fell out, and was picked up in an insensible condition, but quickly recovered, and started for home. The parents were congratulating each other that the boy had learned a lesson which other means had failed to teach, when the youngster slipped out of the room, and attempted to take another ride in the wagon in which his father had hastily come home on hearing of the child's accident. This time he was prevented from accomplishing his wishes.

The American Sportsman is trying hard to teach people how to handle guns. It gives four rules. The substance of the first three rules is—never handle a gun unless you know how; always handle a gun as if it were loaded; always carry a gun at half-cock. The fourth rule we give entire. "If you know of no other way of ascertaining whether a gun is loaded or not than by putting the muzzle to your mouth and blowing, or if you feel inclined to draw the cap, retire to a safe distance and at once blow out your brains—if you have any—before you kill or maim other people by your stupidity and carelessness."

Canning pine-apples is an industry extensively carried on at Nassau, New Providence. This year the season commenced about the middle of May, and ended with July 31. The fruit comes from New Providence and the surrounding islands, and, when canned, is shipped to the United States and England. What is designed for the English market is packed whole, but for this country the fruit is cut into pieces.

Deaths from chloroform continue to be not infrequent. A short time ago a man in Cincinnati crushed the thumb of his right hand in some machinery. Amputation was considered necessary, and he decided to take chloroform. He appeared to be a strong, healthy man, and the physician did not hesitate to administer the anæsthetic, after making the usual inquiries as to organic affections. It took five minutes to completely narcotize the patient, and just as he became unconscious he was seized with a violent trembling fit. The alarmed physician immediately attempted to restore him, but in vain. He died immediately.

An old and worthless New Hampshire dog had been accustomed to accompany his master to a certain meadow. While there one day his master had a conversation with a neighbor as to the best method of dispatching him, he being old and worthless, and it was agreed that he should be brought to the meadow the following day, and that the neighbor should give him poison; but the dog could never be induced to go there again.

A medical man asserts that a fish diet is a great humanizer of the tempers of mankind, tending to make them more kindly toward each other, and less disposed to crime. He instances carnivorous animals as being always the most fierce and violent, and believes that if human stomachs could have an occasional respite by the consumption of fish, the world would be all the better for it.

California is becoming famous for her agricultural products. Last year her wheat crop was worth about $25,000,000, and her barley crop was half as much more in quantity than the wheat, if not in money value. She raised also 25,000,000 pounds of wool, 3,000,000 gallons of wine, and sent to market more than $7,000,000 worth of meat of various kinds.

Since January, 1872, there have been discovered thirteen asteroids and one planet. Eight of these discoveries were made by American observers. The asteroids are situated between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter. Vulcan is the name of the new planet, which was discovered by Mr. Cowie, at Shanghai, China, and the discovery verified by Professor Kirkwood, of Bloomington, ty-four days, twenty-two hours, and thirty-one minutes. This planet was discovered May 24, 1873, but was predicted before that time.

The Bank of England forgers have been sentenced to the highest punishment under the law for their offense—penal servitude for life.

The kangaroo vine of Australia has received by a traveler the significant name of the "devil's corkscrew." He describes one as being nearly 700 feet in length, and measuring at its base three feet nine inches in circumference. It had first infolded in its deadly embrace a tree of considerable size, but this support had died and disappeared, and nothing remained but a spiral column of vine nearly 200 feet in height, from the summit of which the huge climber had sent out its continuations in a horizontal line for more than 130 feet, until it reached a eucalyptus-tree. Around this the vine had wound in several coils, and then thrown out a number of stems, which were grasping all the trees in the neighborhood of its line of march.

Many letters find their way to the Dead-letter Office because people can not remember that the franking privilege is abolished.

The annual sea-serpent has appeared—this time in Portland Harbor. He is about thirty feet long, has a head like a seal, and makes a great commotion as he wriggles along through the water.

Mainichi Hirakana Shunbunshi, or the Daily Hirakana News, is the title of an adventurous pioneer of a coming era, which is published at Jeddo, Japan. The common method of printing, both in China and Japan, has been for ages by the means of carved wooden blocks. The letter-press of the Daily Hirakana News is printed with movable type. A distinct space is left between each word, and the use of the comma and period introduced. This paper is published by the "Society for the Dispersion of Darkness"—a significant name, truly—whose two-fold object is stated to be the enlightenment of the country by providing a medium of home and foreign news, and to demonstrate that the use of fifty syllables (which constitute the elements of the "Hirakana" of the Japanese) is amply sufficient for literary purposes, and that it will be no loss to abandon the borrowed Chinese characters.

A DILEMMA.

See illustration on page 636.

THERE is always a dash of bitter in the cup of human bliss. Nothing, for example, can be more delightful than to walk "abroad in the meadows to see the young lambs"—or the grown-up lambs, we should rather say, at this season of the year—but unluckily there are sometimes to be found in the meadows quadrupeds of a more formidable character. Fancy the astonishment of a lady who, being of a book-devouring disposition, crosses the fields absorbed in the pages of a magazine, and suddenly finds that a whole herd of cows are walking close behind her, and with lowering heads and threatening aspect are apparently discussing whether they had not better pitch her into the next field for the crime of wearing a crimson panier. Still worse, however, is the shock to the young ladies in the picture before us. In this case they have to deal not with the "milky mothers of the herd," who are generally peaceable enough unless irritated by yelping dogs, but with a veritable bull, a formidable personage, that is shut up all by himself in a field, that is most likely utterly ennuyé, and that is longing for a row as heartily as an Irishman in the good old days when Donnybrook Fair was a place of fighting, and consequent enjoyment. As the girls have no cavalier in attendance, and as the dog is sure to whet the bull's wrath, it is not easy to see how they can proceed on their journey. Like the baffled Scotchman in the story, they must go "bock agin," unless they adopt the prescription furnished in Lear's Book of Nonsense,

"There was an old man who said, 'How Shall I flee from this horrible cow?
I will sit on this stile, and continue to smile,
Which may soften the heart of that cow.'"

We can not approve of the title selected by the artist, unless he means playfully to imply that the girls are likely to be impaled on the horns of the living dilemma in the next field. A dilemma supposes a state of affairs where you are between Scylla and Charybdis, or, to speak less classically, where, whatever you do, you find yourself in a fix. Such was the sailor's case when the tiger and alligator each stood ready to devour him; but here there is no dilemma, because the bull-haunted girls apparently are quite free to return the way they came.

IMPROVED METHOD OF ADMINISTERING MEDICINE.

AN ingenious method of administering certain medicines, which possibly is not entirely new, has lately been suggested by Limousin of Paris. This consists in the preparation of little disks of tough, unleavened bread, which are punched out with a die, and embossed so as to have a depression in the centre, in which the medicine to be administered is placed, and then covered with a thin plate of the same material. The name of the medicine and the dose are stamped on the disk. When needed for use, one (or more) of these disks is placed in a teaspoon with some water, until slightly softened, and it may then be swallowed without leaving any taste of the medicine in the mouth. It is claimed by the inventor that this method is particularly adapted for the administration of bitter substances, such as sulphate of quinine, rhubarb,

Fig. 1.—Black Faille ... Fig. 2.—Violet Gros ... Fig. 3.—Gray ... Fig. 4.—Dress for ... Fig. 5.—Dress for ... Fig. 6.—Gray ... Fig. 7.—Suit for ... Fig. 8.—Black Faille ... Fig. 9.—Pearl ... Fig. 10.—Blue Poult de Soie and ... Fig. 11.—Olive ... Fig. 12.—Brown Serge ... Fig. 13.—Myrtle ... Fig. 14.—Brown Serge ... Fig. 15.—Blue Poult de Soie and ... Fig. 16.—Slate-

Fig. 12.—Dress with Vigogne Man-

Fig. 13.—Green Diagonal

Fig. 14.—Dress with Vigogne Man-

Fig. 15.—Blue and White Foulard Walk-

Fig. 16.—colored Silk

THE NEAR ROSE.

By EMILY E. FORD.

A ROSE-TREE grew in my garden green,
And offered me fresh and fair
Full boughs of soft roses. Down they lean,
And thrust their buds my fingers between,
As if asking my love to share.

But willful I left the near bough's gift,
So tender and dewy and rare,
And stretched my hands to eagerly lift
The far-off blossoms that wave and drift
Just out of my reach in the air.

Then stung me the thorns with keenest wound;
They left me a rankling pain.
I sought to pass by an easy bound,
And grasp the far buds, but still I found
My efforts were sadly in vain.

Then glad I pressed to my throbbing hand
A dewy and soft cool rose
That grew at my lips, as though 'twere planned
To make my restlessness understand,
"Take the good that close to you grows."

The blessing the present hour bestows
Seems never so fine and rare
As the future's, when out of reach it grows,
As on highest bush waves far-off rose,
Made by distance only more fair.

The thorns of the near rose we may see
As we hold it within our hand.
Content is a flower of a lowly tree;
But the far-off blooms are a mystery
That we long to understand.

THE LEGEND OF CARDYN.

THE scene suited the story. We were sitting in the antechamber to the banqueting-room of Cardyn Priory. We were three—Charles Leveson, the present occupant of the Priory; George Payne, a barrister; and myself, who boasted of some slight connection with the periodical press of London.

Leveson having promised to relate the legend of the Priory, I recalled his promise to his mind as we sat in the antechamber to the banqueting-room that sultry afternoon, with the sea rolling darkly and angrily in front, and the distant thunder making no inapt accompaniment to the curious legend.

"It has nothing whatever to do with monks or nuns," said Leveson. "Happily their iniquities do not form the plot of the 'Legend of Cardyn.' Indeed, the date of its action is not so very remote. It occurred less than two hundred years ago; and I have made all the inquiries possible, verifying details where it has been in my power to do so. Though the family of the Hemlows, to whom it refers, have been extinct for generations, it is not a little odd that some of the servants in the Priory to-day are sons of the servants of years ago, and those again were descendants of servants of still more distant years. Curious, isn't it? The place seems to have a fascination for all those employed about it. So the story has been told by one to another, until it has at last reached me."

"Yes, Jennings" (to an old servant who just then appeared), "that is what I rang for—cigars, and the Cognac that has been in bottle twenty years. I am about to tell my friends the legend—the legend you told me."

"Eh, eh, Sir," replied the servant, bending forward and putting his hand to his ear, for he was very deaf—"eh, eh, Sir; it's a curious story. But have you shown the gentlemen the chapel yet?"

"Indeed, I've forgotten it. Come along; we can get there in three minutes. You have the keys.—He's right; you should see the chapel before I tell the story."

Preceded by Jennings, who hobbled along in front, we walked through several corridors. The old man suddenly stopped, brought out the keys, and after a good deal of difficulty opened a heavy lumbering door, through which we passed into the chapel. What a scent of dust and mould assailed us! The old oak seats were fast falling to decay; the dark desk and pulpit, about which some drapery hung, moth-eaten and frayed at the edges, leaned from the perpendicular, suggestive of undermined foundations. There were many tablets, recording the deaths of the various owners of the Priory and their relatives, into the letters of which green mould had eaten, making the records in some instances almost indecipherable. In a gallery stood an organ whose voice had long been silenced. At the east end was an iron-barred door. Pointing to it, I asked where it led to.

"The vaults," replied Jennings—"the vaults, Sir. You had better see them. I often walk round 'em, Sir, and look at the coffins. The lock works easily."

We entered. There was a grim array of coffins, revealed by some faint gleams of light proceeding from a small window at the extreme end. Some lamps, too, long unused, were suspended from the ceiling. In the centre there stood a marble slab, supported by short pillars and surrounded by an iron frame-work, whence depended the remains of some old and moth-eaten velvet curtains.

"What was that for?" I asked.

"You will know in time," said Leveson. "Take a good note of all you've seen; then you will be the better able to realize the legend. Thanks, Jennings. We'll return. How musty and cold it smells!"

Then, followed by the clanging of doors, we returned to the room we had left; and Mr. Leveson, who could not see his face, on which were visible very evident signs of coming illness, took his hand, and, with the exquisitely sensitive touch of the blind, recognized its feverish state.

"You are indeed unwell, Lewis. You must not leave the house to-day; and if you are not better, we must dispatch some one to C——."

"I confess that I do feel unwell," answered Lewis, as he seated himself by the fire, shivering as he did so. "I could not sleep. But keep a brave heart. You know how strong I am. A day or two, and it will be all well with me again."

But Lewis's hopeful anticipations with regard to his health were not fulfilled. For some days he refused to see a doctor; but he was at last obliged to give in to the solicitude of his wife and the anxious pleadings of Cornelius. He was unable to leave his bed now. Mencia's love quickened all her energies on her husband's behalf. Whether watching at his bedside, or busily carrying out the instructions of the doctor, she was prompt and apt. It seemed as though her love was too great to allow her powers to be paralyzed even by the alarming illness of one whom she most cherished.

Knowing the cleverness and skill with which she attended upon his brother, Cornelius sighed heavily, and the tears started to his blind eyes.

"Oh, Mencia," he said, "it is now that my blindness seems most bitter to me. I can render my brother no help. I can hear him moan in his pain, but I can do nothing to allay it. I can not see when he makes a sign that he wants food or medicine. You are able to watch and detect the faintest sign of any unexpressed desire. He might die, and my blind eyes would never know it. I am not envious of what you can do, Mencia. I am thankful for your great care and love for him—as thankful, I hope, as I know he is. But I have known him longer than you, Mencia. O God! why was I blind?"

With the darkening of the October days Lewis Hemlow's malady increased. The physician from the nearest town was unable to battle with it, and recourse was had to an eminent London doctor. The fever, under his treatment, subsided, but Lewis's condition was for a long time precarious. Both Mencia and Cornelius watched anxiously day by day for signs of increasing strength, but these failed to reveal themselves to these two loving watchers. Sometimes Lewis was able to leave his bed for a few hours; at other times his fatigue was so great that he was unable to make the experiment. Mencia's face became pale, and her figure worn, and Cornelius grew more wistful and sad than ever. The doctor shook his head as they plied him with anxious questions. Eager inquiries were made at the Priory morning after morning as to Sir Lewis's health; and the whisper soon passed from one to another of those that made them that Lewis Hemlow would never be well again.

This dread conviction settled upon Lewis before his wife had dared to yield to such a fear.

"I shall die, Mencia," he said one day, when he had been removed from his bed to the fire. "I shall be obliged to leave you and Cornelius. Poor Mencia! poor Cornelius! It is weeks since I was first taken, and you see I make no progress. You will not forget me when I am gone?"

"Forget you, Lewis!" cried his wife, weeping passionately; "that would be impossible.

A hundred and eighty years ago, or thereabouts, Sir Edgar Hemlow died, leaving two sons. Their names were Lewis and Cornelius. The former had just reached manhood at the time of his father's death. Cornelius was several years younger than his brother, and was doubly unfortunate in being blind and epileptic. The fortune of Sir Edgar was large; but in consideration of the helpless condition of his younger son, he bequeathed it all to Lewis, giving strict injunctions in his will that Lewis should take special and affectionate care of his brother. Cornelius loved his brother passionately; and when he knew the disposition of his father's money, was perfectly satisfied with the position in which he was placed. Money to him, who was blind and at times mentally weak, was but a name. He was contented with dependence on his brother's bounty, who loved him earnestly.

Cornelius had one great taste—a taste for music. His skill seemed intuitive. He would spend hours at the organ in the chapel; indeed, he never seemed so happy as when he was there, for his disposition was silent and retiring.

That of Lewis was the opposite. In a small vessel, which he purchased shortly after his father's death, he was in the habit of making voyages to various towns along the eastern and southern coasts; and he would even occasionally extend his voyages to the Low Countries and France. Cornelius never accompanied him; but when his brother had been absent several weeks he would mount the tower, accompanied by one of the servants, who, at his master's bidding, would fix his eyes upon the horizon to watch for the return of his brother's vessel.

Time passed on. Sir Edgar Hemlow had been dead about five years, when Lewis told his brother that he should make a voyage to Antwerp, and that probably his stay might be longer than usual. It was as Lewis said. He was absent for more than a month; and, rather to the surprise of his brother, made another voyage to Antwerp, when he again staid some time. Day after day Cornelius mounted the tower with one of the servants to watch for Lewis's return; day after day he descended with his expectation unsatisfied. At last, when he had fixed his blind vacant eyes on the distant sea for many an hour, the servant keenly watching by his side, the little vessel was espied on the horizon, making its way to the shore. Cornelius hastened from the tower, and with almost unfaltering steps made his way to the sea, and as his brother disembarked, threw his arms around him, and fairly cried with delight.

"My poor Cornelius," said Lewis, "and have you missed me so much? Well, I am home at last; and with the exception of one more visit to the Low Countries, shall not leave you for a long time."

"Day after day, Lewis, I've gone to the tower with Herbert to watch—how eagerly! how longingly! It was only at those times when I had not the power to see you that I regretted I was blind. It seemed to me cruel that I could not be the first to catch sight of your little vessel rising over the horizon. Oh, Lewis, if I could only see you! I feared at times that you might never return; for the sea is so cruel—so cruel! And when the wind roared round the old walls I trembled for you, lest you might be wrecked."

"My good Cornelius, I wish you would accompany me sometimes. The sea is not cruel; it is glorious! But come, let us hasten in, for I have something to tell you which I hope will please you. Cardyn will be a more cheerful home to you in future."

"What have you to tell me, Lewis?" asked Cornelius when the two were alone together.

"Guess, Cornelius, guess."

"I can not guess, brother."

"You are to have a sister, Cornelius, a beautiful, loving sister. I am to be married soon."

"Married!" said the other, slowly.

"Yes, to Mencia Spanhoven. Oh, she is so beautiful! I have brought her likeness from Antwerp. Ah, Cornelius—I forgot for the moment you were blind! I thought you might see it. Forgive me. Her mother was a Spaniard, and she has a Spaniard's dark eyes and hair; eyes that glow and melt with love. Her father is a merchant of the Low Countries, and my visits there have been so long because I have been passing my time with her. You can not help loving her, Cornelius."

Cornelius sighed.

"We shall be married shortly," said Lewis, "and I shall bring her to Cardyn. What happy days we shall have together! I have spoken often to her about you, and she is full of interest in you. Like you, she plays on the organ, oh, such ravishing music! But the music is not half so beautiful as she is."

Cornelius rose suddenly from his brother's side and walked to the window. Tears welled up into his sightless eyes, and an expression of pain passed over his face. The brothers presented a strange contrast, both in figure and countenance. The younger was slight and delicate, his face was almost hairless; long, thin, scattered black locks fell carelessly to his shoulders, and his blind eyes were piteous in their expression. Lewis was strong and vigorously made; his hair was brown, his eyes bright blue and frank, his voice was laughter itself; there was passion in his face, though it wore an almost constant smile.

"I shall not be to you what I once was, Lewis," Cornelius said, sadly. "I am blind. I am weak. I am not as other men. And you are so much to me in my blindness and helplessness. In pity, consider me! Give not your whole heart away. I crave my share—a small, poor share; but if I have not that, how desolate I shall be! As I sit in the chapel playing I try to make the music speak what I feel. My hands tremble; a strange impulse makes me seek for am happy—when I have prayed in music—I have prayed for you. In words I could not tell you how much I loved you; my poor, trembling, eager, passionate notes have been the voice of my deep, my undying love. Pity me! I am so poor in what you are rich—power and health and sight! Do not, for this beautiful woman, withdraw that which will beggar me indeed!"

Saying this he hurried from the room.

"Poor Cornelius!" thought Lewis; "what a strange, fond heart he has! To be blind always—how dreadful!" And then his thoughts reverted to Mencia, and he wished the days would pass rapidly till he should bear her home. Alas, for many hours he forgot Cornelius; forgot him, indeed, until Cornelius himself returned.

"I have been wrong," cried his blind brother, advancing quickly toward Lewis. "I have been wickedly jealous. Forgive me, Lewis: I have been so unjust to you. Do not tell Mencia that I have grudged your love for her. I will welcome her as you would have me do. Forgive my petulant words."

"I have scarcely thought of them, my poor sensitive brother! Do not look so sad! You have not offended me. Hope for happy days. When I next go away my visit will not be long. And if you and Herbert take your stand upon the tower the fifth day from my departure, his eyes will soon espy the vessel that brings home Mencia and myself."

The day for Lewis's departure for Antwerp arrived, and after taking an affectionate adieu of his brother, he started in his vessel for the Netherlands. With Cornelius he kept his promise, for on the fifth day after his departure the vessel was seen returning, and Cornelius soon stood in the presence of his brother's wife. Both Lewis and Mencia were in high spirits. Cornelius placed his hand timidly in that of Mencia; but his timidity soon gave way before her graciousness and kindness.

"You have done well to marry, Lewis," said his brother, as they separated for the night. "I shall give Mencia all a brother's love."

Mencia was indeed very beautiful. Her portrait still hangs in the gallery of Cardyn Priory, painted by some Flemish artist, and the colors are bright and vivid now. She had few or none of the characteristics of her father's race; her eyes were large, lustrous, and brown; there was an almost voluptuous sweetness in the lips and in the olive complexion, through which the blood glowed brightly. The bust was shapely and full, her figure tall and replete with grace; the moulding of her arms was faultless; the beauty of her hand, with its long tapering fingers, was of rare excellence.

A year went by very peacefully and happily with those at Cardyn Priory. No child was born to Mencia, and there was some regret on this account. "There will be no more Hemlows," croaked the old women in the village. "Lewis married a foreigner, and his race will die with him, for of course Cornelius will never marry. Sir Lewis should have wedded a country-woman of his own, and then he would not have been without an heir."

These remarks reached Mencia's ears, and one day, sitting alone with her husband, she said,

"Oh, Lewis, I fear you will not love me now, for we have no children! And the gossips of the village say that if you had married a country-woman of your own, it would have been otherwise. Do not cease to love me because I am childless; for you know how I worship, how I adore you!"

"Oh, Mencia, do not be grieved, my own. It is with us as Heaven wills. I do not love you one whit the less—one whit the less. We are very happy—you, my brother, and myself. Poor Cornelius! he is brother and son to us—is he not?"

She rose, and with her dark eyes melting with tenderness, she kissed her husband passionately.

"What would my life be without you, Lewis? Is it wicked to love you as I do? Oh no, it can not be. If it is so good to love God, is it not good of me to love you? Say that you are not angry with me because I have borne you no child!"

"Can I be angry with one whose love is unmeasured wealth to me?"

Lewis's sailing excursions were fewer and shorter now than formerly; but though he was united to one whose fascinations were very great, he did not altogether sink into a lazy worship of his beautiful wife. He would therefore occasionally be absent from her in his little vessel for two or three days together. On one occasion when he proposed going the signs of a coming storm were so apparent that both his wife and Cornelius urged him to remain on shore. Their pleadings were vain; and he had not long left before the threatened storm burst; still the vessel stood seaward in the teeth of the storm.

Many hours passed without any abatement of the hurricane; and Mencia's anxiety increased. More than once she dispatched a servant to the tower to endeavor to see whether there were any signs of the returning vessel, and at last, after many disappointments, as the night was closing with added wind and storm, the servant returned with the message that the vessel was making for port. Mencia then dispatched two or three men-servants to the beach to give the assistance that might be necessary, owing to the difficulties of landing and the roughness of the sea. Lewis's boat had had a hard fight for it; a good deal of the rigging was gone; and as the crew ran her ashore the waves beat so fiercely against her that she rolled from side to side, and seemed likely to be beaten to pieces. Just as Lewis was going to spring to the most available spot for landing—a small jetty that ran about a dozen yards into the sea—he was thrown suddenly forward against the wood-work. He gave a sharp

"It has been hard work," he said to one of his servants, who ran forward to help him up the beach. "Every rag on me is wet through! And that confounded blow on the head has almost stunned me. Am I bleeding much, Herbert?"

"A good deal, Sir. You had better hurry in. Lady Hemlow has been so anxious for your return! and she will be frightened when she sees you in this condition."

Lewis hurried on to the Priory, and was met at the door by his wife, who gave a cry of alarm as she saw his bleeding face and soaked garments.

"Oh, Lewis!" she cried, "come in; you are wet. Why did you leave us to-day? Poor Cornelius and I have been so alarmed. How the blood pours from your wound!" And she stanched the blood with her handkerchief, leading him forward to an apartment where a bright fire was burning. Cornelius had hovered about his brother, his sightless eyes very piteous in their expression; and as Mencia spoke of the blood which was pouring from his brother's face, he gave a cry of alarm.

"Are you much hurt, Lewis?"

"No, Cornelius; no. Don't be frightened, my boy. It is only a little blow. I was thrown down just as I was landing. I am only wet through; and before I go to the fire will change every thing."

In less than half an hour Lewis returned from his bedroom, and found Mencia and Cornelius at the bright fire in the old dining-hall. Mencia had warmed some Burgundy over the fire, which she handed to her husband as soon as he entered.

"Drink, Lewis dear. I am sure you must need it."

The blood had ceased flowing from the wound now, but Lewis looked fagged and worn. Even after he had taken plentifully of the warm Burgundy, the paleness did not leave his face. Mencia glanced anxiously at him from time to time.

"You need not be alarmed, Mencia; I am only tired. I shall be well to-morrow. The day has been a rough one for me. Oh, such a sea it was! I haven't seen one like it for years."

The next morning, when Cornelius descended to breakfast, he found Mencia alone.

"Lewis is not well," she said. "He was very feverish during the night, and scarcely slept at all. He will not rise till noon."

Lewis joined them at noon, and Cornelius,

When the winter is over, and the sweet spring is here, you will be yourself again."

"Never, never, Mencia," said her husband, sadly. "You must not hope, my own. Reconcile yourself to the idea that I can not be with you long. Only, when I am gone, take care of my brother—my poor, fond Cornelius. You know how he loves me, Mencia? Treat him as your best friend and brother; for he will have none but you, and for my sake you will always think of him."

Mencia's tears fell faster, and she clung to her husband, her beautiful face buried in his bosom.

A week afterward Lewis again spoke of his approaching death, and on this occasion both Mencia and Cornelius were present.

"More than ever I am convinced that my days are numbered," he said. They had got him from the bed, and he was sitting in a large easy-chair by the fire, a table spread with writing materials being before him. "It is only a question of a few days. I and the sea have parted company forever. What happy days I have spent upon it! It looks so stormy this morning that if the window were open I think I could hear it. But that, I suppose, must not be—eh, Mencia? Ah, it is cold," he added, with a shiver. "You know what I purpose doing this morning, Cornelius?" he added, after a pause. "I have summoned Chester from C——, who is to make my will. I dare say he will be here in a short time. I wish, my brother, you were stronger and better; but I have committed you to Mencia's charge, who has promised me that she will be your faithful sister. With regard to my property—"

"Don't speak of that, Lewis," cried Cornelius. "Only do with it as you like. I am blind and helpless. Leave me to Mencia's charge; give all to her. I have had no responsibility yet, and I could not bear to have it when you are gone."

"I have thought it best to do so," answered Lewis, slowly. "I have considered your blindness and helplessness, and I know I shall do as you would wish me by leaving all my property to her. You will then be absolved from all care and responsibility, and you may place full faith in Mencia's consideration. I wish, my dear brother, you were not so afflicted, that you and Mencia might have shared alike. Do not think, Cornelius, that my conduct has been guided by any other desire than that of knowing you would be the happier by my taking this course."

"I am glad you have resolved to act thus," answered Cornelius. "Trust Mencia in all things."

He had only thus spoken when the lawyer was ushered in. So the will was made as Lewis directed and Cornelius approved.

This was the last day that Lewis was able to sit up. He became weaker and weaker. Snow fell thick and fast about the Priory, hiding the sea which rolled before it. And one day, not long afterward, the bell from the tower was heard solemnly tolling in the cold winter air; and a woman sat by the bed where a dead man lay, weeping as though life's most precious gift were snatched away forever, and a blind man sat opposite, kissing and clasping a cold hand, with his eyes bent on the face of one he had never seen.

Lewis was embalmed. In Mencia's passionate love it seemed impossible for her to permit his body to yield to corruption as long as means existed for preventing it; and in order that she might be enabled to see the beloved face, a large square of glass was inserted in the coffin. The embalmer—a well-known French chemist who had settled in London a few years before, on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes—performed the work in a singularly skillful manner.

There lay Lewis dead, but to all appearance only sleeping. The coffin was placed on a large marble stand, a lamp was suspended from the ceiling of the crypt, and velvet curtains were hung around.

Day after day Mencia, generally attended by Cornelius, passed through the chapel to the vaults where the Hemlows lay and gazed through the glass on the embalmed remains of the loved one. Weeks and months passed, and the grief of both remained unabated. Sometimes when she was in the vault, hanging in passionate sorrow over the still features of Lewis Hemlow, Cornelius sat at the organ playing.

There was a year of winter and spring and summer and autumn, and winter again, and yet another year, and even another—the cloud of sorrow remaining heavily on Mencia, with but a rift here and there revealing brightness.

It had been impossible for her to leave Cardyn Priory ere this, although her friends at Antwerp had been urgent in their entreaties for her to visit them. At the expiration of this period, however, the undertaking did not seem so serious; so, after consulting with Cornelius, and with some reluctance, she accepted an invitation to visit her father and mother, and embarked at Harwich for her parents' home in the Netherlands.

For Cornelius it was very sad after the departure of Mencia. He passed most of his time in the chapel at the organ. Mencia's original intention, as expressed to Cornelius, had been to return in a month; but at the termination of a month she wrote to say that she purposed extending her visit.

It was shortly after this that a strange event happened to Cornelius while sitting at the organ, where he had been playing for hours. The strange half-light which was the condition of his blindness, and which, since he could remember, had never altered its character—being both night and day the same, in the greatest brightness or intensest darkness—was changed. As he stooped over the keys he saw a broad, indistinct, white line. The next day the same appearance presented itself, and for many days it was visible. With a strange thrill he recognized this as the keyboard. "Is it possible that I shall ever see?"

After he had been familiar with this appearance for more than a fortnight, he was driven to C—— with a view of consulting the physician who had attended his brother during his illness. A very careful examination was made, and after testing his sight in various ways, the doctor gave it as his opinion that a partial recovery was possible, and that Cornelius had better take the advice of some one more experienced than himself.

It was then arranged that the two should visit London, and consult the most eminent physician of the day. Here he was again encouraged to hope. An operation was spoken of—clumsy, indeed, when compared with the delicate operations performed by the skillful oculists of to-day, but one which in many cases had proved successful. He consented to undergo it; and as he heard that Mencia had again prolonged her visit, he arranged to remain in London. In due course the operation was performed—with success. Cornelius was able to see, indistinctly, of course, as yet; but he had the promising assurance that his sight would continue to improve, though he was forbidden to entertain hopes that it would ever be strong. Gratified as the doctors were by the success of their operation, they were not a little alarmed that the health of Cornelius, after this, did not seem so robust. The epileptic seizures, which in his boyhood had been frequent, returned. The opening of this new sense was evidently attended with some loss of power in another direction. He became, moreover, eccentric and irritable in his manner. The doctors shook their heads as these facts revealed themselves, but were still urgent in their entreaties that he must hope for the best.

When Cornelius returned to the Priory he was no longer totally blind.

To Mencia he had said nothing of his new hopes. Without knowing the reason, her letters gave him pain. Evidences of an altered tone of thought were apparent in them; but for this he would have spoken openly of his freshly recovered power.

Again and again she wrote, excusing herself for not returning. When she did return she had been absent nearly four months.

"I am back again at last, Cornelius," she said, entering the room where her husband's brother sat, and looking more beautiful than ever. "Did you think I had forgotten you? If you did, you were unjust to me. But after my long sorrow it was such happiness to be with my friends again. You know I had not seen them for more than three years—since Lewis was buried. They would not let me part from them. I saw all my old school companions, and staid with them at Bruges and Ghent and Brussels. Some were married, and they were all happy. I was, indeed, very sad at first, but they did their best to lighten my heart, and I thank them for it."

"For they succeeded, Mencia, I see," said Cornelius, in a tone which she had never before heard him use. She started a little as she noticed it.

"Yes, I am happier than I was. And are not you, Cornelius?"

"Happier! I have not forgotten Lewis!"

"Lewis!" she echoed, slowly, a blush mounting to her face—"nor I."

There was a long silence between them.

"And have you been well since I left?" asked Mencia, after a while.

"Yes," answered Cornelius, a little irritably. "I am not so blind as I was. I can see a little, and I can see you, Mencia."

"See, Cornelius!" She said this quite joyfully. But in a moment the glad look passed from her face, and was succeeded by one of anxiety or fear.

"I can see that you are very beautiful," said Cornelius. "But your face is not the face, I think, that I used to turn my blind eyes to when Lewis was alive. It changes so. I can hardly explain to you what I mean, for I can see but little, and I have only been able to do so for a short time. And, Mencia, your voice seems changed too. It is hardly the voice that used to speak to Lewis and to me. Poor Lewis!"

He turned his face from Mencia, and bent it downward.

"Cornelius, this is fancy. I am the same. I love you as much as ever. You have been too lonely here. I should not have remained away so long. Don't be sad. And can you really see me plainly?"

"No; very indistinctly. A little while ago I could see the changes of expression as they passed over your face; now all is blurred. Perhaps my sight will never fully return." And he rose abruptly and left the room.

Mencia glanced after him as though she were both hurt and frightened. With something of a sigh she walked to the window and looked over the garden toward the sea.

"My parents are soon coming to visit me at the Priory," she said to Cornelius, a few days after her return. "My sister as well—and my cousin."

"Your cousin! I never knew you had one."

"Yes," answered Mencia, rather reluctantly. "He is the son of my mother's sister—a Spaniard. I never saw him before I visited Antwerp this time. He has lived, until lately, all his life in Spain."

"What is his name?"

"Carlos Vazquez."

"When do you expect them?"

"In a few days."

"Is your cousin young?"

"He is two or three years older than I am." Cornelius sighed.

"Have you been to the chapel since your return?"

"Yes, Cornelius."

But Mencia did not visit the chapel so frequently as of yore, and the suspicions of Cornelius were aroused. It was evident to him that her grief had lost its poignancy, and that her love for Lewis Hemlow was becoming only a memory. This unhappy conviction served to increase his restlessness and irritability. In his morbid state of mind this change in the conduct of Mencia seemed faithlessness to his brother.

In due time the Spanhovens arrived, by way of Harwich. Carlos Vazquez accompanied them. He was a very handsome Spaniard, bearing some resemblance to Mencia. The meeting between him and his cousin was very tender; and a pained look came into the dim eyes of Cornelius as he noticed this.

Cornelius said but little; and his manner with Carlos had but small courtesy in it. For some days they scarcely saw him; on others they did not see him at all. When asked why he did not appear among them, he excused himself upon the plea of illness; and the plea was very just, for he indeed showed symptoms of illness—of an illness of a very peculiar kind. Though the malady was physical, it was only so in secondary degree. He was unable to sleep, the epileptic seizures were long and serious, and there was a restlessness in his conduct which indicated considerable mental disturbance.

"Your brother-in-law seems a strange fellow," said Carlos to Mencia as they were strolling round the garden. "He has evidently taken a very great dislike to me for some cause; and I have noticed him watching us two from one of the windows for some time past. Let us leave the garden and pass into the quadrangle. You have not told him any thing yet, have you, Mencia?"

"No, Carlos; I have almost dreaded to do so. But I will explain all things to him shortly. I scarcely like to do it yet."

"Why should you not? He surely does not expect that you will grieve forever, my cousin. It would be unreasonable of him to hope for such a thing."

"You do not know how he loved Lewis," she answered, in a low voice.

Three days afterward Mencia, finding Cornelius alone, said,

"I have something I wish to tell you. You will not be angry, Cornelius, will you? It is important that you should know it."

"I can guess what it is, Mencia. I have watched you and your cousin. You have forgotten my brother. When I prayed that I might see, in days past, I little thought what would be first revealed to my once-blinded eyes! Oh, I would have been blind forever rather than have seen my brother's widow the bride of another. You love Carlos Vazquez."

"I do. But Lewis—I have not forgotten him."

"You have," cried Cornelius, raising his voice, "or you would never consent to marry again. After such love as Lewis had for you, how can you profane his memory by caring for another? It is monstrous! He made you mistress of all when he died, little fearing that you would soon prove unworthy of his love and of all he gave you. Who is this Carlos Vazquez, that he should occupy the place in your heart which once held Lewis Hemlow? He is unworthy! Oh, my brother, that you should be so soon forgotten! When you did not return after the month, Mencia, I began to grow fearful of some indefinable coming sorrow; and your few letters to me made it evident that you had changed. But I did not think then that it was because my brother's successor was already bidding for your hand. I was not prepared to find you so faithless yet; for what are three poor years of grief for one like Lewis—for the loss of a love like his? If my blindness had not been in a measure cured, you would have concealed this from me longer; but you knew that I could see, and that it was vain to hide the story from me. The mention of your cousin's name prepared me for what I was destined to discover. Mencia, this marriage shall not have my blessing."

He had spoken these last words trembling with excitement. Suddenly the shaking in his limbs increased, his face flushed, and as suddenly turned pale; then he staggered and fell.

Mencia cried loudly for help. A seizure was upon him.

Hearing her cries, the servants entered hurriedly.

"Take him to his room," she cried. "He has frightened me so. You have seen him like this before, have you not? It is not surely dangerous. What can be done for him?"

Cornelius was unconscious for hours. When he recovered he was very weak. The balance of his mind was shaken. He rambled incoherently, and mentioned Mencia's name angrily. Once or twice she came to his room with kind and eager inquiries; but he forbade her to enter.

It was impossible for him to reconcile himself to the idea of Mencia remarrying. By such an act his brother's memory seemed profaned. The more he brooded upon this forth-coming event, the more disturbed became his mind. He hated her; but he hated Carlos Vazquez more.

Poor Mencia! When parents and friends argued that her continued sorrow for her husband, and all its outward manifestation by habit and dress, were folly, which she would be wise to forget in the presence of her Spanish cousin, whose regards for her were expressed soon after their meeting at Antwerp, she found herself unable to offer any strong arguments in favor of her present conduct. Mencia was not the first woman whose grief, apparently inconsolable, for a lost husband, has in time been merged in a passionate love for another. Carlos was an eager and romantic lover. Was it strange that she soon felt that she could love him? Was it strange, as their intimacy increased, that her love became as devoted as his own? She had hesitated to write to Cornelius, fearing that he would look unfavorably on her remarriage; and there was some half-cherished intention of concealing the fact from him for a while, which she effect when she returned and found that he was no longer blind. That, however, he would offer such objection to the marriage as she now found him prepared to do, she had no apprehension; and his passionate words and angry manner frightened her when she spoke to him about it.

Carlos Vazquez was an impatient lover, and on his account the preparations for the marriage were hurried. Mencia's father returned to Antwerp after staying at the Priory a few weeks; but her mother and sister remained with her. Carlos Vazquez went to London—visiting the Priory occasionally. It was arranged that the marriage should take place in a month's time from the return of Spanhoven to Antwerp.

Mencia saw little of Cornelius during this period. The servants reported that he was very ill, and very eccentric in his manner. Under the circumstances, Mencia was glad that he kept to himself; and the Spanhovens rejoiced at the absence of so disagreeable a companion. The wealthy burghers and merchants of Antwerp, friends of Spanhoven, and among whom he ranked high, sent splendid presents of diamonds and lace, and various products of the Low Countries, to grace the forth-coming marriage; and some Spanish relatives of Mencia, who were established at Brussels and other towns in the Low Countries, forwarded presents of gold bracelets and cups, lavish and barbaric in design, obtained by their predecessors during the expeditions to America which had been rife a little more than a century previously.

It was within two days of the wedding. There was some uncertainty as to the arrival of Carlos, who was detained in London by business arising out of a misunderstanding in the London house which did business with Spanhoven's firm at Antwerp, and which he was commissioned to settle. The evening of his expected arrival, which was dark and stormy, passed off, leaving Mencia disappointed at his non-appearance.

"As you are going to marry again, Mencia, I suppose you have taken a last farewell of Lewis."

It was Cornelius who spoke. He was gaunt and haggard. He and Mencia were standing together in the corridor which led to the chapel, and it was the morning after Mencia's disappointment because Carlos had not come.

"No, Cornelius. I—"

"Have you quite forgotten him?" cried Cornelius.

"Indeed I have not," she answered.

"Will you not see him once again? It is not so very long since you visited him often indeed. I saw him yesterday. He was as beautiful as ever! Come. I am told that Carlos Vazquez did not arrive last night; so you need have no fear of offending him. Come."

Mencia almost shuddered.

"Come. Lewis will not speak and upbraid you, Mencia," said Cornelius, in a strange voice. "You need fear no reproach in his face; for the faces of the dead are still, and say nothing."

"You are trying to alarm me, Cornelius. Why do you look at me so? I loved your brother, and I have truly mourned for him: that you know."

"Then follow me once again. It will be for the last time. You need grieve no more;" and Cornelius laughed almost deliriously. "You need grieve no more, for you are about to wed again. And what happiness there must be in store for you! Come. How you tremble! Are you a coward in the presence of the dead?"

Cornelius took her hand, and they passed along the corridor. Mencia shook her nervous trembling off in her resentment at the conduct of Cornelius. Upon reaching the chapel, when Cornelius ascended to the organ-loft, she was even angry with herself for having been frightened by his strange manner.

After a little hesitation she entered the mortuary chapel, as the music of the organ burst over her head.

Even though her heart beat with some bliss at her coming happiness with him for whose love the memory of Lewis had paled, a sadness swept over her spirits. She approached the dark resting-place of her husband, who in his brief married life with her had been her sole earthly idol. But she knew that it was a sadness which would soon pass—a sadness brightened by smiles, of which we have all had, even in our bitterest moments, some experience.

Passing slowly on, she drew the curtains which surrounded her husband's coffin; the music from the organ surging and rolling around her—music which was neither chant of praise nor cry of lamentation, but a melody fantastic in its weirdness and terror. She drew the pall which covered the coffin, and bent over it.

What a cry she uttered!

It was not the face of Lewis she saw, but that of Carlos Vazquez.

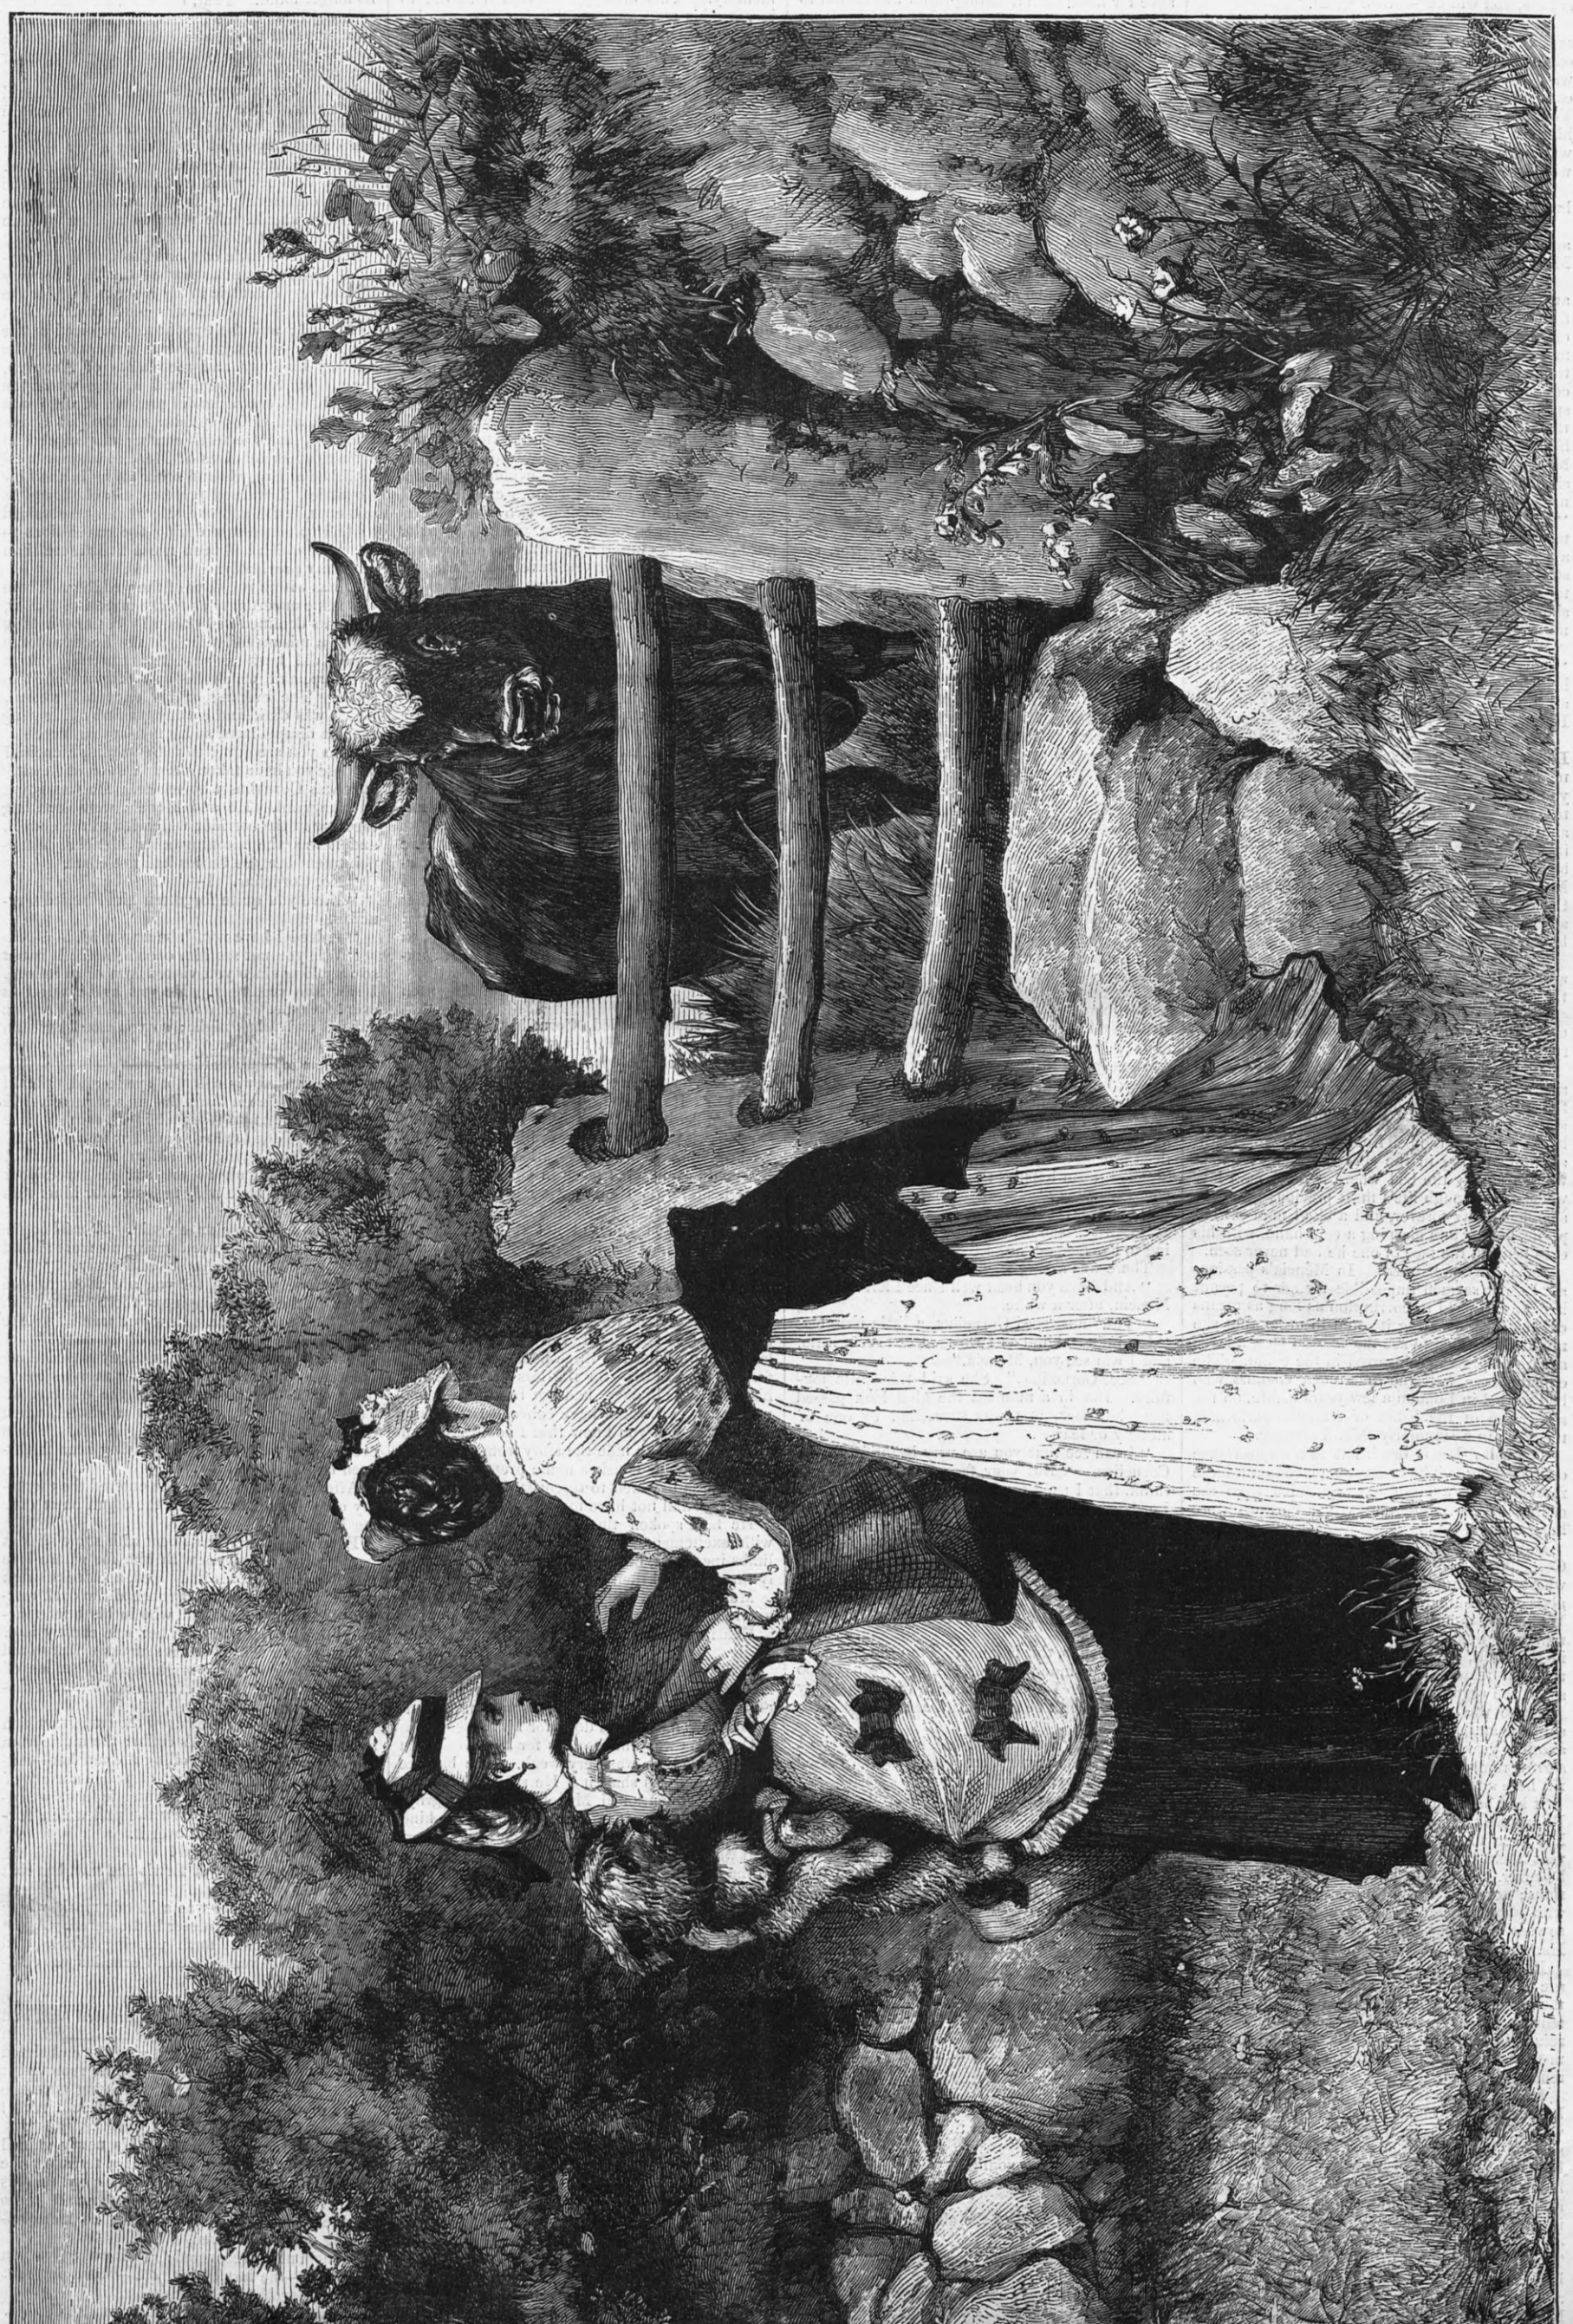
On his heart there was a bloody mark, where the dagger of his murderer had entered. Again and again she sent forth piercing shrieks, and then fell. The vengeance of Cornelius was complete and terrible.

He had met Carlos on the previous night, who was returning to the Priory, murdered him, and brought his body to the mortuary chapel. In his belief that Mencia would visit the embalmed body of her husband once again, he removed it and substituted that of Carlos, relying upon the effect of the ghastly sight which should reveal itself to Mencia.

In his crazed humor—for his newly gained gift of sight had been bought at a terrible price of lost mental power, which jealousy for his brother's memory by degrees aggravated into madness—he could have devised no more appalling method of revenge.

Mencia never recovered; and it was only when Cornelius—the last of his race—was dying that the whole truth was revealed.

Desolation reigned for many years at Cardyn.



A DILEMMA.—FROM THE PICTURE BY HEYWOOD HARDY.—[SEE PAGE 631.]

Breakfast Cap of Swiss Muslin, Lace, and Pink Ribbon.

THIS cap of plain white Swiss muslin is trimmed with lace insertion an inch and a half wide, lace an inch and a half and two inches wide, and loops and ends of pink gros grain ribbon two inches and a quarter wide. To make the cap cut of double stiff lace one piece each from Figs. 55 and 56, Supplement, cover the front of the rim on the outside with pink ribbon, and pleat it, bringing × on ●. On the back edge of the front of the rim sew the back of the rim according to the corresponding signs. Seven-eighths of an inch from the middle on Fig. 55 set two pink ribbons each twenty-four inches long, cross these ribbons and fasten them on the back of the rim so that the free ends hang down top, with narrow and wide lace, and pleat the top, bringing × on ●. Sew the upper veil on the back edge of the crown, and set the lower veil into a double binding of blue ribbon half an inch wide and eight inches long, the ends of which are sewed to ✳ on Fig. 59. On the front edge of the crown set a box-pleated Swiss muslin ruffle an inch wide, sloped off toward the ends to a width of half an inch, and trimmed with lace seven-eighths of an inch wide. Besides this trim the crown with two box-pleated standing ruffles each an inch and three-quarters wide and trimmed with lace. These ruffles are also sloped off from the middle toward the ends. Finally, trim the cap with loops and ends of blue gros grain ribbon.

BREAKFAST CAP OF SWISS MUSLIN, LACE, AND PINK RIBBON.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 55–58.

CRAPE HOOD.

BREAKFAST CAP OF SWISS MUSLIN, LACE, AND BLUE RIBBON.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 59–61.

Fig. 1.—PLAIN AND STRIPED BLUE POPLIN HOUSE DRESS.—FRONT.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 49–54.

sixteen inches long. Then cut of Swiss muslin on the bias one piece each from Figs. 57 and 58, Supplement, pleat the crown on the outer edge, and sew it on the rim as shown by the illustration. Trim the pleated part with insertion and narrow lace, as shown by the illustration and partly indicated on the pattern, pleat it, bringing × on ●, and sew it on the back edge of the cap. Pleat the wide lace, and sew it on the cap along the under edge of the rim. Besides this, the cap is trimmed with a standing Swiss muslin ruffle seven-eighths of an inch wide, edged with lace two inches wide, and arranged in pleats as shown by the illustration; the seam of this ruffle is covered by a wound gros grain ribbon. In the middle of the back and on the right side of the cap set a bow of similar ribbon.

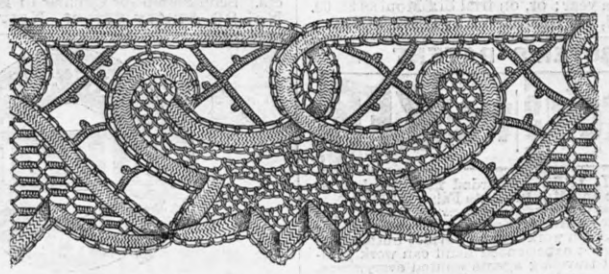
FAILLE, SWISS MUSLIN, AND LACE FICHU-COLLAR.

Crochet Mantelet with Hood for Girl from 6 to 8 Years old.

THIS mantelet is worked with blue zephyr worsted in a kind of Afghan stitch. The edge is trimmed with crochet scallops and worsted balls. To make the mantelet first cut the pattern of net, having joined on the piece turned down in Supplement on Fig. 27, cut one piece each from Figs. 27–29, and sew up the shoulder pleats in Fig. 27. From this pattern work, first, Fig. 27, beginning on the under edge with a foundation of the requisite length (244 stitches in the original), and on this crochet the 1st pattern row in the ordinary Afghan stitch. This stitch is worked in pattern rows, each of which counts two rounds—one round going forward, in which the stitches are taken up, and one round backward, in which the stitches are cast off. 2d pr. (pattern row): 1st round.—Inserting the needle in the back veins of the chain stitch row lying crosswise in the preceding pr. take up 1 loop each. 2d round.—The loops on the needle are cast off each separately in the usual manner. Work all the pr. like the second. In order to obtain the shape of the pattern, narrow on the front edge in the middle of the back and on the shoulder. The narrowing is always done in the 2d round of a pr., casting off together 2 or 3 stitches in one. Having reached the neck, border the front edges of this part with crochet scallops in the following manner: 1st round.—Always alternately 1 sc. (single crochet) on the next edge st. (stitch), 3 ch. (chain stitch), pass over 1 edge st. 2d round.—

Fig. 2.—PLAIN AND STRIPED BLUE POPLIN HOUSE DRESS.—BACK.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 49–54.



POINT LACE EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Breakfast Cap of Swiss Muslin, Lace, and Blue Ribbon.

THE trimming for this plain white Swiss muslin cap consists of lace seven-eighths of an inch and an inch and a half wide, and loops and ends of blue gros grain ribbon two inches wide. For the crown of the cap cut of double stiff lace one whole piece from Fig. 59, Supplement, surround it with wire, and bind it all along the outer edge with narrow blue ribbon. Cut the veils of Swiss muslin on the bias from Figs. 60 and 61, Supplement, each in one piece, trim the outer edge, excepting the

CROCHET MANTELET WITH HOOD FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.

For pattern see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 27–29.

DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 3 TO 4 YEARS OLD.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 9–12.

Hosted by Google

* 5 dc. (double crochet) on the middle of the next 3 ch. in the preceding round, 1 ch., 1 sc. on the middle of the next 3 ch., 1 ch., pass over 3 st., and repeat from *. On the under edge of the mantelet work 2 rounds like the 1st round on the front edge, but in the 2d round always work the sc. on the middle of the 3 ch. in the preceding round, thus passing over 3 st. Then set on fringe with worsted balls. For the hood, which is worked from the upper edge by the pattern cut from Fig. 28, make a foundation of 46 st.; for the revers, Fig. 29, beginning from the upper edge also, make a foundation of 60 st. In both parts widen in the middle and narrow on the outer edges. In widening take up the extra st. in the 1st round of a pr. always from a back, horizontal vein of the chain stitch row. Having worked both parts, join them according to the corresponding figures, and then border the hood on the under edge, and the revers on the upper edge, with two rounds like those on the front edge of the mantelet. Join the hood with the mantelet according to the corresponding figures, and cover the joining seam with a binding of blue satin ribbon; the ends of the ribbon should project six inches long from the front edge. In the middle of the back, pleat the mantelet as indicated on Fig. 27, bringing × on ●, and then set a belt of blue linen two inches wide, upon the wrong side, which is closed in front, underneath the mantelet, by means of hooks and eyes. On the point of the hood set a tassel of worsted balls, lay the revers in a pleat as indicated on Fig. 29, bringing × on ●, and ornament it there with a bow of blue satin ribbon. Covered buttons and button-loops serve for closing.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ZETA.—Read answer given in Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI., to "Amelia G." Add a ruff, cuffs, belt, and pocket of gros grain to your Irish poplin, and it will not need further alteration. Large paniers and bustles are entirely out of fashion.

TWENTY-FIVE.—You will find the information you need about wraps in the New York Fashions of Bazar No. 38, Vol. VI. The soft thick cloth English jacket will suit you. Make your alpaca with a double-breasted jockey basque by pattern in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI., and trim with folds, side pleatings, and oxidized buttons.

ANNIE S.—Make your bombazine by the Double-breasted Jockey Basque pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI. Trim with folds and pleated flounces of the same according to the illustration. Over-skirts and polonaise skirts are never lined by first-class dressmakers. Both apron and open front over-skirts are worn. Puffs are not appropriate trimmings for mourning.

OLD SUBSCRIBER IN MAINE.—Shorten your brown silk, put two flounces of lighter brown headed by a bias band of the dark shade, and wear with a brown polonaise of cashmere, cloth, or camel's-hair.

L. F. G.—"Granite cloth" means gray granite-colored cloth. The fringe is gray. The figures are of dark green and granite cloth, as stated in description. Soutache is the narrow braid ordinarily used for braiding.

TWO OLD SUBSCRIBERS.—Do not have your empress cloth dyed, but wear it green, as that will be a fashionable color, and get darker green for a redingote. Get gray poplin of a darker shade for over-skirt and for basque, with light sleeves. There is nothing that exactly takes the place of black alpaca for a serviceable suit. Make it by the Double-breasted Jockey Basque pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI. Read about redingotes in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 38, Vol. VI.

LITTLE WOMEN.—The wraps for little girls are polonaises and jaunty sacques made like those described for ladies in Bazar No. 38, Vol. VI. Dark sombre colors are used for children instead of the bright ones of two years ago.

MRS. J. M. C.—You should buy Bazar No. 35, Vol. IV., in which the garments of the infant's wardrobe are illustrated, and the materials, with quantity, described. Order it from this office by sending ten cents and your address.

J. E. L.—It is impossible to prevent gray linen from washing lighter. Wear the garment a season without washing. This is easily done by cleansing grease spots with soap and brush, and moistening the whole garment with starch-water, and ironing it at once.

M. L. K.—We have not the water-proof cloak pattern you describe.

SUBSCRIBER.—The simplest binding or facing of piqué, or else open-worked English embroidery for edging the garment, is what you need for trimming a girl's piqué redingote.

MRS. W. D. W.—You do not make your question plain. The double-breasted jockey basque is suitable for both house and street dresses.

A CONSTANT READER.—The dark silks so fashionable all the year in the North will not be too dark for style to wear in New Orleans in the winter. Have your grenadine all black. Sponge your green silk with benzine. Get a camel's-hair mantilla. For your black silk, other dresses, and wraps, consult New York Fashions of Bazar Nos. 38 and 39, Vol. VI. We can not devote an article to New Orleans dresses.

A LADY'S FRIEND.—Read back numbers of the articles to "Ugly Girls" published in the Bazar.

MRS. J. T. V.—Trim the basque and over-skirt of pattern sent for your alpaca with the simplest piping. Put lengthwise folds on the skirt.

GENEVA.—The customary bridal traveling dress of dark silk with cashmere redingote will be most suitable for your quiet morning wedding. But if you must wear a light silk at 11 A.M., get pearl-color, and make by descriptions given for black and dark silks in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI. Put lengthwise pleated puffs down the front breadths, ruffles up the back, no over-skirt, and a basque. This basque should be merely corded on the edge of the front, and you will then have enough lace to trim the back of the basque, the sleeves, and to make a lace ruff inside a standing silk ruff and silk revers collar.—The usual "party table" of fruits, cake, ices, and other confectionery will be appropriate.

S. D. I.—Indigo blue, which is nearer black than navy blue, will be the fashionable color this winter. Make a redingote or a demi-polonaise with a simply trimmed skirt, like those described in Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI. The hair is worn lower than last winter. Shorten your green silk, and have a jockey basque and over-skirt by cut paper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI.

MRS. E. A.—Trim your black cashmere with a bias band of repped silk, silk facings, cuffs, and buttons.

L. H.—Hints about your black silk will be found in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI. We do not reply by mail.

MRS. F. L. C.—Read answer just given "L. H." Put wide crape folds down the front breadths of your silk, with kilting of silk and crape behind. The ruff and coat collar on the basque must be of English crape also, unless your mourning is light enough to dispense with crape altogether, and trim your dress with silk folds and the new fringes that are made entirely of fine cut jet beads. A long redingote and plain skirt of English blue water-proof will be the best winter traveling suit. Put rows of deeper blue or black yak braid for trimming. The young girl's redingote can be shaped precisely like that worn by ladies.

MARIE.—Get good silk of a darker wine-color, and make lengthwise puffs and ruffles for the skirt. Remove all the satin and fringe. A very dark cashmere polonaise would also be pretty over the silk skirt.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DEAFNESS AND CATARRH.—A Lady, who had suffered for years from Deafness and Catarrh, was cured by a simple Indian Remedy. Her sympathy and gratitude prompt her to send the recipe, free of charge, to any one similarly afflicted. Address MRS. M. CLARA LEGGETT, Jersey City, N. J.

HAIR!!!

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, corner Fourth Street,
Branch Store, 345 Sixth Avenue,

Begs leave to call the attention of the ladies to his superb stock of Human Hair Goods, of the best quality of hair only, without any intermixing whatsoever, of his own importation and manufacture.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

RETAILED AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

I can offer to the public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors.
All goods WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.

Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE Removed to 345 6th AVENUE,
Bet. 20th and 21st Streets.

Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

Science of Health, FIRST-CLASS MAGAZINE at $2 00 a year; or, on trial Six Months $1 00. S. R. WELLS, 389 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

WEBSTER'S PATENT
BUTTON HOLE WORKER

Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.
Is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented. So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent by mail to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

Skin Diseases a Specialty.

DR. J. M. VANDYKE, Graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, is the only regular physician that makes the treatment of Skin Diseases a specialty. Those who wish to consult him, either in person or by letter, will find him to be first-class in his specialty.

Skin Diseases and their Symptoms.

ACNE, (PIMPLES, BLACKHEADS).—Symptoms—Hard, small pimples with black points; affect the forehead, cheeks, and nose of both sexes.

ECZEMA, (TETTER).—Symptoms—Blisters form, which burst and dry into a yellowish or dark crust, may be in the form of scales; affects all parts of the body.

WOMEN'S RED RASH OF THE FACE.—Symptoms—Congestion of the skin of the face, with red patches and red spots, pimples, and roughness of the skin.

BARBER'S ITCH.—Symptoms—First, a red, itchy patch is seen, mattery pustules form, become quite hard, and shaving becomes painful. A burning sensation is present.

PRURIGO, (INTENSE ITCHING), Which begins when the clothing is removed; increased by the warmth of the bed. No eruption except that produced by scratching.

The above and all Skin Diseases cured by Dr. J. M. VanDyke. New York Office, No. 6 West 16th Street; Philadelphia Office, 1126 Walnut Street. The Doctor can be consulted either by letter or in person at either office.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

LAFONTAIN'S FRENCH COMPLEXION BEAUTIFIER removes TAN AND FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, AND FLESHWORMS. Price $1 00 per Bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 SIXTH AVENUE. Agents wanted.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS, in any quantities. Send for Circular.
MME. L. CENDRIER, 636 Broadway, N. Y.

VIENNA
PREMIUMS.

THE WILSON SHUTTLE
SEWING-MACHINES
Received the Grand
PRIZE MEDAL
AND MEDAL OF HONOR
FOR THE
BEST SEWING-MACHINE,
THE BEST MADE SEWING-MACHINES,
AND THREE
Co-Operative Medals
FOR
The Best Made Set of Harness,
The Best Made Side Saddle,
The Best Boot and Shoe Work,
And the Best Samples of Cloth Sewing.

No other Sewing-Machines received Premiums on their merits, which we will prove by evidence at our office, and that all reports relating to the contrary are false.

Machines Sold on Easy Monthly Payments.
SALESROOM:
707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
And all other Cities in the United States.

DO YOU WISH TO BE BEAUTIFUL?
BARRY'S
Pearl Cream
Removes every blemish from the skin, and gives a pure and
BEAUTIFUL COMPLEXION.
Sold by all druggists, and at the depot, 26 Liberty St., New York.
Only 50 Cents per Bottle.

For $5 and $2.

The Patent Brass Hair-Curler, heated on any Gas-Burner, and Furnace for heating Crimping-Iron. On exhibition at the Fair of the American Institute, New York City, and recommended by first-class hair-dressers. Send Stamp for Circular to F. IMHORST, No. 20 Amity Street, New York.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.
Trade Mark. Patented.
Sold by all Druggists.

Seeds for Fall Sowing.
Bulbs for Fall Planting.
Plants for Winter Flowering.

Embracing every thing NEW and RARE in great variety, and at LOW RATES. Price-Lists mailed free to all applicants.

Peter Henderson & Co.
Seedsmen, 35 Cortlandt St., New York.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN Dress Shields will absorb moisture and protect the Dress thoroughly. The Perforated Premium Buckskin Undergarments are recommended by all Physicians. Send for circulars. D. C. HALL & Co., 44 West Broadway, N.Y., Sole Agents and Manufacturers.

THREE PAIR Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1 00. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, Dress-Trimmings, &c. Price-List sent free on application.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

The New Florence

Is the only Sewing-Machine that feeds the work backward and forward, or to the right and left, as the purchaser may prefer. It has been greatly IMPROVED & SIMPLIFIED, and is far better than any other machine now in the market. ☞ FLORENCE SEWING-MACHINE COMPANY, Florence, Mass.

Drunkenness and Opium Habit.

DR. BEERS, 345 Fourth Ave., New York, guarantees a cure for these evils. Call, or send stamp for evidence.

DR. NOBLE'S GREAT DISCOVERY.—A certain cure for fever and ague, bilious fever, and chill fever. A tonic. Price $1 per bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 Sixth Ave. Sold every where. Agents wanted.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

FALL IMPORTATIONS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.
Are now prepared to Exhibit their selections of FALL AND WINTER FABRICS, comprising MANY NOVELTIES PRODUCED THIS SEASON, in full lines of PLAIN AND FANCY DRESS GOODS,
BLACK, FANCY, AND PLAIN SILKS,
In Cloth and Evening Shades.
ALL WIDTHS
BLACK CLOAKING VELVETS.
BLACK AND COLORED
TRIMMING VELVETS,
Cut on the Bias, suitable for MILLINERS AND MANUFACTURERS.
HOSIERY AND UNDERWEAR
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION, FOR MISSES, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN.
BLANKETS, FLANNELS, QUILTS, &c.
Also, a Choice Selection of Novelties in EARLY FALL WRAPS,
HOUSE JACKETS, &c., &c.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

1873. FALL 1873.
ANNOUNCEMENT.
MILLER & GRANT,
879 Broadway, N. Y.,
ARE DAILY RECEIVING
NEW IMPORTATIONS OF RICH LACES,
EMBROIDERIES, RIBBONS,
DRESS TRIMMINGS, &c., &c.
ALSO, NOVELTIES IN FANCY GOODS.
☞ ELEGANT DESIGNS IN OXIDIZED SILVER.

Ehrich's
REAL LACES, EMBROIDERIES, BLACK SILKS, AND MOURNING GOODS, LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S UNDERWEAR, SHAWLS, FINE FURS, HATS, FEATHERS, RIBBONS, SUITS, &c., &c.
FIRST-CLASS GOODS at Popular Prices.
Samples sent free on application.
Goods shipped C.O.D., with full privilege of examination.
Send stamp for Fall Price-List.
EHRICH & CO.,
287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, New York.

Novelties in Laces.
SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

SUITS, SACQUES, Ladies' and Children's Undergarments, Corsets, Infants' Wardrobes. Agent for Love's Celebrated Hand-Made Corsets, also made to order. In charge of Mme. Jacobs. Miss M. E. COOK, 461 Sixth Avenue, cor. 28th St., N. Y.

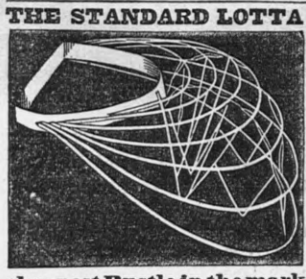
THE STANDARD LOTTA BUSTLE.



A diploma has been awarded by the American Institute to A. W. Thomas, Patentee & Manufacturer for the lightest, strongest, most durable, comfortable, elastic, and cheapest Bustle in the market. The wearer can sit in any position whatever without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree, it closing entirely up on sitting, and returning with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault). No ladies' wardrobe complete without the Standard Lotta Bustle. For sale every where. Ask for Nos. 10, 11, 15, 18, 22, &c., comprising the various sizes and styles. Patentee and Wholesale Manufacturer, 91 White St., N.Y.; & 801 Race St., Phila.

ASK YOUR STOREKEEPER FOR IT.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS.
AGENTS WANTED.
SEND FOR CATALOGUE.
Domestic Sewing-Machine Co., N. Y.

EVERYBODY LIKES a beautiful complexion, and a soft, smooth skin; both are obtained by using 'Wright's Alconated Glycerine Tablet of Solidified Glycerine, fragrant, transparent, and incomparable as a Toilet Soap. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR OCTOBER, 1873.

CONTENTS:

A LADY'S ENTERPRISE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Poultry House on Wheels, Transverse Section.—The Poultry House and Grounds at Belair.—The Egg-Room.—Crève-Cœur Cock.—Crève-Cœur Hen.—Houdan Cock.—Houdan Hen.—Flèche Cock.—Flèche Hen.—Bréda Hen and Cock.—Dorking Cock.—Dorking Hens.—Nankin Cock.—Nankin Hen.—The Epinette.

L'ENVOI AND SONG. By ALFRED H. LOUIS.

GENERAL SHERMAN IN EUROPE AND THE EAST.—(Third Paper.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Castle of Europe and Village within its Walls.—The City of Sebastopol as it now is.—Malakoff.—Circassian Arms.—Tiflis.—Grand Duke Michael.—Pass of Dariel.—Schamyl's Village, Guinib.—Cossacks.—Moscow.—Great Bell at Moscow.—Great Gun at Moscow.—Statue of Peter the Great, St. Petersburg.—Emperor Alexander II.—Gortschakoff.—Grand Duke and Grand Duchess.—Statue of Nicholas I., St. Petersburg.

THE LORDSHIP OF CORFU—A LEGEND OF 1516. By PAUL H. HAYNE.

THE HAMPTON NORMAL AND AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Hampton Institute; the new Building.—Teachers' Home and Girls' Quarters.—Walls of St. John's Church.—Chapel and Farm Manager's House.—Winter-Quarters in front of Institute.—Negro Cabin at Hampton.—Lion and John Solomon.—The Printing-Office.—Girls' Industrial Room.—Reading-Room.—The Assembly-Room.—Ball Club.

MEMNON.

"DAT TADDEUS."
ILLUSTRATION.—"Behold me! I am dat Taddeus!"

WHO WAS RIGHT?

OUR GIRLS.

THE WORLD AND I.

THE HOME OF PAUL AND VIRGINIA.'
ILLUSTRATIONS.—"The Souffleur."—The Yamseh.—Les Trois Mamelles.—Cascade of the River Savane.—Le Pont Naturel.

IN A TOBACCO FACTORY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Breaking.—Sorting.—Stemming.—Boiling Licorice and Dipping.—Sprinkling the Flavoring.—Twist-Room.—Examining Work.—Making Negro-Head.—Opening Finishing Pot.—The oldest and the youngest Hand.

LOTTERY. By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

DETECTIVE PINKERTON. By GENERAL R. B. MARCY, U.S.A.

HERO WORSHIP.

A SIMPLETON.—A STORY OF THE DAY. By CHARLES READE.

THE REPUBLICAN MOVEMENT IN EUROPE. By EMILIO CASTELAR.—(Tenth Paper.)

SEMPER FIDELIS. By ANNIE CHAMBERS KETCHUM.

A LOSS TO THE PROFESSION.

RECOLLECTIONS OF AN OLD STAGER.

THE JUDICIAL RECORD OF THE LATE CHIEF JUSTICE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.

EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.

EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

THE October Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, contains Twenty-one Contributions, besides the Editorial Departments, with over Sixty Illustrations. Colonel AUDENRIED'S splendidly illustrated description of General Sherman's European tour is concluded; the remarkable poultry establishment of the Baroness de Linas, at Belair, France, is described and illustrated; there is an illustrated paper on the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute for Freedmen; a description of a Tobacco Factory, profusely illustrated by W. L. SHEPARD; and a beautifully illustrated paper on Mauritius, prepared from Colonel Pike's "Sub-tropical Rambles," recently published.

The "Recollections of an Old Stager," and EMILIO CASTELAR'S "Republican Movement in Europe" are continued. General R. B. MARCY contributes some interesting anecdotes of Detective Pinkerton; and there is a very timely and interesting review of the Judicial Record of Chief-Justice Chase by JOHN S. BENSON.

CHARLES READE'S Novel "A Simpleton," is concluded in this Number, and is to be followed in November with a thrilling serial story, entitled "The Living Link," by the author of "The Dodge Club," characteristically illustrated by W. L. SHEPARD. In an early Number will be commenced "My Mother and I," A Love Story for Girls, by the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."

There are three interesting short Stories in this number—one of them illustrated—and five excellent Poems.

The five Editorial Departments are full of entertainment and instruction. The Editor's Historical Record—a department maintained from the earliest number of the Magazine, and the only monthly summary of events that is anywhere published—steadily improves in the scope and thoroughness of its treatment. GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS will resume the Easy Chair in the November Number, which will also contain the first of a series of papers by CHARLES NORDHOFF, descriptive of the Pacific Coast.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

ONE COPY OF EITHER FOR ONE YEAR, $4 00, POSTAGE PREPAID.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

FINE FURS.

A large assortment, at less than manufacturers' prices. Send for Price-List. Orders promptly attended to and sent C. O. D., with privilege of examination.

J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

$72 00 EACH WEEK. Agents wanted every where. Business strictly legitimate. Particulars free. Address J. WORTH & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments, or all the time, than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF. CASHMERE BOUQUET

A DELICATE SOAP FOR THE TOILET. CASHMERE BOUQUET

MADE BY COLGATE & COMPANY, NEW YORK.

KNABE Grand, Square, and Upright Pianos, NEW YORK BRANCH HOUSE, No. 112 5th AVE. WM. KNABE & CO., Baltimore and New York.

GRANDEST SCHEME EVER KNOWN.

4th Grand Gift Concert

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF KENTUCKY.

12,000 CASH GIFTS, $1,500,000.

$250,000 FOR $50.

The Fourth Grand Gift Concert, authorized by special act of the Legislature, for the benefit of the Public Library of Kentucky, will take place in Public Library Hall, at Louisville, Ky.,

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1873.

Only Sixty thousand tickets will be sold. The tickets are divided into ten coupons or parts.

At this Concert, which will be the grandest musical display ever witnessed in this country, the unprecedented sum of divided into 12,000 cash gifts, will be distributed by lot among the ticket-holders.

$1,500,000

LIST OF GIFTS.

ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		$250,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		100,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		50,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		25,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		17,500
10 CASH GIFTS	$10,000 each	100,000
30 CASH GIFTS	5,000 each	150,000
50 CASH GIFTS	1,000 each	50,000
80 CASH GIFTS	500 each	40,000
100 CASH GIFTS	400 each	40,000
150 CASH GIFTS	300 each	45,000
250 CASH GIFTS	200 each	50,000
325 CASH GIFTS	100 each	32,500
11,000 CASH GIFTS	50 each	550,000
TOTAL, 12,000 GIFTS, ALL CASH, amounting to		$1,500,000

The distribution will be positive, whether all the tickets are sold or not, and the 12,000 gifts all paid in proportion to the tickets sold.

PRICE OF TICKETS:

Whole tickets, $50; Halves, $25; Tenths, or each coupon, $5; Eleven Whole Tickets for $500; 22½ Tickets for $1,000; 113 Whole Tickets for $5,000; 227 Whole Tickets for $10,000. No discount on less than $500 worth of Tickets at a time.

Tickets now ready for sale, and all orders accompanied by the money promptly filled. Liberal terms given to those who buy to sell again.

THOS. E. BRAMLETTE,
Agent Public Library Ky., and Manager Gift Concert, Public Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

Or THOS. H. HAYS,
609 Broadway, New York.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. IV.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	No. 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)	" 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)	" 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old)	" 29
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)	" 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt)	" 35
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER	" 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 44
GENTLEMAN'S SHORT DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP	" 46
PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 48

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postillion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	" 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER	" 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)	" 6
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 20
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER	" 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)	" 25
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)	" 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old)	" 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)	" 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt	" 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT	" 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT	" 43
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)	" 50

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT	" 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)	" 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT	" 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 17
LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 23
GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 24
BLOUSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 28
LADIES' AND MISSES' BATHING OR GYMNASTIC SUIT	" 30
PLEATED WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 32
ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT	" 39

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, Cor. 4th St., N. Y. The largest stock of Human Hair goods in the city. Wigs made to order by the best artists. A perfect fit guaranteed. The invisible wig a specialty. No. 1, round the head; No. 2, from forehead to nape of neck; No. 3, from ear to ear across crown; No. 4, from ear to ear across forehead. Goods sent C.O.D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

Harper & Brothers' Latest Publications.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.
THE LAND OF MOAB. The Result of Travels and Discoveries on the East Side of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. By H. B. TRISTRAM, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Master of the Greatham Hospital, and Honorary Canon of Durham. With New Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. Cloth, $2 50.

II.
FLAMMARION'S ATMOSPHERE. The Atmosphere. Translated from the French of CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Edited by JAMES GLAISHER, F.R.S., Superintendent of the Magnetical and Meteorological Department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. With 10 Chromo-Lithographs, and 86 Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

III.
TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS. The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. (Uniform with Tyerman's "Life of John Wesley.")

IV.
THE BAZAR BOOK OF HEALTH. The Dwelling, the Nursery, the Bedroom, the Dining-Room, the Parlor, the Library, the Kitchen, the Sick-Room. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. (Uniform in style and price with the "Bazar Book of Decorum.")

V.
CASTELAR'S OLD ROME AND NEW ITALY. Old Rome and New Italy. By EMILIO CASTELAR. Translated by Mrs. ARTHUR ARNOLD. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

VI.
LIFE OF ALFRED COOKMAN. The Life of the Rev. Alfred Cookman. By H. B. RIDGAWAY, D.D. With Portrait on Steel. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

VII.
I GO A-FISHING. By W. C. PRIME, Author of "Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia," "Tent Life in the Holy Land," "Later Years," "The Old House by the River," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

VIII.
ANECDOTES OF PUBLIC MEN. By JOHN W. FORNEY. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

IX.
MISS BEECHER'S HOUSEKEEPER & HEALTHKEEPER: Containing Five Hundred Recipes for Economical and Healthful Cooking; also, many Directions for securing Health and Happiness. Approved by Physicians of all Schools. Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

X.
FARM BALLADS. By WILL CARLETON. Illustrated. Square 8vo, Cloth, Beveled and Illuminated, $2 00; Gilt Edges, $2 50.

THE NEW NOVELS

OF

THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

1.
MISS DOROTHY'S CHARGE. By FRANK LEE BENEDICT, Author of "My Daughter Elinor," "Miss Van Kortland," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50. (Nearly Ready.)

2.
STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "Birds of Prey," "Lovels of Arden," "To the Bitter End," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

3.
A SIMPLETON: A Story of the Day. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

4.
TOO SOON: A Study of a Girl's Heart. By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID, Author of "Patty," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

5.
INNOCENT. A Tale of Modern Life. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," "Chronicles of Carlingford," "John: a Love Story," "Brownlows," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

6.
WILKIE COLLINS'S NEW MAGDALEN. The New Magdalen. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "Armadale," "Moonstone," "Man and Wife," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.
"'HE COMETH NOT,' SHE SAID." By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "On Guard," "Walter Goring," "Theo Leigh," "Played Out," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

8.
THE HOUR AND THE MAN. An Historical Romance. By HARRIET MARTINEAU. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

GOODALL'S PLAYING CARDS.
The Best and Cheapest. Sold Every Where.

WANTED—BOOK AGENTS, to sell new and popular books. Books that are admirably adapted to the season, viz: Anecdotes of Public Men, by John W. Forney; Farm Ballads, by Will Carleton; I Go a-Fishing, by W. C. Prime; Miss Beecher's Housekeeper and Healthkeeper; The Fishing Tourist, by Charles Hallock. Liberal inducements offered. For further particulars, inquire of or address

AVERY BILL,
Care of Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

A PARISIAN dentist, who has a small villa in the outskirts, has raised upon a mound at the bottom of his little garden a summer-house built entirely of human teeth. From a distance it looks very nice, but close, certainly rather extraordinary. A short time since the dentist sent his servant into the country with orders to put the house in order and clean the summer-house. Five days having elapsed and the servant not returning, his master lost patience, and made his way to the villa. There he found his man diligently occupied in cleaning the summer-house—with a tooth-brush!

A VEST THAT SHOULD BE DOUBLED—The harvest.

A man having a bill against a distant merchant, sent a letter of inquiry to a banker of that locality. The reply was, "He is dead; but he pays now just as well as he ever did."

SAGE COMMENT.—Some one tells a story of a steamboat passenger watching the revolving light of a light-house on the coast, and exclaiming, "Jupiter! the wind blows that light out as fast as the man can strike it."

An epicure has written to the authorities to ask for a few new-laid eggs of the octopus, as he wishes to try their flavor.

"How I prize you, my dear!" said the jimmy to the safe door.

If you want to try a man's capacity, give him a cigar, then a strip of paper; light a match, and as soon as he has the cigar bit off and his paper in a blaze, ask him an important question that can't be answered under sixty seconds. The generality of mankind pull hard and then begin to reply, stop short and pull again, and recommence afresh. Then they send out a sentence enveloped in smoke, and about as clear as ground green glass; then they break off short and go for the weed again, and finally they try to convey their ideas in an eloquent glance; the paper burns down to their fingers, and their hand goes up like a pigeon out of a spring trap. The final expression of sentiment is not exactly suitable for a class at Sunday-school.

A WOMAN'S AILMENT—The stitch.

A sea-captain, invited to meet the committee of a society for the evangelization of Africa, when asked, "Do the subjects of the King of Dahomey keep Sunday?" replied, "Yes, and every thing else they can lay their hands on."

The death of John Stuart Mill brings up the anecdote of the Philadelphia publisher, who advertised certain new books as follows, "Mill on Political Economy; Ditto on the Floss."

A young lawyer lately concluded his argument in a case of damages for injury done by the defendant's pigs with the following burst: "If, gentlemen of the jury, the defendant's pigs are permitted to roam at large over the fair fields of my client with impunity, then—yes, then, indeed, have our institutions been made in vain."

The opposite counsel said, "You can score one for that."

China has abolished the kotow. We don't know what it is, but we are glad it is abolished, for we never liked it.

An orphan, under age, married his female guardian in Illinois the other day, and was compelled to get her written consent to his marriage before the wedding could take place.

The creditors of an absconding banker found, on opening his safe, that the only thing he had laid up for a rainy day was an umbrella.

THE MYSTERY SOLVED.

SENTIMENTAL YOUNG LADY. "What a delightful Letter James Henry does write! So full of poetical gems! What a Wonderful Memory he must have for Poetry!"

The above shows James Henry in the act of concocting one of these wonderful Effusions.

ROYALTY FROM A NEW POINT OF VIEW.—We have never, says a Western editor, associated much with royalty, partly because monarchs of the present day are not proper companions for a virtuous young man, and partly because none of them have come to this country animated by a craving anxiety for our society. But we have seen a great deal of kings in the theatres, and we have never been more thankful that we are a republican who can never by any possibility be placed upon a throne than when we have observed that every movement of a king is always heralded by a flourish of trumpets and a roll of drums. This would constitute an insuperable objection to our assumption of a crown. It would be very disagreeable if there were a man hired by the government to execute the chromatic scale upon a brass horn every time we went from the bath-room to the front parlor, or to plunge about wildly through variations on the trombone whenever we crossed our legs or took a drink of water. It would be equally horrible if, when we went to the head of the stairs to call to the hired girl to put breakfast on, an uproarious fiend in the yard should rattle out the long roll on a drum. So, upon the whole, it is perhaps better that things are as they are.

What is the champion conundrum?—Life, because every body has to give it up.

What relation is a loaf of bread to a locomotive?—Its mother. Why? Because bread is a necessity and a locomotive an invention, and we all know that necessity is the mother of invention.

A Bennington daughter, whose domestic nature is equal to her natural simplicity, was invited by an Advent exhorter to join his sect, get her white robe ready, and prepare to ascend. "I can't," the maiden replied; "father and mother are going up, and somebody must stay to see to the cattle."

Professor Agassiz is no believer in Darwin. Not long ago he was introduced to a lady whom he was quite sure of having met before. She told him he was mistaken. He laughingly replied, "Well, we have known each other, but I presume it was when we were both toads."

SEEDINESS IN SPRING.

Caught in a vernal shower,
I got beneath a tree;
For I am not a flower;
The rain improves not me:
Regilds the dandelion,
Revives the daisy's hues,
But not restores the dye on
My coat, or mends my shoes.

And thou, too fairest daughter
Of not a wealthy sire,
Alas, no good rain-water
Will do to thine attire,
For all the rose and lily
That in thy cheek combine!
And I were very silly
To wish that thou wert mine.

A SETTLER SETTLED.

"I have come," said a Scotch farmer to a neighbor laird who was just dying—"I have come to settle about that bit of land."

"Settle't!" cried the old wrangler; "how will you settle't? Your father couldna settle't, and your grandfather couldna settle't, and the 'fifteen' couldna settle't, and how will you settle't?"

"Oh," said the rival claimant, "I'll let you have it altogether."

"But I'll no tak' it," cried the stout old litigant, and turned his face resolutely to the wall.

PACIFIC EXHIBITION—A stand of arms.

THE BEST THING TO DO SHOULD THE DRUM OF YOUR EAR BE DESTROYED—Get a trumpet.

The price of speckled trout just now is twenty-five cents a speck. Purchasers who do not count the specks are liable to be cheated.

A lady hearing that a tunnel cost 5000 francs a yard, importuned her husband to buy her a dress of that material.

A citizen of Connecticut, recently introduced to a newly married man, congratulated him warmly, and said, "Ah, these Litchfield County girls make clever wives; I've had three of 'em."

There are experts on all manner of subjects in these days of litigation. A woman testified the other day in a turkey case, and declared that she knew "these turkeys by their walk, their countenance, and their manner of roosting."

A good-hearted but partially deaf old lady is much disturbed by the talk about the Kickapoo Indians. She doesn't see why any body should kick a poor Indian.

A parent writes that he is annoyed and pained by his young son staying out at night, and asks a remedy for this rapidly growing evil. There are several remedies. The most effectual is to compel him to wear patched clothing.

LADIES WHO LIGHT UP WELL AT NIGHT—Those who have lantern-jaws.

A young Irishman told a sweet Cork girl (flesh and blood, not made of stopper) that the following was phonography: "U R A B U T, L N."

The following elegant notice of the change of weather appears in a paper: "The sun is swinging up the circle again, and will soon cross into the overcoat line from the regions where lighter clothing and ham and eggs tell us the condition of the atmosphere."

A crowd of quarrelsome people were dispersed from the front of a residence in a very singular and sudden manner one night. A stranger visiting the family slipped into the crowd unperceived, and extending an inverted hat, announced that he was making a missionary collection. Two minutes later he stood there alone, with not a single member of the turbulent mass to be seen in any direction.

A CAREFUL SCOT.—A man who was discovered asleep among a lot of tombstones in a stone-cutter's yard said, on being awakened, that he had come in to buy a monument for himself, and having picked out one, made up his mind he would try it one night before purchasing.

"James Jenkins," said a school-master to his pupil, "what is an average?"

"A thing, Sir," answered the scholar, promptly, "that hens lay eggs upon."

"Why do you say that, you silly boy?" asked the pedagogue.

"Because, Sir," said the youth, "I heard a gentleman say the other day as a hen would lay, on an average, a hundred and twenty eggs a year."

A big nose may be justly called nobby.

A QUAKER PRINTER'S PROVERBS.—Never send thou an article for publication without giving the editor thy name, for thy name may perchance secure publication. Never do thou loaf about a printing-office, ask questions, or knock down type, or the boys will love thee like as they do shade trees—when thou leavest. Thou shouldst never read the copy on the printer's case, or the composer thereof may knock thee down. Never inquire thou of the editor for the news, for, behold, it is his business at the appointed time to give it thee without asking. It is not right that thou shouldst ask him who is the author of an article, for it is his duty to keep such things to himself. When thou dost enter his office, take heed unto thyself that thou dost not look at what may be lying open and concerneth thee not, for that is not meet in the sight of good-breeding. Neither examine thou the proof-sheet, for it is not ready to meet thine eye; that thou mayest understand.

MRS. MORIARTY, BECOMING INFATUATED WITH THE PRESENT STYLE OF SIDE ORNAMENTATION, SHOWS THE BENIGHTED DENIZENS OF MACKERELVILLE HOW THE THING IS DONE.

THE LINE MUST BE DRAWN SOMEWHERE!

MY LADY. "And why did you leave your last Situation?"

SENSITIVE BEING. "Well, my Lady, I 'adn't been in the 'Ouse 'ardly a Month when I hascertained as the Ladies of the Family 'ad never even been Presented at Court!"

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 41.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Ladies' and Children's Fall Suits, Figs. 1-6.

Fig. 1.—RÉSÉDA GROS GRAIN DRESS. The skirt of this dress is made of réséda gros grain, with velvet stripes of a darker shade woven in. The polonaise is of plain gros grain, trimmed with pinked ruffles of the material and with strips of velvet.

Fig. 2.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD. This dress of white batiste is embroidered with red cotton.

Fig. 3.—BLACK POULT DE SOIE DRESS. This pretty dress is trimmed with ruffles and kilt pleatings of the material, and with bows of black faille ribbon. Pleated Swiss muslin fraise and under-sleeves.

Fig. 4.—BROWN SERGE DRESS. This dress is trimmed with folds, rolls, bows, and buttons of gros grain of the same color, as shown by the illustration. Fraise and under-sleeves of pleated white Swiss muslin.

Fig. 5.—GRAY DIAGONAL CLOTH DRESS. This dress is trimmed with ruffles, folds, and rolls of the material. The ruffles are button-hole stitched in scallops with gray silk in a lighter shade. White Swiss muslin fraise and under-sleeves.

Fig. 6.—VIOLET POPLIN DRESS. The skirt is arranged in kilt pleats. The polonaise is draped in a pouf, and trimmed with ruffles of the material, and folds and bows of violet gros grain. Fraise and under-sleeves of pleated Swiss muslin.

ABORIGINAL MONEY.

AT a late meeting of the Academy of Sciences of San Francisco, Mr. R. E. C. Stearns presented a paper upon the money of uncivilized man, exhibiting specimens of this circulating medium and of the shells from which it was derived. He remarks that the durability and ease of manipulation of shells have long caused them to be employed in domestic intercourse and trade, and among these he first enumerated the common clam of the eastern coast of the United States, the purple portion of which constituted the black wampum, or one class of their money, while another was made from the axes of a species of Pyrula. In each shell about half an inch in diameter of the inside is of this purple color, and this was converted into beads, which they called Suckanhock, or black money, which was twice the value of their white money, or wampum proper, which was made of the Metauhock or Pyrula. This was used not only among the Indians, but among the whites; and it is remarked that the solid cash with which the salaries of ministers were formerly paid included black and white wampum.

The money of the west coast Indians is a species of tusk shell or Dentalium, resembling an elephant's hollow tusk, their worth depending upon the length of the shell. These are strung on cords and worked up in various forms of beaded and other ornaments, having a distinct value among the Indians, according to the size of the shell and their number, quite as fixed as

Fig. 1.—RÉSÉDA GROS GRAIN DRESS. Fig. 2.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD. Fig. 3.—BLACK POULT DE SOIE DRESS. Fig. 4.—BROWN SERGE DRESS. Fig. 5.—GRAY DIAGONAL CLOTH DRESS. Fig. 6.—VIOLET POPLIN DRESS.

FIGS. 1-6.—LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S FALL SUITS.

Hosted by Google

that of the specie or paper-money of the United States. The use of the money cowry in Africa is well known, many tons of the shells being annually imported to Great Britain, and again exported for barter with the native tribes.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

☞ A Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains more reading matter than an average octavo volume. The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for October 4 was sent out gratuitously an interesting

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing several illustrations, and further installments of "PHINEAS REDUX," by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, and "THE PARISIANS," by LORD LYTTON.

An EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for October 11.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich and varied assortment of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Ladies' Fall Street and House Dresses, Wrappers, Basques, Mantelets, etc.; Ladies' and Gentlemen's Lingerie; Edgings, Insertions, Borders, Vignettes, etc., etc.; with choice literary and artistic attractions.

THE SOLEMNITY OF MARRIAGE.

IN these days of divorces, separations, and general public disagreements between husband and wife, there is apprehension that the real dignity and solemnity of marriage may be frequently overlooked. It is too rapidly becoming a not uncommon belief that marriage is an arrangement simply for the happiness of the high contracting parties, and that as soon as perfect happiness ceases the contract is virtually at an end, and needs only the sanction of the law to set it aside, as that sanction authorized it in the beginning.

But this idea is a thoroughly miserable one, not only in the impiety of its disregard of sacred vows, but in the depravity of the selfishness of such disregard, not only in theory, but in practice. It loses sight of every relation of marriage but that between the husband and wife personally; forgets its interwoven affiliations with others, its influence upon society, its obligations to the community; is entirely oblivious of the fate of children, one side of whose life the divorce of parents inevitably removes, and is thus grossly material and mischievous in every point of view.

If marriage were an institution intended only to endure so long as perfect happiness under its bond endures, there would be no civil need of marriage at all, nor of any outward observance of union. But the oath of marriage is taken for better or worse, and the existence of children, whose affections belong to both parents, in whose veins the blood of both parents runs, marks the institution as a thing intended for perpetuity. The mere happiness of having one's own way is a but a crude and shallow thing, as reflection can not but teach; but there comes by-and-by, out of the fostering growth of a long discipline, a happiness born of self-denial, of patience, of duty well done, that as far exceeds any other as the perfect blossom exceeds the sleeping bud. The one happiness dies with the gratification that gave it birth; the other never knows death, for it has become a part of the soul perfecting itself through trial.

In fact, nobody but a simpleton would look for complete happiness in marriage until its great leaven has had time to work, and interunite lives, hopes, and aims. There is, indeed, the lovers' rapture in the early days, that dazzling atmosphere of bliss which surrounds the two, and shuts out the world beyond, as the bright and blinding sunshine shuts out the great universe of stars, which folds them in upon themselves in an ecstatic content that passes — passes presently and fortunately, since human life and work would find it as unhealthy for any length of time as any hardy plant would find the concentrated warmth and light of a greenhouse. And after that has passed comes the real task, the assimilation in the great alembic of marriage, with love for the solvent, of two natures that are of different birth, of different rearing and education, and frequently of different tastes. Too often the solvent gives out before the task is done; and all too often then the end comes, and the appeal to courts of law.

But it is really just here that marriage should assert its value. Has the expected happiness, after all, proved only a dream and an illusion? Has it been found impossible for you to have your every wish met, and the other party in the case to do the same? Has happiness fled indignantly before a compromise in which there shall be mutual yielding, or has it utterly expired in suffering? That, then, is the hour for principle, the hour for duty, the hour in which to remember that if marriage is not in every Church accounted a sacrament, yet, nevertheless, at every celebration of it God himself has been called to witness it, to sanctify it, and take part in it, and that thereafter only in sacrilege can it be lightly or irreverently treated.

We do not, certainly, pretend to deny that there are cases where crime and insanity demand a different view of the infrangibility of the marriage bond; but such cases are exceptional, perhaps enough so to prove the rule. The ordinary marriage is that of the ordinary man and woman, neither of whom is criminally insane, and who are capable of reasonable and honorable action, and who, if they choose to look around them, to look backward from the beginning, to look forward to the end, will find many a prudent and pleasant way of closing any chasm that may open between them.

In some regions of France, where, under the hereditary religion, divorce is impossible, but where, for all that, a couple may have found life together insupportable, and so desire to live apart, the couple give notice of their desire to the curé of the parish, who immediately thereon packs his knapsack and takes up his abode with that couple for a year, in order ostensibly to ascertain if their desire is just. Of course then it very naturally and instantly becomes the purpose of either party to prove to the priest that it is not the one to blame; and thus the angry word remains unspoken, the angry reply ungiven; snapping and snarling are unheard; there is no more bickering over shameless trifles; little attentions are rendered for the sake of appearances, and accepted for the same; the two are mutually mollified; they find there is some good in each other yet, and usually before the year expires the good curé takes his knapsack and departs, leaving a reconciled husband and wife behind him.

It would, of course, be out of the question to apply such a remedy any where but with rude peasants, for, indeed, there is no one among superior classes receiving quite the affection or having the authority of the village priest with his people; and the presence in such instances of mothers-in-law or the customary relatives always does more hurt than good. But it is every where possible to remember that a greater than any village priest, a nearer and dearer Friend, and One the fiat of whose authority is fate, is always present, and so to order one's ways that that omnipresent eye shall see no wrong in them. It is even possible to lay aside injured pride or wounded sensibility, and to forget one's self absolutely in a sweetness that shall win the dead love back to life.

But if you fail to win the dead love back, if you fail to renew the whole of its old delightful spell, can you find no pleasure in your children, in the care of their present, the anticipation of their future? Can you not simulate a happiness, or at least a calm, you do not feel, and keep a peaceful home about you for the sake of its influence upon their temperaments? And can you not feel a half-consoling satisfaction in the fact of your attempt, and the consciousness that you yourself are not poisoning your children's memories at the source, are not making home an impossible place for the one who has as much right there as yourself, are not laying violent hands on the domestic altar, are not injuring others by your example?

But if you succeed in winning back the dead love, or if, indeed, you never lost it, what a life is yours, and within what a charmed sphere do you move! You know the full blessing of companionship — of a companionship where utter confidence exists, where interests are identical, where fear is cast out, where every word and every thought meets its echo, where the smile is always ready, the loving lip, the following eye, where one climbs on the hand of the other, and the other urges forward with lofty cheer, and where husband and wife so closely grow together that even Death can not part them, but their spirits seem to be at one long after the sods separate the dead from the living body.

We once saw the end of such a marriage, so far as this world goes. The half-paralyzed husband, who had been the old wife's care for years, was in the room below, when she was prostrated with a swift and fatal fever. But she refused to let him be told. "He is dying too," she said, "and he will miss me so if he knows I die the first." The next day they lay side by side on one bed; and though we had looked on many memorable sights—on men and women in all the breathing beauty of youth, on marble sculptures, frost-white and perfect—we thought we had never seen any thing so beautiful as those two shrunken frames, between whose animating spirits the marriage was so perfect that one could not stay without the other—a marriage that could only have begun in this world, and was to go forward through heavenly eternities!

OCTOBER MARKETING.

BY PIERRE BLOT.

IN October there is even a greater variety of food of every kind than in September, as the following list will show:

FISH.

Black and striped bass, black and blue fish, butterfish, carp, cod, flounders, haddock, mackerel, Spanish mackerel, mullet, muskalonge, blue perch, pickerel, plaice, porgy, ray, scup, skate, smelt, sucker, sun-fish, lake trout, weak-fish, and frogs.

SHELL-FISH.

Hard and soft shell clams, hard and soft shell crabs, lobsters, mussels, oysters, periwinkles, prawns, scallops, green turtles.

MEAT.

Beef, mutton, lamb, pork, sucking pig, tame rabbits.

POULTRY.

Chickens, capons, spring chickens, Guinea-fowls, ducks, ducklings, goslings, turkeys.

GAME.

Bobolink, yellow-legs, blackbirds, robins, high-holes, orioles, thrush, woodpecker, brand-goose, wild-goose, curlew, ducks (canvas-back, red-head, mallard, black, wood, widgeon, broad-bill, teal, and pintail), grouse, hare, meadow-lark, partridge, pheasant, prairie-hen, pigeons and squabs, plover, opossum, rabbit, raccoon, rail, snipe, squirrel, buck venison, woodcock, woodchuck.

VEGETABLES.

Artichokes, Jerusalem artichokes, beets, broccoli, Brussels sprouts, cabbages (red, Savoy, and white), cardoons, carrots, cauliflowers, table and turnip-rooted celery, chiccory, cucumbers, corn, endive, kohlrabi, Lima beans, okra, musk and water melons, onions, potatoes, sweet potatoes, pumpkins, radishes (black, red, and yellow), salsify, squash, tomatoes, white and Russia turnips, water-cress.

FOR PICKLING.

Cucumbers, mangoes, small onions, peppers, string-beans, tomatoes, tarragon.

FRUITS.

Apples, barberries, cranberries, cocoa-nuts, chestnuts, black-walnuts, hickory-nuts, bananas, grapes, oranges, peaches, pears, plums, quince.

In our last article we said that brook trout could be caught on and after September 15; it should read until September 15.

Beef begins to be in its prime in October; so are mutton, poultry, and most game.

Our need of food increases as the weather becomes colder; and nature provides for this, as will be easily seen by the above lists. Rich soups and large joints will take the place of light dishes, vegetables, and fruits, though by no means excluding them entirely.

Palatable, nutritious, and healthy cooking is impossible without beef broth, as it is the foundation of soups, sauces, and gravies. As we have said before, beef broth is neither expensive nor difficult to make, and is easily kept for two or three days in winter-time.

Two kinds of fluid are used besides broth to make soups—milk and water; but, although good, they are light soups in comparison with those made with broth. Butter is added when water is used.

Bones alone make a gelatinous broth, but not as nutritious as when used with meat. A pound of meat and bones makes a pint and a half of good broth; two pounds make a quart of rich broth. The more meat used with a certain amount of water, the richer the broth. The pieces of beef generally used to make broth are the leg, the shin, the neck, the round, and the chuck; other pieces are just as good, but they are dearer, and do not make more or better broth. Besides beef, the trimmings of pieces of beef and veal, of chickens, turkeys, and Guinea-birds, are excellent to make broth; also the bones and what has been left of the same pieces after having been served as roasted pieces, and after having cracked the bones with a chopper. Any kind of meat or bones used to make broth must be fresh; the piece of meat or bird, the bones of which are used for broth, must have been roasted when very fresh. The least taint spoils the broth. Many epicures use every kind of game, biped or quadruped, with beef to make broth, either raw or the bones of such after having been served as roast pieces, especially such game as partridges and like birds, rabbits, hares, etc.; such broth has a gamy taste. Some go further; when they have made rich beef broth, they boil game in it to make it richer, and then make consommé with it. It is then real essence of meat, and very rich food.

The best utensil for making broth is an earthen pot; next is a copper or iron digester or kettle, well lined with tin. An iron pan lined with porcelain is excellent if the porcelain is not cracked. Any kind of fire is good as long as it is not too sharp, and will keep the pot simmering; it does not matter whether it is on a stove or range, in a grate or furnace, or whether it is a hard coal, charcoal, or wood fire. It is not necessary to be a thorough cook to make excellent broth, for care and watchfulness are the only two qualities required.

Process: Put two pounds of beef in a pot or kettle with two quarts and a half of cold water, a small table-spoonful of salt, and set it on a good fire; after about thirty or forty minutes the scum will begin to collect on the surface; take a skimmer and skim it off as soon as there is enough of it; when it begins to boil add about a wine-glassful of cold water to stop the boiling, and allow all the scum to come on the surface in order to remove it. When no more of it comes up add a small turnip, or part of one, a medium-sized carrot, two cloves, an onion, a stalk of celery, a leek, and a clove of garlic; simmer constantly for about six hours, then add a table-spoonful of burned sugar, and the broth is made. The meat is either served with the carrot, turnip, and leek, or prepared as directed for cold beef in a preceding number. Strain the broth, and it is ready for use. It does not keep long in summer without turning sour; it is then necessary to cool it quickly by exposing it to a draught, and to keep it in a dark and cool closet, or on ice. It keeps longer by giving it one boil every twelve hours.

Burned Sugar, or Caramel.—The utensil used to make caramel or burned sugar can not be used for any thing else afterward. An old tin pan or old ladle answers the purpose. White is better than brown sugar or molasses, having a finer flavor. The process is to put about two ounces of sugar in the ladle or pan, and set it over a rather sharp fire; stir with a piece of wood, or a wooden skewer used by butchers, till it is black, and begins to send forth a burning smell, when add a gill or so of cold water; stir and boil gently for four or five minutes; take off the fire, strain, let it cool, and it is made. When cold it is put in a bottle, corked, and used whenever wanted. It keeps well, and may be used warm as well as cold.

Consommé.—This means very rich broth made richer and clarified. It is to the old what milk is to the infant—the best food that can be given.

Process: When broth is made and strained it is put back in the pot or digester with a few onions or carrots in slices, lean beef chopped and mixed with raw eggs, and then beaten into the broth, which is set on the fire and boiled for about half an hour, or until perfectly clear. The more chopped meat is used, the richer the consommé. It is as nutritious as beef, healthful, and very easy of digestion. Whoever named it the staff of old age named it rightly; it is certainly the best way for old persons, deprived of masticating powers and of strong digestive organs, to eat, digest, and assimilate beef and other meats.

Chicken Broth.—This is generally made for invalids, for whom beef broth is too rich; although chicken broth can be made rich also by putting several old chickens in the kettle with a comparatively small amount of water.

Process: To make an ordinary chicken broth, neither rich nor weak, put in the soup kettle an old chicken, the bones of which you crack in several places, or half of a chicken, with about a quart of water to a pound of meat; add a little salt, and set on a good fire. When commencing to boil push the kettle back, add a gill of cold water, and skim off the scum that gathers on the surface. When no more scum comes up, add a carrot, a stick of celery, and two leeks; simmer for two hours, strain, and use. If wanted weak, put more water and less chicken, and vice versa if wanted rich.

Veal Broth.—Like chicken broth, it is generally made for invalids; the process is exactly like the above, using a pound of the breast or neck piece of veal instead of a pound of chicken.

Mutton Broth.—Proceed and season exactly as directed for beef broth, using the same weight of mutton as of beef.

Leek Soup.—Take half a dozen leeks, clean and wash them well, cut them in thin slices, and put them in a pan with a little butter; fry until they begin to color, when add three pints of broth or water, and simmer for an hour. While it is simmering, cut two or three slices of bread in dice, and put it in the soup tureen; salt to taste, and turn the leeks and broth over the bread; cover the tureen for two or three minutes, and serve. Leek is the most demulcent of edible vegetables.

Hosted by Google

Leek Soup for Invalids.—Clean and wash a dozen of good-sized leeks, and cut them in thin slices; put them in a pan with two ounces of butter, and fry them till about half done; add about two quarts of broth, and simmer until about half reduced; add salt to taste, and serve as it is. This leek soup is excellent for invalids and consumptives.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

COIFFURES.

BEFORE describing the bonnets displayed by private milliners it is necessary to say that there is a change in the way of arranging the hair. Parisian ladies retain the high puffs and braids on top of the head, with the back hair unrelieved by plaits or tresses, but this style is unbecoming to the slender faces of American women, hence the desire here to return to lower coiffures. The new caprice for day wear is to have a single narrow châtelaine braid down the back of the head, with two or three soft puffs on top and a crown braid in front. The back hair is still combed up from the nape of the neck, but its bare look is taken away by the châtelaine braid. Thick ropes made of two tresses of hair twisted together are even newer than plaits for the crown and châtelaine. The part above the forehead is shown, and the front hair, in long rippling waves, natural and careless-looking, is laid smoothly and low on the temples, instead of being drawn backward and covered up with frizzes and fringe. Smooth hair is once more in fashion, though ladies destroy the beauty of the new arrangement by pasting the waves flatly with pomade or bandoline. Side locks in front of the ear are worn turned toward the face instead of backward.

BONNETS.

Three styles of bonnets are offered by exclusive milliners. That which will be most prevalent is an improved Rabagas, with broad, half-high crown, and an upturned coronet brim leaning outward from the crown, and sometimes slightly pointed and indented on the left side; the back recedes and fits beautifully over the new coiffures. Second is a dressy Marie Antoinette shape, with the sides curved outward as the brims of Leghorn hats were worn in the summer, and an elaborate face trimming under this brim. Third is the Directoire shape, a simple yet distingué bonnet without a coronet, but with a projecting front that shelters the abundant face trimming now in vogue.

Colored velvet bonnets are chosen to match the suit with which they are worn, or else to brighten black costumes. Perhaps the choicest among these are the dark blue-grays, called granite and slate color. Sage and plum color have had their day, and are to be superseded by ultramarine blue and myrtle green. Corbeau and Havana—dark ashes-of-roses with pink tinges—are choice selections; olives and bronze are still in favor. The velvet is placed smoothly on the frame, showing its graceful outlines. The trimming is soft gros d'Orient (twilled silk) of a lighter shade mingled with velvet like the bonnet, laid in easy, careless folds around the crown almost to its top; erect loops with a cut steel dagger thrust through them are placed slightly to the left of the front—the right side has only the folds for trimming—and a short broad end, or else nothing in the way of streamers, is behind; two demi-long plumes spring out of the erect loops and curl over the crown to the back; the coronet brim is covered with velvet, corded or piped on the edge with the trimming silk, and there is a soft velvet puff, or else two silk puffs, placed as face trimming under the brim; a flower cluster, usually three half-blown roses, is placed low on the left of the back, or a smaller cluster nestles on the indentation of the brim. Strings of gros grain ribbon are added or omitted as the wearer pleases. This general description serves for the greater number of bonnets, and is more useful to the reader than detailed descriptions of separate bonnets. On many bonnets flowers are omitted altogether, and feathers are used in abundance. Steel must be very carefully used, or else it is vulgar—besides, it is very expensive. Judicious milliners prohibit it except in the slender long dagger of finely cut diamond-steel, and a single light row of beading around dark velvet coronets. Lace is very little used.

Black bonnets will continue as popular as ever. For the demi-season they are made of dotted Brussels net laid plainly on the frame; this net is only visible on the top of the crown, as its sides are nearly covered with loosely folded gros d'Orient and velvet of any of the dark stylish colors, while the brim is of black velvet. Two plumes and a face trimming of silk puffs, a roll, or else an ostrich feather band, complete this stylish bonnet. Later in the season black felt bonnets will be offered, and when trimmed entirely with black these are so handsome that they rival velvet. Black velvet bonnets are enlivened by strings of double-faced ribbon, blue or rose on one side and black on the other, with a box-pleated ruffle of this ribbon under the coronet, and black plumes tipped with a color. Most distinguished-looking bonnets are all black, mingled silk and velvet, with black plumes, a steel dagger, or else a jet ornament, and dark groseille roses.

ROUND HATS.

The presence or absence of strings no longer serves to distinguish bonnets from round hats, since many bonnets dispense with strings. The only distinguishing feature is now the face trimming, which bonnets have and hats have not. The French fancy at present in round hats is for the Incroyable, turned up behind with projecting brim in front, and sides curved to show a dressy coiffure. A flaring brimmed Rabagas hat, and the English walking hat with both sides turned up, are most in favor here for fall wear, but novelties are anticipated for the winter. Fine black chip and velvet will be chosen for winter. Very stylish hats for the intermediate season are white chip Rabagas with myrtle green velvet on brim and around crown, and a cluster of long green cock's plumes nodding over the crown. The Rubens hat, with one side turned up, has become too common for exclusive tastes. The red rose of Spain in dark scarlet or the bright groseille crimson still droops from the back of hats; it is also seen half-blown, three in a row, or else in a triangular cluster. While two half-long plumes are preferred for bonnets, a single long ostrich feather curls over the hat crown, beginning slightly on the left of the front. Black and the new shaded ostrich plumes are used for these, but there is also a stylish preference for the natural ostrich feather of shaded gray, which is more durable than any colored plume, and, moreover, costs only half as much. There is a hybrid affair, neither hat nor bonnet, resembling the Normandy cap, and called after it; also the Shah turban, with broadly turned up brim and an aigrette in front.

THE NEW SPANISH VEIL.

The new Spanish veil has a drawing string of ribbon to confine it under the chin in a becoming way, that will also be comfortable in cold, windy days. It is made of Brussels thread net, with tiny thick embroidered dots, and a lace edge of Chantilly two inches wide. It is a kind of scarf over a yard long, sloped to points at each end, but quite wide in the middle. The upper part of the middle covers the top of the hat; it falls thence over the face under the chin, where the ribbon is put in the hem, and, after drawing it up, is tied behind over the pointed ends, which hang like tabs. Price $25.

DRESS AND CLOAK TRIMMINGS.

The new camel's-hair and yak braids for trimming cloth and woolen fabrics are most inexpensive of the fashionable trimmings. In narrow soutache widths, representing double rows of fine braid, they cost $2, or else $2 25 for a dozen pieces, each containing six yards. Star braid is $2 for a piece containing twenty-four yards. Inch-wide braids are 35 or 45 cents a yard. There are stylish and durable trimmings for English walking jackets, polonaises, water-proofs, and children's clothes. Yak laces cost from 75 cents to $1 25 for the trimming widths, which are from two to three inches; beaded yak laces with fine cut jet are newer, and worth from $2 50 to $4. Worsted fringes are shown in the dark hues, now called "camel's-hair shades," for trimming diagonals and camel's-hair cloth. They are in rows of balls, or in mulberry drops, and cost $1 60 a yard, or thereabouts.

Silk trimmings for failles, velvet, and cashmere have many finely cut jet beads intermingled, and also some blue steel beads. The ribbon galloons seen on French garments as heading for lace or fringe are now found in the trimming stores. Inch-wide galloon made entirely of jet costs from 90 cents to $1 40 a yard; other patterns partly jet, with the silk showing, cost from $1 to $2. Another novelty is the fouragere cords, thick as a lady's finger, to be draped as swinging cords in front to fasten sacques, and as ornaments from the shoulders behind, or as an edge to finish jackets. These are shown in passementerie with large jets, while other cords are all jet, or all steel beads, or perhaps jet and steel mixed. Price from $1 to $3 a yard. Handsome passementeries have something like camel's-hair braid wrought in leaf designs. Passementerie ornaments for velvet cloaks have heavy swinging tassels rich with jet, and are very expensive. Beautifully crocheted ornaments without tassels are to be placed upright in the back of velvet polonaises; they cost without beads from $2 50 upward; crocheted fastenings for the front, to which fouragere cords are to be attached, cost from $3 to $6 a pair.

Fringes are exceedingly handsome this season. It is said they will rival lace, and they cost almost as much. Two and a half inches is the stylish width for trimming black silk dresses and wraps. Those made entirely of small cut jet beads are $4 or $5 a yard. With latticed cord heading thickly strewn with jet and a jet ball hanging, they cost from $2 25 to $4 75 a yard. An elegant fringe, with passementerie heading and tassels of jet and floss, is $6. Crimped tape fringe in clusters, with jet balls and tassels, is $4 50. The new curled tape fringe, like a twisted shaving, is $4; but with curled tape tassels over a regular sewing-silk fringe it is only $2 25.

Diamond-steel buttons, cut in beautiful designs, cost $2 50 a dozen for the quarter-of-a-dollar size, which is most used; others of more elaborate cutting cost from $7 up to $21 a dozen. The new dark blue steel buttons for trimming dresses and wraps of granite and slate colors, blue and black, cost $2 75 a dozen. The plain smoked pearl buttons, now so stylish, are only 75 cents a dozen in shades appropriate for olives, bronze, etc. White pearl buttons, with inlaid centres of smoked pearl as beautifully shaded as opals, are $4. Flat thick buttons are preferred to all but the handsome Japanese buttons, which bulge outward in the centre. These are black, with gilt figures, and are seen on imported silk dresses. Price from $10 50 to $12 a dozen.

ELEGANT NOVELTIES.

Among the elegant materials found at French wholesale importing houses are velvet-striped Siciliennes, made up of alternate inch-wide stripes of velvet and the soft repped Sicilienne, in dark camel's-hair shades. This is for parts of costumes, which are completed by plain velvet of the same shade imported to match the stripes. Polonaise patterns of richest black faille are shown wrought elaborately with soutache and fine jet. Black velvet mantillas not yet made up are ornamented with exquisite raised embroidery, sprinkled with large and small jets. Among smaller articles are bows of black velvet mixed with light-colored China crape in folds tastefully arranged. These are for the throat, with smaller ones for the hair.

IMPORTED SUITS.

Polonaises with basque backs are revived on imported suits. A novelty is the double polonaise having a vest of lighter shade so long that it forms the front of the garment, while the darker material of which the garment is made is sloped away backward to meet a basque. This is prettily shown in a blue-gray "diagonal" suit, trimmed with blue steel buttons. The basque back is without postilion pleats, and is shorter in the middle than on the hips; the back of the polonaise skirt forms a Watteau fold. Pleated puffs and flounces trim the lower skirt. Other polonaises, cut with darts and but one back seam, are lapped diagonally, and have a single revers instead of the double-breasted revers collar. The back of the skirt is open to the belt behind, and trimmed with a bias band. A tiny bow defines the waist behind, and a small turned-over collar finishes the neck. The front breadth of the skirt, as far as visible, is covered with lapping folds; puffs and flounces trim the foot of the skirt; Japanese buttons. Suits with basque and over-skirt have the over-skirt draped much shorter on the left side, and each side is trimmed differently. The lower skirt then has diagonal trimming on the front breadths.

For information received thanks are due Miss PAGE; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; THOMSON, LANGDON, & Co.; A. SELIG; and CH. BERTEAUX & RADOU.

PERSONAL.

IN the charming Memoir and Letters of Sara Coleridge is a letter to her friend Mrs. GILLMAN, in which, after announcing the death of her husband, she says: "It was at Highgate, at your house, that I first saw my beloved HENRY. Since then, now twenty years ago, no two beings could be more intimately united in heart and thoughts than we have been, or could have been more intermingled with each other in daily and hourly life. He concerned himself in all my feminine domestic occupations, and admitted me into close intercourse with him in all his higher spiritual and intellectual life. It has pleased God to dissolve this close tie, to cut it gradually and painfully asunder, and yet, till the last fatal stroke, to draw it even closer in some respects than before."

—JOAQUIN MILLER diffuses his personal presence over the fashionables of London by appearing on horseback with Mexican saddle, and wearing a white sombrero with cords and tassels of the gayest fashion. A circus man has offered him several pounds a week to appear on his fiery steed in the sawdust arena. His talent scoffs at the low greed of that man.

—The Princess of Wales is described as being a most lovely woman—tall and perfectly formed, her every movement graceful, and her manners winsome and wholly unaffected. Her face is all sunshine and sweetness, and one never to be forgotten. Her popularity in England is very great, all classes regarding her with peculiar affection, not more for her peerless beauty than for her faultless character as a wife and mother.

—The Rev. Dr. JOSEPH PARKER, of London, author of Ecce Cœlum, is on a visit to this country. He is one of the ablest of the Congregational clergymen of the British metropolis. He is to the Congregationalists what SPURGEON is to the Baptists and Canon LIDDON to the Episcopalians.

—What would be thought of an administration in this country that would resort to the littleness of sending secret agents to report the sayings and doings of an ex-President and his friends? Yet this has been done by President M'MAHON to ex-President THIERS.

—Mr. PULLMAN, the palace-car man, has given Mr. THOMAS MURPHY $42,000 for the building lot at Long Branch next to Mr. GEORGE W. CHILDS'S, and will next year build a palace-hut.

—PIERRE ROUVIS, the first explorer of New Caledonia, died in Paris on the 25th of August. He was one of the companions of Bishop PIARD, who was eaten by the natives in 1846, when prelates were deemed of the required tenderness for edible purposes.

—Mr. HELON CONE has won the gratitude of the people of East Haddam, Connecticut, by presenting to that town ten thousand dollars, the interest of which is to be used by indigent and worthy young persons wishing to start business in the town.

—The late Bishop WILBERFORCE was not the first bishop killed by a fall from his horse in modern times. It is now almost ninety-nine years since JAMES JOHNSON, Bishop of Worcester, was thus killed, in Stall Street, Bath, being then in the seventieth year of his age. His body was buried in Lacock Church, where there is a monument to his memory, and where his hatchment still remained on the wall not long since. Another monument to his memory is in Worcester Cathedral. It is by NOLLEKENS. Among colonial bishops, too, who have died from other than "natural causes," the names of Dr. COTTON, of Calcutta, and of Dr. SAWYER, of Grafton and Armidale, in Australia, should be mentioned. They were both drowned. Bishop HEBER also died from apoplexy while bathing. To these should be added the late Bishop PATTESON, who was murdered by the natives whom he was seeking to Christianize. Another English prelate, Bishop KIDDER, was killed while in bed by the fall of a stack of chimneys in a tempest. And Bishop KEMP, of Maryland, had an end put to his life by the overturn of a stage-coach.

—The best-paid family on earth, from the public purse, is the royal family of England. The Queen receives £385,000 a year, which is about $5000 per day. The Prince of Wales has $200,000 per annum, besides $300,000 per annum from the Duchy of Cornwall. The Duke of Edinburgh has $125,000 per annum, and each one of the married daughters has been munificently pensioned by the government.

—The Sultan of Turkey is personally pecunious to that extent that he has on exhibition at the Weltausstellung, at Vienna, treasures worth fifty millions of dollars. The principal piece is the throne of NADIR SHAH. It is gilded wood, covered all over with garlands and flowers and tracery in pearls, rubies, and emeralds.

—Sir HENRY HOLLAND, pleasantly remembered by many of our people, though now over eighty-five years of age, has just left London on his ordinary two months' tour for Nijni-Novgorod. Sir HENRY has made eight voyages to the United States and Canada, and one to Jamaica. He has four times traveled over the East; has made three tours to Algeria, two in Russia, and has several times visited Sweden and Norway, yet he says he has never lost a patient by his wanderings.

—During the late President LINCOLN'S administration one member of his cabinet was strongly disliked by his little son TAD. When Mr. LINCOLN was ill with the varioloid the offensive secretary sent his card in and asked for an interview. TAD was present and heard his father decline the request, saying he was ill. "Papa," said TAD, "let him come in and catch it."

—One of the droll results of recent changes in Mr. GLADSTONE'S cabinet is that the Quaker JOHN BRIGHT becomes an officer for spiritual purposes in the Church of England. And yet it is so, for as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster he will have the patronage of forty-one livings in various parts of the country. These livings are of a widely varied character, ranging from Reston, in Lincolnshire, worth £116 per annum, to Rothbury, in Northumberland, with the very comfortable income of £1470 a year. It is rather curious that although these livings are attached to the office of the Duchy of Lancaster, yet none of them are in Lancashire. They are situated in Yorkshire, Leicester, Norfolk, Essex, Wilts, Herts, Cumberland, etc.

—In Madison, Wisconsin, dwells a young man who is a model of pride, humility, and independence. He prefers to get his education through the agency of his own industry rather than accept the aid proffered him by his father. Why or wherefore does not appear, but such is the case. In order to carry out his laudable principles he does the washing, on Monday, for his mother, she paying him the same as she would the washer-woman, and he finds the proceeds sufficient to pay for his schooling every week. Washing, rinsing one's way into Virgil and Euclid is a process sufficiently novel to merit the admiration of the world at large. We infer that he will iron his way into Greek, ruffle himself over the difficulties of Homer, and clear-starch himself into Hebrew.

—A former Attorney-General of Massachusetts, JAMES SULLIVAN, was at once an able lawyer and a hearty, dignified gentleman of the old school. To a friend who was complaining at the age of sixty that he felt one's days must be few, and the capacity for usefulness well-nigh exhausted, Mr. SULLIVAN felicitously replied: "You mistake there. At sixty a man in fair health may enter upon a series of years equal in usefulness and happiness to those of any period, provided proper precautions are taken and proper habits formed. Employment without labor, exercise without weariness, and temperance without abstinence are the rules of life for a man of threescore years." The advice probably contains as sound sense as could easily be compacted in the same number of words.

—Mr. OLIVER JOHNSON, of the Christian Union, a veteran journalist, was a few days since married at New Haven to Miss JENNIE M. ABBOTT, daughter of the Rev. J. S. C. ABBOTT, whose many historical works, published by the HARPERS, are familiar to the public. The reverend historian officiated at the ceremony which gained him a son-in-law, and caused his daughter to change "her local habitation and her name."

—When Lord LYTTON inserted in the ninth book of The Parisians, now in course of publication in Harper's Weekly (which it is supposed he intended to publish anonymously), the following eccentric reference to himself, "There is somewhere in Lord LYTTON'S writings—writings so numerous that I may be pardoned if I can not remember where—a critical definition of the difference between dramatic and narrative art of story," probably the principal reason for the remark was to mislead critics as to the authorship of the novel. Defining the difference between the dramatic and narrative art was a favorite pastime with many of Lord LYTTON'S characters, and the distinction between dramatic and lyric poetry so charmingly given by Lily Mordaunt in Kenelm Chillingly is one of the prettiest and most memorable passages in the book.

—The defiant manner—perhaps we should call it "cheek"—displayed during the TICHBORNE trial by Dr. KENEALY toward the judges while summing up, would have met with very different treatment at the hands of our Supreme Court judges. For example, referring to the witness CHATILLON, Dr. K. remarked that that individual occupied the position more of a valet than a tutor. "I don't think that is a proper observation," interrupted the Lord Chief Justice. "But I think it is," replied Dr. KENEALY. "I say it is not," answered the Chief Justice; and the whole court looked on with bated breath as Dr. KENEALY said, in measured accents, "But I say it is; and there is nothing to prevent me saying so." Mr. Justice MELLOR here interposed; but every one was so occupied watching the Chief Justice and Dr. KENEALY that his words escaped observation till he was heard to say, "Except the rules which regulate the conduct of gentlemen." Thereupon Dr. KENEALY drew himself up, and looking grandly bucolic, as well as virtuously indignant, said, almost fiercely, "My lord, I know these rules as well as you, and will not have them dictated to me by you. I beg you will not repeat them." Mr. Justice MELLOR was understood to say he would repeat them; but he was cut short by the Chief Justice saying, in a commanding way, "I can not allow a member of this bench to be addressed in that way." Dr. KENEALY, with cool deliberation, "When a member of that bench forgets his duty—" The Lord Chief Justice, with increased warmth, "I won't allow you to say he forgets his duty." "But I will when the occasion requires," hissed Dr. KENEALY, and there was another painful pause. Then the doctor, turning to the jury, said, "It is you, gentlemen, that I address; and what I was going to say is that this witness, CHATILLON, appears to me to have been more of a valet than a tutor."

Hosted by Google

CHILDREN.

WE can not expend too much care on the training and welfare of children, for first impressions are always strong, and generally most difficult to alter. It is easier to learn than to unlearn, and the carelessness of parents in permitting their children to wander within reach of contaminating influences is so productive of serious and lasting ill that it can not be too strongly condemned. It is too much the custom for parents (especially in the pleasant world of fashion) to give themselves up so much to their own amusement that they become blinded to family ties, and banish their offspring to the seclusion of the school-room or nursery, there to work or play under the supervision of governesses and servants; and though happily there are many instances of devoted attachment between the little ones and their guardians, still the love of the latter can not equal or suffice for that of an affectionate parent, nor can their influence, strong as it may be, ever carry with it the serious weight and life-long recollection of a parent's kind and instructive counsels. The evil results of the want of tact in the management of children, and want of sympathy with their little joys and sorrows, are unpleasantly apparent in the discontented, nervous, and ill-tempered children whom we so often meet in society. We all know that much-to-be-avoided individual (generally of the male sex) "l'enfant terrible," who is overfed, overindulged, and overimpertinent; destruction is his chief amusement, and neither our clothes nor our bodies are safe from his assaults. He has a wonderful talent for exhibiting, at most inconvenient times, the "skeletons" that his acquaintances are only too desirous to keep in their "cupboards." No secret is safe with him, and there is no limit to the mischief he will say or do. Being a spoiled child, he is always able to have his little whims indulged, for he well knows that if he is thwarted he has only to roar and make himself generally disagreeable in order to gain his desires. He forms a striking contrast to those of his brethren who are of a milder and more orderly temperament, and who, unfortunately, often suffer much for their docility and obedience. As they do not intrude themselves upon our notice, they are frequently put on one side and forgotten, and (like so many of their elders in the race of life) pay the penalty of their good behavior by being condemned to solitude and oblivion. If the family possesses more than one small olive-branch, the youngsters find some consolation in companionship, and often become devotedly attached to each other; but if, as is too often the case, the family consists of but one child, and that a neglected one, how sad its fate! What a touching sight it is to see the little creature compelled to play alone! There it sits in a distant corner of the room, surrounded by its toys, and gently murmuring to itself as it pretends to hold conversations with imaginary people. It is so engrossed in its own pursuits that it hardly notices our approach. It seems to live in a little castle in the air where mirth is forbidden, for no ringing laughter comes from that lonely corner, and a surprised and frightened glance is the only reply to our proposal for a romp. We turn away with pain, as we remember that this is one of the little children that must be seen but not heard.

Netted Design for Altar and Pulpit Covers, Surplices, etc.

THIS design is especially suitable for ornamenting altar or pulpit covers, but may also be used for trimming surplices, albs, etc. The netted foundation should be as fine as possible, and may be woven of cotton or of thread; the design is worked with medium-sized thread or with twist, according to the material used for the foundation. Button-hole stitch the points on the outer edge, and cut away the projecting edges of the foundation.

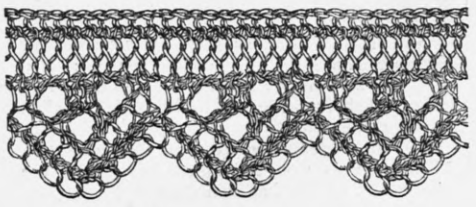
Crochet Edging for Lingerie, etc.

See illustration on page 645.

THIS edging is worked with twisted crochet cotton, No. 70, lengthwise, on a foundation of the requisite length, as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately 1 sc. (single crochet) on the next st. (stitch), 5 ch. (chain stitch), with these pass over 5 st. 2d round.—9 sc. on each ch. scallop of the preceding round; this round borders the under edge of the edging. Work the 3d round on the foundation st. as follows: 8 sc. on every 5 free foundation st. 4th round.—1 dc. (double crochet) on the next sc. of the preceding round, ∗ 1 ch., 1 dc. on the third following st., 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following st., 1 ch., 1 dc. on the third following st.; repeat from ∗. 5th round.—∗ 1 sc. on the two upper veins of the next dc. in the preceding round, 3 sc. on the next 3 ch. always between 2 dc., twice alternately 1 sc. on the two upper veins of the next dc., 1 sc. on the next ch., then 5 ch., 1 sc. on the same ch. on which the last sc. was worked, twice alternately 1 sc. on the two upper veins of the next dc., 1 sc. on the next ch., then 2 sc. on the next 2 ch. always between 2 dc.; repeat from ∗. 6th round.—∗ 4 dc. on the next sc. in the preceding round, 4 ch., 5 sc. on the next ch. loop of the preceding round, 4 ch.,

NETTED DESIGN FOR ALTAR AND PULPIT COVERS, SURPLICES, ETC.

Hosted by Google



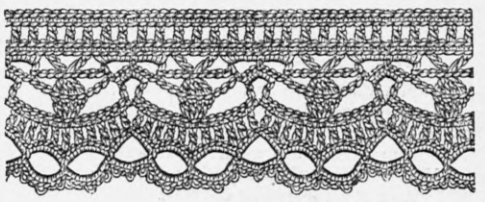
KNITTED EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

with these pass over 7 st.; repeat from . 7th round.— 4 dc. on the next 4 dc. in the preceding round, working off the upper veins, however, not each separately, but together, drawing the thread through once, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the last of the next 4 ch., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the middle of the next 5 sc., 3 ch., 1 sc. on the first of the following 4 ch., 3 ch., with these pass over 3 st.; repeat from . 8th round.— 1 dc. on the st. with which the next 4 dc. of the preceding round were worked together, 3 ch., 1 dc. on the same st. on which the first dc. was worked, pass over 4 st. of the preceding round, 4 sc. on the next 3 ch., 1 sc. on the next sc., 4 sc. on the following 3 ch., pass over 4 st. of the preceding round; repeat from *. 9th round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round. 10th round.—Always alternately 1 dc. on the next st. of the preceding round, 1 ch., with this pass over 1 st. 11th round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round.

Knitted Edging for Lingerie, etc.

BEGIN this edging, which is worked crosswise, going back and forth, with a foundation of 8 st. (stitch), and after knitting one round all plain, work the 1st round.—T. t. o. (thread thrown over), n. (that is, knit 2 st. together), 3 k. (knit plain), t. t. o., n., 1 k. 2d round.—Sl. (slip), 2 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., 2 k. 3d round.—T. t. o., n., 4 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 4th round.—Sl., 2 k., t. t. o., n., 2 k., t. t. o., 2 k. 5th round.—T. t. o., n., 2 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 6th round.—Sl., 2 k., t. t. o., n.; on the t. t. o. work 1 k., 1 p. (purled); n., t. t. o., 2 k. 7th round.—T. t. o., n., 6 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 8th round.—Sl., 2 k., t. t. o., n., 2 k., t. t. o., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 9th round.—T. t. o., n., 2 k.; on the t. t. o. work 1 p., 1 k.; n., 2 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 10th round.—Sl., 2 k., t. t. o., n., 2 k., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 11th round.—T. t. o., n., 1 k., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 12th round.—Sl., 2 k., t. t. o., n.; on the t. t. o. work 1 k., 1 p.; then 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 13th round.—T. t. o., n., 1 k., n., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 14th round.—Sl., 2 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 15th round.—T. t. o., n., 1 k., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 16th round.—Sl., 2 k., t. t. o., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k. Always repeat from the 1st to the 16th rounds.

BLACK BEAVER MOHAIR DRESS.



CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Black Beaver Mohair Dress.

THIS black beaver mohair dress consists of a skirt and polonaise. The skirt is covered in front with kilt pleatings of the material, and trimmed in the back with gathered ruffles of the same. The ruffles are bound on the under edge with gros grain of the same color. The polonaise is trimmed with box-pleated ruches and bows of gros grain. Pleated Swiss muslin fraise and under-sleeves.

Cravat and Hair Bows, Figs. 1–4.

Figs. 1 and 2.—BLUE FAILLE CRAVAT AND HAIR BOWS WITH SPRAY OF FLOWERS. The cravat bow is made of blue faille and lined with black faille. The end of the bow is fringed out. A spray of flowers finishes the bow, as shown by the illustration, Fig. 1. Fig. 2 shows the hair bow to match.

Figs. 3 and 4.—LAVENDER FAILLE CRAVAT AND HAIR BOWS WITH SPRAY OF FLOWERS. These bows are made of lavender faille, arranged on a stiff lace foundation, as shown by the illustration, and ornamented with sprays of flowers.

CLEANING SILVER-WARE, ETC.

IT was found by Dr. Elsner that water, with its sediment, in which pared potatoes have been boiled will remove tarnish from all kinds of solid and plated silver-ware, German silver, etc. (even that made on spoons by boiled eggs), as readily and effectually as the usual powder, and is without the objections which apply to the use of the latter for chased articles. After the water becomes sour by standing, it can be used, instead of the more dangerous sulphuric acid, for cleansing copper vessels.

Fig. 2.—BLUE FAILLE HAIR BOW. [See Fig. 1.]

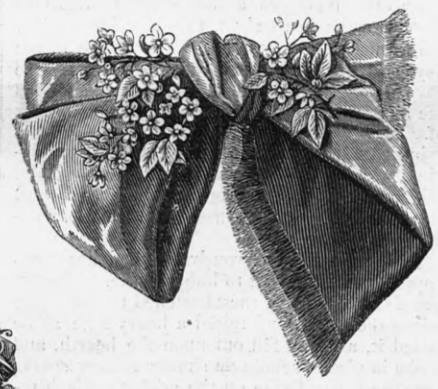


Fig. 1.—BLUE FAILLE CRAVAT BOW WITH SPRAY OF FLOWERS. [See Fig. 2.]

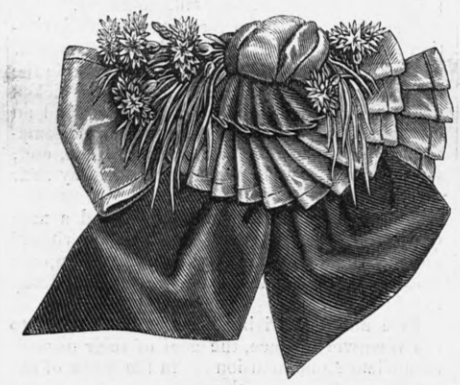

Fig. 3.—LAVENDER FAILLE CRAVAT BOW WITH SPRAY OF FLOWERS. [See Fig. 4.]

Fig. 4.—LAVENDER FAILLE HAIR BOW. [See Fig. 3.]

Fig. 1.—GROS GRAIN FICHU-MANTILLA.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 2.]

Gros Grain Fichu-Mantilla, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS fichu-mantilla is made of black gros grain. The trimming consists of black silk fringe, a passementerie border, bows of black gros grain ribbon, and buttons and cord loops. Hooks and eyes serve to close the mantilla. In the back, at the bottom of the waist, on the wrong side, fasten a belt, which is closed above the fronts, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—GROS GRAIN FICHU-MANTILLA.—BACK.—[See Fig. 1.]

Hosted by Google

THE FLOWERS' REVEL.

BY EMILY E. FORD.

CALLED the flowers to one another,
"Sisters, see that flaming bough!
Summer's gone, our lovely mother;
Step-dame Autumn ruleth now.
She hangs out her splendid banner;
Rings her voice upon the breeze;
Winds with sonorous praises fan her;
And she issues her decrees.

"Frost is her obedient servant;
Droop our heads before his nod;
Tender blooms or blossoms fervent
Die at touch of his cold rod.
We must yield to him with meekness;
We have had our happy day;
All our strength to him is weakness;
We can not dispute his sway.

"All our beauty, tender, vivid,
All our color, sweet or strong,
At his look grow dull and livid,
And we die—a lifeless throng.
But before his chills subdue us
Let us banquet proud and high;
Summer's life yet pulses through us:
Let us praise her ere we die!

"Gather we in groups together,
Massing splendors new and old;
In this glorious golden weather
Doubly blooming we'll unfold.
With gay groups of lavish flowering
Will we hide each path we tread,
In deep clustering wealth embowering
Our spring home and fall death-bed."

So the roses budded daily;
So the jasmines trailed their grace;
So petunias pranked it gayly;
So verbenas ran their race.
Salvia's splendors hang in red flame;
Gladiolus lifts its cup;
Feverfew, with fair white head, came
Purely with the rest to sup.

How they frolicked, how they rallied,
O'er the graves King Frost will bring!
How they dallied, how they sallied,
Sweet-lipped sister brood of spring!
Till in revel gay and tender,
And with wealth of richest bloom,
With their soft heads crowned in splendor,
Dropped they in their autumn tomb.

SPOONS AND SPARKS.

A BROAD and sinuous line of river, bright with the full sunshine of a September noon, here bordered with meadows, there fringed with low woods, and winding toward the clustered roofs of a distant town. Two wherries drifting idly in the shadow of hemlocks and pines, while their prone and meditative occupants watch the lazy wreaths of smoke curl above the bowls of their pipes.

Of these two individuals the one nearest the sunshine is David Whipple, a Bostonian, aged nineteen, fair-haired, fair-skinned, and six feet two. The other, lying at full length, with his cap pulled low over a pair of dark eyes, is of slighter make and more vivacious expression: this is Ernest Walch, a young Virginian.

Fifteen minutes of silence had evidently tried the latter's patience excessively. He had frightened several turtles back to their watery haunts, had whistled to birds, and apostrophized flies. He finally pocketed his pipe and sat erect, with the remark, "I say, Davy!"

"Well?"

"I saw Miss Wentworth to-day."

That this announcement possessed some interest in the mind of the youth called Davy may be surmised from the fact that he too suddenly sat erect; but he only said, as he slowly knocked the ashes from his pipe, "Humph."

"You'd have said something besides 'Humph' if you had seen her. She rode past our hotel."

"And I presume you mooned after her in your usual style."

"Very near it, I admit," rejoined the other, with a shrug. "The case is unique. I never before tried for a month unsuccessfully to gain an introduction to a lady. But I shall succeed yet."

"I'll wager any thing you choose," was the reply, emphasized by a flourish of the pipe, "that I'll have an introduction first, after all!" and the speaker faced his friend with the last trace of indifference banished from his countenance.

"Safe enough to wager where neither is likely to win," commented his companion.

"That's as one thinks. I consider my winning as certain as—as that I can reach the stone bridge two miles down the river at least a minute in advance of you."

"Done!" exclaimed the Virginian, with a laugh and a quick straightening of his lithe figure. "The loser in the race abandons his chances, eh?"

"Just so."

In two minutes the wherries were abreast, and their owners ready for a start. The next, they swept off down the stream, pulled evenly and easily. Both the young men were powerful rowers. Ernest had the most effective stroke, David greater reserves of strength. It was pretty to see the wherries dart through shadows and sunshine, past bold wooded curves and banks gay with golden-rod. Their progress during the first ten minutes was quiet, but at the beginning of the second mile it became more lively. Laborers in the fields on either hand paused to watch as the wherries shot by, and now the red jacket, now the blue, seemed gaining. For a while the fates favored David, and he won half a boat's length in a quarter of a mile. Then Ernest bent more gallantly to his oars, and regained his place. But in the next quarter he lost again, and David's greater strength told steadily against him.

When they were on the last half mile, a long straight stretch with the bridge before dwarfed by distance, they pulled like two young giants. David's teeth were set, and every muscle in play. Ernest's cap had fallen, and his black eyes gleamed triumphantly as he noted that each determined stroke brought him nearer his first position. Independently of its puerile cause, the race was magnificent. There happened to be but one spectator of its close. This was a gray-haired gentleman, who, seeing the two boats sweep around the upper curve of the river, checked his horse on the bridge.

They came in grandly, darting like birds through the smooth water, straight and swift, for the bridge. The intent watcher leaned far over the rails, and as both bows simultaneously swerved on opposite sides of the central stone pier, uttered an involuntary "Hurrah!" that was like an electric shock to the two excited rowers beneath.

"By George!" gasped David, trying his best for breath, "we hit the pier in the same second."

Ernest, in no condition to dispute or to assent, replied by a nod, and the ejaculation,

"Tough one, wasn't it?"

"Who's the party on the bridge?"

Ernest was saved an answer by the appearance of the "party," who scrambled down an embankment and approached radiantly.

"Pretty well done, young gentlemen! Haven't seen such a race since my college days. Pretty evenly matched. Now I should have said," with a glance from the powerful David to his slighter companion, "that this young man had an advantage; but it seems not."

"Walch makes up in science what he lacks in strength," said David, magnanimously, grounding his boat.

Ernest imitated his friend's example, remarking that "with all the science he could muster, he had rarely won a race with Davy."

"A fine sight it was, indeed!" resumed their enthusiastic friend. "I used to be remarkably fond of boating before I got my flesh—remarkably. Some of my pleasantest hours have been passed on the Charles River."

"On the Charles? You were a Cambridge student, then? We belong to that persuasion," rejoined David.

"Harvards, are you? I'm glad to hear it. Glad to have met you. Allow me to introduce myself—name's Wentworth; place is about a quarter of a mile from here. My carriage is on the bridge: come and take a glass of wine with me, and have a chat about college affairs."

The faces of the two recipients of this invitation were studies. The name was Wentworth, was it? Ernest pulled his cap lower to hide the twinkle in his eyes, and David abruptly picked up the spoons of his wherry. Neither had an idea of refusing, though Ernest murmured something about appearance, boating costume, etc., which objection was promptly overruled by their new friend.

"Boats are perfectly safe. I'll send a man down to attend to 'em. Dress is all right," puffed the old gentleman, pulling himself up the embankment by means of a wiry shrub. "Jump in; jump in!"

Five minutes' driving brought our friends to the Wentworth place, the goal of their desires, an ancient stone mansion set in the midst of extensive grounds. On the way up the avenue the two visitors were electrified by seeing the flutter of muslin skirts on the terrace. Immediately after both had a vision of blue eyes and curls and a dainty figure, and found themselves bowing confusedly to "my daughter Ella," the divinity of their worship.

Both gentlemen were in a maze most of the afternoon. They had wine in the shady dining-room, through the windows of which they caught glimpses of beds of bright autumn flowers. They had stores of jovial anecdotes from their host. Then they had music in the parlors, and sweet commonplaces from Miss Wentworth.

When our two friends were set down on the piazza of their hotel at seven o'clock that evening both stood motionless, watching the carriage of their new acquaintance rolling away. As it disappeared they first faced each other blankly, then, by common impulse, burst into a fit of laughter. The inaugural remark was made by Ernest.

"This beats any thing I ever heard of!"

"It does. We're even, Walch. Neither of us won the race, and neither of us won the wager."

"Curious enough!" rejoined Ernest, soliloquizing, as he turned away. "I wonder which will win the lady?"

The enlightened reader must have anticipated results. Our collegians were not original in their love-making. The odd feature in the case was the dual love-making. The changes were rung on riding, boating, music, croquet, and billiards for three weeks. At the end of that time, unfortunately for their friendly feelings, they found themselves as even in this race for a lady's favor as they had been in the memorable race down the river. Both were prodigious—and equal—favorites with Mr. Wentworth, both received gracious smiles from Miss Wentworth, both made the greatest efforts to please, and spent the whole of their pocket-money in the attempt.

I do not know precisely when their friendship became a memory; but at the end of those three weeks they were enemies, who endured each other for the sake of appearance when they met at the Wentworths' house, but outside it never exchanged a word, and regarded each other loweringly at meals and in passage-ways. To add to the complications of the affair, the 28th of September approached, bringing with it the dreaded necessity of returning to Cambridge.

The days flew by, and each delayed until the morrow before putting his fate to the test. On the 27th both must go, and the 25th found each resolute to ask the question, that had become all-important to both, on the 26th.

The 26th came, and with it a violent autumnal storm. Instead of proceeding to the Wentworth mansion for a morning's croquet, our heroes found themselves reduced to despair. David misanthropically kept his room. Ernest lounged around the stables till dinner-time, played billiards half the afternoon, then took a survey from the window, and formed a desperate resolve. Immediately after supper, at which David did not appear, he put on heavy boots, borrowed a cloak of the landlord, and started through a sea of mud, in a pouring rain, and in the face of a furious northeaster, for the Wentworths'.

Looking back at David's lighted windows, he thought, with pardonable triumph, that for once he had stolen a march upon his rival; but his triumph changed to perturbation when he finally stood, a mud-bespattered and drenched individual, ringing the Wentworths' door-bell. His spirits rose, however, at sight of the cozy library, where Mr. Wentworth, in dressing-gown and slippers, sat before an open wood fire, and Miss Ella, seated on a cricket, was occupied in popping corn. The latter rose with a blush and smile of welcome.

"Please excuse papa and me. We were having one of our old-fashioned evenings."

"Delighted to see you, my boy!" chimed in Mr. Wentworth, adding, with uncomfortable solicitude, "And where's Mr. Whipple?"

"I really don't know what Davy is doing with himself this evening," responded Ernest, seating himself on the other side of the fire, and wishing Mr. Wentworth in the arctic regions. "I, for my part, couldn't reconcile myself to leave town without spending my last evening with you"—these words accompanied by a significant glance at the young lady.

"Your coming is a perfect godsend—a perfect godsend!" was the hopelessly brisk response. "I don't know any thing duller than a September storm. I wish your friend was here; but never mind; we'll make an evening of it."

Accordingly the hospitable old gentleman rang for fruit and wine and cigars, and gave full freedom to his garrulous tongue. Ernest was in despair. Reminiscences and stories and jokes succeeded one another, while he was obliged to laugh and answer and take hopeless notes of the fire-light gleams netted in the brown curls opposite, the downcast eyes, the snowy hands busy with the tassels of a coquettish silk apron, and the tiny slipper resting on a flower in the hearth-rug.

Periodical glances at the clock told Ernest that it was half past eight, then that it was nine. He formed the second desperate resolve of the day, and began to talk about his travels. He gave a long and intensely prosy account of his life in Paris, using all the French he could think of. Mr. Wentworth had never traveled, but evinced polite attention. Ernest, with unflagging zeal, went on with Germany and Italy. His host nodded with waning interest. Ernest was about to attempt Russia, when a snore delighted his ears.

The young lady nervously resumed her corn-popping, vainly trying to hide a smile. The fire was dying down. Ernest hastened to assist her, seized the tongs, and raised a heavy log; as he raised it, a brand fell out upon the hearth, and broke in pieces, sending a shower of fiery sparks over the pretty figure on the cricket. Each uttered a suppressed exclamation. Miss Wentworth shook her curls hastily, and Ernest shook the little silk apron and much-beruffled skirt. He shook it so vigorously that a letter dropped out of the pocket, and lay before him, address upward; but he did not heed the letter, for somehow he had mistaken the young lady's hand for her apron, and still held it, though the sparks were only black specks. He was in the midst of an incoherent but earnest speech, saying something about wanting the right to protect her from all the troubles of life as he had protected her from those flying sparks, when the letter caught his eye. "Miss Ella Wentworth, D——, Massachusetts," in David's handwriting, unmistakably. That one glance showed him also that it was a drop-letter, and stamped September 26.

Ernest hesitated so noticeably in the middle of his speech that his listener glanced up at him in surprise, and caught his glance at the letter. She picked it up hastily, with a rosy blush and an exclamation that caused the old gentleman's drowsy eyes to open wide.

"Ahem! I believe," he observed, with the extra dignity sleepy persons often assume, "that I lost what you were last saying—about the Swiss patois, wasn't it?"

Poor Ernest! It was hard work to sit and hear the history of the old gentleman's last speculation after that; and many pleading glances were sent toward the flushed, downcast face opposite him. At last, at eleven, he rose hopelessly to go. He lingered and lingered, finding continually last words to say, till the utter futility of delay discouraged him into seeking the door; but here the old gentleman, suddenly radiant with a new thought, detained him.

"Dear me! why, Nell, I had almost forgotten what we spoke of at dinner. Mr. Walch, we want you and your friend Whipple at Christmas-time, you know. You must give us a few days. Nell here is going to be married about that time, and you must both come to the wedding without fail. I dare say," he added, struck by the blankness of Ernest's face, "that you've never happened to hear of it before. Well, well, good news is always welcome, isn't it? Now I shall depend on you for a week at Christmas, and don't forget to invite your friend. Good-by, and good luck to you, my boy!" and the hearty good-wisher followed him out upon the door-step to give a final hand-shake.

A half hour after, as David was pacing his chamber feverishly, his door opened, and a drenched and muddy figure presented itself, and remarked, hysterically, as it dropped a soaked cloak on the floor,

"Well, old fellow, we've come out even again. Neither of us won the race, neither won the wager, and neither has won the lady!"

MOORISH WOMEN.

THE condition of women in Morocco is most pitiable. They are all slaves, and the lot of those who are so, avowedly and technically, is much less miserably dull, monotonous, and degraded than that of the ladies who are supposed to repose on satin divans, sip sherbet, eat dainty devices in sugar, and string pearls in the harem, in which their occupations are in reality much more prosaic, and their surroundings much less splendid. The wedding festivities are exceedingly barbarous, the unhappy bride being carried to her husband's house in a box, on a mule's back, with a little boy also shut up with her in durance, as a happy prognostic of the future. A box of sweetmeats is also placed in the box to while away the time and console the small boy. A horrible noise, howling, drumming, firing, is kept up the whole way; and the female relations of the bridegroom, who does not appear at all, receive her on the threshold with appalling shrieks of Ah—yee! Ah—yee! The box is carried in, the door is shut, the friends disperse, but the musicians remain, and the horrible din goes on for hours. No religious ceremony takes place, and the fattening of the bride is the only preparation on her part for holy matrimony. "For this purpose," says a spectator, "from the time of her betrothal she is confined to one room, not permitted to take any exercise, and compelled to swallow large quantities of keskoo every day. This system, steadfastly pursued for a few weeks, brings her into a condition of what is considered in Morocco becoming obesity. I have heard of an intended bride so fat that she was unable to pick up her pocket-handkerchief when she dropped it, and who could with difficulty move across the room without assistance."

A Moorish bride must, we think, be rather a curious spectacle, according to the following description of a merely ordinary specimen: "Nothing of her shape or figure was visible through the enormous mass of clothes in which she was enveloped. She had certainly several pounds weight of jewelry hanging on her shoulders and chest. Her wrists were encumbered with massive manacles of gold and silver, while every one of her fingers was covered with rings up to the first knuckle. Her face was painted thickly white all over, and her cheeks then coarsely daubed with vermilion. The lids of her eyes and her eyebrows were blackened, the latter being thus brought to meet above her nose. But the most ridiculous and repulsive part of the 'get up' were two triangular patches about the size of half-crown pieces upon the lower part of her cheeks, ingeniously painted in a pattern of various colors. She had a star of the same on the forehead, between her eyes, and another on her chin. When her eyes were open, and we could see them, they were as vacant and expressionless as the orbs of a wax figure."

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

"WHAT is the pleasantest place to spend the winter in in England?" My first impulse was to answer, unhesitatingly, "Ryde," when this question was put to me yesterday by a stranger who had recently landed on our shores. I reflected a moment, however, and then with due caution adopted the spontaneous suggestion of my own experience, and said, "The Isle of Wight is the place that combines as many elements of pleasant existence as are compatible with existence at all in our island of fogs." But if I must go further, and say what spot in the Isle of Wight is preferable, I will say Ryde. It was the fashion of fashions a few years ago, and was consequently about the dearest place in England. Of late it has ceased to be the rage, and is therefore a much pleasanter resort than it used to be. The exquisite natural beauties of the coast, with its richly wooded slopes running down to the water's edge, as green and luxuriant as if the briny wave were an inland lake or a mountain stream, give the country as you approach it in the steamer the appearance of a vast private garden, while villas and mansions glisten through the woods overlooking the sea, and lend an air of sociability to the garden that is very hospitable and enticing. Ryde is eminently a place possessing "good society," as we stiff-necked Europeans call the gatherings of our upper classes. It is even fastidious above its neighbors in this respect. As you stroll along the shady roads leading to the town, or loiter on the pier, where the band is playing to the beauty and fashion of the place, you will meet with scores of high naval and military officers, heroes of a "hundred fights," who congregate in this delightful garden to fight their battles over again under the shadows of its majestic cliffs that frown across defiantly at the dusky cliffs of its neighbors beyond the Channel. Foreigners of distinction frequent Ryde in great numbers during the season, and as soon as Parliament breaks up Pall Mall and Piccadilly are to be seen cooling themselves after their respective campaigns in London under the covered seats of the pier, or skimming over the green waves in every variety of boat, barge, steamer, yacht, and canoe.

There is a capital market in the town; good shops; broad, well-paved streets; a town-hall, where balls and private theatricals refresh the jaded spirits of the vulgar pleasure-seekers who are not content with the beauties of nature and the flow of soul. There are places of worship for every denomination of Christians. The most remarkable of these is the Roman Catholic Church of St. Mary's, a beautiful Gothic gem recently constructed by a noble foundress resident in the town. American families who think of residing at Ryde can not do better than address themselves for advice and information of every sort to the clergyman of their special Church. These gentlemen are always well informed, and I may safely add always kind, and ready to be of use to strangers. If you have sons to educate, they will introduce you to the most suitable school or academy for them. Naval schools are numerous in Ryde. This is chiefly owing to the proximity of Portsmouth, which accounts also for the number of naval officers who congregate there. There is immense facility in every way for maritime studies at Ryde, and all sorts of accidental helps in the way of regattas, boat-races, naval reviews on great occasions, etc.

Hosted by Google

The residence of the Queen at Osborne, on the eastern shore, gives a certain character of royal repose to the island, and keeps up a constant flow of interest. Her Majesty is particularly fond of this little summer palace, and throws aside the stately ceremonial of royalty as much as possible while residing there. The coast all round is dotted with handsome mansions of noblemen and gentlemen, and if a stranger is furnished with good introductions, there is no place in England or elsewhere that affords more agreeable society than Ryde and its neighbors, Cowes, Ventnor, and Freshwater. The latter is a sort of classic ground, being the visible dwelling-place of the poet Tennyson. Round his elegant rural retreat all the wit and talent of England are perpetually moving. The Queen once sent him word that she would honor him with a visit on the following day. The announcement was received with full loyal welcome from the poet and his household, which, be it said in all respect, has, with all the attractions, some of the disadvantages of the poetical atmosphere. Order does not there reign supreme in outward things. The house was, however, put under arms to receive the royal visit; Tennyson arrayed himself in solemn dress-coat; Mrs. Tennyson wore an appropriate toilette; the younger Tennysons were snatched from mud pies, washed and dressed, and kept in bondage to the best clothes for the whole afternoon, while a delicate repast of strawberries and cream and flowers was prepared in an arbor out-of-doors. But the day passed, and the next, and the next, and no Majesty appeared. The household drew a sigh of regret—some of them doubtless of relief—and lapsed into slippers and mud pies once more. But lo! one morning, as the children were at their favorite pastime in the garden, and the poet meditating in his dressing-gown, and Mrs. Tennyson on domestic cares intent, a horseman dashed up to the gate, and shouted, "The Queen!" and before Tennyson could don his coat or warn his wife the royal carriage drew up before the house. With the instinct of a true gentleman, he went forward to greet his sovereign, called his family to him, and led her Majesty into the house. Then there was an awful pause. Suddenly the poet raised his head, and looking at the Queen, exclaimed, "Oh, woe is me! For five days I waited, ready in suitable attire, to receive my Queen. My wife was ready, and my children were washed, and pictures to behold, and her Majesty came not; and now she has come, and found us in what a plight!" The poet groaned. The Queen broke into a merry laugh, and the ice thus broken so gracefully and wittily did not form again during the visit.

There are few objects of interest in the Isle of Wight in the way of monuments. Carisbrooke Castle is almost the only ruin of note. It is a grand old fortress, whose keep is anterior to the Norman times. The castle itself was built by Fitz-Osborne, a kinsman of William the Conqueror, who bestowed the isle and title of Wight upon him. The lords of Wight were small kings in their own way. Carisbrooke was their castle, and the village was the capital of the island. There was an old priory, which has long since disappeared. Near its site has risen a handsome modern edifice, a Dominican convent of nuns. Charles I. when he fled from Hampton Court took refuge at Carisbrooke, and was held a prisoner there by the Roundheads for some weeks, during which he made several unsuccessful attempts to escape. The view from the broken battlements of the castle is very picturesque, and extends over an immense portion of the island. Carisbrooke is about four miles from the town of Ryde, and is a great resort for picnickers. Cowes is about half an hour from Ryde by steamer. It has of late become what Ryde used to be, the fashion par excellence. Balls that equal those of the London season are given yearly at Cowes, and it overflows with the élite of the capital during the yachting season. The nimble little boats that puff away all day long between Ryde and all the coast towns make interchange of visits very convenient. The charge on the steamer is merely nominal, and a band plays during the short journey, which makes it still more delightful. Ryde is about three hours and a half from London, and an hour and three-quarters from Southampton, where you take the steamer for Havre or other Continental ports. The mildness of the climate attracts many French families to Ryde; but to those who make this their chief object we would recommend Ventnor, which is on the southern coast, near a portion of the Undercliff. It was not long ago a small bathing-place, but it has of late years expanded considerably in size and importance, owing to the almost Italian mildness of the air there in winter. It contains hotels, boarding-houses, and very good shops. Its fine scenery is not the sole attraction of the island. Men of science find a vast store of interest in the extraordinary geological structure of its cliffs. The whole series of strata which compose the Isle of Wight are to be seen in these precipitous cliffs in a distinct and curious manner. The north side of the island consists of the strata above the chalk; the centre and upper part of the south side consist of the chalk; and the lower part of the south and the southeast consist of the strata below the chalk. The south side, from Dunnose to St. Catherine's, is composed of chalk and chalk marl in nearly horizontal strata; the centre is green sandstone, under which is dark marl, and then ferruginous sand. The formation of the strikingly grand Undercliff is owing to the action of the land springs on this marl, which turns into mud, runs out, and leaves the green sandstone and marl without support, and free to tumble into the picturesque disorderly blocks they gradually assume. These various elements of the soil explain the exuberant growth of timber on the island, a circumstance which makes it so different from other sea-side places. There are parts where the oaks grow down to the very lips of the sea. The pasture lands are rich, and flocks and herds are every where feeding on the downs. This suggests the presence of dairies, and the abundance of pure milk, so essential to invalids, and so rare in our large towns. Laurels, myrtles, and geraniums flourish through the winter, which never wears in this sheltered little sea nest the dreary aspects it assumes in most English coast towns. What more can I say to tempt you to try Ryde for your winter-quarters? That it is a very emporium of pretty girls and their inevitable appendages—handsome young men; that marriages are of every day occurrence there; and that owing to the poetic character of the scenery, and the charming opportunities of yachting, walking on the pier, and dancing by day and by night, there is no spot in Europe better calculated to develop tender and elevated emotions between sympathetic hearts.

COMET.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

DURING the first session of the Anderson School, on Penikese Island, eighteen women enjoyed the rare advantages for studying natural history which were furnished the students. No question was raised about their admission, for Professor Agassiz has always received women both as students and as assistants in the museum at Cambridge; and it was said of those at Penikese that "the earnestness, industry, and skill with which they availed themselves of all the privileges at their disposal proved the justice of their admission." They seem to have taken an intelligent part in various enterprises, on the ground of equality—or some other ground that answered just as good a purpose. A beautiful yacht was presented to the school to enable the students to go out for dredging. These excursions took place almost every day, and the dredging party consisted of four ladies and four gentlemen, a fact which seems to indicate not only that "equal rights," but pleasant courtesy, was tendered to the ladies, who numbered only eighteen out of fifty students.

The Anderson School of Natural History is considered a great success. Some inconveniences necessarily incident to a new enterprise were suffered, and the expenses of the students during the first year were more than they will probably be hereafter. The new buildings are now completed, or nearly so, which will afford good accommodations for another year. Fifty aquarias have also been completed and put in position, so that each student will be supplied with that important auxiliary. They are thirty inches long by twenty inches wide and deep. During the past term pails, pans, and jars were made to serve a temporary purpose. The materials for aquarium study were largely obtained by the students themselves, and many valuable acquisitions were secured from fishermen in the vicinity. The island itself, being almost destitute of trees, did not furnish many insects, and no reptiles were found there; but living creatures of various kinds have been introduced, and will take up their abode there as a supply for future years. Penikese, from a botanical point of view, did not present a promising aspect; nevertheless one of the students made a list of about seventy-five plants, and beautiful specimens of sea-weed were prepared. Professor Agassiz took special interest in aiding the students to make collections to carry home with them. Indeed, he was almost constantly in the laboratory, giving personal aid and encouragement to all alike. Moreover, he lectured nearly every day, and never failed to be present at lectures given by other scientists. There have been so many applications for admission to the school that it is probable none will be admitted hereafter except those who are actually engaged in teaching natural history; and it is believed that the school will be a great power in elevating the standard of instruction among teachers of the country.

Boston presents to her citizens this fall two elaborate and extended courses of entertainments. These consist of a combination of lectures by the most popular orators, readings by elocutionists, and concerts by musical celebrities. The array of distinguished talent presented is peculiarly satisfactory to the managers of the courses, and will doubtless be so also to those who avail themselves of the opportunities offered them.

In a few years it will be possible to reach the inmost recesses of the White Mountains by cars. It is true that the picturesque beauty of many spots will be marred by the intrusion of the iron road; but the travel will be much increased by the easier mode of access, and all property in the vicinity will be enhanced in value. Farms scattered here and there have already doubled in value from the future prospect.

A facetious writer remarks that "when a man walks squarely up to the clergyman who married him three years before, takes him by the hand cordially, and without a word of reproach inquires after his health, it is useless for any to maintain that Christian forgiveness is a thing of the past, and does not enter largely into that man's character, or that the heroic virtues have all disappeared from earth!"

There is nothing like knowing what has become of ancient things. We are just informed by a diligent investigator that the ark is now in a good state of preservation, but lying under an eternal mantle of snow, hundreds of feet deep, at an altitude of 17,500 feet above the level of the sea! As snow always covers the top of Ararat, it is impossible for any of Noah's descendants to go up and find the ark. Furthermore, the ark was smaller than the Great Eastern, had three decks, and was divided into numerous compartments, for the safety and order of its occupants.

A novel method of killing mosquitoes has been discovered which deserves to be patented. But we disclose it to our readers, unconscious that we thereby infringe any body's rights. The apparatus required is simple, consisting of a broomstick, the cover of a tin blacking-box, and a nail. The inside of the cover should be anointed thoroughly with kerosene oil, and then nailed, hollow side up, to the end of the broomstick. The method of operation is equally simple: clap the machine over the nearest mosquito on the wall or ceiling, and hold him prisoner a moment. Then his dead body will be found adhering to the oil at the bottom of the cover, the fumes having put an end to his existence. Sometimes a strong-headed individual will reel about a while before he keels over and dies. By an industrious use of this machine a room can be entirely cleared of mosquitoes.

The modern Methuselah was born—according to the authority of the Anglo-Brazilian Times—at Sequerema, Brazil, in 1694. This patriarch of one hundred and seventy-nine years old is in the enjoyment of good health, and his declining years are cheered by 42 children, 123 grandchildren, 86 great-grandchildren, 26 great-great-grandchildren, and 20 great-great-great-grandchildren. He has had six wives. We shall look to see this wonderful story confirmed.

Mount Negabi is the name of the height on the southern coast of the Crimea where the new château of Eriklik has been erected as a summer residence for the Empress of Russia. It is at the distance of a league and a half from the town of Yalta, and on the level near the sea is a fine dairy-farm, from which the road winds up the hill, the top of which is clothed with oak and willow. The château is comfortable, but not highly ornate in character, and is surrounded by a small but admirably arranged garden, at one end of which is a pavilion, whence a magnificent view of the sea, the rocks, and the forests, as well as of the town of Yalta, may be enjoyed. The château of Orlanda, the property of the Grand Duke Constantine Nicholaievitz, is not far off.

Distinct and pleasant enunciation in either sacred or secular vocal music is a rare attainment. Often it is wholly impossible to understand the words sung: sometimes the mélange of nonsense that seems to be uttered is simply ridiculous. Singers who give no thought to this matter may profitably study upon the following stanzas, which purport, rather absurdly to be sure, to be the musical efforts of a fashionable young lady seated at the piano:

"When ther-moo-hoon is mi-hild-ly be-heaming
O'er ther ca-halm and si-hi-lent se-e-e-a,
Its ra-dyunce so so-hoft-ly stree-heam-ing,
Oh! ther-hen, oh, ther-hen,
I thee-hink
Hof thee-hee,
I thee-hink,
I thee-hink,
I thee-he-he-hehehehe-hink hof theeeeeeee!

"When the sur-hun is brigh-hi-hightly glowing
O'er the se-hene so dea-hear to meee,
And swee-heet the wee-hind is blo-ho-howing,
Oh, ther-hen, oh, ther-hen,
I thee-hink
Hof thee-hee,
I thee-hink,
I thee-hink,
I thee-he-he-hehehehehehe-hink hohohohohohohoho h-o-f theeeeeeeeeeeee!"

The police of Paris have recently seized more than one thousand medals, which were struck off to commemorate the crimes of the Commune.

Alexandra Palace, which was destroyed by fire a few months ago, is to be rebuilt immediately. The new palace will be much larger than the old building, and iron and glass are to be largely used in its construction. Among the ruins of the old palace the bodies of two sisters have been found. It is supposed that they went in to view the ruins after the fire, and were buried by some falling masonry.

The French papers report the case of a workman employed in a factory at Paris who recently inquired at the "Lost and Found" department of the Prefecture of Police if a 500-franc note had been deposited there. The answer was in the negative. It appears that the note had been given him by his employer to pay a bill, and that he had lost it. He went back to his work and declared that he could not survive the loss. Attempts were made to console him, and his tried honesty for twenty-eight years was cited as placing his character above suspicion. However, he went away weeping, and the next day his body was found in the Seine. While it was on its passage to the Morgue the Prefecture of Police was informed that the note had been found in an omnibus.

A Parisian—Jouglet by name—is reported to have invented a method of making artificial sugar by uniting its constituent atoms of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen.

A baby-show, which was a prominent attraction in connection with the St. Clair (Missouri) County Agricultural and Mechanical Association, awakened in the vicinity where it was held a vast deal of enthusiasm. Thirty-four babies were entered on the list as competitors for the three prizes. The scene is thus graphically described: "After the babies were seated it was a beautiful sight. Thirty-four little noses evoked admiration; sixty-eight little fists alternately churned the air, and were crammed into thirty-four little mouths; sixty-eight little eyes were fixed upon vacancy; sixty-eight little lungs were inflated, ready for a starter; sixty-eight little legs stuck out straight, and 340 little toes sawed the air. It was a beautiful sight, but presently there arose a sound not altogether as attractive as the sight. Then the committee went to work, and the crowd looked on curiously. The babies were seated in rows, and the examiners passed along, attentively regarding each one. The flush came and went in many a mother's cheek; a feverish light came into each mother's eyes as she gazed hopefully upon the impassive faces. Little faith would any one of them put in the decision that robbed her darling of all the praise. At length the verdict was agreed upon, and it was announced that the children would be driven around the amphitheatre before the decision was given. The first prize, a sewing-machine, was mounted in a spring wagon, the committee occupied a second wagon, and eight followed, filled with the babies and their mothers. Slowly they moved around the ring, while from out 10,000 throats poured a noise like thunder. Once more the wagons drew up at the booth and discharged their squalling freight. Then the decision was announced." It is to be noted that only girl babies received prizes. The first prize was given to a little miss, aged one year, for being the handsomest, best-formed, and most sprightly; the second to a thirteen-months old young lady; and the third to twins of four months.

THE CHICAGO MEMORIAL PICTURE.

See illustration on double page.

THIS fine engraving, allegorically representative of the burning of Chicago, is from the painting by Edward Armitage, R.A., which has recently been presented to the city of Chicago by the proprietors and staff of the London Graphic, as a memorial of their sympathy with the Garden City in its great calamity. The original, which is fifteen feet by nine feet, is now in the Art Institute of Chicago, the City Hall, which is intended to be its ultimate resting-place, being still unbuilt. It was exhibited for the past season in London, where it elicited most favorable opinions from the representatives of the press and from connoisseurs in general. The London Times says of it: "This is an excellent example of true monumental work in its right application, and no member of our Academy is more fitted to grapple with such work than Mr. Armitage, who more than a quarter of a century ago was chosen by Delaroche from among his pupils to work under his direction on his great wall picture of the mighty masters of all time in the Hemicycle of the École des Beaux Arts."

As is fitting in all allegorical subjects, the design is simple and easily understood. The interest of the painting centres on the figures, which are larger in size than life, England, America, and Chicago being each represented by a female form. Chicago lies on the ground, with the last fragment of her purple robe still smouldering near her. She is being raised from her prostrate position by Columbia, who wears a golden robe, typical of the wealth of America, and has the national flag carelessly thrown around her shoulders. Beneath is seen a rich embroidered skirt, edged with fur, and the foot is covered with an Indian moccasin. In her left hand she holds a cup, on which is the national motto, "E pluribus unum;" and close at hand, perched on a rock, is an eagle, the national emblem. Britannia has a chaplet of oak leaves on her head, a pearl necklace around her neck, while her vermilion robe is adorned with the arms of Great Britain. A long black mantle has just dropped from her shoulders, as she reaches forward to draw a white linen covering over Chicago. Crouched at her side, quiet but watchful, is the national emblem, the lion. The immediate foreground has only a trailing arbutus, with a few pinks and a cactus plant at the foot of the eagle's rock; in the background the sky is partially obscured by clouds of smoke, which roll up from blazing "elevators" and factories, typifying the destruction of the commercial centre of the city. The smoke is seen drifting toward an open forest of the scrub pines common to the shore of Lake Michigan.

USEFUL RECIPES.

JELLY.—The juice of apples boiled in shallow vessels, without a particle of sugar, makes the most sparkling, delicious jelly imaginable. Red apples will give jelly the color and clearness of claret, while that from light fruit is like amber. Take the cider just as it is made, and not allowing it to ferment at all, and if possible boil in a pan flat, very large, and shallow. Any one living near a "house" for boiling sorghum juice can make this jelly in perfection.

RICE PUDDING.—One quart of new milk, one cupful of seeded raisins, two-thirds of a cupful of rice; keep it hot in a saucepan on the back part of the stove for two hours, or until the rice is soft enough. Then add one quart of milk, one cupful of sugar, and when cool enough, two eggs (the yolks and whites beaten separately until they are frothy), a piece of butter the size of a walnut, and a very little salt. Mix carefully, so as not to break the rice, and bake about half or three-quarters of an hour.

KEEPING CIDER SWEET.—Heat the cider until it boils, pour into bottles, which have been previously heated to prevent cracking. Cork tight, and seal immediately, as in canning fruit. The cider will keep unchanged for years.

To have nice bright crisp parsley for winter use, spread thinly, as soon as gathered, on a piece of paper, place in a cool oven, leaving the doors open; as soon as dry, powder it and put into a bottle, corking to exclude the air. Other herbs will discolor if dried in this manner.

If the crust to bread is wished tender, as soon as the loaves are taken out of the oven, wrap them in a wet cloth wrung from cold water, and then over it a dry towel.

Hosted by Google

COMMEMORATIVE PICTURE OF THE BURNING OF CHICAGO.—By Edward Armitage, R.A.—[See Page 647.]

Hosted by Google

(Continued from No. 35, page 550.)

LADY ANNA.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE,

Author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," "Orley Farm," "The Eustace Diamonds," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXV.

DANIEL THWAITE'S LETTER.

On the day following that on which Daniel Thwaite had visited Lady Lovel in Keppel Street the Countess received from him a packet containing a short note to herself, and the following letter addressed to Lady Anna. The inclosure was open, and in the letter addressed to the Countess the tailor simply asked her to read and to send on to her daughter that which he had written, adding that if she would do so he would promise to abide by any answer which might come to him in Lady Anna's own handwriting. Daniel Thwaite when he made this offer felt that he was giving up every thing. Even though the words might be written by the girl, they would be dictated by the girl's mother, or by those lawyers who were now leagued together to force her into a marriage with the Earl. But it was right, he thought—and, upon the whole, best for all parties—that he should give up every thing. He could not bring himself to say so to the Countess or to any of those lawyers when he was sent for and told that because of the lowliness of his position a marriage between him and the highly born heiress was impossible. On such occasions he revolted from the authority of those who endeavored to extinguish him. But when alone he could see, at any rate as clearly as they did, the difficulties which lay in his way. He also knew that there was a great gulf fixed, as Miss Alice Bluestone had said—though he differed from the young lady as to the side of the gulf on which lay heaven, and on which heaven's opposite. The letter to Lady Anna was as follows:

"MY DEAREST,—This letter, if it reaches you at all, will be given to you by your mother, who will have read it. It is sent to her open, that she may see what I say to you. She sent for me, and I went to her this evening, and she told me that it was impossible that I should ever be your husband. I was so bold as to tell her ladyship that there could be no impossibility. When you are of age you can walk out from your mother's house and marry me, as can I you, and no one can hinder us. There is nothing in the law either of God or man that can prevent you from becoming my wife—if it be your wish to be so. But your mother also said that it was not your wish, and she went on to say that were you not bound to me by ties of gratitude you would willingly marry your cousin, Lord Lovel. Then I offered to meet you in the presence of your mother—and in the presence too of Lord Lovel—and to ask you then before all of us to which of us two your heart was given. And I promised that if in my presence you would stretch out your right hand to the Earl, neither you nor your mother should be troubled further by Daniel Thwaite. But her ladyship swore to me, with an oath, that I should never be allowed to see you again.

"I therefore write to you, and bid you think much of what I say to you before you answer me. You know well that I love you. You do not suspect that I am trying to win you because you are rich. You will remember that I loved you when no one thought that you would be rich. I do love you in my heart of hearts. I think of you in my dreams, and fancy then that all the world has become bright to me, because we are walking together, hand in hand, where none can come between to separate us. But I would not wish you to be my wife just because you have promised. If you do not love me—above all, if you love this other man—say so, and I will have done with it. Your mother says that you are bound to me by gratitude. I do not wish you to be my wife unless you are bound to me by love. Tell me, then, how it is; but, as you value my happiness and your own, tell me the truth.

"I will not say that I shall think well of you if you have been carried away by this young man's nobility. I would have you give me a fair chance. Ask yourself what has brought him as a lover to your feet. How it came to pass that I was your lover you can not but remember. But, for you, it is your first duty not to marry a man unless you love him. If you go to him because he can make you a countess, you will be vile indeed. If you go to him because you find that he is in truth dearer to you than I am, because you prefer his arm to mine, because he has wound himself into your heart of hearts, I shall think your heart indeed hardly worth the having; but according to your lights you will be doing right. In that case you shall have no further word from me to trouble you.

"But I desire that I may have an answer to this in your own handwriting.

"Your own sincere lover,

"DANIEL THWAITE."

In composing and copying and recopying this letter the tailor sat up half the night, and then very early in the morning he himself carried it to Keppel Street, thus adding nearly three miles to his usual walk to Wigmore Street. The servant at the lodging-house was not up, and could hardly be made to rise by the modest appeals which Daniel made to the bell; but at last the delivery was effected, and the forlorn lover hurried back to his work.

The Countess as she sat at breakfast read the letter over and over again, and could not bring herself to decide whether it was right that it should be given to her daughter. She had not yet seen Lady Anna since she had sent the poor offender away from the house in anger, and had more than once repeated her assurance through Mrs. Bluestone that she would not do so till a promise had been given that the tailor should be repudiated. Should she make this letter an excuse for going to the house in Bedford Square, and of seeing her child, toward whom her very bowels were yearning? At this time, though she was a countess, with the prospect of great wealth, her condition was not enviable. From morning to night she was alone, unless when she would sit for an hour in Mr. Goffe's office, or on the rarer occasions of a visit to the chambers of Sergeant Bluestone. She had no acquaintances in London whatever. She knew that she was unfitted for London society, even if it should be open to her. She had spent her life in struggling with poverty and powerful enemies—almost alone—taking comfort in her happiest moments in the strength and goodness of her old friend Thomas Thwaite. She now found that those old days had been happier than these later days. Her girl had been with her, and had been—or had, at any rate, seemed to be—true to her. She had something, then, to hope, something to expect, some happiness of glory to which she could look forward. But now she was beginning to learn—nay, had already learned, that there was nothing for her to expect. Her rank was allowed to her. She no longer suffered from want of money. Her cause was about to triumph—as the lawyers on both sides had seemed to say. But in what respect would the triumph be sweet to her? Even should her girl become the Countess Lovel, she would not be the less isolated. None of the Lovels wanted her society. She had banished her daughter to Bedford Square, and the only effect of the banishment was that her daughter was less miserable in Bedford Square than she would have been with her mother in Keppel Street.

She did not dare to act without advice, and therefore she took the letter to Mr. Goffe. Had it not been for a few words toward the end of the letter, she would have sent it to her daughter at once. But the man had said that her girl would be vile indeed if she married the Earl for the sake of becoming a countess, and the widow of the late Earl did not like to put such doctrine into the hands of Lady Anna. If she delivered the letter, of course she would endeavor to dictate the answer—but her girl could be stubborn as her mother; and how would it be with them if quite another letter should be written than that which the Countess would have dictated?

Mr. Goffe read the letter, and said that he would like to consider it for a day. The letter was left with Mr. Goffe, and Mr. Goffe consulted the Sergeant. The Sergeant took the letter home to Mrs. Bluestone, and then another consultation was held. It found its way to the very house in which the girl was living for whom it was intended, but was not at last allowed to reach her hand. "It's a fine, manly letter," said the Sergeant.

"Then the less proper to give it to her," said Mrs. Bluestone, whose heart was all softness toward Lady Anna, but as hard as a millstone toward the tailor.

"If she does like this young lord the best, why shouldn't she tell the man the truth?" said the Sergeant.

"Of course she likes the young lord the best—as is natural."

"Then, in God's name, let her say so, and put an end to all this trouble."

"You see, my dear, it isn't always easy to understand a girl's mind in such matters. I haven't a doubt which she likes best. She is not at all the girl to have a vitiated taste about young men. But, you see, this other man came first, and had the advantage of being her only friend at the time. She has felt very grateful to him, and as yet she is only beginning to learn the difference between gratitude and love. I don't at all agree with her mother as to being severe with her. I can't bear severity to young people, who ought to be made happy. But I am quite sure that this tailor should be kept away from her altogether. She must not see him or his handwriting. What would she say to herself if she got that letter? 'If he is generous, I can be generous too;' and if she ever wrote him a letter pledging herself to him, all would be over. As it is, she has promised to write to Lord Lovel. We will hold her to that; and then, when she has given a sort of a promise to the Earl, we will take care that the tailor shall know it. It will be best for all parties. What we have got to do is to save her from this man, who has been both her best friend and her worst enemy." Mrs. Bluestone was an excellent woman, and in this emergency was endeavoring to do her duty at considerable trouble to herself, and with no hope of any reward. The future Countess when she should become a countess would be nothing to her. She was a good woman; but she did not care what evil she inflicted on the tailor in her endeavors to befriend the daughter of the Countess.

The tailor's letter, unseen and undreamed of by Lady Anna, was sent back through the Sergeant and Mr. Goffe to Lady Lovel, with strong advice from Mr. Goffe that Lady Anna should not be allowed to see it. "I don't hesitate to tell you, Lady Lovel, that I have consulted the Sergeant, and that we are both of opinion that no intercourse whatever should be permitted between Lady Anna Lovel and Mr. Daniel Thwaite." The unfortunate letter was therefore sent back to the writer, with the following note: "The Countess Lovel presents her compliments to Mr. Daniel Thwaite, and thinks it best to return the inclosed. The Countess is of opinion that no intercourse whatever should take place between her daughter and Mr. Daniel Thwaite."

Then Daniel swore an oath to himself that the intercourse between them should not thus be made to cease. He had acted, as he thought, not only fairly, but very honorably. Nay, he was by no means sure that that which had been intended for fairness and honor might not have been sheer simplicity. He had purposely abstained from any clandestine communication with the girl he loved, even though she was one to whom he had had access all his life, with whom he had been allowed to grow up together, who had eaten of his bread and drank of his cup. Now her new friends, and his own old friend the Countess, would keep no measures with him. There was to be no intercourse whatever. But, by the God of heaven, there should be intercourse!

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE KESWICK POET.

INFINITE difficulties were now complicating themselves on the head of poor Daniel Thwaite. The packet which the Countess addressed to him did not reach him in London, but was forwarded after him down to Cumberland, whither he had hurried on receipt of news from Keswick that his father was like to die. The old man had fallen in a fit, and when the message was sent it was not thought likely that he would ever see his son again. Daniel went down to the north as quickly as his means would allow him, going by steamer to Whitehaven, and thence by coach to Keswick. His entire wages were but thirty-five shillings a week, and on that he could not afford to travel by the mail to Keswick. But he did reach home in time to see his father alive, and to stand by the bedside when the old man died.

Though there was not time for many words between them, and though the apathy of coming death had already clouded the mind of Thomas Thwaite, so that he, for the most part, disregarded—as dying men do disregard—those things which had been fullest of interest to him, still something was said about the Countess and Lady Anna. "Just don't mind them any further, Dan," said the father.

"Indeed that will be best," said Daniel.

"Yes, in truth. What can they be to the likes o' you? Give me a drop of brandy, Dan." The drop of brandy was more to him now than the Countess; but though he thought but little of this last word, his son thought much of it. What could such as the Countess and her titled daughter be to him, Daniel Thwaite, the broken tailor? For, in truth, his father was dying a broken man. There was as much owed by him in Keswick as all the remaining property would pay; and as for the business, it had come to that that the business was not worth preserving.

The old tailor died and was buried, and all Keswick knew that he had left nothing behind him, except the debt that was due to him by the Countess, as to which opinion in the world of Keswick varied very much. There were those who said that the two Thwaites, father and son, had known very well on which side their bread was buttered, and that Daniel Thwaite would now, at his father's death, become the owner of bonds to a vast amount on the Lovel property. It was generally understood in Keswick that the Earl's claim was to be abandoned, that the rights of the Countess and her daughter were to be acknowledged, and that the Earl and his cousin were to become man and wife. If so, the bonds would be paid, and Daniel Thwaite would become a rich man. Such was the creed of those who believed in the debt. But there were others who did not believe in the existence of any such bonds, and who ridiculed the idea of advances of money having been made. The old tailor had no doubt relieved the immediate wants of the Countess by giving her shelter and food, and had wasted his substance in making journeys and neglecting his business, but that was supposed to be all. For such services on behalf of the father it was not probable that much money would be paid to the son; and the less so as it was known in Keswick that Daniel Thwaite had quarreled with the Countess. As this latter opinion preponderated, Daniel did not find that he was treated with any marked respect in his native town.

The old man did leave a will—a very simple document, by which every thing that he had was left to his son. And there was this paragraph in it, "I expect that the Countess Lovel will repay to my son Daniel all moneys that I have advanced on her behalf." As for bonds, or any single bond, Daniel could find none. There was an account of certain small items due by the Countess, of long date, and there was her ladyship's receipt for a sum of £500, which had apparently been lent at the time of the trial for bigamy. Beyond this he could find no record of any details whatever, and it seemed to him that his claim was reduced to something less than £600. Nevertheless he had understood from his father that the whole of the old man's savings had been spent on behalf of the two ladies, and he believed that some time since he had heard a sum named exceeding £6000. In his difficulty he asked a local attorney, and the attorney advised him to throw himself on the generosity of the Countess. He paid the attorney some small fee, and made up his mind at once that he would not take the lawyer's advice. He would not throw himself upon the generosity of the Countess.

There was then still living in that neighborhood a great man, a poet, who had nearly carried to its close a life of great honor and of many afflictions. He was one who, in these, his latter days, eschewed all society, and cared to see no faces but those of the surviving few whom he had loved in early life. And as those few survivors lived far away, and as he was but little given to move from home, his life was that of a recluse. Of the inhabitants of the place around him, who for the most part had congregated there since he had come among them, he saw but little, and his neighbors said that he was sullen and melancholic. But, according to their degrees, he had been a friend to Thomas Thwaite, and now, in his emergency, the son called upon the poet. Indifferent visitors, who might be and often were intruders, were but seldom admitted at that modest gate; but Daniel Thwaite was at once shown into the presence of the man of letters. They had not seen each other since Daniel was a youth, and neither would have known the other. The poet was hardly yet an old man, but he had all the characteristics of age. His shoulders were bent, and his eyes were deep set in his head, and his lips were thin and fast closed. But the beautiful oval of his face was still there, in spite of the ravages of years, of labors, and of sorrows; and the special brightness of his eye had not yet been dimmed. "I have been sorry, Mr. Thwaite, to hear of your father's death," said the poet. "I knew him well, but it was some years since, and I valued him as a man of singular probity and spirit." Then Daniel craved permission to tell his story; and he told it all from the beginning to the end—how his father and he had worked for the Countess and her girl; how their time and then their money had been spent for her; how he had learned to love the girl, and how, as he believed, the girl had loved him. And he told with absolute truth the whole story, as far as he knew it, of what had been done in London during the last nine months. He exaggerated nothing, and did not scruple to speak openly of his own hopes. He showed his letter to the Countess, and her note to him, and while doing so hid none of his own feelings. Did the poet think that there was any reason why, in such circumstances, a tailor should not marry the daughter of a countess? And then he gave, as far as he knew it, the history of the money that had been advanced, and produced a copy of his father's will.

"And now, Sir, what would you have me do?"

"When you first spoke to the girl of love, should you not have spoken to the mother also, Mr. Thwaite?"

"Would you, Sir, have done so?"

"I will not say that; but I think that I ought. Her girl was all that she had."

"It may be that I was wrong. But if the girl loves me now—"

"I would not hurt your feelings for the world, Mr. Thwaite."

"Do not spare them, Sir. I did not come to you that soft things might be said to me."

"I do not think it of your father's son. Seeing what is your own degree in life and what is theirs, that they are noble and of an old nobility, among the few hot-house plants of the nation, and that you are one of the people—a blade of corn out of the open field, if I may say so—born to eat your bread in the sweat of your brow, can you think that such a marriage would be other than distressing to them?"

"Is the hot-house plant stronger or better, or of higher use, than the ear of corn?"

"Have I said that it was, my friend? I will not say that either is higher in God's sight than the other, or better, or of a nobler use. But they are different; and though the differences may verge together without evil when the limits are near, I do not believe in graftings so violent as this."

"You mean, Sir, that one so low as a tailor should not seek to marry so infinitely above himself as with the daughter of an earl."

"Yes, Mr. Thwaite, that is what I mean; though I hope that in coming to me you knew me well enough to be sure that I would not willingly offend you."

"There is no offense—there can be no offense. I am a tailor, and am in no sort ashamed of my trade. But I did not think, Sir, that you believed in lords so absolutely as that."

"I believe but in one Lord," said the poet. "In Him who, in His wisdom and for His own purposes, made men of different degrees."

"Has it been His doing, Sir—or the devil's?"

"Nay, I will not discuss with you a question such as that. I will not, at any rate, discuss it now."

"I have read, Sir, in your earlier books—"

"Do not quote my books to me, either early or late. You ask me for advice, and I give it according to my ability. The time may come, too, Mr. Thwaite"—and this he said, laughing—"when you also will be less hot in your abhorrence of a nobility than you are now."

"Never!"

"Ah—'tis so that young men always make assurances to themselves of their own present wisdom."

"You think, then, that I should give her up entirely?"

"I would leave her to herself, and to her mother—and to this young lord, if he be her lover."

"But if she loves me! Oh, Sir, she did love me once. If she loves me, should I leave her to think, as time goes on, that I have forgotten her? What chance can she have if I do not interfere to let her know that I am true to her?"

"She will have the chance of becoming Lady Lovel, and of loving her husband."

"Then, Sir, you do not believe in vows of love?"

"How am I to answer that?" said the poet. "Surely I do believe in vows of love. I have written much of love, and have ever meant to write with truth, as I knew it, or thought that I knew it. But the love of which we poets sing is not the love of the outer world. It is more ecstatic, but far less serviceable. It is the picture of that which exists, but grand with imaginary attributes, as are the portraits of ladies painted by artists who have thought rather of their art than of their models. We tell of a constancy in love which is hardly compatible with the usages of this as yet imperfect world. Look abroad, and see whether girls do not love twice, and young men thrice. They come together, and rub their feathers like birds, and fancy that each has found in the other an eternity of weal or woe. Then come the causes of their parting. Their fathers perhaps are Capulets and Montagues, but their children, God be thanked, are not Romeos and Juliets. Or money does not serve, or distance intervenes, or simply a new face has the poor merit of novelty. The constancy of which the poets sing is the unreal—I may almost say the unnecessary—constancy of a Juliet. The constancy on which our nature should pride itself is that of an Imogen. You read Shakspeare, I hope, Mr. Thwaite."

"I know the plays you quote, Sir. Imogen was a king's daughter, and married a simple gentleman."

"I would not say that early vows should mean nothing," continued the poet, unwilling to take notice of the point made against him. "I like to hear that a girl has been true to her first kiss. But this girl will have the warrant of all the world to justify a second choice. And can you think that because your company was pleasant to her here among your native mountains, when she knew none but you, that she will be indifferent to the charms of such a one as you tell me this Lord Lovel is? She will have regrets—remorse even; she will sorrow, because she knows that you have been good to her. But she will yield, and her life will be happier with him—unless he be a bad man, which I do not know—than it would be with you. Would there be no regrets think you, no remorse, when she found that as your wife she had separated herself from all that she had been taught to regard as delightful in this world? Would she be happy in quarreling with her mother and her new-found relatives? You think little of noble blood, and perhaps I think as little of it in matters relating to myself. But she is noble, and she will think of it. As for your money, Mr. Thwaite, I should make it a matter of mere business with the Countess, as though there was no question relating to her daughter. She probably has an account of the money, and doubtless will pay you when she has means at her disposal."

Hosted by Google

Daniel left his Mentor without another word on his own behalf, expressing thanks for the counsel that had been given to him, and assuring the poet that he would endeavor to profit by it. Then he walked away, over the very paths on which he had been accustomed to stray with Anna Lovel, and endeavored to digest the words that he had heard. He could not bring himself to see their truth. That he should not force the girl to marry him, if she loved another better than she loved him, simply by the strength of her own obligation to him, he could understand. But that it was natural that she should transfer to another the affection that she had once bestowed upon him, because that other was a lord, he would not allow. Not only his heart but all his intellect rebelled against such a decision. A transfer so violent would, he thought, show that she was incapable of loving. And yet this doctrine had come to him from one who, as he himself had said, had written much of love.

But, though he agreed after this fashion with himself, the words of the old poet had had their efficacy. Whether the fault might be with the girl, or with himself, or with the untoward circumstances of the case, he determined to teach himself that he had lost her. He would never love another woman. Though the Earl's daughter could not be true to him, he, the suitor, would be true to the Earl's daughter. There might no longer be Romeos among the noble Capulets and the noble Montagues—whom indeed he believed to be dead to faith; but the salt of truth had not therefore perished from the world. He would get what he could from this wretched wreck of his father's property, obtain payment, if it might be possible, of that poor £500 for which he held the receipt, and then go to some distant land in which the wisest of counselors would not counsel him that he was unfit because of his trade to mate himself with noble blood.

When he had proved his father's will, he sent a copy of it up to the Countess with the following letter:

"KESWICK, November 4, 183—.

"MY LADY,—I do not know whether your ladyship will yet have heard of my father's death. He died here on the 24th of last month. He was taken with apoplexy on the 15th, and never recovered from the fit. I think you will be sorry for him.

"I find myself bound to send your ladyship a copy of his will. Your ladyship perhaps may have some account of what money has passed between you and him. I have none except a receipt for £500 given to you by him many years ago. There is also a bill against your ladyship for £71 18*s.* 9*d.* It may be that no more is due than this, but you will know. I shall be happy to hear from your ladyship on the subject, and am,

"Yours respectfully,
"DANIEL THWAITE."

But he still was resolved that before he departed for the far western land he would obtain from Anna Lovel herself an expression of her determination to renounce him.

CHAPTER XXVII.

LADY ANNA'S LETTER.

IN the mean time the week had gone round, and Lady Anna's letter to the Earl had not yet been written. An army was arrayed against the girl to induce her to write such a letter as might make it almost impossible for her afterward to deny that she was engaged to the lord; but the army had not as yet succeeded. The Countess had not seen her daughter—had been persistent in her refusal to let her daughter come to her till she had, at any rate, repudiated her other suitor; but she had written a strongly worded but short letter, urging it as a great duty that Lady Anna Lovel was bound to support her family and to defend her rank. Mrs. Bluestone, from day to day, with soft, loving words taught the same lesson. Alice Bluestone, in their daily conversations, spoke of the tailor, or rather of this promise to the tailor, with a horror which, at any rate, was not affected. The Sergeant, almost with tears in his eyes, implored her to put an end to the lawsuit. Even the Solicitor-General sent her tender messages, expressing his great hope that she might enable them to have this matter adjusted early in November. All the details of the case as it now stood had been explained to her over and over again. If, when the day fixed for the trial should come round, it could be said that she and the young Earl were engaged to each other, the Earl would altogether abandon his claim, and no further statement would be made. The fact of the marriage in Cumberland would then be proved, the circumstances of the trial for bigamy would be given in evidence, and all the persons concerned would be together anxious that the demands of the two ladies should be admitted in full. It was the opinion of the united lawyers that, were this done, the rank of the Countess would be allowed, and that the property left behind him by the old lord would be at once given up to those who would inherit it under the order of things as thus established. The Countess would receive that to which she would be entitled as widow, the daughter would be the heir at law to the bulk of the personal property, and the Earl would merely claim any real estate, if—as was very doubtful—any real estate had been left in question. In this case the disposition of the property would be just what they would all desire, and the question of rank would be settled forever. But if the young lady should not have then agreed to this very pleasant compromise, the Earl, indeed, would make no further endeavors to invalidate the Cumberland marriage, and would retire from the suit. But it would then be stated that there was a claimant in Sicily, or, at least, evidence in Italy, which, if sifted, might possibly bar the claim of the Countess. The Solicitor-General did not hesitate to say that he believed the living woman to be a weak impostor, who had been first used by the Earl, and had then put forward a falsehood to get an income out of the property; but he was by no means convinced that the other foreign woman, whom the Earl had undoubtedly made his first wife, might not have been alive when the second marriage was contracted. If it were so, the Countess would be no countess, Anna Lovel would simply be Anna Murray, penniless, base-born, and a fit wife for the tailor, should the tailor think fit to take her. "If it be so," said Lady Anna through her tears, "let it be so; and he will take me."

It may have been that the army was too strong for its own purpose—too much of an army to gain a victory on that field—that a weaker combination of forces would have prevailed when all this array failed. No one had a word to say for the tailor; no one admitted that he had been a generous friend; no feeling was expressed for him. It seemed to be taken for granted that he, from the beginning, had laid his plans for obtaining possession of an enormous income in the event of the Countess being proved to be a countess. There was no admission that he had done aught for love. Now in all these matters Lady Anna was sure of but one thing alone, and that was of the tailor's truth. Had they acknowledged that he was good and noble, they might perhaps have persuaded her—as the poet had almost persuaded her lover—that the fitness of things demanded that they should be separated.

But she had promised that she would write the letter by the end of the week, and when the end of a fortnight had come she knew that it must be written. She had declared over and over again to Mrs. Bluestone that she must go away from Bedford Square. She could not live there always, she said. She knew that she was in the way of every body. Why should she not go back to her own mother? "Does mamma mean to say that I am never to live with her any more?" Mrs. Bluestone promised that if she would write her letter and tell her cousin that she would try to love him, she should go back to her mother at once. "But I can not live here always," persisted Lady Anna. Mrs. Bluestone would not admit that there was any reason why her visitor should not continue to live in Bedford Square as long as the arrangement suited Lady Lovel.

Various letters were written for her. The Countess wrote one, which was an unqualified acceptance of the Earl's offer, and which was very short. Alice Bluestone wrote one, which was full of poetry. Mrs. Bluestone wrote a third, in which a great many ambiguous words were used—in which there was no definite promise, and no poetry. But had this letter been sent it would have been almost impossible for the girl afterward to extricate herself from its obligations. The Sergeant, perhaps, had lent a word or two, for the letter was undoubtedly very clever. In this letter Lady Anna was made to say that she would always have the greatest pleasure in receiving her cousin's visits, and that she trusted that she might be able to co-operate with her cousin in bringing the lawsuit to a close—that she certainly would not marry any one without her mother's consent, but that she did not find herself able at the present to say more than that. "It won't stop the Solicitor-General, you know," the Sergeant had remarked, as he read it. "Bother the Solicitor-General!" Mrs. Bluestone had answered, and had then gone on to show that it would lead to that which would stop the learned gentleman. The Sergeant had added a word or two, and great persuasion was used to induce Lady Anna to use this epistle.

But she would have none of it. "Oh, I couldn't, Mrs. Bluestone; he would know that I hadn't written all that."

"You have promised to write, and you are bound to keep your promise," said Mrs. Bluestone.

"I believe I am bound to keep all my promises," said Lady Anna, thinking of those which she had made to Daniel Thwaite.

But at last she sat down and did write a letter for herself, specially premising that no one should see it. When she had made her promise she certainly had not intended to write that which should be shown to all the world. Mrs. Bluestone had begged that at any rate the Countess might see it. "If mamma will let me go to her, of course I will show it her," said Lady Anna. At last it was thought best to allow her to write her own letter and to send it unseen. After many struggles and with many tears she wrote her letter as follows:

"BEDFORD SQUARE, Tuesday.

"MY DEAR COUSIN,—I am sorry that I have been so long in doing what I said I would do. I don't think I ought to have promised, for I find it very difficult to say any thing, and I think that it is wrong that I should write at all. It is not my fault that there should be a lawsuit. I do not want to take any thing away from any body, or to get any thing for myself. I think papa was very wicked when he said that mamma was not his wife, and of course I wish it may all go as she wishes. But I don't think any body ought to ask me to do what I feel to be wrong.

"Mr. Daniel Thwaite is not at all such a person as they say. He and his father have been mamma's best friends, and I shall never forget that. Old Mr. Thwaite is dead, and I am very sorry to hear it. If you had known them as we did, you would understand what I feel. Of course he is not your friend; but he is my friend, and I dare say that makes me unfit to be friends with you. You are a nobleman and he is a tradesman; but when we knew him first he was quite as good as we, and I believe we owe him a great deal of money, which mamma can't pay him. I have heard mamma say before she was angry with him that she would have been in the work-house but for them, and that Mr. Daniel Thwaite might now be very well off, and not a working tailor at all, as Mrs. Bluestone calls him, if they hadn't given all they had to help us. I can not bear after that to hear them speak of him as they do.

"Of course I should like to do what mamma wants; but how would you feel if you had promised somebody else? I do so wish that all this might be stopped altogether. My dear mamma will not allow me to see her; and though every body is very kind, I feel that I ought not to be here with Mrs. Bluestone. Mamma talked of going abroad somewhere. I wish she would, and take me away. I should see nobody then, and there would be no trouble. But I suppose she hasn't got enough money. This is a very poor letter, but I do not know what else I can say.

"Believe me to be,
"My dear cousin,
"Yours affectionately,
"ANNA LOVEL."

Then came in a postscript the one thing that she had to say—"I think that I ought to be allowed to see Mr. Daniel Thwaite."

Lord Lovel, after receiving this letter, called in Bedford Square, and saw Mrs. Bluestone, but he did not show the letter. His cousin was out with the girls, and he did not wait to see her. He merely said that he had received a letter which had not given him much comfort. "But I shall answer it," he said; and the reader, who has seen the one letter, shall see also the other.

"BROWN'S HOTEL, ALBEMARLE STREET,
"4th November, 183—.

"DEAREST ANNA,—I have received your letter, and am obliged to you for it, though there is so little in it to flatter or to satisfy me. I will begin by assuring you that, as far as I am concerned, I do not wish to keep you from seeing Mr. Daniel Thwaite. I believe in my heart of hearts that if you were now to see him often you would feel aware that a union between you and him could not make either of you happy. You do not even say that you think it would do so.

"You defend him as though I had accused him. I grant all that you say in his favor. I do not doubt that his father behaved to you and to your mother with true friendship. But that will not make him fit to be the husband of Anna Lovel. You do not even say that you think that he would be fit. I fancy I understand it all, and I love you better for the pride with which you cling to so firm a friend.

"But, dearest, it is different when we talk of marriage. I imagine that you hardly dare now to think of becoming his wife. I doubt whether you say even to yourself that you love him with that kind of love. Do not suppose me vain enough to believe that therefore you must love me. It is not that. But if you would once tell yourself that he is unfit to be your husband, then you might come to love me, and would not be the less willing to do so because all your friends wish it. It must be something to you that you should be able to put an end to all this trouble.

"Yours, dearest Anna, most affectionately, L.

"I called in Bedford Square this morning, but you were not at home."

"But I do dare," she said to herself, when she had read the letter. "Why should I not dare? And I do say to myself that I love him. Why should I not love him now, when I was not ashamed to love him before? She was being persecuted; and as the step of the wayfarer brings out the sweet scent of the herb which he crushes with his heel, so did persecution with her extract from her heart that strength of character which had hitherto been latent. Had they left her at Yoxham and said never a word to her about the tailor, had the rector and the two aunts showered soft courtesies on her head, they might have vanquished her. But now the spirit of opposition was stronger within her than ever.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The Bidwell Convicts.—A Triumph for the Ladies.—The new Canterbury Pilgrims.

MESSRS. BIDWELL and company, of New York, have at last obtained the reward for which they have so long and diligently labored, in a sentence of penal servitude for life. The whole history of commercial crime affords no parallel to this astounding case. These four men were possessed among them of no less than £10,000, and understanding that your wise precaution of sending round the acceptances of bills to be "initialed" is dispensed with in this country, they came over hither solely to trade with their capital on that platform, and rob the Bank of England. With the particulars of the affair you are doubtless already acquainted. In one of my own letters I showed how this stupendous fabric of roguery broke down through a single weak point—their neglect to date two of their forged bills, which accordingly were sent to the acceptor (not from any suspicion of their authenticity, but simply to have the omission rectified), when, of course, all was discovered. Every shilling of the stolen £100,000, that whale to catch which they threw out their sprat of £10,000, with which they bought genuine bills to establish confidence, has been, I believe, recovered by the bank; but the prisoners, it seems, though they lived extravagantly enough, with traveling-bags costing £50 apiece, for example, made to order, and stamped with their crests (a hand passant into another man's pocket, I suppose), had not spent their all, since at the very last moment a plot was discovered for their escape from Newgate, in which no less than three warders were concerned, one being taken with £100 in gold about him, a portion only, doubtless, of the bribe he was to have got had their release been effected. The discovery of these gentlemen's whereabouts was mainly owing to their devotion to the fair sex; but it is due alone to the extradition act between our two countries (in accordance with which you so promptly took action in this matter) that they are not now at large to commit their depredations in "fresh fields [green ones] and pastures new." Apart from the special interest of the case, it affords a curious example of how rogues in grain can yet be faithful to one another, and pitiful, even in the hour of their own doom, for the ruin they have brought upon others. The elder Bidwell's appeal for mercy for his brother, and his attempted defense of Noyes, was, I am told, a touching spectacle; while the apology they made to the manager of the bank (Colonel Francis) for having made a cat's-paw of him had something very gentleman-like about it, which, I hope, the poor colonel appreciated.

The wealth left by the Duke of Brunswick to Geneva seems at present literally incalculable. Twelve hundred thousand pounds' worth of gold and jewels has, however, been found in his boxes, and also six hundred thousand pounds' worth of Pacific Railway bonds, while a telegram from Prince Bismarck to the German consul at Geneva owns to two millions and a half personalty in Germany. It will not surprise you to hear that his mistress, though always called the Duchess of Brunswick, has been left absolutely destitute, or that his brother, the reigning duke, is resolved to dispute the will on the ground of insanity.

In England, as you know, our ladies are very much behindhand in the assertion of their rights; still, they have always asserted that it is not from any fault of their own that they have failed in intellectual competition with men: they have not been given a fair chance. To this it has been triumphantly replied that no woman has ever yet obtained a first class in our new local examinations, open to both sexes. Imagine, then, the sensation that has been produced among us by Miss Rogers, a young lady who has just obtained the first place in the first division of the senior candidates at Oxford! Such a success as this will do more to forward the woman's rights question in a reasonable way than all the declamations in its favor. It happens at a most opportune time, too, since the birth of Dr. Elizabeth Garrett's baby is just now evoking much ridicule, upon the ground that it will be very inconvenient to employ a medical attendant who is liable to such visitations, while "the faculty" seem more inclined to be exclusive than ever.

How you must hug yourselves under your stars and stripes, when you behold what tricks are being played in Europe by kings by right divine, like the Comte de Chambord and Don Carlos! In their self-importance and pretension, they seem to have lost every vestige of common-sense. The Spanish would-be monarch wrote last week to his cousin to state his programme, and condescendingly allows that there is a doubt about the people being made expressly for kings to rule over them; but he of the "white flag" will make no such admission.

If it was merely that these old-world shadows are declaiming to Frenchmen and Spaniards, I should say I had too great a confidence in human nature to believe that any thing could come of it. It is a curious coincidence, however, if nothing more, that contemporaneously with the disinterment of the august pretenders, a sort of galvanic life has been given in England to ideas that have been exploded ever since the Reformation. This very morning the train has started from London which takes the English pilgrims to the shrine of Paray-le-Monial. They are of all ranks, from the Duke of Norfolk down to the humble but pious excursionists who use Messrs. Cook's through tickets and hotel coupons. The affair has no national significance whatever, but that it should happen at all in these days takes one's breath away. Poor Lord Westbury's opinion of it would have been probably something worth hearing, and I can well imagine the mincing accents in which he would have discoursed upon "this leetle peelgrimage to Paray-le-Monial." To judge by his last testament, it seems he entertained the same opinion of his first-born (Dick Bethell) as the rest of the world, for he has left the bulk of his property "to accumulate," and £50,000 of it "to go to that successor to the title of Lord Westbury who shall not have been born in the lifetime of the testator." Yet Dick is a peer of the realm, for all this.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

GEORGE ELIOT'S SAYINGS.

FROM THE "MILL ON THE FLOSS."

A MAN with an affectionate disposition, who finds a wife to concur with his fundamental idea of life, easily comes to persuade himself that no other woman would have suited him so well, and does a little daily snapping and quarreling without any sense of alienation.

The middle-aged, who have lived through their strongest emotions, but are yet in the time when memory is still half passionate and not merely contemplative, should surely be a sort of natural priesthood, whom life has disciplined and consecrated to be the refuge and rescue of early stumblers and victims of self-despair. Most of us, at some moment in our young lives, would have welcomed a priest of that natural order in any sort of canonicals or uncanonicals, but had to scramble upward into all the difficulties of nineteen entirely without such aid.

Great sorrows bring lines in well-rounded faces, and broaden the streaks of white among the hairs that once looked as if they had been dipped in pure sunshine.

All long-known objects, even a mere window fastening or a particular door-latch, have sounds which are a sort of recognized voice to us—a voice that will thrill and awaken, when it has been used to touch deep-lying fibres.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—NUT BROWN VIGOGNE HOUSE DRESS.—FRONT.

Fig. 2.—NUT BROWN VIGOGNE HOUSE DRESS.—BACK.

Nut Brown Vigogne House Dress, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS dress of nut brown vigogne consists of a skirt, over-skirt, and basque-waist, trimmed with folds of brown gros grain and silk fringe. The bottom of the skirt is cut in points, as shown by the illustration. The basque-waist is trimmed with folds extending around the neck. Pleated Swiss muslin collar and under-sleeves.

Black Camel's-hair and Gros Grain House Dress, Figs. 1 and 2.

SKIRT of black gros grain, trimmed with folds in front and gathered ruffles of the material in the back. The ruffles are bound narrow on the under edge with the material. The polonaise is of black camel's-hair. The edge is cut in uneven points, as shown by the illustration, and is bound with black gros grain. The waist and sleeves are trimmed to correspond. Buttons and button-holes serve for closing.

CURIOSITIES OF TREE-PLANTING.

A PROVERB of Northwest India declares that three things make a man to be truly a man—to have a son born to him, to dig a well, and to plant a tree. It is impossible for one who has not seen it to realize the misery of a treeless country. Both in East and West trees were no doubt the first temples, and the planting of groves was the primitive form of church-building. Abraham, we are told, planted a grove in Beersheba, to commemorate his solemn covenant; but among his descendants it became in time the mark of a pious ruler to "cut down the groves," as the seats of pagan worship, the mark of a careless ruler to leave them untouched, and the mark of an impious ruler to plant and dedicate new groves.

Tree-planting has, in fact, retained in Germany longer than elsewhere something of its cult character, binding together religion, nation, and family. In the Vosgesen, the old German farmers were not allowed to marry until they had done something for the future good of the tribe by planting a stated number of walnut-trees. When the amiable and liberal Oberlin was pastor of Waldbach, in the Steinthal, he set forward this old custom of tree-planting as a Christian duty.

The asking of a distinguished guest to plant a tree is a pleasant way of commemorating his visit. According to the German fancy, no tree planted as a memorial will grow and flourish unless it has a motto given it at the time of its planting. When the late Baron Bunsen was visiting Lepsius at Berlin in 1857, the antiquary requested him to plant a young oak in his beautiful garden. "I held the tree," writes Bunsen, "while the earth was thrown over its vigorous roots, and I said in giving the name:

"'Oak, I plant thee. Grow in beauty; straight and firm and vigorous stand!
Bunsen is the name I give thee: flourish in the German land.
For the house of Lepsius blooming, through the storms grow fair and free,
And a shelter in the noonday to his children's children be!'"

One of his sons planted at the same time a Weymouth pine, to which they fastened the accommodating German motto, Wonnemuth (joyful courage).

Tree-planting is as necessary a part in many German rejoicings as it has been of French rejoicings during each revolutionary epoch. The Trees of Liberty, however, were often planted to die—actually as well as metaphorically. I have seen trees of this kind, stripped of all but a crown of leaves, planted in German Switzerland to mark a local festival. The poor people of the village of Clevers-ulzbach gathered together on the 10th of November, 1859, around the grave of Schiller's mother, and marked the birthday of her son by planting a lime-tree "in the soil that covers the heart that loved him best." When the parish priest of Starrkirch, in the German canton of Solothurn, was excommunicated, his parishioners planted a tree opposite his parsonage with the very determined motto, Dem Pfarrer zum Schutz, Rom zum Trutz. Individual trees planted by famous men are still to be seen by the pilgrims who visit their homes and haunts. In the last century there was quite a fashion for planting willows. It is said that the first weeping-willow seen in England was sent to the poet Pope as a present, from Turkey, by his friend Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, and planted by him in his garden at Twickenham. It is the famous Salix babylonica of the Psalter, upon which, on the banks of the Euphrates, the weeping daughters of Jerusalem hung their harps. Garrick planted two willows on his lawn beside his Shakspeare Temple; in the midst of a thunder-storm, which destroyed one of them, the pious and devoted widow of the great actor was seen running up and down excitedly, crying out, "Oh, my Garrick! oh, my Garrick!" The willow known as Dr. Johnson's willow, at Lichfield, was blown down long ago; it was said in the Gardener's Magazine to have been planted by him, but it is more probable that his admiration and talk of it developed the legend of his planting it. At the time of its destruction it was thirteen feet in girth. Pieces of household furniture and snuff-boxes were made of it, and slips from it were planted by his admirers throughout the neighboring country; an offset of the old tree was planted on the same site. Thomas Moore tells us that when Byron first went to Newstead Abbey from Aberdeen, at the age of ten, he planted a young oak in some part of the grounds. He had a notion, or thought he had, that as it flourished so should he. Six or seven years later, on revisiting the spot, he found his oak choked up with weeds and almost dead. The mulberry-tree in the beautiful gardens of Christ College, Cambridge, owed its defensive bands of lead and its props to the legend that it was planted by Milton. There is an oak in the gardens of the convent of St. Onophrio at Rome, in which Tasso died, which has long been said to have been planted by the poet; some of the monks, however, have begun to ascribe its planting to the more saintly hands of St. Philip Neri. The planting of an orange-tree in the convent of St. Sabina in Rome is now attributed to St. Dominic, in the year 1200; and another orange-tree in the convent of Fondi to the famous Dominican, St. Thomas Aquinas, in 1278.

Fig. 1.—BLACK CAMEL'S-HAIR AND GROS GRAIN HOUSE DRESS.—FRONT.

Fig. 2.—BLACK CAMEL'S-HAIR AND GROS GRAIN HOUSE DRESS.—BACK.

Hosted by Google

LOVE IN A MAZE.

LOVE IN A MAZE.

IN this ingenious picture we see the concentrated essence of a novelette. There is, first, the indispensable young lady; there is, secondly, the lover who pursues her, but whom she does not like; there is, thirdly, the lover who also pursues her and whom she does like. The young lady, to whom we may suppose the intricacies of the labyrinth are familiar, has taken her seat in the centre of the maze, for the ostensible purpose of reading a book. The rivals give chase, perhaps they meet occasionally, both in a state of puzzlement, and glower fiercely at each other. At length the favored suitor, guided either by his superior intellectual acumen, or possibly by telegraphic signs from his sweetheart, gains the desired "bower of bliss," while his rival remains discomfited, looking, from t'other side of the hedge, as disconsolate as a stray horse in a pound. These ingeniously contrived labyrinthine puzzles are popular adjuncts to pleasure-grounds in England. In this country they are seldom seen. The Central Park, indeed, has its maze, but on rather a small scale, and disappointing to any one who expects to see in it a sort of Fair Rosamond's bower.

MOHAMMEDAN FESTIVALS.

THE religious fasts and festivals of the Mohammedan religion are exceedingly repulsive, and also very inconvenient to foreigners visiting Tangier. The Ramadan, for instance, during which no true believer will either eat, drink, smoke, or bathe for a whole month between the hours of sunrise and sunset, is a period of quite as severe trial to the infidels as to them; for every conceivable contrivance by which noise can be made, in order to keep the faithful awake, so that they may eat during the privileged hours, is resorted to. Nothing more horrible than the diversified din by which night is made hideous for all ears can possibly be conceived. But, in certain respects, the festivals are much more odious.

Hosted by Google

The detestable cruelty of the feast of Rams, in which the whole town is turned into a huge slaughter-house, and the streets literally run blood, while scenes of disgusting gluttony testify to the zeal of the true believers, is enough to make one rush away from Tangier, regardless of one's lungs, at its approach. It is consolatory to be told that in the Mohammedan countries the feast is not celebrated with such superfluous barbarities as at Tangier, where the proceedings are regarded with supreme contempt by all the non-Moorish part of the population. A so-called Christian festival is celebrated on Holy Saturday by the Christians; it is only ludicrous, not cruel, and consists of the following observances: "All the devout Spanish and Portuguese Christians of Tangier arise early on this morning, set aside for the commemoration of the treachery and suicide of Judas Iscariot, and forming into parties, carry about monstrous effigies of the recreant apostle, with much firing of guns, shouting, and noise. They parade through the quarters of the town where the Jews reside, and every time one of the processions arrives outside a Jew's house it is brought to a stop, and Judas Iscariot is flogged with as much zeal and ardor as if he were the real live traitor, instead of a bundle of straw and old clothes. After this he is hanged from any convenient window, and then a party assemble below and fire at the suspended traitor until he is literally riddled with holes, when he is taken down and buried." The Jews also have the feast of Purim, on which they celebrate the murder of Haman and his sons; but as it is to be presumed the families concerned on that occasion are extinct, this demonstration hurts nobody, and so lacks the stimulating attraction of malice.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A VILLAGE DOCTRESS.—It is rumored that plain round waists will be revived later in the season. The hair is still worn in finger puffs and crown braids, but not as far forward as formerly. It is dressed far enough back to show the wavy tresses that are parted in the middle and drawn back on the forehead. Soft little kid shoes of buff, blue, or pink are buttoned on the side of baby's feet when it is put into short clothes. Velvet polonaises will be worn again.

TWO OF US.—Seal-skin cloaks of very dark shade are well worn in mourning. A demi-trained silk without lustre, and trimmed with crape, is the suitable "fall dress" for you. Have a crape sleeveless jacket with high ruff to wear with various dresses. Black crêpe lisse ruffs and doubled tulle edged with fine jet are stylish for you. Your suit need not be altered. Get a little seal-skin jacket and turban for your blonde of seven.

GLASGOW, SCOTLAND.—Make your Irish poplin evening dress with a demi-trained skirt and basque. Put bias lengthwise bands from belt to foot on the three front breadths and five flounces on the back widths, covering them from the belt down. Make your basque quite short behind, but in long points or square tabs in front. Have a velvet revers and ruff of the color of the dress with a lace ruff inside. Put two velvet cords on the edge of the basque for trimming, and also pipe the bands on the skirt with velvet. The sleeves should be close to the elbow and flounced below.

D. C. S.—Get a long sacque of soft flannel cloth either black and white stripes or else blue and gray for your boy. Read about Fall Redingotes in Bazar No. 38, Vol. VI. Get blue serge and black alpaca dresses for a girl of eight years.

MERRIMAC.—Read about black silks in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI. Silks are naturally higher when first imported than at the end of the season. Bonnet's silk is chosen for fineness, Ponson's for heaviness.

WILLIE S.—Make your black silk with a demi-polonaise like that described in Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI. Get a dark blue silk skirt with blue camel's-hair redingote for another suit. Your velvet polonaise will answer again, but may require some new arrangement of drapery. Get a suit of striped serge—myrtle green ground with red stripe, or else blue with white—for the house; for this consult Bazar No. 40, Vol. VI. You can order the "Ugly Girl" papers from this office at ten cents a paper.

MISS L. M'L.—We do not reply by mail. Use the jockey basque suit pattern sent you for your black silk. Ruffles and folds are both used again. You will learn all about them in the New York Fashions of Bazar Nos. 39 and 40, Vol. VI. Twenty-five cents will be returned to you, as the suit pattern costs only 25 cents.

MRS. L. S. O.—Trim your gray and black striped poplin with black velvet bands. Put side pleatings and bias bands on child's merino dress.

MRS. M. H. S.—Make up your silk skirt and with it a loose-front belted polonaise of black cashmere instead of velveteen. This will suit you far better than a basque and over-skirt—indeed it would be a good model for a black silk polonaise of your dress material made with a view to alteration. The round high waist with revers and ruff, coat sleeves, and trimmed demi-train will be stylish.

JEAN.—Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI. Your dresses should be the length ladies wear, now that you are eighteen—for instance, just escaping the ground in the street, and demi-trained in the house.

MIZPEH.—Make a flounced skirt of your crimson silk, and get very dark wine-colored cashmere for a redingote to wear over it. It is rather bright for the street, and will need a dark over dress to make it more stylishly sombre. For black alpacas read hints in Bazar No. 40, Vol. VI.

PEGGOTY.—Silk skirt with polonaise of cashmere or camel's-hair is the regulation suit for a wedding and traveling dress. Get olive, slate, or deep blue. Velvet round hat and gloves to match. Read about black alpacas in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 40, Vol. VI. Polonaises will be worn in the winter. For black silks consult Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI. A demi-trained silk dress of any of the new dark shades will be useful to you for dinners, visiting, church, etc. Have also a mantilla or an English walking jacket.

VA.—Read answer just given "Peggoty," as it is in reply to queries about an October trousseau.

HELEN.—The demi-polonaise style described in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI., is what you want for your black silk.

KITTEN OF N.—A blouse-polonaise, belted, and a skirt with two gathered flounces is the model for even very simple school dresses.

THE FALLING LEAVES betoken approaching winter, when nothing makes a parlor so cheerful or a kitchen so neat as a well-polished stove, and DIXON'S STOVE POLISH will do it in five minutes, without dust or smell. Established Forty-Six Years. Try it. Made only by THE JOSEPH DIXON CRUCIBLE CO., Jersey City, N. J.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HAIR!!!

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, corner Fourth Street,
Branch Store, 345 Sixth Avenue,

Begs leave to call the attention of the ladies to his superb stock of Human Hair Goods, of the best quality of hair only, without any intermixing whatsoever, of his own importation and manufacture.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.
RETAILED AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

I can offer to the public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors.
All goods WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches $1 and upward. Finest quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed, 18 inches long, 4 ounces weight, - - - $5 00
Do. 22 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 6 00
Do. 26 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 8 00
Do. 32 do. do. 4 do. do. - - - 10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.

Long Single Curls, natural Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE Removed to 345 6th AVENUE,
Bet. 20th and 21st Streets.

Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

WEBSTER'S PATENT

BUTTON HOLE WORKER

Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.
Is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented. So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent by mail to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

Fashions Opening!

From Smith's Illustrated Pattern Bazaar.

1360—THE REDINGOTE—FAMED for beautifying any style of figure. Is a complete costume with any kind of skirt. Double-breasted and rolling-collar Requires only eight yards of twenty-seven-inch goods. All sizes. Price of pattern, with a CLOTH MODEL, 50 cts. Mailed.
We give a perfect CLOTH MODEL with every pattern, which shows just how to put the garment together after being cut by the pattern. They are PERFECT GUIDES.

172—WAIST—Is a new and bewitching design. The back sets out just enough to give a modest, graceful effect. In any material. All sizes. Price of pattern and CLOTH MODEL, 25 cts. Mailed.

Immense Premiums Given!
Smith's Illustrated Pattern Bazaar
Only ONE DOLLAR a Year.

PREMIUM to every subscriber of patterns of their selection to the value of One Dollar, Free, OR, in place of Patterns, you may choose ONE of the following beautiful Oil Chromos, viz.: WHITTIER'S "BAREFOOT BOY," 10x14 inches; "THE UNWELCOME VISITOR," 13x17 inches; "THE MATRON," 13x17 inches; "THE PET LAMB," 14x17 inches. Two stamps must be enclosed for postage on each chromo. These pictures sell readily for from $1 to $3 each. Send two stamps for Catalogue of Styles.

CLUB. —One Chromo Extra will be given to the person who sends us three subscribers at one time. Two extra for five, etc.

"SMITH'S INSTRUCTION BOOK," or, "Secrets of Dressmaking" in Ladies' and Children's Garments will be ready in a few days. Price, 10 cents. Mailed.

A. BURDETTE SMITH,
P.O. Box 5055. 914 Broadway, New York City.

Science of Health, FIRST-CLASS MAGAZINE at $2 00 a year; or, on trial Six Months $1 00. S. R. WELLS, 389 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

THREE PAIR Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1 00. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, Dress-Trimmings, &c. Price-List sent free on application.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

LAFONTAIN'S FRENCH COMPLEXION BEAUTIFIER removes TAN AND FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, AND FLESHWORMS. Price $1 00 per Bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 SIXTH AVENUE. Agents wanted.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

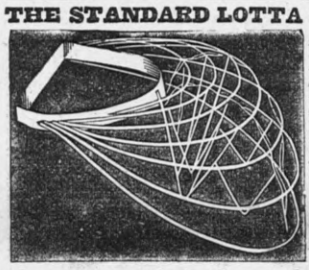
VIENNA PREMIUMS.

THE WILSON SHUTTLE
SEWING-MACHINES
Received the Grand
PRIZE MEDAL
AND MEDAL OF HONOR
FOR THE
BEST SEWING-MACHINE,
THE BEST MADE SEWING-MACHINES,
AND THREE
Co-Operative Medals
FOR
The Best Made Set of Harness,
The Best Made Side Saddle,
The Best Boot and Shoe Work,
And the Best Samples of Cloth Sewing.

No other Sewing-Machines received Premiums on their merits, which we will prove by evidence at our office, and that all reports relating to the contrary are false.

Machines Sold on Easy Monthly Payments.
SALESROOM:
707 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
And all other Cities in the United States.

THE STANDARD LOTTA BUSTLE.



A diploma has been awarded by the American Institute to A. W. Thomas, Patentee & Manufacturer for the lightest, strongest, most durable, comfortable, elastic, and cheapest Bustle in the market. The wearer can sit in any position whatever without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree, it closing entirely up on sitting, and returning with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault). No ladies' wardrobe complete without the Standard Lotta Bustle. For sale every where. Ask for Nos. 10, 11, 15, 18, 22, &c., comprising the various sizes and styles. Patentee and Wholesale Manufacturer, 91 White St., N.Y.; & 801 Race St., Phila.

ASK YOUR STOREKEEPER FOR IT.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.
Trade Mark. Established
Sold by all Druggists.

Seeds for Fall Sowing.
Bulbs for Fall Planting.
Plants for Winter Flowering.

Embracing every thing NEW and RARE in great variety, and at LOW RATES. Price-Lists mailed free to all applicants.

Peter Henderson & Co.
Seedsmen, 35 Cortlandt St., New York.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON
Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 39 East 33d St., N. Y.

ELEGANT BONNETS,
Made to order, sent any where by Express for $10, $12, $15, to $25. All Shopping orders filled promptly. Send for particulars and reference.
Mrs. L. M. HAVENS, Box 4314, N. Y. City.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS, in any quantities. Send for Circular.
MME. L. CENDRIER, 636 Broadway, N. Y.

MME. BURLETON, 21 Clinton Place, near B'way, Eighth St., West. The latest style of Fall Bonnets and Round Hats; also, Mourning Bonnets.

GRANDEST SCHEME EVER KNOWN.

4th Grand Gift Concert

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE
PUBLIC LIBRARY OF KENTUCKY.

12,000 CASH GIFTS, $1,500,000.

$250,000 FOR $50.

The Fourth Grand Gift Concert, authorized by special act of the Legislature, for the benefit of the Public Library of Kentucky, will take place in Public Library Hall, at Louisville, Ky.,

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1873.

Only Sixty thousand tickets will be sold. The tickets are divided into ten coupons or parts.

At this Concert, which will be the grandest musical display ever witnessed in this country, the unprecedented sum of

$1,500,000

divided into 12,000 cash gifts, will be distributed by lot among the ticket-holders.

LIST OF GIFTS.

ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		$250,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		100,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		50,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		25,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		17,500
10 CASH GIFTS	$10,000 each	100,000
30 CASH GIFTS	5,000 each	150,000
50 CASH GIFTS	1,000 each	50,000
80 CASH GIFTS	500 each	40,000
100 CASH GIFTS	400 each	40,000
150 CASH GIFTS	300 each	45,000
250 CASH GIFTS	200 each	50,000
325 CASH GIFTS	100 each	32,500
11,000 CASH GIFTS	50 each	550,000
TOTAL, 12,000 GIFTS, ALL CASH, amounting to		$1,500,000

The distribution will be positive, whether all the tickets are sold or not, and the 12,000 gifts all paid in proportion to the tickets sold.

PRICE OF TICKETS:

Whole tickets, $50; Halves, $25; Tenths, or each coupon, $5; Eleven Whole Tickets for $500; 22½ Tickets for $1,000; 113 Whole Tickets for $5,000; 227 Whole Tickets for $10,000. No discount on less than $500 worth of Tickets at a time.

Tickets now ready for sale, and all orders accompanied by the money promptly filled. Liberal terms given to those who buy to sell again.

THOS. E. BRAMLETTE,
Agent Public Library Ky., and Manager Gift Concert,
Public Library Building, Louisville, Ky.
Or THOS. H. HAYS,
609 Broadway, New York.

WATERS' CONCERTO PARLOR ORGANS

are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. The CONCERTO STOP is the best ever placed in any Organ. It is produced by a third set of reeds peculiarly voiced, the EFFECT of which is MOST CHARMING and SOUL STIRRING, while its IMITATION of the HUMAN VOICE is SUPERB. Terms liberal. A GREAT OFFER. HORACE WATERS & SON, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of 100 PIANOS and ORGANS of first-class makers, including WATERS', at extremely low prices for cash, or part cash, and balance in small monthly payments. New 7-Octave first-class PIANOS, all modern improvements, for $275 cash. Organs $55, $75. DOUBLE-REED ORGANS, $100; 4-STOP, $110; 8-STOP, $125, upwards. ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES MAILED for one stamp. A large discount to Ministers, Churches, Sunday-Schools, Temperance Societies, Lodges, etc. AGENTS WANTED.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS.
AGENTS WANTED.
SEND FOR CATALOGUE.
Domestic Sewing-Machine Co., N. Y.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

RETAIL.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

HAVE OPENED AN INVOICE OF

FINE PARIS MILLINERY,

INCLUDING

PARIS-MADE HATS AND BONNETS, of the Latest Styles, DIRECT FROM THE FIRST PARISIAN HOUSES, whose customers are fashion's leaders. Also, an assortment of HATS AND BONNETS Made and Trimmed here.

UNTRIMMED HATS AND BONNETS,
OSTRICH PLUMES AND TIPS,
FEATHERS, FLOWERS,
BRIDAL WREATHS AND GARNITURES,
ORNAMENTS, VEILS, &c.

MOURNING HATS AND BONNETS,
IN GREAT VARIETY.

☞ ORDERS for Dress or Mourning Millinery executed UNDER SUPERIOR MANAGEMENT IN A FEW HOURS' NOTICE, without disappointment, equal in style and elegance to the choicest foreign productions.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

EXPOSITION OF

FALL AND WINTER FABRICS,

&c., &c., &c.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

Are now exhibiting full lines of

FALL AND WINTER MATERIALS,

INCLUDING THE

LATEST "PARISIAN NOVELTIES"

Introduced this SEASON in

PLAIN AND FANCY DRESS GOODS, all the fashionable tints.
BLACK, FANCY, AND PLAIN SILKS, in all the Colorings suitable for STREET AND EVENING COSTUMES.
RICH LACES AND PARIS EMBROIDERIES.
MOURNING DEPARTMENT replete with every Novelty.
BLACK CLOAKING VELVETS, "Lyons" Manufacture.
COLORED AND BLACK TRIMMING VELVETS, suitable for all descriptions of manufacture.
MISSES', LADIES', AND GENTLEMEN'S HOSIERY AND UNDERWEAR.
GENTLEMEN'S AND LADIES' FURNISHING DEPARTMENTS (complete in every detail.)
BLANKETS, FLANNELS, AND QUILTS, &c.
FALL WRAPS, HOUSE JACKETS, SHAWLS, RUGS, &c., &c.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

1873. FALL 1873.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

MILLER & GRANT,

879 Broadway, N. Y.,

ARE DAILY RECEIVING

NEW IMPORTATIONS OF RICH LACES,
EMBROIDERIES, RIBBONS,
DRESS TRIMMINGS, &c., &c.

ALSO, NOVELTIES IN FANCY GOODS.

☞ ELEGANT DESIGNS IN OXIDIZED SILVER.

Ehrich's

REAL LACES, EMBROIDERIES, BLACK SILKS, AND MOURNING GOODS, LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S UNDERWEAR, SHAWLS, FINE FURS, HATS, FEATHERS, RIBBONS, SUITS, &c., &c.

FIRST-CLASS GOODS at Popular Prices.

Samples sent free on application.

Goods shipped C.O.D., with full privilege of examination.

Send stamp for Fall Price-List.

EHRICH & CO.,
287 & 289 Eighth Avenue, New York.

FINE FURS.

A large assortment, at less than manufacturers' prices. Send for Price-List. Orders promptly attended to and sent C. O. D., with privilege of examination.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

OPIUM AND MORPHINE HABIT CURED!

Medicine compounded by a Sufferer, a Surgeon U.S.A. Also cures Drunkenness. It always cures. Send for work on "Opium-eating and its Cure," to
W. B. SQUIRE,
Worthington, Greene Co., Ind.

GOODALL'S PLAYING CARDS.

The Best and Cheapest.
Sold Every Where.

DR. NOBLE'S GREAT DISCOVERY.—A certain cure for fever and ague, bilious fever, and chill fever. A tonic. Price $1 per bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 Sixth Ave. Sold every where. Agents wanted.

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery,

Cor. 4th St., N. Y.

The largest stock of Human Hair goods in the city. Wigs made to order by the best artists. A perfect fit guaranteed. The invisible wig a specialty. No. 1, round the head; No. 2, from forehead to nape of neck; No. 3, from ear to ear across crown; No. 4, from ear to ear across forehead. Goods sent C.O.D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN Dress Shields will absorb moisture and protect the Dress thoroughly. The Perforated Premium Buckskin Undergarments are recommended by all Physicians. Send for circulars. D. C. HALL & Co., 44 West Broadway, N.Y., Sole Agents and Manufacturers.

V. VIGOUROUX, 122 4th Ave., N.Y.

Stamping, Embroidering, Lingerie Establishment. Ladies' & Babies' Trousseau. Specialty of Initial Monograms for HANDKERCHIEFS, TABLE and BED CLOTHS. Wholesale Department, ☞ 69 EAST TWELFTH STREET. MACHINE AND PERFORATED PATTERNS.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.

PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..No. 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)..... " 50

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)..... " 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT.... " 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 17
LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 23
GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT. " 24
BLOUSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 28
LADIES' AND MISSES' BATHING OR GYMNASTIC SUIT..... " 30
PLEATED WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 32
DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 32
ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT..... " 39

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$72 00 EACH WEEK. Agents wanted every where. Business strictly legitimate. Particulars free. Address J. WORTH & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

ONE APPLICATION OF

BARRY'S

Pearl Cream

Mantles the pale and faded cheek with youthful bloom and

BEAUTY.

Sold by all druggists, and at the depot, 26 Liberty St., New York.

Only 50 Cents per Bottle.

Harper & Brothers' Latest Publications.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.

THE LAND OF MOAB. The Result of Travels and Discoveries on the East Side of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. By H. B. TRISTRAM, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Master of the Greatham Hospital, and Honorary Canon of Durham. With New Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. Cloth, $2 50.

II.

FLAMMARION'S ATMOSPHERE. The Atmosphere. Translated from the French of CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Edited by JAMES GLAISHER, F.R.S., Superintendent of the Magnetical and Meteorological Department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. With 10 Chromo-Lithographs, and 86 Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

III.

TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS. The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. (Uniform with Tyerman's "Life of John Wesley.")

IV.

THE BAZAR BOOK OF HEALTH. The Dwelling, the Nursery, the Bedroom, the Dining-Room, the Parlor, the Library, the Kitchen, the Sick-Room. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. (Uniform in style and price with the "Bazar Book of Decorum.")

V.

CASTELAR'S OLD ROME AND NEW ITALY. Old Rome and New Italy. By EMILIO CASTELAR. Translated by Mrs. ARTHUR ARNOLD. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

VI.

LIFE OF ALFRED COOKMAN. The Life of the Rev. Alfred Cookman. By H. B. RIDGAWAY, D.D. With Portrait on Steel. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

VII.

I GO A-FISHING. By W. C. PRIME, Author of "Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia," "Tent Life in the Holy Land," "Later Years," "The Old House by the River," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

THE NEW NOVELS

OF

THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

1.

MISS DOROTHY'S CHARGE. By FRANK LEE BENEDICT, Author of "My Daughter Elinor," "Miss Van Kortland," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

2.

STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "Birds of Prey," "Lovels of Arden," "To the Bitter End," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

3.

A SIMPLETON: A Story of the Day. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

4.

TOO SOON: A Study of a Girl's Heart. By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID, Author of "Patty," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

5.

INNOCENT. A Tale of Modern Life. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," "Chronicles of Carlingford," "John: a Love Story," "Brownlows," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

6.

WILKIE COLLINS'S NEW MAGDALEN. The New Magdalen. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "Armadale," "Moonstone," "Man and Wife," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

EVERYBODY LIKES a beautiful complexion, and a soft, smooth skin; both are obtained by using 'Wright's Alconated Glycerine Tablet of Solidified Glycerine,' fragrant, transparent, and incomparable as a Toilet Soap. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

Every baby must have it. IS THOROUGHLY WATER-PROOF, protects clothing, retains linen diaper, avoids pins, permits circulation of air. Recommended by physicians and all mothers whose children have worn them. Made in 4 sizes—1, smallest; 4 largest—exclusively by EUREKA DIAPER CO., 532 Broadway, N. Y. Sample mailed on receipt of $1. Sold also by Stewart, Claflin, Lord & Taylor, Arnold & Constable and first-class Infants Clothing, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA DIAPER; see they bear stamp of EUREKA PATENT DIAPER CO. Take no other. Agents wanted.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR OCTOBER, 1873.

CONTENTS:

A LADY'S ENTERPRISE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Poultry House on Wheels, Transverse Section.—The Poultry House and Grounds at Belair.—The Egg-Room.—Crève-Cœur Cock.—Crève-Cœur Hen.—Houdan Cock.—Houdan Hen.—Flèche Cock.—Flèche Hen.—Bréda Hen and Cock.—Dorking Cock.—Dorking Hens.—Nankin Cock.—Nankin Hen.—The Epinette.
L'ENVOI AND SONG. By ALFRED H. LOUIS.
GENERAL SHERMAN IN EUROPE AND THE EAST.—(Third Paper.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Castle of Europe and Village within its Walls.—The City of Sebastopol as it now is.—Malakoff.—Circassian Arms.—Tiflis.—Grand Duke Michael.—Pass of Dariel.—Schamyl's Village, Guinib.—Cossacks.—Moscow.—Great Bell at Moscow.—Great Gun at Moscow.—Statue of Peter the Great, St. Petersburg.—Emperor Alexander II.—Gortschakoff.—Grand Duke and Grand Duchess.—Statue of Nicholas I., St. Petersburg.
THE LORDSHIP OF CORFU—A LEGEND OF 1516. By PAUL H. HAYNE.
THE HAMPTON NORMAL AND AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Hampton Institute; the new Building.—Teachers' Home and Girls' Quarters.—Walls of St. John's Church.—Chapel and Farm Manager's House.—Winter-Quarters in front of Institute.—Negro Cabin at Hampton.—Lion and John Solomon.—The Printing-Office.—Girls' Industrial Room.—Reading-Room.—The Assembly-Room.—Ball Club.
MEMNON.
"DAT TADDEUS."
ILLUSTRATION.—"Behold me! I am dat Taddeus!"
WHO WAS RIGHT?
OUR GIRLS.
THE WORLD AND I.
THE HOME OF PAUL AND VIRGINIA.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—"The Souffleur."—The Yamseh.—Les Trois Mamelles.—Cascade of the River Savane.—Le Pont Naturel.
IN A TOBACCO FACTORY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Breaking.—Sorting.—Stemming.—Boiling Licorice and Dipping.—Sprinkling the Flavoring.—Twist-Room.—Examining Work.—Making Negro-Head.—Opening Finishing Pot.—The oldest and the youngest Hand.
LOTTERY. By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.
DETECTIVE PINKERTON. By GENERAL R. B. MARCY, U.S.A.
HERO WORSHIP.
A SIMPLETON.—A STORY OF THE DAY. By CHARLES READE.
THE REPUBLICAN MOVEMENT IN EUROPE. By EMILIO CASTELAR.—(Tenth Paper.)
SEMPER FIDELIS. By ANNIE CHAMBERS KETCHUM.
A LOSS TO THE PROFESSION.
RECOLLECTIONS OF AN OLD STAGER.
THE JUDICIAL RECORD OF THE LATE CHIEF JUSTICE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.
EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.
EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.

THE October Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, contains Twenty-one Contributions, besides the Editorial Departments, with over Sixty Illustrations. Colonel AUDENRIED'S splendidly illustrated description of General Sherman's European tour is concluded; the remarkable poultry establishment of the Baroness de Linas, at Belair, France, is described and illustrated; there is an illustrated paper on the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute for Freedmen; a description of a Tobacco Factory, profusely illustrated by W. L. SHEPARD; and a beautifully illustrated paper on Mauritius, prepared from Colonel Pike's "Sub-tropical Rambles," recently published.

The "Recollections of an Old Stager," and EMILIO CASTELAR'S "Republican Movement in Europe" are continued. General R. B. MARCY contributes some interesting anecdotes of Detective Pinkerton; and there is a very timely and interesting review of the Judicial Record of Chief-Justice Chase by JOHN S. BENSON.

CHARLES READE'S Novel "A Simpleton," is concluded in this Number, and is to be followed in November with a thrilling serial story, entitled "The Living Link," by the author of "The Dodge Club," characteristically illustrated by W. L. SHEPARD. In an early Number will be commenced "My Mother and I," A Love Story for Girls, by the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."

There are three interesting short Stories in this number—one of them illustrated—and five excellent Poems.

The five Editorial Departments are full of entertainment and instruction. The Editor's Historical Record—a department maintained from the earliest number of the Magazine, and the only monthly summary of events that is anywhere published—steadily improves in the scope and thoroughness of its treatment. GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS will resume the Easy Chair in the November Number, which will also contain the first of a series of papers by CHARLES NORDHOFF, descriptive of the Pacific Coast.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

ONE COPY OF EITHER FOR ONE YEAR, $4 00, POSTAGE PREPAID.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

WANTED—BOOK AGENTS, to sell new and popular books. Books that are admirably adapted to the season, viz: Anecdotes of Public Men, by John W. Forney; Farm Ballads, by Will Carleton; I Go a-Fishing, by W. C. Prime; The Fishing Tourist, by Charles Hallock. Liberal inducements offered. For further particulars, inquire of or address AVERY BILL,
Care of Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments, or all the time, than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and Carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

Hosted by Google

AWFUL INCIDENT ON THE BEACH.

A Short-sighted Lady can't make out what on earth this Board is about till she gets Quite Close to it. [Confusion!

VERSICLES.

There was a young lady of Bocking
Who had a great hole in her stocking;
When the boys cried "Potatoes!"
She uttered three great "Oh's!"
And then called them names that were shocking.

There was a young lady at Kew
Who would go to sleep in her pew;
When the parson, quite vexed,
Would not give out the text
Till the clerk stirred her up with a cue.

There was a young lady of Wapping
Who for joy jumped when taken out shopping;
Till the neighbors would talk,
And they told her to walk,
When she cried, "Well, suppose we try hopping."

There was a fair maiden at Node
Who, when going home, took the wrong road;
When they said she was wrong,
She, in language quite strong,
Said the people might go and be blowed.

There was a young parson at Penge
Who wore a black tile at Stonehenge;
When they cried, "Who's your hatter?"
He replied, "'Tis no matter,"
When they'd bonnet him out of revenge.

There was an old cabby at Bow
Whose horse was uncommonly slow;
When his fares they cut rougher,
And called him a duffer,
Not a peg would his old knacker go.

There was a young lady of Jersey
Who was fat, not to say she was pursy;
When they said, "Pray, try Banting,"
She replied, softly panting,
"I will, till I grow wicey wersey."

It is related of a Scottish lady in a remote part of the Highlands, noted for her profuse liberality, that being sometimes overburdened with habitual "sorners," when any one of them outstaid his welcome, she would take occasion to say to him at the morning meal, with an arch look at the rest of the company, "Mak' a guid breakfast, Mr. ——, while ye're about it; ye dinna ken whaur ye'll get your dinner." The hint was usually taken, and the "sorner" departed.

FACETIÆ.

"WHAT'S in a name?" A good deal at times. The daughter of Don Carlos, the pretender to the throne of Spain, for instance, has plenty in hers, which, according to a contemporary, is, in French, Blanche-de-Castile-Marie-de-la-Conception-Thérèse-Françoise-d'Assise-Marguerite-Jeanne-Beatrice-Charlotte-Louise-Fernande-Adelgonde-Elvire-Ildefonse-Régine-Joséphe-Michelle-Gabrielle-Raphaelle. These constitute the young lady's Christian name only, and when her titles are added there is probably a dozen lines or so more. It is to be hoped that the don is not going to have a large family, for two or three children christened in this fashion would exhaust the vocabulary.

SOMETHING LIKELY TO END IN SMOKE.—The report of a gun.

PHILOSOPHICAL REFLECTION.—How different is the bias of men's minds! What opposite tendencies they exhibit in their investigation of the phenomena of mental science! For example, the lawyer inclines to the abstract, the builder to the concrete.

TO KEEP THE FEET WARM.—Use hob-nails in your boots.

A MAN WHO HAS NOT TIME TO BE POSTMASTER.—The United States Postmaster-General has received the following letter from a person who was recently appointed postmaster, at a salary of $12 per annum, of a town in Iowa:

"to the general postmaster at Washington Citty my Deare friend i hope you will, not apint me postmaster in this here town i hain't got no time to tend to it i supose you got the paper someow, my frinds sent up Reckominden me but I hain't got time to do the thing as it ort too be done. In fact I dont know hardly what is a go in to be done our shoomaker would be a very good man only he was Grely square out which you know onfits him for the position then there is our storceeper jim B—— that want's the position mightty bad but as shure as you are a living man jim B—— kaint read good writin and thats the trouble. You see them that want's it dont know enuff to tend it and them their that does dont want to take it jim B—— wus rased out in the countrey and jest come to town last week and dont know enuff to be postmaster, but do as you think best only dont apint me i hain't got time ever your friend," etc.

A Baptist paper in Ohio was sent for nine years to a subscriber who never paid a cent for it. The other day the newspaper was returned to the patient and long-suffering publisher with the affecting pencil note on its margin, "Gone to a better world." The editor is a very pious man, but it is reported that his faith is terribly shaken in regard to the accuracy of the information.

"WHEN MUSIC, HEAVENLY MAID," ETC.

MISTRESS. (finding the house-maid for the third time hanging about the drawing-room door). "Mary, what are you here Listening at the Doors for? Haven't you any Work?"

MARY. "Oh, if you please'm, I don't mean no 'arm—it's that 'evingly Music!" [N.B.—The man was only tuning the piano!

"'TIS BETTER NOT TO KNOW."

IMPUDENT BOY (generally). "Try yer Weight—only Five Cents!" (To lady of commanding proportions in particular). "Tell yer 'xact Weight to a Hounce, Mum!"

RAILWAY DUTIES.

There are many passenger duties which are not merely not obnoxious, but are eminently proper; and yet how many persons travel constantly by railway without giving them a thought. By way of useful admonition, let us specify a few:

There is, first of all, the duty of not pushing at the pay place, especially if ladies chance to be in front of you.

There nextly is the duty of coming there provided with the proper ready money, so as not to keep folks waiting while you change a five-dollar bill.

There, moreover, is the duty of abstention from piling up your hat-boxes and hand-bags and wraps in the umbrella net so as to risk their tumbling on your neighbor's head.

There is the duty of not quarreling about an open window, but of conceding the command of it to the sitter next it, facing toward the engine, who, by long-acknowledged justice, clearly has the right.

There is the duty of obedience to the law respecting trespass which prohibits the removal of a coat or an umbrella, marking the retention of a vacated seat.

There is the duty of shutting the door gently when you quit the train at a way-station, and neither slamming it with a bang nor leaving it wide open, as is done by selfish and ungentlemanly snobs.

There is the duty of sharing your newspaper with any one who has none, and offering first the leaders, and not the outside sheet.

There is the duty of not putting your dirty boots upon the cushions when you wish to lay your legs up.

There is the duty of opening the car door for any lady leaving or entering the train, even at the risk of soiling your new gloves.

There is reciprocally the duty on the lady's part to smile her gratitude at least, if she does not verbally express it.

There is the duty of never eating peppermint, or using scents or drinks which have a nauseous odor.

There is the duty of abstaining from bothering your neighbors with remarks about the weather, or platitudinarianisms upon things in general.

There is the duty of not snoring when you are in company and pursuing a night journey.

And there is, finally, the duty of remembering that delays are dangerous, especially on railways; and therefore of never keeping the train waiting while you fumble in your pockets for your ticket, which you ought to have in readiness to be produced at any moment.

Why is a young lady like a bill of exchange?—Because she ought to be settled when she arrives at maturity.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 42.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Tulle and Lace Opera Coiffure.

THIS coiffure of figured black tulle is trimmed with lace insertion an inch and a quarter wide, lace edging three inches and three-quarters wide, loops and ends of black gros grain ribbon, and bright-colored autumn flowers. For the crown of the coiffure cut of double stiff lace one whole piece from Fig. 40, Supplement, wire it, and bind it all around with black ribbon. On the point marked ∗ fasten the end of a band of stiff lace and wire eight inches long and three-quarters of an inch wide. Cut the veil of tulle in one piece from Fig. 41, having first joined on the pieces turned down in Supplement (see diagram of Fig. 41, reduced to one-sixteenth of full size). Edge this part with insertion and lace, and also sew on another piece of lace from the middle of the front toward both sides to a length of twenty-nine inches and three-quarters. Lay the veil in a pleat in the middle, bringing × on ●, and sew it on the crown along the dotted line from ⁚ to ∗, and, besides, fasten it with several stitches on the band and on the corners of the crown. On these corners sew gros grain ribbons of the requisite length, which are tied in a bow in the back above the veil, and fastened with several stitches in the middle on the under edge of the veil. Set the flowers along the front edge of the crown. In adjusting the coiffure cross the ends of the veil in front as shown by the illustration, and ornament them with a bunch of flowers.

TULLE AND LACE OPERA COIFFURE.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 40 and 41.

COURTESY AT HOME.

SOMETHING is wrong in those families where the little courtesies of speech are ignored in the every-day home life. True politeness can not be learned, like a lesson, by one effort, any time in one's life; it must be inbred. "Well-meaning, but rough," is said of many a man; and too often the beginning of the difficulty lies with the parents in a family. Is it hard for the husband to give a smiling "Thank you" to his wife as she brings his slippers on his evening return home? Is it more difficult for the mother to say, "John, will you shut the door, please?" than to use the laconic phrase, "Shut the door!" When Tom knocks over his sister's baby-house, why should not "Excuse me, I didn't mean to," be the instinctive apology?

Many who would not be guilty of discourtesy to a stranger, or to a friend in the world without, lay aside much if not all their suavity of manner on entering the home circle. The husband and wife dispense with those little graceful attentions which, though small, are never unimportant. The children are ordered hither and thither with crusty words; no "Thank you" rewards the little tireless feet that run on countless errands. The dinner is eaten in silence, broken only by fault-finding and reproof from the parents, and ill humor and teasing among the children. In the evening the father devotes himself to his newspaper, and the mother to her sewing, interrupting themselves only to give such peremptory orders as, "Less noise, children;" "Stop quarreling;" and, finally, "Go to bed!"

In many families there is no positive rudeness among the members, only a lack of those simple affectionate attentions which awaken a spontaneous return; a want of that consideration and gentleness of demeanor which are well-springs of comfort in every household. The well-bred host does not fail to bid his guest "Good-night" and "Good-morning;" why should not this simple expression of good feeling be always exchanged between parents and children? The kindly morning greeting will often nip in the bud some rising fretfulness; and the pleasant "Good-by" from old and young, when leaving the house for office, shop, or school, is a fragrant memory through the day of separation. When the family gather alone around breakfast or dinner table, the same courtesy should prevail as if guests were present. Reproof, complaint, unpleasant discussion, and scandal, no less than moody silence, should be banished. Let the conversation be genial, and suited to the little folks as far as possible. Interesting incidents of the day's experience may be mentioned at the evening meal, thus arousing the social element. If resources fail, sometimes little bits read aloud from the morning or evening paper will kindle the conversation.

No pleasanter sight is there than a family of young folks who are quick to perform little acts of attention toward their elders. The placing of the big arm-chair in a warm place for mamma, running for a footstool for aunty, hunting up papa's spectacles, and scores of little deeds show unsuppressed and loving hearts. But if mamma never returns a smiling "Thank you, dear," if papa's "Just what I was wanting, Susie," does not indicate that the little attention is appreciated, the children soon drop the habit. Little people are imitative creatures, and quickly catch the spirit surrounding them. So, if when the mother's spool of cotton rolls from her lap, the father stoops to pick it up, bright eyes will see the act, and quick minds make a note of it. By example, a thousand times more quickly than by precept, can children be taught to speak kindly to each other, to acknowledge favors, to be gentle and unselfish, to be thoughtful and considerate of the comfort of the family. The boys, with inward pride in their father's courteous demeanor, will be chivalrous and helpful to their young sisters; the girls, imitating the mother, will be gentle and patient, even when big brothers are noisy and heedless.

Scolding is never allowable; reproof and criticism from parents must have their time and place, but should never intrude so far upon the social life of the family as to render the home uncomfortable. A serious word in private will generally cure a fault more easily than many public criticisms. In some families a spirit of contradiction and discussion mars the harmony; every statement is, as it were, dissected, and the absolute correctness of every word calculated. It interferes seriously with social freedom when unimportant inaccuracies are watched for, and exposed for the mere sake of exposure. Brothers and sisters also sometimes acquire an almost unconscious habit of teasing each other, half in earnest, half in fun. This is particularly uncomfortable for every body else, whatever doubtful pleasure the parties themselves may experience.

In the home where true courtesy prevails, it seems to meet you on the very threshold. You feel the kindly welcome on entering. No rude eyes scan your dress. No angry voices are heard up stairs. No sullen children are sent from the room. No peremptory orders are given to cover the delinquencies of housekeeper or servants. A delightful atmosphere pervades the house—unmistakable, yet indescribable.

Hosted by Google

OCTOBER.

BY MARIAN DOUGLAS.

THE Shah came into England—
He had a diamond crest;
He kept a captive rainbow,
And wore it on his breast.
But what was all his splendor
To us who could not see?
Here comes the Prince October,
With grander pomp than he!
Bright glows his scarlet mantle;
Like fire his flags unfold;
And all the way before him
Is glittering with gold.
He's lavish with his bounty—
His hand he never shuts;
Down drop the ruddy apples,
And fall the glossy nuts.
The Shah went back to Persia—
What matters it to me?
He took with him the jewels
That I shall never see;
But in October's triumphs
We all of us may share—
Here, Maggie, take this ruby crown
Of maple leaves to wear!

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

☞ A Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains more reading matter than an average octavo volume. The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for October 11 was sent out gratuitously an interesting

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing a further installment of "PHINEAS REDUX," by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, illustrated, and other attractive features.

Another EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for October 18.

☞ A Cut Paper Pattern of a new and elegant Demi-Polonaise, with Basque Back and Square Front, will be published with the next Number. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 671.

A NEW ART.

SOME interesting ideas upon the future of color have been enunciated from time to time, and have attracted attention among all those who give thought to the progress of our race from one height to another of attainment or enjoyment, whether out of a conviction that every achievement of science lifts us nearer the great table-lands of knowledge where dwell the demi-gods, or out of an assurance that science is the handmaid of luxury, and that all her resources are but so many aids to modern comfort.

The subject of color is one that, though closely interwoven with many branches of science, has received less notice on account of its own inherent claims than casually through experiment in other directions. Thus much that we know about it has been the result of accident; and what investigation it has received for its own sake, after reaching some results of importance, has until recently stopped short of the application of those results in any but the simplest ways. The investigators who find the source of so many of our daily miracles in atomic motion, as that of sound and heat and light, and who seem to be rapidly reaching the ground occupied by the philosopher who declared that nothing existed, but only appeared to exist, necessarily do the same thing for color, so that a celebrated German thinker once illustrated the subject of a living faith by convincing his hearers that the red hue of a piece of drapery was utterly non-existent as a material thing, and was only believed to exist.

The facts of color are now pronounced to have their origin through the ethereal undulation of light through space—short swift waves producing the violet rays, while the long and slow waves give red—color, indeed, being only the elaboration of light, every ray of pure white light containing the three primary colors: three colors, we say, for the sake of simplicity, as some experimenters call them seven, and yet others declare their number infinite—which latter doubtless in shade and variation they are. A curious and forcible reverse of this truth we have seen in the work of a great painter, who, when he wished to produce an effect of dazzling whiteness, instead of splashing a sheet of white upon the canvas, always painted a delicate prismatic spectrum of the so-called seven colors, and thus produced his effect.

Many tints out of this infinite variety have been added to our list by the experimenters with the aniline dyes, and hues that were so evanescent and so beautiful when seen in the clouds that we hardly believed we saw them, but fancied them rather airy deceptions or freaks of our imagination, have recently become established facts in our ribbons and tissues. The instruments of the scientific, however, are said to reveal the presence of yet other colors in the solar ray, which, as colors, the eye has no power to perceive, and to which, unless the character of our organs of vision should greatly change, we must remain forever blind. The human eye, nevertheless, varies concerning the power of perceiving the colors already recognized in a remarkable degree. We often hear the term "color-blind" applied to various individuals—a loose and inaccurate term, though conveying distinctly enough the circumstance that certain tints fail to strike the retina with sufficient force for impression. This, like near-sightedness, would appear to be owing to some defect in the eye itself, and the defect is probably of a similar nature to that of an imperfect ear for music, although at first glance the one would appear a physical and the other a mental deficiency. Red is the color most frequently failing, though usually there is a confusion of all shades. A strawberry growing in the bed is not to be told from the leaves around it by eyes in which this defect is partial, although recognized when in the hand; and an article pronounced to be brown when in the shade has been seen to be red when placed in the sunshine, the more vivid light probably increasing the force of the undulation; but to eyes in which the defect is complete, the color is always neutral. This defect is much more general than might be supposed; and on the railways of certain countries other signals than those of colored lights have been adopted, serious accidents having occurred through the color-blindness of the engineers, who were unaware of their deficiency.

But even those among us whose eyes are supposed to be perfect need not claim too much, for it is well known that the Asiatics are familiar with several tints which for the European eye have no existence, not even that which the German thinker spoken of above allowed. The European, for example, will complain of the dull effect of a shawl or of a carpet, and the Asiatic will point out to him tint after tint, which render the fabric gorgeous in Oriental sight, but which to the European present a solid block of a low dull hue borrowed from its most prominent neighbor. Whether the Asiatic owes his advantage to the accident of his being of an elder race, with a longer-trained vision, to his almond-shaped eyes, or to the luxury of light that the Orient affords, or to any other cause, is, of course, an undetermined question.

But let eyes differ in their sensibility and their capacity as they may, we all know that, even to those which are the least sensitive, effects of color give a vivid gratification, while to the keen eye and the poetical temperament they bring an exquisite enjoyment which scarcely any thing else equals. Whether the color be seen in turbulent masses of moon-lit mountain vapor, in gorgeous sunrises, where darkness rolls away before the advent of light and color, as the waves rolled aside from Aphrodite when she rose—whether seen in long low landscapes veiled in azure hazes, or in the fruity richness of a maiden's cheek or the sheen of her garment—color and its gradations in complement and shadow afford a lofty and genuine delight, which the poet and the painter feel through all their being, which even the sculptor of cold white form acknowledges, and remembrance of which imparts a vital warmth to the tune of the musician.

It is in this relation of the subject that we began to speak; for from these circumstances there has been conjectured the possibility of an expression and elevation of color into something like a new and separate art—an art which shall bear no more relation to painting than it shall to music. Doubtless, before this art acquires any thing but a rudimentary character, the race will have to advance and the senses refine prodigiously. But we have every reason to expect such advance to take place, and that being accomplished, electric or other means may be found of rapidly opening and revealing and veiling sensations of color, each sensation more or less prolonged, as musical tones are prolonged—here a whole note, there a half; here the color flats, and there it sharps; here are chromatic scales running through a gamut of tones; where one shade melts into another are rapid trills, such as those we have when the sun sparkles on water which is neither blue nor green; here are unsatisfying minors, falling short of perfect tint; here the long, powerful undulations flash in red and yellow on the sight, telling the story as the high tones of the violin may speak it; here the low, soft violets and indigoes lend foundation and shadow; here some melody of color would flow on with gently recurring hues and modulations, as we might see the shore and sky repeated in the bosom of the stream on which we sail; here would be a symphony in the grand union and harmony of many tints, with brilliant adagio and stately andante, and with a scherzo of the three primitive colors; here are songs without words, and here one can easily imagine the dark greens and grays and olives of a gondolied.

To think of such an art developed, with its students, its great masters, its teachers, its performers, its results exhibited in halls crowded with spectators, the air before them pulsating with such shifting splendor, is to think of something almost transcending our powers of imagination, of something that to the incredulous and prosaic may seem only an extravagant vagary of the fancy. But probably TUBAL-CAIN in his day could dream no less vaguely and wildly of a Tannhäuser or a Magic Flute than we now dream of this, which is not among the lost arts, but is one yet to be found.

THE CYCLES OF FASHIONS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

THERE is something almost awful in the revolutions of the fashions. Periodicity is of itself mysterious. Why does one winter's pneumonia repeat itself the next winter? Why do the chills and fever shake you and burn you every twenty-one days? Why do the canker-worms bury themselves on the 10th of June, and the cattle go to pasture on the 20th of May? Why should the hoops that moved ADDISON'S ridicule rise and round and vanish in our own day? What wonderful working of the inner world brings up again the Josephine waist, the Pompadour hair, the Grecian skirt? It is not the whim or the caprice of one man or woman any more than is the birth and death of a language, the creation and adoption of a word or a song. EUGÉNIE in Paris could friz the forehead of Christendom, but EUGÉNIE at Chiselhurst has no more power than the Tuileries can give to Madame THIERS.

A little while ago a lady presented herself in the house of a friend, dressed in a gown just thirty years old. The corsage was pointed in front, full of close gathers at the point and loose gathers on the shoulders, open behind. The skirt was straight and full, without gore or over-skirt. The sleeves would pass very well for modern flowing sleeves, and the muslin under-sleeves were sufficiently fashionable to escape observation. At the time when that dress was made mothers used to entertain their daughters with accounts of the narrow gored skirts which they wore in their youthful days. When those daughters grew up they wore skirts gored and narrow as their mothers had done before them.

Why do the revolving years thus put down one and bring up another? Or would it be better that we should have either the one or the other constantly? Is there intrinsic advantage in either? To my eye the gored narrow under-skirt with the short draped over-skirt is prettier than our plain full skirt; but if next year the over-skirt should disappear, and women go back to single blessedness, no doubt the lovely forms of wearers and the nimble fingers of seamstresses would give it the grace and beauty which seem to inhere in the present style.

When we see NILSSON and KELLOGG acting Margaret in simplest, finest muslin or crape, whose white folds fall and sweep with statuesque grace, we are charmed with the garb, and would fain dispense with paniers and rufflings and doublings. But presently a lady appears in the drawing-room splendid with sheen of satin, the fairy frostwork of lace, the white repose of pearls, or the dazzle of diamonds; the little country girl flits among her flowers, fresh as they, with the morning red upon her cheeks, the heaven's blue in her eyes, and every seam of her cambric gown and every puff of her fluttering ribbons modeled upon the last fashion plate, and at once the ancients go down before the moderns. The flowing lines of crape and muslin, you say, may answer for the stage—may have answered well for HELEN, with a maiden to every fold, for ASPASIA entrancing the youths and the philosophers of Athens; but they would fare but hardly in the scrimmage of modern life, in the daylight of gardens, or the glitter of evening splendors.

We can hardly find words strong enough to express our disapprobation of the cramping bodies of modern dress. Our ladies would be disgusted, says the fashion denouncer, to see their Venus, their Psyche, their Clytie, tricked out in nineteenth-century corsage. But no more, I imagine, than would the critics to see the nineteenth-century ladies dressed in Venus's array. Clytie's mantua-making is perfectly hygienic, but her loose robe,

> "slipping down, leaves bare
> Her bright breast, shortening into sighs."

Yet Clytie followed the fashions of her day and sinned not, and Anna Maria follows the fashions of her day, "close-buttoned to the chin," with equal innocence. If the close waist fits well, it is a healthful waist. It may be clumsy and uncomfortable, pinching here and bagging there, and then it is a trial to health and temper. But the master of arts among dress-makers knows that a dress too tight is a misfit; that to be perfect it must be comfortable. The really elegant dress admits full play of all the muscles that a woman has any occasion to use while she is wearing it. And surely the American woman of our age would be no better equipped for her work by adopting the costume of HELEN.

It is to be said, moreover, that in our day fashion is to the last degree accommodating. If one has constitutional objections to the plain waist, the polonaise is ready, with every degree of fullness. If corsets are repugnant, they can be dispensed with, and no one be the wiser but the dispenser. If skirts are too long, what doth hinder that they be shortened? If they ought to hang from the shoulders, go hang them. None of these things move the world from its equipoise. One can accomplish them all, and yet live and move and have her being without rebuke—nay, even without notice from fashion.

Some of our prophets predict a return to the sandal of antiquity, and if fashion were a matter of will, we might perhaps advocate the change. If sandals could be so arranged as to keep the feet warm and dry in winter, they would be cool and charming in summer, and neat and pleasant all the year round to the foot which they would protect without confining. But our various little side issues of foot-drawings and broad soles avail but little. In shoes as in gowns neither the large nor the small has any advantage; but the shoe that fits you is the right shoe. You make much ado with models and measurements, and after weeks of waiting are put to pedal torture. You step into the next shoe shop, and in ten minutes are shod with suppleness and strength.

It is a most wise and benign arrangement of Providence that we can follow the fashions, and are not forced to lead them—even our own. Here and there rises a sovereign of style who by some inward genius seizes, combines, produces, creates—the artist of costuming. The rest of us, the common herd, copy with what closeness we may, in such fabrics as we can command. Of ourselves we have no originating power. Left to ourselves, we should be in sorry plight. Yet we recognize beauty when it is presented to us. We detect harmony; we shun discord and glare and violence. To design our own costume would exhaust our ingenuity without satisfaction. To follow our leaders is half a pastime. We have the pleasure of selection with the minimum of fatigue, and the great bulk of time left for other and more strenuous occupations. After a day's shopping or an hour under the dress-maker's hand, a woman bemoans herself for her Paradise Lost; yet it is really surprising to see how short is the time which she is forced to spend on clothes in order to be very well dressed. Could CHARLES SUMNER deliver orations in a sash, or Mr. LONGFELLOW write poetry in paniers? Certainly not. Nor would Mrs. STOWE have better moulded Uncle Tom in coat tails, or Mrs. BROWNING sung in trowsers. Suum cuique. A woman spends hours in embroidering a gown, when she might have learned a language or saved a soul. True; but there are times when she does not feel like either learning a language or saving a soul. Then the growth of silken leaves and buds under the busy fingers is no task but a solace. I know a woman who > "can speak Greek

> As naturally as pigs squeak;
> To whom Latin is no more difficile
> Than to a blackbird 'tis to whistle;"

who dreams in German and thinks in French, and when it comes to soul-saving is a saver of life unto life—who yet embroiders her own capes and gowns and those of her friends.

What we want is strong-minded and large-

Hosted by Google

natured women who will not be the slave of dress, or of reform, or of any one idea; who will understand the philosophy and recognize the beauty and adopt the necessities of dress without straining its possibilities; who will neither dwarf nor magnify its importance, but will know how to follow fashion with moderation and discrimination, to lead it with beneficence, and make it in all things a minister of grace. If the woman is subordinate to the dress, it is not the fault of the dress but of the woman.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

ANTIQUE AND NEW STYLES.

THE modistes have returned from Paris with the announcement that Fashion has ventured still farther into the past, and, abandoning the styles of le Grand Monarque, has chosen as a foundation for new costumes the dress worn in the time of the foppish Henri Trois, his mother, Catherine de Medicis, and her contemporary, Queen Elizabeth. For instance, we observe the Henri Trois basque, smooth, shapely, and fitted like a corset; the Henri Trois toque, with erect pompon in front; Catherine de Medicis sleeves, that look like armor, close-fitted, with stiffly pleated puffs; the aumônière, or reticule, swung low from the belt, from which the châtelaine dispenses her alms; the Medicis fraise; and the Elizabethan ruff. When all these are well reproduced in combination with some of the Directoire styles of a later period, a most stately yet picturesque attire is obtained, far better suited to the gentlewomen of to-day than the girl-of-the-period costumes lately in vogue.

FRENCH DRESSES.

To particularize: the most elegant French dresses are those intended for carriage and visiting costumes, and also for dressy occasions in the house. These are partly velvet, partly silk; are either one of the dark stylish shades or else black, and consist of a basque with an elaborately trimmed demi-train, and perhaps some part of an over-skirt, such as an apron front, or else the pendent châtelaine breadths or sashes hanging at the back and sides.

The new basques are of velvet with silk sleeves, two silk cords in the edge, silk revers or silk ruff, or perhaps both. They are double-breasted, are much longer than formerly, extending eight or ten inches below the waist, have square tab fronts, or else are of the same length all around, instead of sloping upward on the hips, have two rows of small buttons down the front from the throat to the edge, and are flat behind whether with or without pleats. The Henri Trois basque is close and high in the throat, with a "shell ruff" of silk, double-breasted, fastened smoothly by a dozen small embroidered buttons, has tiny piped pockets on the sides, with merely corded edges without other ornament. The Catherine de Medicis basque of velvet is also double-breasted, with a standing collar of silk flaring outward, and an inner silk ruff; the armor-like silk sleeves have pleatings at the elbow joints and wrists. The Directoire basque has its silk revers like a gentleman's coat collar as now worn, with a box-pleated ruff across the back, above a square, sailor-like collar; coat sleeves with upturned stiff cuffs.

In the matter of over-skirts the caprice here is for long, smooth, clinging breadths with square corners, though the pretty wrinkled rounded apron is still seen in French dresses. The Bazar introduced these square over-skirts last March, as the reader will find by referring to figure No. 1 on the first page of Bazar No. 12, Vol. VI. Directions for this over-skirt given in the Supplement will now be found a stylish model, six months after its issue. On the same page is an example of the double-breasted basque with pockets and the single revers as now imported. The round apron over-skirts of imported dresses are very long, and are simply trimmed with a bias fold and piping; some are buttoned down the left side, and others are draped differently on each side. Some of the prettiest "square skirts" have two square breadths on each side, opening from the belt in front, trimmed on three sides by a velvet fold, while two long straight back breadths are formed in a panier puff.

Demi-trained skirts of silk are elaborately trimmed with different trimming in back and front. Crescent-shaped folds of velvet in groups of three, with a wide soft puff of silk between, cross the front breadths, while the back has flounces and puffs. Other skirts have the tablier formed of three wide curved folds edged with fringe, and again others have the lengthwise puffs, bands, and kilt pleats from belt to toe. Bias gathered flounces of silk are again bound with velvet rolled like a cord, and some Medicis dresses without a flounce at the foot are finished by a thick cord of velvet on the edge. Straight silk flounces, especially for the three front breadths, are laid in wide side pleats, bound with velvet, and have a bias band of velvet set on two or three inches above the binding.

A simple and stylish model for black silk dresses is a Directoire basque of velvet, with silk sleeves, revers, ruff, and double cord on the edge; a long apron over-skirt of five widths, edged with a velvet fold three inches wide, is drawn back closely, and fastened high behind under a straight sash of velvet lined with silk. The back of the skirt has five lapping gathered flounces, bound with velvet, while the front breadths have a deep side-pleated flounce, with a velvet band set on and a velvet binding; there is no ornamental heading to this flounce, as it begins under the long apron. Hanging low on the left side from two silk-covered cords is the velvet aumônière, a flat bag, hexagon shape, with a flap at the top and tassels on the corners. A brown silk Catherine de Medicis dress has the velvet basque with silk sleeves named after that queen, and a demi-trained skirt, with brown velvet cord around the bottom, while the tablier is of lengthwise velvet and silk pleats. An olive suit has a tablier of three clusters of velvet folds, with silk puffs between, cut steel buckles on the sides, and flounces headed by puffs behind. The double-breasted Henri Trois basque has two rows of steel buttons in front. Aumônière of silk and velvet.

Very elaborate dinner dresses of black silk have a long apron and square sleeveless basque of black Brussels net, figured, with tiny jet beads wrought in the figure. A side-pleated flounce is on the front of the skirt, while the back is covered to the waist with five clusters of three narrow flounces, each cluster headed by an insertion of beaded net. The plain silk basque has a ruff of black tulle headed on the edge with an inner pleating of white lisse. Embroidered black tulle of trimming width, with insertion to match, makes an elegant trimming, and is sold by the yard in the fancy stores. Very narrowly pleated ruffles are used as trimming on the black silk dresses, especially for finishing off the foot of puffed front breadths. Elaborate embroidery of colored floss is appliquéd to dark blue and plum-colored silk dresses. The fouragère cords are draped across some double-breasted basques, and make very pretty ornaments.

WOOLEN SUITS.

It is among the woolen suits preferred for the promenade that the long-promised simplicity is seen. They are made with short train skirts, on which are five or six bias bands of silk double-stitched by machine, a long over-skirt buttoned on one side diagonally, or else lapped in front, with cut steel buttons down each front breadth. The simple double-breasted basque has a standing Medicis collar and two rows of buttons. This style is excellent for inexpensive diagonals, serge, and de bège costumes of dark maroon, blue, and myrtle green, and also for black alpaca. Burnished blue steel buttons and new black wooden buttons are also used for such suits.

VELVET POLONAISES.

The velvet polonaises exhibited are parts of suits, and are exceedingly plain. They are half-fitted, to be worn with a belt, are very long, and double-breasted, having two rows of large jet buttons down the front. These buttons are formed of tiny cut beads. Other polonaises have a band of silver-fox fur extending down each front and a moiré bow at the end. The bottom of the garment is not trimmed. The skirt is of silk, with velvet flounces.

THE LADIES' OVERCOAT.

New long basquines of cloth fitting the figure behind, and with velvet rolled collar in front, are called ladies' overcoats. They are comfortable and graceful cloaks, though rather masculine-looking. Short English walking jackets are made with very long waists fitted by cross seams to lie smoothly on the tournure. When made of the new diagonal cloth, with repped silk revers, cuffs, and bands, they cost $28.

FRENCH WRAPS.

The stylish French wraps are long simply shaped sacques with the new religieuse sleeve, straight and long. These are shown in a figured fabric with raised diamonds, as if quilted, and the same woolen diamond stuffs are imported. Black lynx fur in wide bands is the trimming. Long ample cloaks of shaggy cloths, trimmed with yak braid and wooden buttons, are imported for old ladies. Worth's newest Dolmans are of soft fine cloth nearly covered with braiding. A band of ostrich feathers and fringe trim the edge, and the lining throughout is of fine silk plush.

EVENING DRESSES.

New evening dresses show a variety of materials—tulle, silk, and satin in one dress. For instance, one of Worth's dresses of white faille has tulle loosely puffed on the back breadths, with diagonal satin bands in front, and a tulle flounce with diagonal bands upon it. On the right is a garland of variegated roses, while the left is draped by a sash of brown velvet with blue silk lining. The low corsage has short sleeves with upturned trimmings that are as effective as regular ruffs. The various colors and materials in this dress are blended with skill, or it would have a most bizarre appearance.

NOVELTIES.

Among the novelties found at the fancy stores are sets of striped percale, collar and cuffs, with new flaring standing collar and very wide French cuffs. Fanciful linked balls of gilt, oxidized silver, and blue-gray metal fasten the collar and cuffs. The entire set costs from $4 50 to $6.

Handsome ornaments for the hair are bows of China crape of palest tints with Valenciennes lace medallions, leaves, or butterflies, mounted on wires: price $5.

The most stylish belts are of black velvet, with three oxidized buckles and châtelaine: price $15. Cut steel ornaments are also placed on the back of velvet belts.

Camel's-hair lace is the latest novelty for trimming camel's-hair. It is more light and wiry than yak, shows much of the white fleece, and is in black and natural gray shades. It costs $1 85 a yard for trimming widths.

Elegant French galloons, to be laid flatly on velvet or silk, have drooping tasseled ornaments: price $5 a yard. There is a special fancy for galloon of solid jet.

White mask veils with black chenille dots are becoming and stylish.

Breakfast caps have small crowns, instead of the high-pointed Normandy shape. Pink and blue repped silk are associated in one cap, while another is trimmed with black velvet ribbons and rose-buds.

Stylish French fraises to wear with black dresses are found ready-made of black silk, with white silk lining and crêpe lisse pleating: price $3 75. Black velvet standing collars with revers have also a quadruple box-pleating showing colored lining: price $5 50. Fine muslin pleated ruffs, edged with real Valenciennes, and shaped narrower in front, cost $9 and upward. Colored crape ruffs with white lisse ruffs inside are $1 75. Black tulle beaded ruffs are very stylish. White tulle ruffs with black chenille on the edge are $2 50.

A Spanish fancy is a high-necked small fichu of black beaded tulle fastened at the throat by a rose. The newest Valenciennes fichus are of large medallions wrought in shape to fit the shoulder, with a flower in the centre of each.

For information received thanks are due Madame BERNHEIM; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and MILLER & GRANT.

PERSONAL.

BISHOP RANDALL, Missionary Bishop of Colorado, New Mexico, and Wyoming, has lately been on a tour through that rough and dangerous region, where "hatred of missionaries and cold water" is a peculiarity of the people. Traveling and sleeping in ambulances, and frequently accompanied by an armed guard for the protection of his person and scalp, he preached at Indian agencies, forts, camps, etc. The Indians were often on his trail, with a view to his horse. It is a novel if not an edifying spectacle to witness a bishop traveling through his diocese armed with a Bible and a rifle, ready to preach to or bring down an Indian, as the case may be.

—Professor BAIRD, to whom the readers of the HARPER publications are indebted for much scientific information, has discovered that the pompano, or pompynose, the finest fish known at the South, is beginning to show himself in fair numbers on the Jersey coast, and during the last year has been taken in Buzzard's Bay and Vineyard Sound.

—Among the jewelers of New York a story is current not altogether creditable to some of the suite of the Shah. When that potentate was in London various of his suite, being connoisseurs in brilliants, visited certain establishments where diamonds were for sale, and in their eager admiration appropriated in an irregular way a few fine stones when the attention of the salesman was momentarily directed elsewhere. But other eyes were upon the royal satellites, and, the quantity and value ascertained, a little bill was presented to the British authorities, with the quiet remark that unless the grand cash was immediately paid they would arrest the Persian nobility for stealing. The little bill, being only about $10,000, was paid.

—Miss RYLAND has given to Birmingham, England, a sixty-acre park, to be known as Cannonhill Park. The cost, including boats, games, etc., all finished and in running order, was $150,000.

—TIFFANY & Co. have on exhibition a relic that will attract the attention of ladies and gentlemen who are curious about such things. It is the traveling watch of the Emperor NAPOLEON I., used during his campaign in Egypt in 1798. It was presented to the late King FREDERICK of Würtemberg by NAPOLEON I. In 1808 the king presented it to the sculptor VON SCHEFFAUER as a token of approbation, he having executed a bust of the king in marble. From VON SCHEFFAUER'S hands it came to the present owner by inheritance. It is regulated by the hands of the European dial (Paris), which regulates also the difference of time on the dials of the other three continents. It shows, moreover, the seconds and the day of the month, also the motion of the balance, through a small crystal in gold setting. On the back is a compass, surrounded by the names of forty-eight principal cities, written in gilt letters on blue enamel. The plan for this watch was indicated by the Emperor himself, and a London artist intrusted with the execution. It possesses, therefore, besides its beautiful workmanship, a certain historical value. It was sent to NAPOLEON III., at his request, and placed by him in the International Exposition of 1867. He afterward delivered it, at the owner's request, to TIFFANY, REED, & Co., Paris, who retained it during the war. It is now in possession of the New York house, who have it on exhibition, and will be sold to the highest bidder.

—Sir ALEXANDER COCKBURN is a great mariner as well as a great magistrate. Every Friday he goes to Southampton, hoists sail on his yacht, undoes his legal papers, and crams for his charge to the jury in the TICHBORNE case. He is all at sea about it until Monday following.

—JULIA A. MILLER, a great-great-great-granddaughter of King PHILIP, died recently at Lancaster, New Hampshire. PHILIP was a first-tribe Indian, of good red stock, his father, MASSASOIT, having been a big sachem 200 years ago. But he kept getting into trouble with the pale-faces, who were always "treatying" him out of his land, and finally, to close up matters, killed the old fellow. He cost the colonists about $500,000, which was a powerful sight of money in those days.

—The Rev. Mr. SPURGEON recently attended a meeting at his orphanage at Stockwell, and in an address spoke incidentally of hoaxes. When the famous "female Plymouth brother" sent the great preacher word that she would give £20,000 toward founding the institution he could hardly believe her, so many attempts had been made to hoax him. Once, Mr. SPURGEON went on to say, he received an invitation to dine with the Bishop of London, while the bishop had an invitation to dine with him on the same day. This practical joke ought to become historic. At the meeting in question he said at least three good things, and one of them, about the love of Baptist children for the swimming-bath, might have exasperated the gravest hearer into a joke.

—Mr. GEORGE GRANT, who recently purchased in Kansas an immense tract of land for settlement by the better class of Scotch emigrants, and called it Victoria, has had the pleasure of seeing the first home increase of the settlers. The first birth on the grounds occurred a few weeks since, and was that of a female infant—Mr. and Mrs. GEORGE MACDONALD, natives of the Highlands of Scotland, parents. It is to be christened VICTORIA GRANT MACDONALD. Mr. GRANT has given it a cow and a calf, and the promise to sustain her increase until VICTORIA GRANT MACDONALD is of age, or twenty-one years old.

—Miss EMILY FAITHFULL is publishing in the Victoria Magazine her notions of American journalism, and is, on the whole, complimentary. She quotes, in mitigation of our newspaper peculiarities, the remonstrance of a shrewd deacon to his minister, who had laid down some strict rules of church discipline: "If the Lord is to have a church in this town, I guess He's got to make it out of the materials He finds here." Miss FAITHFULL is not chary of complimentary personalities, and gives many of the leading editors of the country a first-class notice. While speaking of the employment of women as journalists in this country, she mentions a curious fact not generally known. The first daily paper printed in the English language was published in London in 1702 by a woman—one ELIZABETH MALLET. It was called the Daily Courant, and was not issued as a woman's rights paper, but "to spare the public at least half the impertinences which the ordinary papers contain."

—The Rev. GEORGE GILFILAN, of Dundee, recently made a little anecdote in the pulpit, a place of all others in which he would not do a thing of that sort intentionally. On the Sunday before the election, by a strange coincidence, the chapter which fell to be read in his church was the sixth of the Acts of the Apostles. Mr. GILFILAN was an ardent supporter of Mr. FITZJAMES STEPHEN, and the gravity of the congregation was sorely taxed in the fifth verse, when the clergyman, in sonorous tones, read out, "And they chose STEPHEN."

—The Queen proposes to make her son-in-law LORNE a peer, that he may sit in the House of Lords. As a part of the royal family, it is not permissible for him to take part in the political debates of the House of Commons. Hence the elevation.

—Some idea of the wealth of the late Duke of Brunswick may be gained from the fact that the counting of the bonds, shares, etc., found in his house occupied a whole day. Their value was 16,000,000 francs. There was also 100,000 francs in specie.

—One JOHN ROSTRON, a railway refreshment man, is to make the bride-cake for the wedding breakfast of the Duke of Edinburgh. It will be seven feet six inches high, and weigh over two hundred and thirty pounds. It will be in six tiers, made to resemble the famous porcelain tower at Nankin, and will be surmounted with a profusion of orange blossoms.

—A very old man was Canon WILSON, senior canon of Winchester cathedral, who died a few days since at the great age of ninety-two. He was the author of several learned theological works, and was one of the oldest clergymen in England. He attended divine service the day previous to his death.

—Dr. WILLIAM HOWARD RUSSELL, the correspondent of the London Times, and of the New York Times at the Vienna Exposition, takes it upon himself, when occasion requires, to play the part of a ruler, acting, indeed, with as much power as a Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. At the surrender of Paris it became necessary that the Times should have a special train to carry the news to London in time for the morning paper. After trying the usual sources without success, Dr. RUSSELL went to Baron ROTHSCHILD, who owns a large part of the stock of the Northern Railway, and demanded of him a train in the name of the London Times. He got it. Mr. SMALLEY, writing to the Tribune, says: "Its [the Times] correspondents hold a position apart. Doors fly open to them at which the representatives of other journals knock in vain. Dr. RUSSELL'S personal position is, from a variety of causes, such as no other correspondent is likely to attain, or to attain for a long time. He knows all the kings and princes and prime ministers in Europe who are worth knowing, and his acquaintance with them is old enough and familiar enough to give him a sure footing in the highest society. I need scarcely remind you that when the war of 1870 broke out, the privilege of accompanying the Prussian head-quarters was granted to Dr. RUSSELL, and refused to every other European correspondent. His acquaintance with the Crown Prince of Prussia and other magnates of that court may partly explain that signal favor, but there was something behind it." That something was the Times.

—In the way of journalism the most remarkable paper ever issued was La Muse Historique, or rhyming gazette, by JACQUES LORET, published weekly in Paris from 1650 to 1665. It consisted of 550 verses, summarizing the week's news in rhyme, and treated of every class of subject, grave and gay. LORET computed, in 1663, the thirteenth year of his enterprise, that he had written over 300,000 verses, and found more than 700 different exordiums, for he never twice began his gazette with the same entrée in matière. He ran about the city for his own news, never failed to write good verses upon it, and never had any body to help him, and his prolonged and always equal performance has been pronounced something unique in the history of journalism.

—Miss ROGERS, daughter of Mr. ROGERS TOOKE, Professor of Political Economy at King's College, London, is the first in order of merit in the Oxford local examinations this year. She surpassed 472 students who were examined with her. Hitherto exhibitions at certain Oxford colleges have been always offered to the students leading the list. Miss ROGERS'S position thus opens the question of the admission of women to university residence, examinations, and degrees.

—Mr. BRIGHT, as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, will have certain religious duties to discharge that will be quite new to him. It will be his duty to appoint the Sunday preachers at the Chapel Royal Savoy, in the Strand, as well as to take an interest in its services, which at present are carried on by the Rev. HENRY WHITE, the chaplain to the House of Commons. Fancy Mr. BRIGHT, after the chaplain has said prayers at four o'clock, consulting the reverend gentleman as to what chants, anthems, etc., shall be used at the ensuing Sunday services, the list of which will have to be signed "JOHN BRIGHT, Chancellor." The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is also "an officer appointed chiefly to determine controversies between the Queen and her tenants of the Duchy of Lancaster."

Hosted by Google

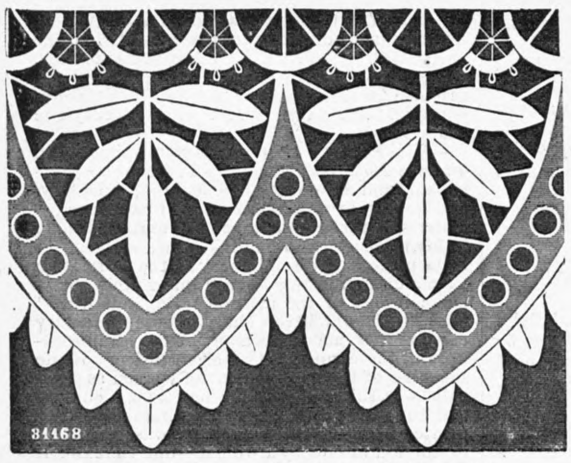

Fig. 1.—EDGING IN VENETIAN EMBROIDERY.

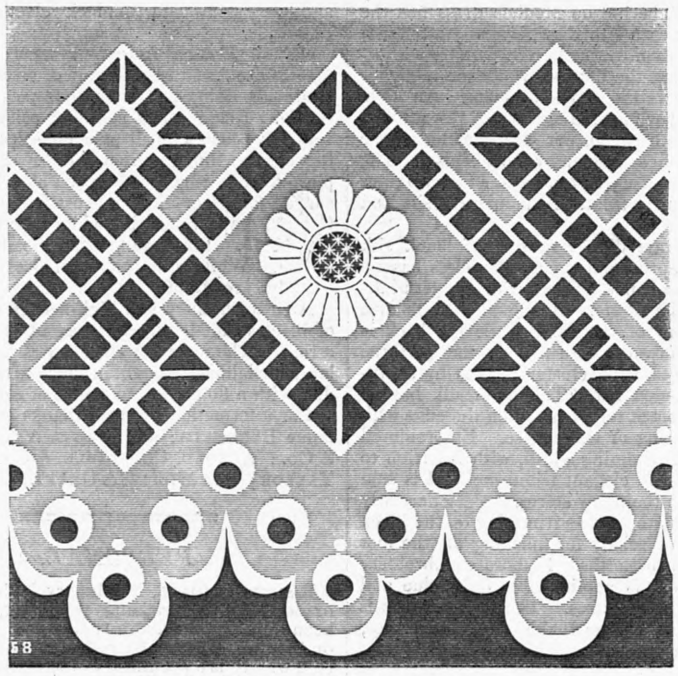

Fig. 3.—EDGING IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

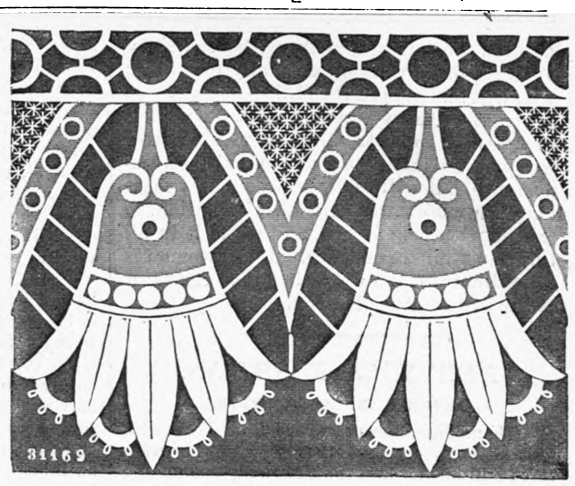

Fig. 2.—EDGING IN VENETIAN EMBROIDERY.

Fig. 4.—INSERTION IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

Fig. 5.—INSERTION IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

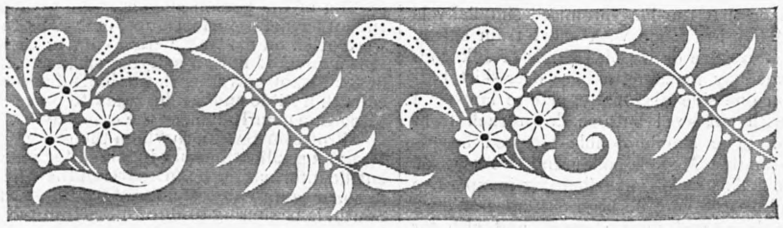

Fig. 8.—INSERTION IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

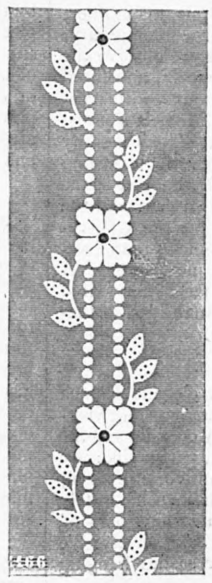

Fig. 6.—INSERTION IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

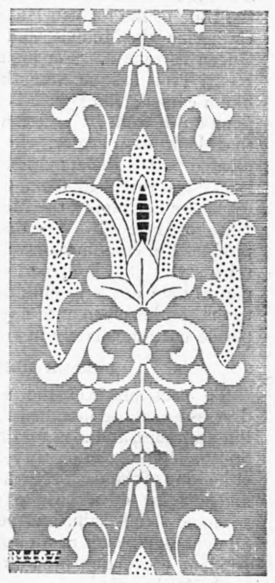

Fig. 7.—INSERTION IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

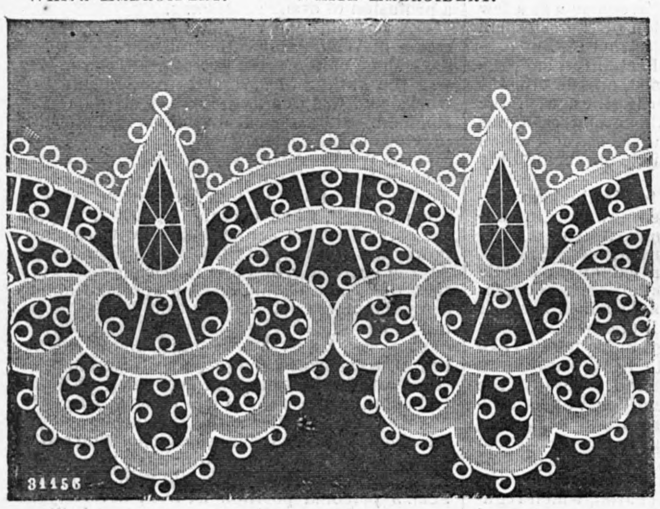

Fig. 9.—EDGING IN GENOESE EMBROIDERY.

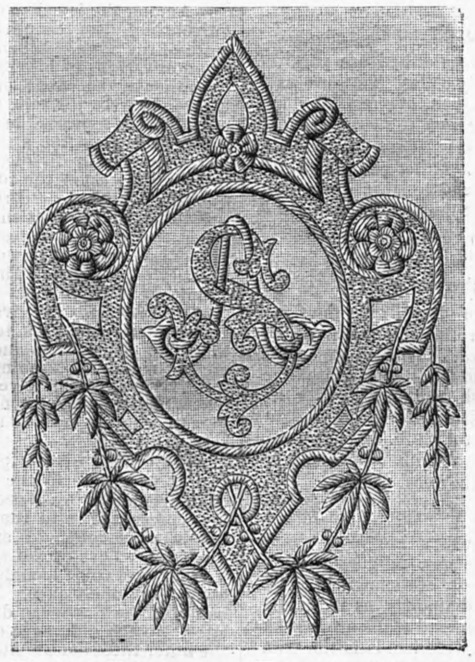

Fig. 11.—VIGNETTE FOR HANDKERCHIEFS, ETC., IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

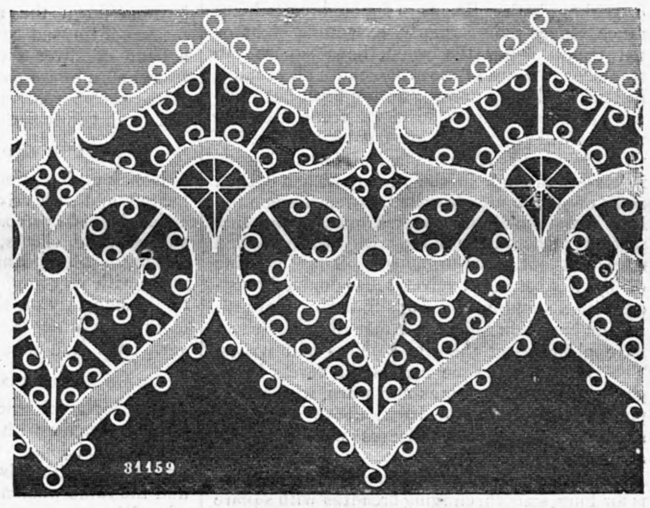

Fig. 10.—EDGING IN GENOESE EMBROIDERY.

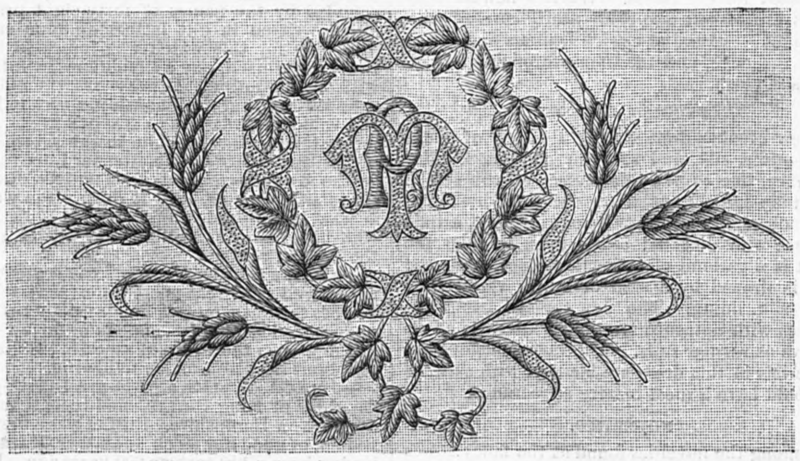

Fig. 12.—VIGNETTE FOR HANDKERCHIEFS, ETC., IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

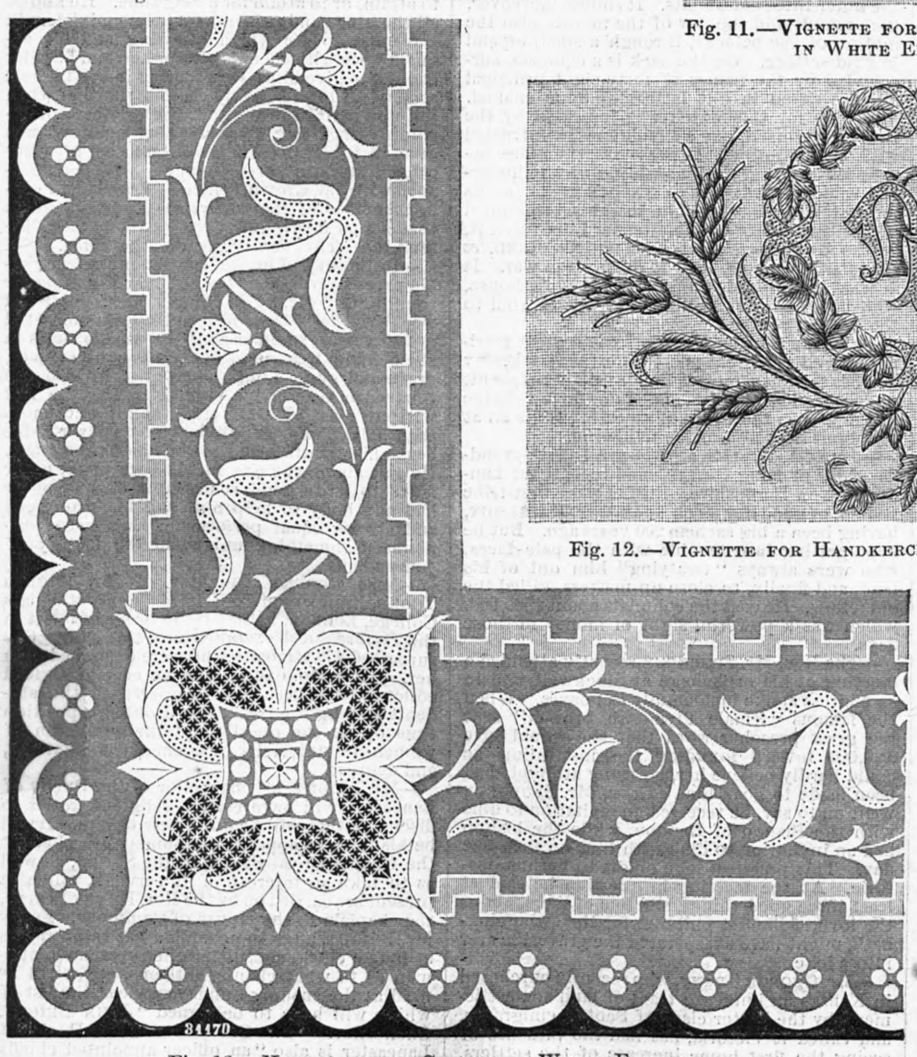

Fig. 13.—HANDKERCHIEF CORNER IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

Fig. 14.—HANDKERCHIEF CORNER IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

FIGS. 1–14.—EMBROIDERED EDGINGS, INSERTIONS, BORDERS, AND VIGNETTES FOR LINGERIE, ETC.—[SEE PAGE 661.]

Hosted by Google

Embroidered Edgings, Insertions, Borders, and Vignettes for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1–14.

See illustrations on page 660.

These edgings are suitable for trimming drawers, petticoats, night sacques, etc. When worked with fine materials they may also be used for trimming lingerie. The insertions are used for the same purposes as the edgings, and are suitable, besides, for gentlemen's shirt bosoms.

Figs. 1 and 2.—Edgings in Venetian Embroidery. Having transferred the design to the foundation material, run all the outlines of the design figures, and then work the cross-bars in the usual manner. Work the leaves in divided satin stitch, button-hole stitch the scallops on the upper edge of the edging Fig. 1, and work the dots on the under edge either as eyelet-holes or in satin stitch. Cut away the material underneath the bars.

Fig. 3.—Edging in White Embroidery. To make this edging first run the outlines, work the cross-bars inside of the Greek figures, and then button-hole stitch the outlines of the latter. Having finished the remainder of the embroidery, cut away the material underneath the bars.

Figs. 4–8.—Insertions in White Embroidery. These are worked entirely in white embroidery, in straight and divided satin stitch, and in half-polka stitch.

Figs. 9 and 10.—Edgings in Genoese Embroidery. To work these edgings work the outlines, and the bars and eyes in connection, with fine guipure cord. The bars and eyes should lie loose on the foundation, while the remainder of the cord is fastened on the material with slanting overhand stitches. For the edging shown by Fig. 9 point lace braid may also be used. After finishing the embroidery, cut away the material underneath the bars.

Figs. 11 and 12.—Vignettes for Handkerchiefs in White Embroidery. These vignettes are worked entirely in white embroidery. If the handkerchief is of very fine material the escutcheon in the design Fig. 4 may be underlaid with batiste.

Figs. 13 and 14.—Handkerchief Corners in White Embroidery. These borders may also be used for trimming pillow-cases.

Foulard and Silk Basque.

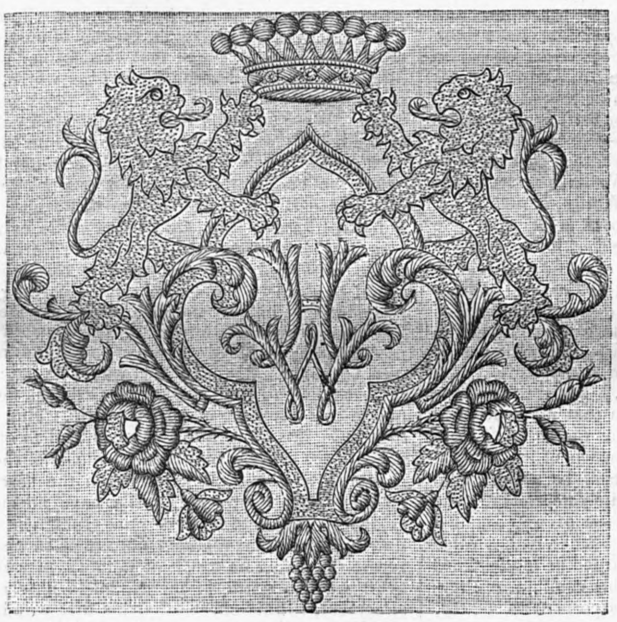

Fig. 2.—Vignette for Handkerchiefs, etc., in White Embroidery.

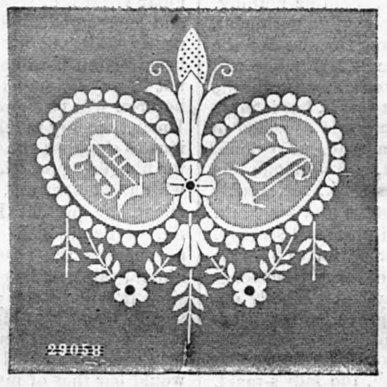

Fig. 1.—Vignette for Handkerchiefs, etc., in White Embroidery.

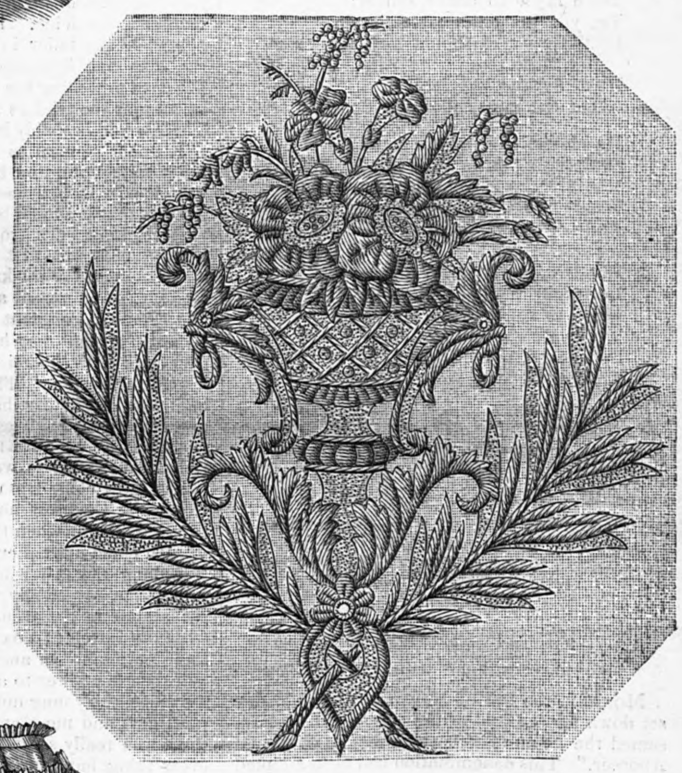

Fig. 3.—Vignette for Handkerchiefs, etc., in White Embroidery.

Foulard and Silk Basque.

This basque of black foulard with white dots is finished with a sailor collar and revers of black silk. The collar and revers are edged with a cording of white silk, and trimmed with steel buttons, as shown by the illustration.

Vignettes in White Embroidery for Handkerchiefs, etc., Figs. 1–3.

These vignettes are suitable for ornamenting handkerchiefs, toilette cushions, etc. They are worked in white embroidery on Swiss muslin, batiste, or linen. The illustrations plainly show the manner of executing the embroidery.

PARALLEL STORIES.

IN the year 1400 Ginevra d' Amiera, a Florentine beauty, married, under parental pressure, a man who had failed to win her heart—that she had given to Antonio Rondinelli. Soon afterward the plague broke out in Florence, Ginevra fell ill, apparently succumbed to the malady, and being pronounced dead, she was the same day consigned to the family tomb. Some one, however, had blundered in the matter, for in the middle of the night the entombed bride awoke out of her trance, and, badly as her living relatives had behaved, found her dead ones still less to her liking, and lost no time in quitting the silent company upon whose quietude she had unwittingly intruded. Speeding through the sleep-wrapped streets as swiftly as cerements allowed, Ginevra sought the home from which she had so lately been borne. Roused from his slumbers by a knocking at the door, the disconsolate widower of a day cautiously opened an upper window, and seeing a shrouded figure waiting below, in whose upturned face he recognized the lineaments of the dear departed, he cried, "Go in peace, blessed spirit!" and shut the window precipitately. With sinking heart and slackened step the repulsed wife made her way to her father's door, to receive the like benison from her dismayed parent. Then she crawled on to an uncle's, where the door was, indeed, opened, but only to be slammed in her face by the frightened man, who, in his hurry, forgot even to bless his ghostly caller. The cool night air penetrating the undress of the hapless wanderer made her tremble and shiver, as she thought she had waked to life only to die again in the cruel streets. "Ah!" she sighed, "Antonio would not have proved so unkind." This thought naturally suggested it was her duty to test his love and courage; it would be time enough to die if he proved like the rest. The way was long, but hope renerved her limbs, and soon Ginevra was knocking timidly at Rondinelli's door. He opened it himself, and although startled by the ghastly vision, calmly inquired what the spirit wanted with him. Throwing her shroud away from her face, Ginevra exclaimed, "I am no spirit, Antonio; I am that Ginevra you once loved, who was buried yesterday—buried alive!" and fell senseless into the welcoming arms of her astonished, delighted lover, whose cries for help soon brought down his sympathizing family to hear the wondrous story, and bear its heroine to bed, to be tenderly tended until she had recovered from the shock, and was as beautiful as ever again. Then came the difficulty. Was Ginevra to return to the man who had buried her and shut his doors against her, or give herself to the man who had saved her from a second death? With such powerful special pleaders as love and gratitude on his side, of course Rondinelli won the day, and a private marriage made the lovers amends for previous disappointment. They, however, had no intention of keeping in hiding, but the very first Sunday after they became man and wife appeared in public together at the cathedral, to the confusion and wonder of Ginevra's friends. An explanation ensued, which satisfied every body except the lady's first husband, who insisted that nothing but her dying in genuine earnest could dissolve the original matrimonial bond. The case was referred to the bishop, who, having no precedent to curb his decision, rose superior to technicalities, and declared that the first husband had forfeited all right to Ginevra, and must pay over to Rondinelli the dowry he had received with her—a decree at which we may be sure all true lovers in fair Florence heartily rejoiced.

This Italian romance of real life has its counterpart in a French cause célèbre, but the Gallic version unfortunately lacks names and dates; it differs, too, considerably in matters of detail. Instead of the lady being a supposed victim of the plague, which in the older story secured her hasty interment, she was supposed to have died of grief at being wedded against her inclination; instead of coming to life of her own accord, and seeking her lover as a last resort, the French heroine was taken out of her grave by her lover, who suspected she was not really dead, and resuscitated by his exertions, to flee with him to England. After living happily together there for ten years, the strangely united couple ventured to visit Paris, where the first husband accidentally meeting the lady, was struck by her resemblance to his dead wife, found out her abode, and finally claimed her for his own. When the case came for trial the second husband did not dispute the fact of identity, but pleaded that his rival had renounced all claim to the lady by ordering her to be buried without first making sure she was dead, and that she would have been dead and rotting in her grave if he had not rescued her. The court was saved the trouble of deciding the knotty point, for, seeing that it was likely to pronounce against them, the fond pair quietly slipped out of France, and found refuge in "a foreign clime.

Fig. 1.—Batiste Wrapper.—Front.—[See Fig. 2.]

Fig. 2.—Batiste Wrapper.—Back.—[See Fig. 1.]

continued sacred and entire till death conveyed them to those happy regions where love knows no end, and is confined within no limits." Of dead-alive ladies brought to consciousness by sacrilegious robbers, covetous of the rings upon their cold fingers, no less than seven stories, differing but slightly from each other, have been preserved; in one the scene is laid in Halifax, in another in Gloucestershire, in a third in Somersetshire, in the fourth in Drogheda, the remaining three being appropriated by as many towns in Germany.

THE BRIDEGROOM AND BRIDE.

By PAUL H. HAYNE.

[We translate this little chanson from Madame Michelet's exquisite work, The Story of my Childhood. The bridegroom and bride introduced are supposed to be peasants of the extreme south of France, and the spirit of the song, if not its precise language, is national and characteristic.]

He took her by the hand
(Dainty little hand!),
  Gently took and led her
Where the priest did stand
  Smilingly to wed her.
"Come, little bride,
Tripping by my side
  With little steps of little feet,
  Each a footfall soft and sweet,
Come, little bride!"

He takes her by the hand
(Fervid little hand!),
  Warmly takes and leads her
Where the dancers stand;
  And he whispers, "Sweet,
  Your fairy, twinkling feet
(The tiniest feet in France)
Were made to dance, dance;
Yet you must not glide too far,
Lest these eyes should miss their star.
  But, little one,
Hold Arnaud by the hand
  Till the merry dance is done!"

He clasped her by the hand
(Palpitating little hand!),
Warmly clasped and led
Where the wedding-feast was spread,
And—"Eat and drink," he said,
  "Little one!
But beware the spiky bone,
Lest your tender, pretty throat,
Made to set love sighs afloat
  (Love sighs alone)
Be choked, my little one,
Ere the wedding-feast is done."

LADY ANNA.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE,

Author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," "Orley Farm," "The Eustace Diamonds," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

LOVEL v. MURRAY AND ANOTHER.

MONDAY, the 9th of November, was the day set down for the trial of the case which had assumed the name of "Lovel versus Murray and Another." This denomination had been adopted many months ago, when it had been held to be practicable by the Lovel party to prove that the lady who was now always called the Countess was not entitled to bear the name of Lovel, but was simply Josephine Murray, and her daughter simply Anna Murray. Had there been another wife alive when the mother was married, that name, and that name only, could have been hers, whether she had been the victim of the old Earl's fraud or had herself been a party to it. The reader will have understood that as the case went on the opinions of those who acted for the young Earl, and more especially the opinion of the young Earl himself, had been changed. Prompted to do so by various motives, they who had undertaken to prove that the Countess was no countess had freely accorded to her her title, and had themselves entertained her daughter with all due acknowledgment of rank and birth. Nevertheless the name of the case remained, and had become common in people's mouths. The very persons who would always speak of the Countess Lovel also spoke very familiarly of the coming trial "Lovel v. Murray." And now the 9th of November had come round, and the case of "Lovel v. Murray and Another" was to be tried. The nature of the case was this. The two ladies, mother and daughter, had claimed the personal property of the late lord as his widow and daughter. Against that claim Earl Lovel made his claim as heir at law, alleging that there was no widow and no legitimate child. The case had become infinitely complicated by the alleged existence of the first wife, in which case she, as widow, would have inherited. But still the case went on as Lovel v. Murray—the Lovel so named being the Earl, and not the alleged Italian widow.

Such being the question presumably at issue, it became the duty of the Solicitor-General to open the pleadings. In the ordinary course of proceeding it would have been his task to begin by explaining the state of the family, and by assuming that he could prove the former marriage and the existence of the former wife at the time of the latter marriage. His evidence would have been subject to cross-examination, and then another counter-statement would have been made on behalf of the Countess, and her witnesses would have been brought forward. When all this had been done, the judge would have charged the jury, and with the jury would have rested the decision. This would have taken many days, and all the joys and sorrows, all the mingled hopes and anxieties, of a long trial had been expected. Bets had been freely made, odds being given at first on behalf of Lord Lovel, and afterward odds on behalf of the Countess. Interest had been made to get places in the court, and the clubs had resounded now with this fact and now with that which had just been brought home from Sicily as certain. Then had come suddenly upon the world the tidings that there would absolutely be no trial, that the great case of "Lovel v. Murray and Another" was to be set at rest forever by the marriage of "Lovel" with "another," and by the acceptance by "Lovel" of "Murray" as his mother-in-law. But the quidnuncs would not accept this solution. No doubt Lord Lovel might marry the second party in the defense, and it was admitted on all hands that he probably would do so, but that would not stop the case. If there were an Italian widow living, that widow was the heir to the property. Another Lovel would take the place of Lord Lovel, and the cause of Lovel v. Murray must still be continued. The first marriage could not be annulled simply by the fact that it would suit the young Earl that it should be annulled. Then, while this dispute was in progress, it was told at all the clubs that there was to be no marriage, that the girl had got herself engaged to a tailor, and that the tailor's mastery over her was so strong that she did not dare to shake him off. Dreadful things were told about the tailor and poor Lady Anna. There had been a secret marriage, there was going to be a child—the latter fact was known as a certain fact to a great many men at the clubs—the tailor had made every thing safe in twenty different ways. He was powerful over the girl equally by love, by fear, and by written bond. The Countess had repelled her daughter from her house by turning her out into the street by night, and had threatened both murder and suicide. Half the fortune had been offered to the tailor in vain. The romance of the story had increased greatly during the last few days preceding the trial, but it was admitted by all that the trial as a trial would be nothing. There would probably be simply an adjournment.

It would be hard to say how the story of the tailor leaked out, and became at last public and notorious. It had been agreed among all the lawyers that it should be kept secret, but it may, perhaps, have been from some one attached to them that it was first told abroad. No doubt all Norton and Flick knew it, and all Goffe and Goffe. Mr. Mainsail and his clerk, Mr. Hardy and his clerk, Sergeant Bluestone and his clerk, all knew it; but they had all promised secrecy. The clerk of the Solicitor-General was of course beyond suspicion. The two Miss Bluestones had known the story, but they had solemnly undertaken to be silent as the grave. Mrs. Bluestone was a lady with most intimately confidential friends, but she was sworn to secrecy. It might have come from Sarah, the lady's-maid, whom the Countess had unfortunately attached to her daughter when the first gleam of prosperity had come upon them.

Among the last who heard the story of the tailor—the last of any who professed the slightest interest in the events of the Lovel family—were the Lovels of Yoxham. The Earl had told them nothing. In answer to his aunt's letters, and then in answer to a very urgent appeal from his uncle, the young nobleman had sent only the most curt and most ambiguous replies. When there was really something to tell he would tell every thing, but at present he could only say that he hoped that every thing would be well. That had been the extent of the information given by the Earl to his relations, and the rector had waxed wrathful. Nor was his wrath lessened, or the sorrow of the two aunts mitigated, when the truth reached them by the mouth of that very Lady Fitzwarren who had been made to walk out of the room after—Anna Murray, as Lady Fitzwarren persisted in calling the "young person" after she had heard the story of the tailor. She told the story at Yoxham parsonage to the two aunts, and brought with her a printed paragraph from a newspaper to prove the truth of it. As it is necessary that we should now hurry into the court to hear what the Solicitor-General had to say about the case, we can not stop to sympathize with the grief of the Lovels at Yoxham. We may, however, pause for a moment to tell the burden of the poor rector's song for that evening: "I knew how it would be from the beginning. I told you so. I was sure of it. But nobody would believe me."

The Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster was crowded on the 9th of November. The case was to be heard before the Lord Chief Justice, and it was known that at any rate Sir William Patterson would have something to tell. If nothing else came of it, the telling of that story would be worth the hearing. All the preliminaries of the trial went on, as though every one believed that it was to be carried through to the bitter end; as though evidence were to be adduced and rebutted, and further contradicted by other evidence, which would again be rebutted with that pleasing animosity between rival lawyers which is so gratifying to the outside world, and apparently to themselves also. The jurors were sworn in—a special jury—and long was the time taken, and many the threats made by the Chief Justice, before twelve gentlemen would consent to go into the box. Crowds were round the doors of the court, of which every individual man would have paid largely for standing-room to hear the trial; but when they were wanted for use, men would not come forward to accept a seat with all that honor which belongs to a special juryman. And yet it was supposed that at last there would be no question to submit to a jury.

About noon the Solicitor began his statement. He was full of smiles and nods and pleasant talk, gestures indicative of a man who had a piece of work before him in which he could take delight. It is always satisfactory to see the assurance of a cock crowing in his own farm-yard, and to admire his easy familiarity with things that are awful to a stranger bird. If you, O reader, or I were bound to stand up in that court, dressed in wig and gown, and to tell a story that would take six hours in the telling, the one or the other of us knowing it to be his special duty so to tell it that judge and counselors and jury should all catch clearly every point that was to be made, how ill would that story be told, how would those points escape the memory of the teller, and never come near the intellect of the hearers! And how would the knowledge that it would be so confuse your tongue or mine, and make exquisitely miserable that moment of rising before the audience! But our Solicitor-General rose to his legs a happy man, with all that grace of motion, that easy slowness, that unassumed confidence, which belongs to the ordinary doings of our familiar life. Surely he must have known that he looked well in his wig and gown, as with low voice and bent neck, with only half-suppressed laughter, he whispered into the ears of the gentleman who sat next to him some pleasant joke that had just occurred to him. He could do that, though the eyes of all the court were upon him—so great was the man! And then he began with a sweet low voice, almost modest in its tones. For a few moments it might have been thought that some young woman was addressing the court, so gentle, so dulcet were the tones.

"My lord, it is my intention on this occasion to do that which an advocate can seldom do—to make a clean breast of it, to tell the court and the jury all that I know of this case, all that I think of it, and all that I believe; and, in short, to state a case as much in the interest of my opponents as of my clients. The story with which I must occupy the time of the court, I fear, for the whole remainder of the day, with reference to the Lovel family, is replete with marvels and romance. I shall tell of great crimes and of singular virtues, of sorrows that have been endured and conquered, and of hopes that have been nearly realized; but the noble client on whose behalf I am here called upon to address you is not in any manner the hero of this story. His heroism will be shown to consist in this—unless I mar the story in telling it—that he is only anxious to establish the truth, whether that truth be for him or against him. We have now to deal with an ancient and noble family, of which my client, the present Earl Lovel, is at this time the head and chief. On the question now before us depends the possession of immense wealth. Should this trial be carried to its natural conclusion, it will be for you to decide whether this wealth belongs to him as the heir at law of the late Earl, or whether there was left some nearer heir when that Earl died, whose rightful claim would bar that of my client. But there is more to be tried than this, and on that more depends the right of two ladies to bear the name of Lovel. Such right, or the absence of such right, would in this country of itself be sufficient to justify, nay, to render absolutely necessary, some trial before a jury in any case of well-founded doubt. Our titles of honor bear so high a value among us, are so justly regarded as the outward emblem of splendor and noble conduct, are recognized so universally as passports to all society, that we are naturally prone to watch their assumption with a caution most exact and scrupulous. When the demand for such honor is made on behalf of a man, it generally includes the claim to some Parliamentary privilege, the right to which has to be decided not by a jury, but by the body to which that privilege belongs. The claim to a peerage must be tried before the House of Lords, if made by a woman as by a man, because the son of the heiress would be a peer of Parliament. In the case with which we are now concerned no such right is in question. The lady who claims to be the Countess Lovel, and her daughter, who claims to be Lady Anna Lovel, make no demand which renders necessary other decision than that of a jury. It is as though any female commoner in the land claimed to have been the wife of an alleged husband. But not the less is the claim made to a great and a noble name; and as a grave doubt has been thrown upon the justice of the demand made by these ladies, it has become the duty of my client, as the head of the Lovels, as being himself, without any doubt, the Earl Lovel of the day, to investigate the claim made, and to see that no false pretenders are allowed to wear the highly prized honors of his family. Independently of the great property which is at stake, the nature of which it will be my duty to explain to you, the question at issue, whether the elder lady be or be not Countess Lovel, and whether the younger lady be or be not Lady Anna Lovel, has demanded the investigation which could not adequately have been made without this judicial array. I will now state frankly to you our belief that these two ladies are fully entitled to the names which they claim to bear; and I will add to that statement a stronger assurance of my own personal conviction and that of my client that they themselves are fully assured of the truth and justice of their demand. I think it right also to let you know that since these inquiries were first commenced, since the day for this trial was fixed, the younger of these ladies has been residing with the uncle of my client, under the same roof with my client, as an honored and most welcome guest, and there, in the face of the whole country, has received that appellation of nobility from all the assembled members of my client's family, to dispute which I apparently now stand before you on that client's behalf." The rector of Yoxham, who was in court, shook his head vehemently when the statement was made that Lady Anna had been his welcome guest; but nobody was then regarding the rector of Yoxham, and he shook his head in vain.

"You will at once ask why, if this be so, should the trial be continued. 'As all is thus conceded,' you will say, 'that these two ladies claim, whom in your indictment you have misnamed Murray, why not, in God's name, give them their privileges, and the wealth which should appertain to them, and release them from the persecution of judicial proceedings?' In the first place, I must answer that neither my belief, nor that of my friends who are acting with me, nor even that of my noble client himself, is sufficient to justify us in abstaining from seeking a decision which shall be final as against further claimants. If the young Earl should die, then would there be another earl, and that other earl might also say, with grounds as just as those on which we have acted, that the lady, whom I shall henceforward call the Countess Lovel, is no countess. We think that she is; but it will be for you to decide whether she is or is not, after hearing the evidence which will, no doubt, be adduced of her marriage, and any evidence to the contrary which other parties may bring before you. We shall adduce no evidence to the contrary, nor do I think it probable that we shall ask a single question to shake that with which my learned friend opposite is no doubt prepared. In fact, there is no reason why my learned friend and I should not sit together, having our briefs and our evidence in common. And then, as the singular facts of this story become clear to you—as I trust that I may be able to make them clear—you will learn that there are other interests at stake beyond those of my client and of the two ladies who appear here as his opponents. Two statements have been made tending to invalidate the rights of Countess Lovel, both having originated with one who appears to have been the basest and blackest human being with whose iniquities my experience as a lawyer has made me conversant. I speak of the late Earl. It was asserted by him, almost from the date of his marriage with the lady who is now his widow—falsely stated, as I myself do not doubt—that when he married her he had a former wife living. But it is, I understand, capable of absolute proof that he also stated that this former wife died soon after that second marriage, which, in such event, would have been but a mock marriage. Were such the truth—should you come to the belief that the late Earl spoke truth in so saying—the whole property at issue would become the undisputed possession of my client. The late earl died intestate, the will which he did leave having been already set aside by my client as having been made when the Earl was mad. The real wife, according to this story, would be dead. The second wife, according to this story, would be no wife and no widow. The daughter, according to this story, would be no daughter in the eye of the law—would, at any rate, be no heiress. The Earl would be the undisputed heir to the personal property, as he is to the real property and to the title. But we disbelieve this story utterly: we intend to offer no evidence to show that the first wife—for there was such a wife—was living when the second marriage was contracted. We have no such evidence, and believe that none such can be found. Then that recreant nobleman, in whose breast there was no touch of nobility, in whose heart was no spark of mercy, made a second statement, to this effect—that his first wife had not died at all. His reason for this it is hardly for us to seek. He may have done so, as affording a reason why he should not go through a second marriage ceremony with the lady whom he had so ill used. But that he did make this statement is certain; and it is also certain that he allowed an income to a certain woman as though to a wife, that he allowed her to be called the countess, though he was then living with another Italian woman; and it is also certain that this woman is still living—or at least that she was living some week or two ago. We believe her to have been an elder sister of her who was the first wife, and whose death occurred before the second marriage. Should it be proved that this living woman was the legitimate wife of the late Earl, not only would the right be barred of those two English ladies to whom all our sympathies are now given, but no portion of the property in dispute would go either to them or to my client. I am told that before his lordship, the Chief Justice, shall have left the case in your hands, an application will be made to the court on behalf of that living lady. I do not know how that may be, but I am so informed. If such application be made—if there be any attempt to prove that she should inherit as widow—then will my client again contest the case. We believe that the Countess Lovel, the English Countess, is the widow, and that Lady Anna Lovel is Lady Anna Lovel, and is the heiress. Against them we will not struggle. As was our bounden duty, we have sent not once only, but twice and thrice, to Italy and to Sicily in search of evidence which, if true, would prove that the English Countess was no countess. We have failed, and have no evidence which we think it right to ask a jury to believe. We think that a mass of falsehood has been heaped together among various persons in a remote part of a foreign country with the view of obtaining money, all of which was grounded on the previous falsehoods of the late Earl. We will not use these falsehoods with the object of disputing a right in the justice of which we have ourselves the strongest confidence. We withdraw from any such attempt.

"But as yet I have only given you the preliminaries of my story." He had, in truth, told his story. He had, at least, told all of it that it will import that the reader should hear. He, indeed—unfortunate one!—will have heard the most of that story twice or thrice before. But the audience in the Court of Queen's Bench still listened with breathless attention, while, under this new head of his story, he told every detail again with much greater length than he had done in the prelude which has been here given. He stated the facts of the Cumberland marriage, apologizing to his learned friend the Sergeant for taking, as he said, the very words out of his learned friend's mouth. He expatiated with an eloquence that was as vehement as it was touching on the demoniacal schemes of that wicked Earl, to whom, during the whole of his fiendish life, women had been a prey. He repudiated, with a scorn that was almost terrible in its wrath, the idea that Josephine Murray had gone to the Earl's house with the name of wife, knowing that she was, in fact, but a mistress. She herself was in court, thickly veiled, under the care of one of the Goffes, having been summoned there as a necessary witness, and could not control her emotion as she listened to the words of warm eulogy with which the adverse counsel told the history of her life. It seemed to her then that justice was at last being done to her. Then the Solicitor-General reverted again to the two Italian women—the Sicilian sisters, as he called them—and at much length gave his reasons for discrediting the evidence which he himself had sought, that he might use it with the object of establishing the claim of his client. And lastly, he described the nature of the possessions which had been amassed by the late Earl, who, black with covetousness as he was with every other sin, had so manipulated his property that almost the whole of it had become personal, and was thus inheritable by a female heiress. He knew, he said, that he was somewhat irregular in alluding to facts—or to fiction, if any one should call it fiction—which he did not intend to prove, or to attempt to prove; but there was something, he said, beyond the common in the aspect which this case had taken, something in itself so irregular, that he thought he might perhaps be held to be excused in what he had done. "For the sake of the whole Lovel family, for the sake of these two most interesting ladies, who have been subjected during a long period of years to most undeserved calamities, we are anxious to establish the truth. I have told you what we believe to be the truth, and as that in no single detail militates against the case as it will be put forward by my learned friends opposite, we have no evidence to offer. We are content to accept the marriage of the widowed Countess as a marriage in every respect legal and binding." So saying, the Solicitor-General sat down.

It was then past five o'clock, and the court, as a matter of course, was adjourned, but it was adjourned by consent to the Wednesday, instead of to the following day, in order that there might be due consideration given to the nature of the proceedings that must follow. As the thing stood at present, it seemed that there need be no further plea of "Lovel v. Murray and Another." It had been granted that Murray was not Murray, but Lovel, yet it was thought that something further would be done.

It had all been very pretty, but yet there had been a feeling of disappointment throughout the audience. Not a word had been said as to that part of the whole case which was supposed to be the most romantic. Not a word had been said about the tailor.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Prie-dieu Fashions.—The Roc outdone.—Cockney Malapropisms.—"Asking for more" at Eton.

I TRUST I am not encroaching upon the manor of your Paris correspondent when I mention that French fashions have come over hither hand in hand with French piety, and that the pilgrimage to Paray-le-Monial is putting money into our dress-makers' pockets. There are now robes à la prie-dieu, as well as à la every thing else, which Paterfamilias finds a very expensive addition to the "religious element" in his family. The skirt, I am assured by a young person who ought to know, is generally dove-color, the mantle is cut à la Carmélite, the bonnet shaped à la Béguin, and the whole attire is so arranged that the kneeling posture on the prie-dieu "gives a graceful prominence to the back breadths of the skirt." At the same time the—well, the fiction, is discarded, as it is apt "to exaggerate the outline." Perhaps you will be good enough to correct (if necessary) the French of this neat little description, and place it in some portion of your Bazar where it will be believed: a man that writes "gossip" is always subject to suspicion, and what I tell you is strictly true.

There was a time when the accounts of wonders brought from far were derided as "travelers' tales;" but nowadays, when a matter on the other side of the world can be verified by the flash of a wire, every thing receives acceptance. Thus you may take it for a fact, I believe, that there have been discovered in New Zealand the fossil bones of a bird so enormous that it is conjectured to have preyed upon the moa itself, and doubtless only perished when there was no more to eat. It had curved talons so very huge and sharp that it makes Sindbad's roc appear a mere Cochin China fowl. When I was at Eton there was an Eleventh Commandment—"Tell a lie, tell a good un, and stick to it," and at the first blush this scientific tale would seem to have some kindred with that apothegm; but I believe the news is trustworthy, and that you will not have to take the customary quarter of a mile off that fine bird's dimensions.

It is a mistake when people don't take off enough in such cases, and in others similar to them, as was exemplified the other day by one of our great London surgeons, Mr. C—— H——. This gentleman, unlike the majority of his profession, is said to keep a very sharp eye on that important artery called "the main chance," and not to need the dying exhortation of Marmion, which, if you remember, was to "charge." A clergyman in the Midlands chanced to break his leg, and his wife, alarmed for her good man's life, telegraphed for the great surgeon to come from town and set the limb. Any other doctor, even the most provincial, could have done it, and her husband's living was but £300 a year, so that you may well understand that she was as simple as the fracture itself; but she did not say that in the telegram, and down Mr. C—— H—— came. In five minutes he had done his job, and was turning to leave the house.

"How much we are indebted to you!" cried the grateful wife. "And, by-the-bye, how much are we?" "My fee, madam, is 250 guineas," was his quiet reply. She thought at first he must have meant "pennies," and was nearly offering him a guinea and twopence. Why, if it was guineas, it was a year's income! However, the doctor calmly assured her that it was guineas. She had a brother in a neighboring town who had some slight knowledge of the world, and she sent for him while Mr. C—— H—— waited for his check.

"My dear Sir," said the brother, in explanation, "all this is a sad mistake. I am very sorry you should have been sent for, but my sister was very nervous; knows nothing of the charges made by gentlemen in your eminent position, and is utterly overwhelmed by the extent of your demand. Pray reconsider the matter, and don't charge her 250 guineas."

"Very good. I have," said the surgeon. "I'll make them pounds."

At this season of the year the vulgar of London throng to Ramsgate and Margate, on the Kentish coast. You may be surprised, therefore, to learn that your correspondent has also visited those places. "Nihil humanum a me alienum puto" is, however, his motto; I don't care how vulgar my companion is, so long as he amuses me, and these good folks upon their holiday have certainly brightened mine. In the first place, their English is something delightful, and quite different from that language as understood by your humble servant; and as they all talk at the top of their voices, not a gem of it escapes the ear. I heard some gentlemen discoursing upon a literary subject on the sea-beach, as to how a certain blind author contrived to write his works. "Oh," said one, "he has an amanuensis!" "I see," assented another; "and then he dedicates his books to him!" This was a pretty good example of malapropism, but I was favored with better. Two elderly ladies sat down in my vicinity to what they termed "barst in the sun," and fell conversing on a number of entertaining subjects—among others, upon a most frightful murder that has just taken place in London. Nothing, indeed, has happened like it since Mr. Groenacre cut up his wife into little pieces because, as the wags said, "he didn't like her altogether." A body of a woman, in more than twenty different portions—one lung here and another there, and the head sailing about all by itself—has just been discovered in the Thames.

"Lor!" said one of my lady companions, "that is something like a murder, ain't it?"

"Oh, you may say that! I wonder who was the proprietor of it!"

In this dead season of the year murders are very welcome to our newspapers; and, indeed, without them there would be nothing to read about except the strike among the Eton masters for more money for the keep of their boys. Considering that the head-master of this aristocratic establishment gets £10,000 a year as a compensation for his not keeping boarders, and that each of the boys pays £150 a year (the year only lasting, on account of the length of the holidays, for thirty-nine weeks) for his board and keep—for his tuition is extra—you will be rather astonished at this strike. But the masters know with whom they are dealing—i. e., the fathers of their boys. Money is "no object" to the majority of those who send their sons to Eton, and though one or two venture to remonstrate, others write to say "they, for their part, do not complain; they always knew Eton was expensive, and are quite satisfied with the new arrangement."

This is only another example of that "snobbism" which, as I have had occasion to tell you, is so rampant here that the very education of our children is sacrificed to it. Eton is the school to which, above all others, our young lordlings—such, at least, as have brains for any education at all—are sent; and the sons of our rich parvenus are sent thither also in order to make the acquaintance of these juvenile noblemen. As to learning any thing beyond "the tone"—which is, after all, between ourselves, not a very high one—that is not expected, or perhaps even desired. The reputation of the place in that way is based upon a remark made, or said to have been made, by the great Duke of Wellington, that he had learned "how to win at Waterloo in the playing-fields of Eton." But that was some years ago; and when one considers that the average number of boys there has been eight hundred for the last twenty years—there are now over a thousand—and that these have every advantage in after-life in the way of position and wealth, the very, very few great men in any line that it has turned out is quite remarkable.

This clamor of the masters for more money is every way discreditable, and will perhaps cause some fathers to ask themselves, What can "the tone" be for which we give so much if it is these greedy gentry who impart it to our boys? By-the-bye, it is rather interesting to observe the immense strides made by school-boys of late years with respect to their amusements. Eton boys, for example, who now always wear in public tall hats and white cravats, and come up to play cricket matches at "Lord's" in London before twenty thousand people, were, in Gray's time, it seems, quite a different class of creature:

"Say, Father Thames—for thou hast seen
Full many a sprightly race
Disporting on thy margent green
The paths of pleasure trace—
Who foremost now delights to cleave
With pliant arm the glassy wave?
The captive linnet which enthrall?
What idle progeny succeed
To chase the rolling circle's speed,
Or urge the flying ball?"

To propose to a modern Eton boy to catch a linnet or roll a hoop would be an indignity indeed. And I hear that in America your lads are even more precocious than in England.

What has become of our boys?

R. KEMBLE, of London.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

"BULLS" and "bears," "puts" and "calls," "long" and "short," "cliques" and "pools," "corners," "margins," "scoop," "squeeze," "straddle," "twisting," "coppering," "watering," "washing"—these are some of the technical terms familiar enough in Wall Street, but quite unintelligible to those who have not been initiated into the mysteries of the Stock Exchange. Ladies may be thankful, to our thinking, that the time has not yet come (may it be far distant!) for Wall Street to be included in their "sphere." To say nothing of the irregular and dishonest dealings of "stock-gambling," the hourly anxieties, perplexities, and uncertainties attending a legitimate brokerage business are not to be envied. They fill the mind with constant restless solicitude, and make the man grow gray before his time. But since in the great financial centre of our country transactions are frequently occurring which affect the whole business community, it is well for every one to understand some of the more common idioms which our language has been forced to form in Wall Street. Regular operators in stocks are divided into two classes, "bulls" and "bears," the main object of the former being to advance prices, and that of the latter to depress them. But a speculator will be a "bull" at one time and a "bear" at another, according to the prospect of making money on one side or the other. Any occurrence which unsettles values is taken advantage of by the "bears." Not unfrequently an intentional panic is produced, that stocks may be bought at low prices. The business of a "bear" is to sell property that he does not possess—that is, in Wall Street parlance, to sell "short"—intending to purchase and deliver it when prices fall. If required to deliver it before prices are lower, he borrows, there being a regular system for borrowing stock. The "bull" is in possession of stocks—that is, he is "long"—bought with the expectation of selling at an advanced price. A "clique" or "pool" is composed of "bears" who strive to depress values in order that they may purchase at lower prices than they sold at; or of "bulls" who desire to advance prices. When any kind of stock is controlled by a "clique," it causes what is called a "corner." If, for example, a large quantity of it has been bought "short," an upward movement in prices is sometimes made by the "bulls," and the "bears" are compelled to buy for delivery at higher rates than they sold at, a process called "twisting" or "squeezing." A "put" is a contract by which the signer agrees to receive a certain amount of a specified stock, at a price agreed upon, any time within a certain number of days or months, a bonus being given by the holder of the contract. The holder receives any dividends declared during this time, and if the stock declines in value, so that he can purchase at a lower price than that mentioned in the contract, he will deliver, or "put," the stock to the person signing it; but if he can not make any thing by the transaction, he is not obliged to deliver. A "call" is a contract enabling the holder to demand of the signer a definite number of shares of some particular stock at a specified price, and within a certain time. If the stock advances the holder may "call" it, and make money; but if it declines, he is under no obligation to "call" it, though of course he pays the signer of the contract a bonus. A "straddle," or "double privilege," is a contract allowing the holder either to "put" or "call" stock. The money deposited with a broker through whom stocks are purchased, as security against sudden depreciation, is a "margin." When a "clique" instruct some of their brokers to offer a particular stock in the market at a low price, until other stockholders, becoming alarmed, sell their stock at the best price they can get, and the "clique" at the same time instruct other of their brokers to buy up all of this stock at the low price, the process is called a "scoop." The terms we have briefly explained by no means comprise all the nomenclature of Wall Street, but are merely some of the most familiar phrases of the Stock Exchange.

Shreveport, Louisiana, which has suffered so severely from a virulent form of yellow fever, is said to be a place where, from its location, all diseases are nourished by malarious influences. It has been for many years the head of navigation on the Red River; yet it is so surrounded by vast areas of low land, that with low water there is always an atmosphere charged with deadly malaria. Even in ordinary times the mortality is excessive.

In a recent work on Epidemic or Malignant Cholera it is stated that the poison which causes the disease consists of certain microscopic fungi which, being received into the system, propagate their kind. It is believed by some that this fungus takes its origin on the banks of the Ganges, and that it is produced upon the rice plant. There are many facts in favor of this supposition, although it has not gained universal acceptance with medical men. But it is certain that epidemic cholera never arose spontaneously in any country but Hindostan.

"Obesh" and "Dil" are the respective names of the male and female hippopotami in the Zoological Gardens at London. "Guy Fawkes" is the name of the baby, now eight months old, and until lately he has been kept in the den with his mother. The other day, however, he was introduced to his father, and began rubbing against him in a friendly manner, when suddenly his mother, Dil, rushed at Obesh, and the two gigantic beasts engaged for a few minutes in a savage fight, rearing upon their hind-legs, clashing their tusks together, opening their portentous jaws, and biting at each other maliciously. Obesh was finally worsted, and was ignominiously driven into his pond, while Dil, with Guy Fawkes on her back, stared at him, grunting, and apparently threatening him, for three-quarters of an hour. At the expiration of that time, however, peace was declared, and the most affectionate family endearments were exchanged between the reconciled and contented trio. Obesh has been in the gardens twenty-three years.

Friday will bear the reputation of being an unlucky day in Wall Street. The "Black Friday" of September, 1869, which brought ruin to so many, is well remembered; and it is a singular coincidence that the culmination of the recent panic, when the finances of the country were in a dangerous condition, happened upon the same day of the week, and in the same month.

The safe arrival at Dundee, Scotland, of the crew of the Polaris has relieved a very general suspense. It appears that after the Polaris was abandoned the party wintered in Life-boat Cove, where they built a timber house, which they covered with sails. Plentiful supplies of walrus liver were obtained from the Esquimaux, and in the spring two boats were built, in which they embarked and sailed southward. They were rescued by the Ravenscraig.

Henry Ward Beecher expresses the opinion that if a wife's health require that she go to the country, no husband not a curmudgeon will complain, but it is a most unwifely and demoralizing habit that fashionable women have of pleasure-seeking at watering-places while the husband wanders like a lost spirit through deserted rooms. No woman who values her domestic happiness as she should will leave her husband thus unprotected.

An English clergyman has been sentenced to pay fifty dollars damages for sending a libelous postal card to one of his parishioners, reproaching him for not paying "Easter dues." The accusation on the card commenced with these words:

"Your love of money is notorious. To acquire it has been the aim and object of your life, but at eighty-four you and it must soon part. Will it avail you where you are going? This propensity of yours, so lamentable in one so old, explains your unjustly withholding my Easter dues for the last two years. Well, instead of taking you into the County Court and enforcing them, as I could do, I make you a present of them."

Several other postal cards on the same subject had been sent, which were considered to show a malicious intention to injure the parishioner, though it was not denied that he had refused to pay dues. Thus far the postal card system does not appear to have been much used in this country for malicious purposes; but if it should be, the law will doubtless be appealed to, and proper punishment inflicted upon offenders.

"Honesty" is always reckoned "the best policy;" so also on many occasions is frankness. Many persons will keenly sympathize with a distinguished theological professor, whose memory once utterly failed him as he was waiting in a dépôt for a train. A gentleman stepped up, accosted him warmly, and began numerous inquiries for members of his family. The professor was puzzled; the face of his cordial friend was quite familiar, but to recall his name was beyond any effort of memory. Disliking to make the awkward inquiry, he joined in a lively conversation, hoping for some chance word to reveal the name of his friend. But the ignorance became more and more embarrassing. At last a happy thought came to the professor. So with an indifferent air he asked, "Let me see—I forget just how you spell your name!" But alas for the expedient! With a curious smile, his friend replied, "Well, usually I spell it J-o-n-e-s!"

Camphor is recommended as useful in expelling mosquitoes from a room. The spirts of camphor may be scattered about, or the gum be evaporated over a lamp. Spirits of camphor is also good to scatter inflammation if applied in season. Boils may be thus prevented if the remedy is used in good season.

Hay-fever sufferers will rejoice to know that there is some alleviation of suffering and discomfort possible to them. Mr. Beecher writes that at the Twin Mountain House there have been twenty or thirty refugees, each one of whom has aforetime been made desperate for six weeks of the summer, but this season has been untouched with the ailment. His opinion is that though no radical cure for hay asthma is known, the disease may be kept wholly in check from year to year by a suitable change of air. Either the sea air in full measure or the mountain air is necessary. Many persons are entirely relieved at the sea-side, and almost without exception every one is relieved by taking refuge in the mountains. It is needful that one who is subject to the disease should make the change of air before the coming of the usual attack, and remain away during the whole period which it usually continues.

Manhattan Square extends from Seventy-seventh Street to Eighty-first Street, between Eighth and Ninth avenues. This is the location selected for the new American Museum of Natural History, to which will be removed the collection now in the Arsenal in the Central Park. A State appropriation of $500,000 has been made for the building, the preparation of the foundation has been finished up to a certain point by the Department of Public Parks, and the contracts for the building given out, with the condition that the work shall be begun immediately. It is estimated that it will be completed in January, 1875. The Museum is to be made as nearly fire-proof as possible, and to be heated entirely by steam-coils. The floors are to be constructed with wrought iron girders and rolled iron beams, and iron columns and brick arches are to furnish the support. The roof will be constructed entirely of iron, and the partitions in the Mansard story will also be fire-proof.

HOLIDAY-TIME AFLOAT.—[See Page 666.]

Hosted by Google

HOLIDAY-TIME AFLOAT.

See illustration on double-page.

THE scene represented in this pretty picture repeats itself again and again on our lakes and rivers in the holiday-time of summer, when merry excursionists crowd the decks of the steamboats on their way to some shady grove or favorite summer resort. Judging from their aspect, the good folks on board the vessel in our picture are on their way "to spend a happy day" among umbrageous bowers. The boat must be pretty steady, for one couple is essaying to dance to the music of the band, and yet the tremulous movement caused by the throbbing of the engines causes the hand of that little old-fashioned man to be so unsteady that he is emptying the bottled stout in his good lady's lap instead of into the tumbler. Further on we perceive a pair who have already attained to the degree of bliss promised to the frequenters of the grove in question; for is not his arm around her waist, his hand resting lovingly on her shoulder, and does not her placid face show that she is pleased to have it so? Next to the young man is a mother with a baby, oblivious as babies are wont to be to every thing except to the joys of suction and the pangs of incipient teeth, and opposite baby an elder daughter with an apple in her hand. In the right-hand corner we have a stately mamma and her comely daughter, a pair whom we fancy are holding themselves rather aloof, as beings of a superior world to the ordinary holiday folk. But perhaps we are wrong; perhaps the young man with the mustache and turned-down collar is the daughter's admitted sweetheart, and in that case they are probably only thinking about each other, and are quite independent of their fellow-passengers.

IN THE SUNSHINE.

THE peach hangs heavy on the garden wall—
See, love, see!
The peach hangs heavy on the garden wall;
'Tis ripe, rose-tinted, and ready to fall.
Fruit meet for thee and me,
'Tis ripe as ripe can be:
May we not pluck it from the garden wall?

The sweet birds warble near the garden wall—
Hush, love, hush!
The sweet birds warble near the garden wall;
With melody their mates they softly call.
Each wooes unto his nest
The one that each loves best,
Warbling so sweetly by the garden wall.

Warm lips are waiting by the garden wall—
Yes, love, yes!
Warm lips are waiting by the garden wall;
They wait love's kisses, and they claim love's all.
If thy heart's love be mine,
As my heart's love is thine,
May we not tell it by the garden wall?

THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT.

BY KATE PUTNAM OSGOOD.

THE public has been in error long enough on this subject, thanks to that ridiculous nursery jingle. As for me, I know better. I am myself the house that Jack built, and I should think I ought to know the circumstances under which I was put together. I do know them, the how and the why and all about it, and I am going to relate the whole here for the general benefit.

And to begin with, as people are so ready to be captious, I want to explain before I say another word that those portions of my story which could not have come within my personal knowledge, seeing they belong to a time before I was made, were communicated to me by the other house, which is a great deal older than I am, and so, naturally, has seen and heard more. And if you are ignorant enough not to know that houses, like every thing else, have their own way of talking together, why, I can only say that is your fault, not mine.

Jack Heaton—yes, I dare say it might sound more respectful to say Mr. John Heaton, but nobody else ever did so within my experience, and I don't know why I need—Jack Heaton, I repeat, was thirty-eight years old, well off, good-natured, good-looking, and unmarried. Why he was unmarried I really can't tell you; I never heard of his having had a disappointment, and I know his mother would have liked nothing better than to see him settled with a wife of the right sort. However, that has nothing to do with the present matter: my story is mainly Minnie's story, and Jack's only so far as he had to do with her.

Who was Minnie? What, you don't know that! Well, then, Minnie was the orphan child of one of Jack's college classmates, his best and oldest friend. Something like six years before the time I am going to describe, Jack came home to dinner one day in a brown-study, and when reminded by his mother that salt was nicer than sugar in soup, answered, abruptly,

"Mother, poor Walter Gorham's little girl, it seems, is left with no particular home or means."

"And my generous, extravagant boy has made up his mind to provide both, I can see," put in Mrs. Heaton, smiling at him. Jack was over thirty then, but, as I have often noticed, a man is always a boy to his mother, even if he were a very Methuselah in years.

"The generosity, if there is any, would be pretty much on your side, I am afraid, mother," rejoined Jack, "for the care would come on you; still, I can't bear to think of poor old Walter's child wanting any thing we could give her; so, if you weren't afraid of finding her too great a trouble—"

"Not a bit of trouble," said Mrs. Heaton, without a moment's pause for reflection. If Jack's generosity was extravagant, it was easy to see where he got it! "Haven't I wanted a girl of my own all my life?"

"Yes, I know I was a disappointment to you, mother," put in Jack, with whom this was an old joke.

"As if I would change my boy for all the girls in the world! Still I suppose that doesn't prevent my liking to try my hand on one."

So that is the way it was settled, and Minnie Gorham, a shy, pale little damsel of twelve, came to live in the Heatons' house—the old house, mind you, for that was before I was so much as thought of, hard as I find that to understand now. There she grew up to a girl of seventeen, neither shy nor pale then, but with about the brightest eyes and clearest laugh to be found in the whole neighborhood, as more than one individual had discovered already.

It was somewhere about this time that Jack Heaton, coming home one spring day, was impressed, as he closed the door behind him, by the unwonted quiet of the house. No head peeped into the hall to welcome him; there was nobody in the parlor, nobody in the sitting-room, nobody in the dining-room. Jack penetrated as far as the kitchen, and there finally he came upon Minnie, half extinguished in a blue cotton apron several sizes too large for her, with her sleeves tucked up from her round white arms, and her curly hair all thrust away at the back of her head in a great rough knot, from which stray tendrils crept out in a distracted and distracting manner. Jack's surprise found vent in a low whistle, at which Minnie turned round with a suddenness that sent a pile of egg-shells at her elbow flying from the table to the floor.

"Oh dear!" she exclaimed. "Really, 'gentlemen didn't ought to come into the kitchen,' as cook used to be so fond of remarking."

"Used to be?" repeated Jack, ruefully surveying his own mischief. "Cook hasn't departed this life, has she?"

"No, but she has departed this house, and under peculiar circumstances—for further particulars inquire within," added Minnie, mysteriously tapping a black bottle in the chimney-corner; "and as Bridget knows about as much of civilized cooking as a wild Pawnee, Aunt Fanny and I have sent her up stairs about her business; and if all that isn't explanation enough—"

"Add that Miss Minnie seizes the opportunity to practice on us for the benefit of Mr. Ned Wyndham's household," mischievously put in Mrs. Heaton, appearing from the next room with a handkerchief tied over her head.

"Is that so, Minnie?" asked Jack, after a pause, in which he had attentively considered Minnie, who had fallen to beating the eggs again with still greater energy, which was perhaps what made her cheeks so red.

"The idea!" answered Miss Minnie, with a toss of the head that sent half a score of little curls flying loose. "Before he can have a household he must have a house; and though I dare say the will's good enough, if I wait till he can take me home—" and Minnie completed her broken sentence with an expressive flourish of the egg-beater.

"Well, but you can take him home, then," said Mrs. Heaton. "It comes to the same thing."

"Same difficulty in the way," replied Minnie, "seeing I'm not an Aladdin to make a palace out of a toad-stool."

"And if you were, would you make young Wyndham King Toad?" asked Jack, laughingly, but watching her closely the while.

"Oh, you uncivilized John! did you never hear that direct questions were the bane of existence?" exclaimed Minnie, vanishing into the pantry in search of a nutmeg grater, as she said.

"Is it really true?" asked Jack of his mother, in a low voice.

"Why, where have your eyes been?" answered Mrs. Heaton, in the same tone.

It was scarcely a week later that Mrs. Heaton was thrown into a regular flurry by observing what looked suspiciously like building preparations in the vacant lot adjoining, an open green, forming a part of their grounds. Had Jack sold it to some building speculator? That was an important question under the circumstances, for, as there was only the garden fence between, a great deal would be depending on the sort of tenants the new house might have. Mrs. Heaton could hardly wait Jack's coming home to satisfy her impatience.

"Jack"—she began the attack directly—"there seems to have been some kind of building people in the vacant lot this morning."

"I know it," answered Jack; and after a little pause, "In fact, I sent them."

"Oh, Jack!" exclaimed his mother, reproachfully, "I never thought you would have sold that ground."

"I haven't sold it," answered Jack; and added, "I think of building myself."

"You!" said Mrs. Heaton, in a tone of surprise—"you, of all people in the world, turning speculator! But now, my dear boy, have you considered the risk you run? It is so near; disagreeable people there could make themselves so very disagreeable to us."

"I'll promise to take nobody into the new house who can disturb the peace of the old one," replied Jack, with a smile. "Besides, mother, it isn't even begun yet; time enough to worry when you see the slates on the roof and the chimney smoking."

"Ah, that won't be long first, I'm afraid!" said Mrs. Heaton, ruefully.

"I hope not," rejoined her son. "I'm bound to get the thing through as soon as possible."

"But what for?" replied Mrs. Heaton; "what good is it all going to do?"

"Oh, building pays," answered Jack, vaguely, and changed the subject.

It looked as if Jack meant to lose no time from the way things went ahead. Minnie declared that he had made some unholy compact, and that invisible hands at night took up the work where his Irish hod-carriers had left it. And certainly the house—that is, myself, you understand—grew with a rapidity that gave some color to her accusation.

Finally the day came when I stood finished from head to foot, or, if you prefer it, from roof to basement. And though I say it, that perhaps should not say it, I was a handsome structure. I had a piazza, a balcony, a bay-window; no modern improvement or adornment had been spared on me. I was as yet empty, to be sure, but that was a lack easily supplied; all the more easily that Jack the very evening I was done brought over his womankind, with the addition of young Ned Wyndham, who happened to be making a call at the old house, to give their united voice about the furnishing.

I remember just how the party looked as they entered. Minnie came in first of all. She wore a thin white dress, covered with flounces and puffings, and the folds of which she had gathered up out of the dust, so that I had a peep at the rosettes on her little high-heeled slippers. Her black wavy hair had a red rose-bud on the left side, to balance the pink dimple in her right cheek, I suppose, and her black eyes were wide open and sparkling. Altogether I approved of her, and if I had not been afraid, being so new, of doing some harm to myself, I should have given some sign of satisfaction. Ned Wyndham followed her, quite an elegant-looking young fellow, with white hands and a tawny mustache, and who—that I saw at once—admired her quite as much as I did. Jack and his mother brought up the rear, Jack carrying a note-book and pencil, and Mrs. Heaton with a look of surprise and remonstrance on her face. She was speaking as she entered.

"But, my dear boy," she said, "I can not conceive why you should want to throw away your money on this house." Now this of course was not pleasant for me to listen to, but I resolved to hear further, and not take any hasty prejudices. "It isn't every body, you know," she continued, "who cares to take a furnished house."

"And it isn't every body I would let it to," answered Jack. "Have you forgotten our agreement, mother? I mean to have nice people in here, so I must bait my trap accordingly. That's why I have brought you all over this evening to give me the benefit of your taste. Come, won't somebody begin?"

"Oh, what a dear little bay-window room!" here cried Minnie, who had been flitting about without much attending to the others. "If it were my house I should make this my snuggery; I'd put my piano in that recess there, and a disgracefully easy chair here in the bay-window."

"And fill the balcony with roses and things," completed young Wyndham, whose mind was plainly distracted by that red rose-bud.

"Not bad suggestions either," said Jack, whose pencil was already jotting down pianos, easy-chairs, and plants. "Now what do you say, mother?"

"This room with the dark paneling I should furnish in deep crimson," said Mrs. Heaton, reflectively, from the threshold. "It is just my idea of a comfortable winter parlor; and with a handsome set of book-cases—that is, if it was my own house, I mean," she added, suddenly pulling herself up short in this field so delightful to a woman, and resuming the prudential tone with which she considered it necessary to hold Jack's lavishness in check—"but I can't see the good of getting together pretty things for strangers to spoil."

"Oh, I'll get the worth of my outlay, never fear," said Jack, laughing. "Deep crimson, you say—'m—book-cases—'m—'m."

And that is the way it was from garret to cellar. Not a word could any body drop but Jack's little stump of a pencil caught it up and pinned it fast in a twinkling. If these suggestions were carried out, there was every prospect of as elegant a little dwelling as any body need desire.

And it was so. Yes, I don't know why I should be shy of the truth, and I openly declare that I never wish to see a nicer-looking house than I was after the cabinet-maker and the upholsterer had finished with me, and I stood complete from top to toe in my new clothes. The work had been thoroughly well done. I had variety without gaudiness; bright clear tints, and dark rich shades, lit up with the gleam of mirrors and gilding, and softened with such a profusion of greenery wherever it could be placed, that I appeared to have grown rather than to have been made. Minnie, who approved of me thoroughly—and, indeed, I was mainly the result of her taste—had declared I should be named the Nest, for I was not like any other ordinary house.

It was an autumn day when I was finished—the evening, as I recollect, before Minnie's birthday. She stood in the garden of the old house with Jack, looking at me as my windows brightened in the setting sun, till I seemed all in a glow, inside and out.

"The last stick went in to-day," said Minnie. "The nest is all ready for the birds."

"Then suppose we go over and take a bird's-eye view," suggested Jack, with a laugh, taking his arms from the fence and throwing away the end of his cigar. He opened the gate, and they strolled over together.

Minnie was all in black that evening, with a black necklace round her throat, and her thick black hair waving all over her shoulders. She made me think of a little nun, only those long curls and the bright eyes didn't suit with my ideas of a nun exactly.

They came in and stopped in the little bay-window room, furnished just as she had suggested. She looked round her, then out at the flowers and green things in the balcony, and then all round her again.

"Oh," she said, "I hope whoever comes here will be somebody I can like, for I do love this house so, I can't give it up entirely."

Now I thought this a very pretty speech indeed, and I made the most of the last sun-rays in order to look as bright as I could, as a suitable acknowledgment.

Jack's face brightened too. "I am so glad you like it," he said, heartily, and taking both her hands in his. "My dear Minnie," he continued, "to-morrow, I know, is your birthday, but you won't mind my anticipating by a few hours, I suppose, on making my present something useful as well as ornamental. You are 'monarch of all you survey,'" he went on, jestingly—"of this house and all it contains; and, my dear little girl, I only hope you may be as happy in your nest as I have been in building it for you."

"You built it—for—me?" said Minnie, in so low a voice that I should hardly have thought Jack could have heard, and without once looking up at him, which did not seem to me pretty manners under the circumstances.

"For you and King Toad," answered Jack, laughing.

"King Toad?" repeated Minnie, looking up now with a puzzled face.

"I ought to beg Mr. Edward Wyndham's pardon for that, I suppose," said Jack; "but have you forgotten our conversation last spring, when you gave me to understand that you could not make that young gentleman your King Toad for want of a toad-stool to hold your court under? Now here is the toad-stool, and I hope—"

"I don't want it! I won't have it!" interrupted Minnie, pulling her hands away, and rushing to the window with cheeks as red as the scarlet geraniums there. "It's too, too bad! Ned Wyndham, indeed!"

"But, my dear child," remonstrated Jack, who stood like a statue of astonishment where she had left him, "we all fancied you liked him."

"I'm sure I don't know why you should fancy it," retorted Minnie, with an emphasis very much misplaced on so small a word. "I detest him, and—and every body!"

"Me too? Oh, Minnie, Minnie!" said Jack, walking toward her. "Why, what is the matter, Minnie?"

Jack Heaton built me, I know that; but still I must say I think there could hardly ever have been another man so stupid in such a case. I was new; I had had no experience in that kind of thing; but, for all that, I knew what was the matter with Minnie.

"Are you angry with me?" Jack blundered on. "What have I done? Won't you look at me, Minnie?" for she sat still where she had flung herself into the "disgracefully easy chair," and kept her face obstinately turned away from him. But when he said, "Won't you look at me, Minnie?" she raised her eyes to his very slowly, almost as if against her will. I don't know what he read in her eyes, for I was watching him, but I know I saw the oddest sort of change come over his face, and he put out his hand quickly in a blind sort of way, and struck it against the window-sill. There was a long pause.

"So you won't take my house?" he said, suddenly, in an indescribable tone.

"Never, on that condition," answered Minnie, emphatically.

"And—on what, then?" said he.

"None that would oblige me to—to leave you all," said Minnie. "How pretty those scarlet leaves look in the corner there!" she added, lightly, rising and taking a step forward.

"Stop a minute," said Jack. She stood still, without replying, just on the edge of the balcony, waiting for him to speak. I really thought he never was going to, but still she waited without a word. "Minnie," he said at last, "I am a great deal older than you."

"Après?" said she, saucily. I could have shaken the little witch for her pretenses; for, though Jack couldn't see her face, I could, and it was all in a quiver.

"And—but—I have cared more for you than any thing else ever since you came to us."

"And so have I, Jack," she said, all in a breath, but hanging down her head.

I was not altogether pleased with this answer, it was so very illogical; but it seemed to satisfy Jack, for he caught both her hands again and—but no, on second thoughts I won't tell you what he did, for I am eminently a proper house, and I should not like you to get a wrong idea of me from any foolish behavior of my owners. I'll tell you instead what I did; I gave a tremendous crack that startled them both. Minnie gave a little scream.

"It's nothing but the walls," said Jack, re-assuringly. "It's often so with new houses."

"Are you sure?" said Minnie, peering round through the twilight. "I thought perhaps somebody might have seen— Only think, Jack, if walls had eyes and well as ears!"

If!—I cracked again, louder than before, this time with amusement.

"Oh dear!" said Minnie, pretending fright in so pretty a way that I excused the temporary imbecility of Jack's face. "Do let us get away before the ceiling tumbles about our ears!"

It is some years since that evening. Jack has had a kind of covered piazza built between us two houses, the old and the new, and it would really be difficult to say which of us the family live in. All that can be said with any certainty is that, take us altogether, we are a very happy family indeed, and, spite of our semi-separation, an uncommonly united one.

This is the real, reliable history of the house that Jack built. I give you my word there is not a syllable of truth in that absurd old rigmarole about the cat and the rat and the malt, and all the rest of it; and if you continue to pin your faith to it in the teeth of my assurance, it will only be out of the obstinacy peculiar to the human race.

Hosted by Google

"POLTERABEND" IN GERMANY.

THERE is perhaps no land where one has a better opportunity to observe old customs than in Germany. We wonder sometimes how she has contrived to whirl through the giddy mazes of time with her sister lands and yet get no more shaken up than she has. The old customs seem to have a peculiarly strong hold in the villages and small towns. To live in one of these places gives an American the feeling of being set back at least two centuries in the world's history. One of these old customs is the observance of the evening before a wedding. It is called "Polterabend." The verb "to polter" means to make a great noise, and the evening rightly takes its name from the word. It is a proverb here that "the more potsherds, the more luck;" therefore the friends of the bride collect all the old earthenware which is hors de combat for household warfare, and bring it and dash it against the house where the bride lives. Old cracked plates, saucers, earthen pots, handleless cups, and noseless pitchers close their crippled earthly career by this frantic plunge at the foot of the altar of Hymen. It takes but a short time for the news of the "Polterabend" to reach the ears of the street boys, and then the work goes on merrily; for when could boy nature ever resist so glorious an opportunity to smash something? One living in the house, or even in the vicinity, feels as if Joshua with his armed band were compassing the premises for the seventh time, and as if the walls might fall at any moment, or as if that mythical "bear" had at last really got into the "china shop," so continuous is the crash. The family are obliged to have these tokens of good luck removed as soon as it is light on the following morning, or be fined, as they obstruct the sidewalk. It often requires a horse and cart to do it. While this strange ceremony is taking place outside the house, the friends of the lady have gathered within. No invitations are given, but the house is thrown open, and all the acquaintances are expected to come. Each guest brings some gift, and the presents are placed on a table as they accumulate for the admiration of the assembled company. It is customary to have some short dramatic piece or pieces acted. These are usually prepared for the occasion, and weave in many a sly hit at the habits or tastes of the devoted pair, or hints at the peculiar incidents of the courtship.

We recently attended the "Polterabend" of an American lady who has turned traitor to her republican principles, and resolved to subject herself to Prussian government in house as well as in state. As the guests were socially chatting with each other, the doors were thrown open, and a very picturesque party of gayly dressed gypsies entered the room. In the centre of the group was a pretty little straw wagon, drawn by two of the younger gypsies. It was tastefully trimmed with flowers and evergreens, and in it sat a little child in brilliant gypsy costume, a wreath of flowers on her head, and her figure half concealed by the presents which filled her fantastic car. The company represented themselves as having wandered to this land from America, and as bringing gifts and messages from the dear ones beyond the sea. Each gift was presented by some appropriate words or verses from the gypsy who brought it, and we can only say that we have never seen gypsies who could give a more witty turn to a verse or make more touching allusions to absent ones than these could. One of these gifts was the key-basket to be used in the future housekeeping, for every thing in Germany must be locked up, and it is often as much of an undertaking for a guest to get a book from the library as for the servant to get a lump of sugar from the box. This evening the basket was filled with flowers, but when it is full of heavy keys it is no light matter to carry about. It must be the constant companion of the housekeeper. A lady who lives in one of these old castles, where the rooms are numberless and the keys old-fashioned and massive, says that her wrist often aches for half an hour after carrying her basket about on the regular morning inspection tour. Another gift was the myrtle wreath to be worn the next day at the wedding. Orange flowers are worn only by widows at their second marriage. The myrtle wreath is indispensable to the young bride, even if she have only a calico dress to be married in; consequently every other little dark window in dirty street or lane has its pot of myrtle, with its rich dark leaves, delicately suggestive of the maidenly expectations which are budding behind it. The marriage always takes place in church. After the usual Lutheran marriage ceremony the clergyman makes an address to the bride and groom of from five to ten minutes in length. The whole ceremony is sweet, simple, and impressive, and seems much more fitting for the occasion than the business-like way in which the matter is often dispatched with us.

On the evening after the wedding another gathering of friends takes place at the house of the bride. To this invitations are given, and only intimate friends are present. The dancing continues till late into the night, and at the close another old custom is observed. The bride and groom are blindfolded. The ladies gather in a circle around the groom, and the gentlemen in a similar circle around the bride. The gentleman makes a random selection from his surroundings, and the lady does the same from hers. These two chosen ones must dance the last dance together, and are supposed to be the next happy pair who will have a "Polterabend." If "blind chance" can make such wonderful selections as these blinded people do, it is not strange that she often makes happy hits. At the close of the festivities, in all of which eating and drinking form an important part, some married lady removes the wreath and veil from the head of the bride, and puts on instead the "Haube," or cap, worn by all married ladies in the morning. The bride has now left the ranks of her young friends, and has entered those of the matrons. Hence the German expression, "Sie ist unter die Haube gekommen," instead of "She is married." There is often a playful and prolonged struggle between the married and unmarried ladies before this symbolic ceremony is finally accomplished, each striving for the possession of the bride. In the case of the American lady of whom we have spoken the "Haube" was a pretty little blonde lace affair, with a fleet of pink bows anchored about among its foamy puffs. It was really more becoming than the bridal array which it displaced; and we will hope that the quiet home duties which it symbolizes will be more sweet and satisfactory to her than any girlish pleasures which she may have laid aside with the myrtle and the veil.

MUSIC WITHOUT TEARS.

TO teach children to acquire the rudiments of an ordinary education with as much ease and as little ennui as possible is a question that has absorbed much attention during the last ten or fifteen years. Little volumes called Reading without Tears are given to the world, and some of our best authors have not disdained to prepare elementary works upon history or science to guide their first steps in the pursuit of knowledge. With such attractive text-books as are provided for nursery and school-room, children must indeed be dull who do not enjoy their lessons.

But all these praiseworthy efforts are turned into one channel. When so many great minds have stooped to smooth away all difficulties, and create a royal road to learning—when "first steps" abound in every department of knowledge from reading to algebra and astronomy, not omitting French and Latin—why is it that so little attention is given to facilitating and awakening an interest in not only the rudiments but the entire course of a musical education? In our days some knowledge of the piano is considered almost as indispensable as arithmetic or history, and parents willingly pay exorbitant sums to have their children's fingers well trained; but the results are not always the happiest. One or two quarters at $60 or $80 pass over, the children endeavor—poor little victims!—to master the frightful intricacies that attend the acquirement of technique; but often high tragedy is enacted alike by pupil and teacher, and the professor despairingly announces to mamma that her daughter has no ear, and is hopelessly dull in music. Some young people struggle on, however, and after two or three years are able to play with metronome-like precision, but naught besides. The professor has trained the fingers indeed, but left the mind untouched.

I have gone through all the slavery to my piano that young aspirants to a fine musical education must endure. I have early twisted and tortured my poor little hands in the endeavor to strengthen the rebellious fourth and fifth fingers, and make them capable of executing the heart-breaking trill in Beethoven's A flat sonata, op. 26. I have sat for hours, rigid as a sphinx, practicing upon one note, till I thought my reason would desert me. I have studied five-finger exercises with heavy two-sous pieces upon my hands to keep them from any contortion (and terrible was the penalty if the money dropped off), and I have devoted eight hours daily to mastering the difficulties of the Last Hope under the guidance of its gifted author. Now that these years of drudgery are over, I commence to realize how many passionate tears and hours of despair and ennui might have been spared me had I then known a few simple facts that I have since learned.

In the first place, it is possible to interest children in even the dull rudiments of music, will the teacher but trouble himself to do so; but for one professor who really exerts himself to impart something to his pupils, there are hundreds who go through the hour merely as an irksome duty to be dispatched as easily to themselves as possible. I remember very well that one master of very high standing used to fall into deep fits of abstraction while teaching me. During his reveries he would trim his pencil over the carpet, not at all to mamma's satisfaction, and awakening, would stop me in the course of a scale to propound a conundrum.

The superficiality of professors is something to be deplored. I have suffered much from them. Having a very quick ear and great application, I was while a child much petted by my masters, who thought only of giving their little Wunderkind show pieces, and never troubled themselves to ascertain if I was well grounded in the fundamental principles of music. The result was that when I was sufficiently advanced to play the C sharp minor waltz of Chopin I did not know in what key it was written.

My sister had even a worse experience. Her introduction to the divine art was confided to a lady pianist, who made the lightest possible task of teaching. Marguerite's ear was so very quick that after hearing a simple exercise or air played once she could repeat it perfectly; but this fact the indolent teacher did not discover, and attributed Marguerite's wonderful progress in reading to her own superior teaching. Mamma, however, being somewhat skeptical of such very rapid improvement, put Marguerite one day through a slight examination as to lines, spaces, time, etc. Her astonishment may be imagined when Marguerite reflectively answered, "Fourth space? O, P, Q, I think."

Another point upon which professors are most apt to be negligent is in explaining the significance of a piece of music to a pupil. Indeed, they rarely intimate that it means any thing at all; but confine themselves to such dry hints as "faster, slower, louder," etc.; whereas they should, so to speak, translate the music into an intelligible story. I had studied seriously more than two years before the significance of music dawned upon me—that it was any thing beyond a succession of sounds more or less pleasing to the ear, but, on the contrary, could represent something definite, such as a passion, or a beautiful landscape—that it had, in fact, what our German friends call a Meinung ("meaning"). This new insight into music was revealed to me by a careless remark of a young lady upon the beauty of the storm in the overture of William Tell, which she had just been playing (that same storm which Mendelssohn pityingly stigmatizes in his Letters as "very bad indeed"). Hearing this remark, I asked the young lady quite eagerly for an explanation, and she repeated that portion of the overture, drawing my attention to the chromatic runs and scales in the bass, so like the roaring of a tempestuous wind, the fff chords, like crashes of thunder, and the high piccolo notes, like the peeping of the little birds thrown from their nests by the agitation of the branches. This was, as I say, a revelation to me, and from that time I made my masters' lives a burden to them by my questions concerning the meaning of every piece I learned.

Would not any one, and especially a young person, take a much deeper interest in a piece of music when thus explained to him? If he is learning an opera fantaisie, he should have the entire story of the opera related to him, and the meaning of the different airs explained, that he may not play a fervent duet in the style of dance music. (Do not laugh at me; I have heard one of the first pianists in Rome interpret my favorite Last Hope as a very brilliant mazourka de concert, evidently overlooking the words "Religious Meditation" upon the title-page.)

Apropos of this piece, I spoke of my daily eight hours of practice upon it as one of my unnecessary trials. I have no reproaches to make to my dear dead master in his method of teaching. Kind-hearted as he ever was, Mr. Gottschalk humored the caprice of a little child, and for a year gave me daily lessons while in the city. He had, however, little time during the half hour to attend to technique, and when I was promoted to the Last Hope I threw all of my soul and energy into learning the piece, totally ignoring all exercises, reading and the like. Consequently, after practicing eight hours per diem upon it, I became so fixed in my way of executing it that it was impossible for me to correct whatever faults I might have made in learning it.

Few things are, I think, more necessary, and at the same time entertaining, than an early initiation into reading. Any child, if ordinarily intelligent, wearies of studying, we will say a month, upon the same piece and page in Czerny or Cramer; to a stupid one it may make no difference. If the child should every day read a page or two of some new music, he will almost unconsciously master the difficult art of reading at sight; he will make acquaintance with whole volumes which he might never otherwise have had time to know, and his regular musical studies will be less distasteful to him, owing to this daily introduction of new thought. It will be, I hope, like a volume of fairy tales or a novel to a hard student of the ordinary branches. It is by no means necessary to give young people trash to read in music any more than in literature, though you may think nothing easy enough for a beginner can be found save the Bobolink Polka, the Mocking-Bird, or some such atrocity. I have now a little boy under my care whose present musical attainments are small indeed, being confined mainly to the major scales as far as B flat. Nevertheless I gave him at his last lesson a page of Wagner to read for me, the treble of the first page of the Tannhäuser overture. This grand melody (the Pilgerchor) was as easy to read as many a simple exercise, and I had at the same time the satisfaction of knowing that my little pupil's brain was being strengthened by an acquaintance with solid music.

Let me here mention that it is not necessary in order to be a fine musician that you should be totally ignorant in other respects. To be a true musician, one should have a broad education. De Lenz, an eminent pupil of Chopin, who has since written as few have upon music, records that C., his great master, concerned himself as much about the pursuits, occupations, and mental habits of his pupils as about their music. He would constantly inquire what books they were reading, and who were their favorite poets, and would often say, "It is useless to cultivate the fingers at the expense of the mind."

One last word to professors: Do try to control your temper. It is a manifestation, it is true, of a "sensitive ear" and an "artistic temperament" to leap from your chair and dash frantically about the room upon hearing an unlucky false note, or to give vent to a cat-like scream, and seize the offending fingers in such a manner as to inflict a very feline scratch. (Do not say this is an exaggeration: I am portraying literally one of my professors of former days.) All this conduct may be highly artistic; it is, however, decidedly Bohemian, if not ungentlemanly. There may be cases where the pupil is so hopelessly obtuse that the professor resorts to shouts and high tragedy in order to dispel her apathy, but nine times out of ten such conduct seriously impedes progress. The pupil whose nerves are trembling in anticipation of your outbursts loses all control over her fingers, the connection between them and her brain is severed, and, with the best intentions in the world, she lands upon a black note where a natural is indicated. I would a thousand times rather have a pupil of mine strike a good false note than disregard time, for the latter is a moral fault, showing a sad lack of rhythmical feeling; whereas the false note is only a slip of the finger, which may happen to any of us as well as to those immeasurably our superiors. Witness Rubinstein, who, king of pianists as he is, proverbially makes more false notes than any other pianist in Europe.

One word more: Do not be too quick in telling your pupil that she has made a false note, but first wait to see if her sense of melody does not lead her to correct herself.

USEFUL RECIPES.

TEA RELISH.—Select a piece of beef from the fore-quarter weighing about twenty pounds; place it in a stone pot, or a perfectly sweet and clean butter firkin; over three table-spoonfuls of saltpetre pour one gallon of hot water, and when cold pour over the beef. The weather should be cold, and in this mixture the meat should remain forty-eight hours. At the end of two days take out the meat, and into the pores and crevices rub well one pint of fine salt and one tea-cupful of molasses; next morning turn the meat over, and rub again, turning and rubbing in salt and molasses for six mornings. The next day place the meat in boiling water, and when it commences to boil, skim carefully, and put the vessel on the back part of the stove, where it will simmer, but not boil. Allow half an hour to each pound of meat in cooking it; when done, remove, and press with a heavy weight. Slice, when cold, in very thin slices. If the twenty pounds is too large, cut in two or three pieces, but have the proportion the same of saltpetre, etc.

CHICKEN PIE.—Select young tender chickens, joint them, and season with salt and pepper, sprinkling a small quantity over each piece, and arrange in a deep earthen pie-dish, leaving out the breast-bone, the back, and the neck. Cut fine a piece of butter the size of a walnut, and put over the pieces of chicken enough cold water to nearly cover the meat, and about a pint of oysters, without any of the liquor—allowing one pint of oysters to two medium-sized chickens. A little pounded mace is a great improvement. Make the crust not quite so rich as for ordinary pies, and when placing over the dish lay a fold in the middle, that there may be room for the meat and liquor in cooking. Bake in a moderate oven about two hours. Should the crust be too brown before the meat is done, leave the oven doors open.

RAISIN CAKE.—Wash well one pound of sweet butter, and cream with it one pound of white sugar. In winter, when the butter is very cold, it is better, before washing it, to set it near the stove, where it will soften but not melt, and use tepid water for washing it. When the sugar and butter are well creamed, add slowly one quart of tepid new milk and four pounds of sifted flour; mix well into it a tea-cupful of lively home-made yeast, and put in a warm place until light. This should be in four or five hours, when mix into this batter another pound each of butter and sugar, well creamed together, and, if needed, a little more flour. Have ready two pounds of raisins, seeded and cut fine, and half a pound of currants. Mix a small quantity of flour through the fruit, and stir into the batter with a very small portion of pulverized mace. Let the batter rise again, stir well with a spoon or the hands, and pour into thin well-buttered tins, putting them in a warm place until they commence to rise again; then set into a slack oven, increasing the heat gradually until hot enough, and bake about an hour and a quarter, trying them with a broom splinter before taking out.

PLUM PIE.—Either fresh fruit or the fruit that has been canned can be used. If the latter, the plums should not have been entirely ripe when bottled. In the centre of a deep earthen pie-dish insert a tea-cup, and fill the dish with the fruit—if fresh, adding about the quantity of sugar to make them sweet enough, and a very small quantity of molasses. Moisten the edge of the dish with cold water, and place around the edge a narrow strip of the pie-crust, which must not be too rich; this strip of crust must now be moistened with water or the white of egg to prevent the juice escaping. Place the upper crust on, folding it in the middle so as to allow it to rise when the fruit expands. Prick holes in it with a fork to let out the steam. Bake about half or three-quarters of an hour.

CRACKED WHEAT, which can be had at almost any grocery, boiled in a small quantity of water for five or six hours, and eaten cold with cream, makes a very healthful and palatable article for tea or breakfast. Nothing can be better for children; but it must be well cooked, adding water as it seems inclined to stick.

BRAN BREAD.—Boil one pint of milk, and thicken with Graham flour; add cold milk enough to make a thin batter, and when cool enough add half a tea-cupful of hop yeast, and a small quantity of sirup molasses. Stir in Graham flour to form a stiff batter—as stiff as can be stirred with a spoon. When light, sprinkle a small quantity of fine flour on a board, and work the bread until it ceases to be sticky, being careful not to put on too much flour, and get it too stiff and dry; put it into a round basin that will fit into the steamer, and when light work a very little; put it into the basin again and set into the steamer, having plenty of boiling water in the vessel beneath. A medium-sized loaf should cook one hour, and the lid of the steamer must not be removed or the water cease boiling, else the bread will be heavy. When done, remove from the steamer and put in the oven for about twenty minutes to give it a crust. The steaming gives lightness and moisture to the bread, and the finish in the oven dries the outside, and gives a crust to it.

HEAD-CHEESE.—Select a clean, fat, and perfect pig's head; have it cut through the centre of the forehead and snout, and again under the eyes, separating the snout from the forehead; also have the eyes, lids, and surrounding membranes, with the sac, removed, going close to the bone socket that the eye may not break. Then remove the ears, with the wrinkled skin surrounding them, taking out the canal of the ear, and the horny portion containing the drum, etc. After this is done the bones of the snout are easily taken out. Put the pieces to soak in plenty of lukewarm water, draining off and adding fresh until the blood is removed. Singe off the hairs, and examine the fleshy part of the snout and lower jaw, taking off the skin, which will now come away easily with the knife; wash again and salt. Mix thoroughly together one quart of salt and a table-spoonful of finely pulverized saltpetre, rubbing the pieces of meat well with it and, if wished, a little sugar or molasses. Pack the pieces closely in a crock; let them remain for two weeks, turning occasionally that the top pieces may go into the brine that has been formed at the bottom. Wash all the brine off at the end of that time, and boil gently until tender, and the meat strips off the bone without using a knife. After taking out all bones, cut fine with knife and fork, season with black pepper and a very small portion of mace (pulverized sage is an improvement, if used sparingly); put into a dish with straight sides, packing close, and pressing with a heavy weight. Cut in thin slices, and eat with mustard and vinegar.

Fig. 1.—LINEN CHEMISE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 22–24.

Fig. 3.—LADY'S NIGHT-DRESS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 49–56.

Fig. 2.—EMBROIDERED LINEN CHEMISE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 57–59.

Fig. 6.—LINEN NIGHT-CAP.
For pattern and description see Suppl., No. XIX., Figs. 63 and 64.

Fig. 4.—BATISTE, INSERTION, AND LACE NIGHT SACQUE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 13–16.

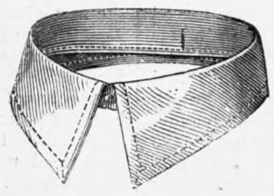

Fig. 11.—GENTLEMAN'S TURNED-DOWN COLLAR.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 35 and 36.

Fig. 5.—MUSLIN NIGHT SACQUE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 17–21.

Fig. 7.—LADY'S KNITTED NIGHT NET.

Fig. 8.—MUSLIN DRAWERS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 6 and 7.

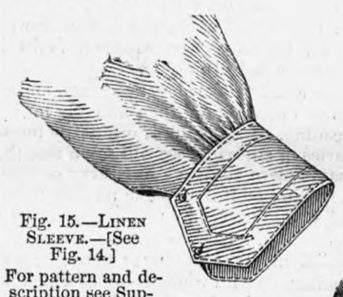

Fig. 15.—LINEN SLEEVE.—[See Fig. 14.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 33 and 34.

Fig. 12.—GENTLEMAN'S STANDING COLLAR.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Fig. 39.

Fig. 10.—BUFF LINEN APRON.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVIII., Figs. 60–62.

Fig. 17.
GRAY AND WHITE LINEN SLEEVE.—[See Fig. 16.]
For pattern and description see Suppl., No. VII., Figs. 28 and 29.

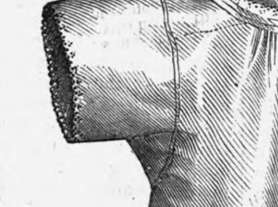

Fig. 13.—GENTLEMAN'S STANDING COLLAR WITH TURNED-DOWN CORNERS.
For pattern and description see Suppl., No. X., Figs. 37 and 38.

Fig. 9.—EMBROIDERED DRAWERS.
For pattern see description in Supplement.

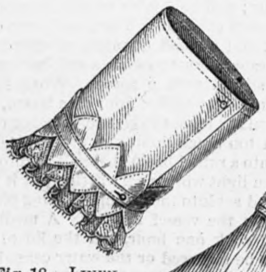

Fig. 18.—LINEN AND LACE CUFF.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 14.—LINEN COLLAR.
[See Fig. 15.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 30–32.

Fig. 16.—GRAY AND WHITE LINEN COLLAR.
[See Fig. 17.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 25–27.

Fig. 19.—LINEN CUFF WITH SIDE-PLEATED RUFFLE.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 20.—MUSLIN DRESSING SACQUE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1–5.

Fig. 22.—GENTLEMAN'S FLANNEL UNDER-SHIRT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 44a, 44b, and 45.

Fig. 21.—MUSLIN DRESSING SACQUE WITH CAPE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 8–12.

FIGS. 1–22.—LADIES' AND GENTLEMEN'S LINGERIE.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—CASHMERE MANTELET.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 42 and 43.

Fig. 2.—CASHMERE MANTELET.—BACK.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 42 and 43.

Lady's Knitted Night Net.

THIS net, which is shown in the illustration, Fig. 7, page 668, is knitted with fine knitting cotton and steel needles. Begin from the middle with a foundation of 4 st. (stitch), close these in a ring, and knit the 1st round.—All knit plain. 2d round.—Alternately t. t. o. (thread thrown over), 1 k. (knit plain). 3d round.—All knit plain. On each t. t. o. work 1 st. All rounds denoted by odd numbers are knit plain, and will not be referred to further. 4th round.—Alternately t. t. o., 2 k. 6th round.—Alternately t. t. o., 3 k. 8th round.—∗ T. t. o., 1 k., t. t. o., 3 k.; repeat from ∗. This repetition takes place in each round beginning with ∗, and will, therefore, not be mentioned again. 10th round.—Always alternately t. t. o., 3 k. 12th round.—Always alternately t. t. o., 4 k. 14th round.—Always alternately t. t. o., 5 k. 16th round.—Always alternately t. t. o., 6 k. 18th round.—∗ T. t. o., 2 k., k. 2 together (knit 2 st. together), t. t. o., 3 k. 20th round.—Always alternately t. t. o., 8 k. The 24th, 28th, 32d, 36th, 40th, 44th, and 48th rounds like the 20th round, but increase the stitches knit plain always by 2 st. at each repetition from ∗ in each of the rounds named. 22d round.—∗ T. t. o., 2 k., twice alternately k. 2 together, t. t. o., then 3 k. The 26th, 30th, 34th, 38th, 42d, and 46th rounds like the 22d round, but increase the number of holes in each of the rounds named at each repetition from ∗ by 1 hole. 50th round.—∗ T. t. o., 1 k., t. t. o., 2 k., eight times alternately k. 2 together, t. t. o., then k. 2 together, 2 k. 52d round.—∗ T. t. o., 3 k., t. t. o., 21 k. The 56th, 60th, 64th, 68th, 72d, 76th, and 80th rounds like the 52d round, but in each of the rounds named increase the smaller number of st. knit plain in connection by 4 st. at each repetition from ∗, and diminish the larger number of st. knit plain in connection by 2 st. at each repetition from ∗. 54th round.—∗ T. t. o., 5 k., t. t. o., 2 k., seven times alternately k. 2 together, t. t. o., then k. 2 together, 1 k., k. 2 together. The 58th, 62d, 66th, 70th, 74th, and 78th rounds like the 54th round, but in each of the rounds named diminish the number of holes at each repetition from ∗ by 1 hole, and increase the st. knit plain in connection by 4 st. at each repetition from ∗. 82d round.—∗ T. t. o., 33 k., t. t. o., 2 k., k. 2 together, 3 k. 84th round.—∗ T. t. o., 35 k., t. t. o., 2 k., k. 2 together, 2 k. 86th round.—∗ T. t. o., 37 k., t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, 2 k. 88th round.—∗ T. t. o., 39 k., t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together, 1 k. 90th round.—∗ T. t. o., 41 k., t. t. o., 1 k., k. 2 together. 92d round.—∗ 43 k., t. t. o., k. 2 together. 94th, 95th, and 96th rounds.—All purled. Now begins the foundation of the net, which is worked in connection with the finished star, and without changing the number of stitches, as follows: 1st round.—Always alternately t. t. o., 3 k., k. 2 together. 2d round.—All knit plain. Repeat these two rounds, always alternately, 21 times; then knit three rounds all purled and three rounds all plain. Then one round of holes as follows: Always alternately t. t. o., k. 2 together, 2 k. Three rounds all knit plain and 3 rounds all purled. Then cast off. Border the outer edge of the net with edging. To do this again take up the st. cast off on the needles, and in the 1st round work on these st. always alternately 1 k. each on the next 2 st., 1 p. (purled), 1 k. on the following st.; the number of st. should be divisible by 9. 2d round.—All knit plain. 3d round,—∗ 2 k., k. 2 together, k. 2 together, 2 k., t. t. o., 1 k., t. t. o.; repeat from ∗. 4th round.—All knit plain. Repeat these last 2 rounds four times, and then cast off the st. loosely. Run narrow ribbon through the row of holes.

ELECTRICITY FOR CURING TOOTHACHE.

DR. BOUCHAUD, of Paris, strongly recommends the use of electricity in cases of severe toothache, and maintains that not unfrequently a perfect cure will be effected, even where the teeth are greatly decayed. He has seldom failed to secure at least a temporary relief, this frequently lasting for days, and often continuing indefinitely. In numerous instances where alleviation after the first application was of brief duration, the effect became more and more marked, and lasted longer as the treatment was repeated. The method adopted for applying the electricity is to place the positive pole of the current on the cheek opposite the diseased tooth, and the negative upon the antero-lateral portion of the neck; and, to avoid ulcerations, he makes the electrodes very large, and changes their place frequently. He continues the application for about half an hour, although relief is frequently experienced sooner. He uses a battery of about ten elements.

Fig. 1.—CLOTH MANTELET.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]

Cloth Mantelet. Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS mantelet of gray cloth is lined with lustring. The trimming consists of revers of gros grain of the same color, silk fringe, buttons, and cord bands, and a passementerie agrafe, which is set on the triple Watteau fold on the back of the mantelet.

Fig. 2.—CLOTH MANTELET.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.]

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS. J. G. S.—Make your drap d'été an English walking jacket by pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI. Trim with bias repped silk and braid. Use jet or else oxidized silver buttons.

MATTIE.—To have the address of your Bazar changed you should send us your present address, and give your new one to which it is to be sent in future.

MRS. E. A.—For variety's sake make your black alpaca with a double-breasted jockey basque like that illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI. Put oxidized silver buttons on it, pipe the edge of the basque, cover the revers with silk, and then pleat a silk ruff inside. Coat sleeves with silk cuff and silver buttons. Apron over-skirt edged with a piped bias band. Put six bias bands on the skirt, crossed by diagonal bands like description in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 40, Vol. VI.

CECIL H.—Why not make sleeveless jackets, or rather basques, of colored silk, and put black coat sleeves in them, to wear with your black skirts? If you prefer pleated blouse-waists, embroider them on each pleat and on the sailor collar, above which you should have a pleated ruff of the silk. Dark blue and plum-color will be more stylish than paler blue or pink.

JAMIE'S MAMMA.—"Three years old" is too young for trowsers. Use the Highland Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 39, Vol. V., with a warm kilt-pleated skirt and jacket. Use plaids, black velveteen, and navy blue flannel for his suits. The sailor blouse with kilt skirts would also be pretty for him.

ALICE.—Cloth like your sample is worn by both men and boys, but you do not say for whom it is intended.

PERSIMMONS.—Trim your skirt alike all around with the box-pleating and bias bands as you describe. Make your black silk by hints given in Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI. For a blue tarlatan dress put three puffs down the front breadths, one puff on each breadth, with a ruche between down the seams, and three or four box-pleated flounces behind. Then have an open-front over-skirt also with a ruche on the edge, and a basque covered with lengthwise puffs of tarlatan finished with a ruff at the neck.

DAISY.—Antimony, sometimes supposed to be a preparation of lead, is a distinct metal. That used for darkening the eyes is sold in small pencils at drug stores at from 75 cents to $3 apiece. India ink is better applied with a tiny hair pencil to the eyelashes. Bathe your head with cold tea, and brush your hair vigorously ten minutes every day to prevent it from falling out.

CLERK.—Try a quarter of an ounce of carbonate of ammonia in half a pint of sweet-oil to force the growth of mustache, rubbing the mixture on the skin every day.

A LADY.—It stimulates the growth of hair to clip the ends once a month, no matter whether it is new moon or not. Brushing daily strengthens hair. Your other question will be answered in "Ugly Girl" papers to come.

JENNIE.—No compound will cause hair to curl. It can only fix and stiffen it round the papillotes. Camphor dries the superfluous hair so that it breaks off. Wood ashes are good as a depilatory. Applications of any sort must be often repeated to destroy hair. If correspondents will use a little thought, they can save themselves and us many useless inquiries. All these answers have been given over and over in the "Ugly Girl" papers, and in this column.

E. L.—Bathe your neck in strong camphor every night for six weeks to kill the hair which grows too low.

BERTIE.—The author of "Ugly Girls" is experimenting with depilatories, and will have something to say on the subject again.

DESIRE.—See answer to "A Lady."—Lemon juice will clear the skin in most cases, and is perfectly harmless.

MOTHER.—Taraxacum is safe to take at any time. With the chlorate of potash and rose-water, it removes baby-moth.

MADGIE R.—Taraxacum is sold by all druggists, at 25 cents a box.

V. B.—Wash the egg paste off with warm water.—To prevent the skin from being oily use diluted spirits of ammonia; in such cases it will not render the face too harsh.—Wet the tip of the finger, dip it in powdered nitre, and rub on the freckles, or rub the face with slices of lemon, and let the juice dry in.—Bathe the face and hands with diluted ammonia just before going out, and wipe perfectly dry to prevent chapping.—Do not pull hair out with tweezers (it is apt to grow worse), but touch the roots with a hair pencil dipped in carbolic acid, mixed with thrice as much glycerine. When the skin looks whitish a moment after, wash off, and touch with sweet oil. This repeated will kill the hair.

MYRTILE G.—"Ugly Girl" papers have recipes for the complexion and hair.

NELLIE B.—See answer to "V. B."—Unbolted flour bread, and preparations of crushed wheat or oatmeal grits, are meant by coarse food.

ARDENT ADMIRER.—Bathe your head daily in cold water, to which a spoonful or two of ammonia is added. Brush it ten minutes when dry, and hold your head a few instants in a current of hot air from a register or a baking oven, brushing gently afterward. Dress it with glycerine, to which a little ammonia is added, perfuming with rose or violet extract.

F. O. SANDWICH.—Apply the catarrh lotion inside the nostrils, washing them out twice a day. Dilute a separate preparation of the liquid with hot water, cool, and use as a gargle for the throat.

MRS. BROWN.—A relaxed state of the system, dissipation, want of out-door air and exercise, will cause the flabby appearance you speak of. Bathe your cheeks with weak alum water or dilute ammonia, live out-of-doors, use no bread that is not made of coarse flour, and try a salt-water bath every day.

ELMWOOD.—Try lemon juice, or hot water and oxalic acid, equal parts, for ten days, applying as often as you like. If that does no good, mix one spoonful of chloride of lime in one pint of boiling water; when cool enough to be borne, touch the spot with a sponge dipped in the liquid. The next moment wash off with vinegar and water, and put on sweet-oil, with a few drops (not more than ten to the ounce) of carbolic acid to heal the smart. Try the lighter remedies first. You had better get a physician to apply the chloride.

M. J. M.—Bathing the hair daily with warm water, in which a spoonful of ammonia is put, will sometimes restore the color. Long and frequent brushing, with attention to general health, will revive it.

JULIET.—Wear thick cotton or wool stockings, with a sole of Manilla paper inside the shoe. Take hot foot baths, and dip the feet into cold water the last thing. Do you wear flannel or merino under-clothing next the skin, as you should?

THE FALLING LEAVES betoken approaching winter, when nothing makes a parlor so cheerful or a kitchen so neat as a well-polished stove, and DIXON'S STOVE POLISH will do it in five minutes, without dust or smell. Established Forty-Six Years. Try it. Made only by THE JOSEPH DIXON CRUCIBLE CO., Jersey City, N. J.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DUTCH BULBS.
SMALL FRUITS.
NEW PLANTS.

OUR NEW AUTUMN CATALOGUE OF BULBS, NEW PLANTS, AND SMALL FRUITS, Beautifully illustrated with many engravings, and a splendidly-colored two-paged Lithograph of A Group of Hyacinths, is now ready, and will be mailed to all applicants inclosing ten cents. Regular customers supplied gratis. Our list of
SMALL FRUITS
Comprises every desirable variety of
STRAWBERRIES, RASPBERRIES, GRAPES, &c., &c.
Bulbs and Plants mailed to any address at Catalogue prices. Address
B. K. BLISS & SONS,
Seed, Plant, and Bulb Warehouse,
NOS. 23 PARK PLACE, AND 20 MURRAY ST.,
P. O. Box 5712. NEW YORK.

WEBSTER'S PATENT
BUTTON HOLE WORKER
Pat. June 27, 1871. Awarded first premium at the Am. Institute and Md. Institute Fairs, 1871.
Is one of the most important inventions of the age. The most perfect Button-hole Worker ever invented. So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Local and traveling agents wanted everywhere. They sell at sight, and give over 100 per cent. profit. Sample Button-hole Worker and sample Button-hole Cutter packed in a neat case, with full directions for use, with sample of our new and novel way of canvassing, sent by mail to any address on receipt of 65 cents. Address WEBSTER M'F'G CO., Manufacturers, Ansonia, Ct. Please state in what paper you saw this.

A. SELIG,
(SUCCESSOR TO S. M. PEYSER),
No. 813 Broadway, New York,
Is daily receiving new importations of rich DRESS TRIMMINGS, such as beaded LACES, GIMPS, FRINGES, BUTTONS, and ORNAMENTS of the latest styles. Also a full assortment of BERLIN ZEPHYRS, Filling, Floss and Embroidery SILKS, CHENILLES, Worsted and Silk EMBROIDERIES of every description, as STRIPS for Chairs, SLIPPERS, Footrests, Towel-racks, Fire and Light SCREENS, LAMBREQUINS and CUSHIONS in GOBLIN and any other style of EMBROIDERY. GUIPURE and POINT LACE work and materials for making the same. Particular attention paid to orders.
Designing and Embroidering of every description done at the lowest possible prices.

PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, $3;
SCIENCE OF HEALTH, $2;
and either of Harpers, $4, all sent a year for $7, by
S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

SHOPPING
Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

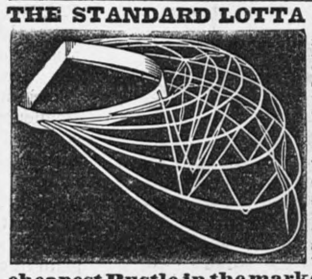
Skin Diseases a Specialty.
DR. J. M. VANDYKE, Graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, is the only regular physician that makes the treatment of Skin Diseases a specialty. Those who wish to consult him, either in person or by letter, will find him to be first-class in his specialty.
Skin Diseases and their Symptoms.
ACNE, (PIMPLES, BLACKHEADS).—Symptoms—Hard, small pimples with black points; affect the forehead, cheeks, and nose of both sexes.
ECZEMA, (TETTER).—Symptoms—Blisters form, which burst and dry into a yellowish or dark crust, may be in the form of scales; affects all parts of the body.
WOMEN'S RED RASH OF THE FACE.—Symptoms—Congestion of the skin of the face, with red patches and red spots, pimples, and roughness of the skin.
BARBER'S ITCH.—Symptoms—First, a red, itchy patch is seen, mattery pustules form, become quite hard, and shaving becomes painful. A burning sensation is present.
PRURIGO, (INTENSE ITCHING), Which begins when the clothing is removed; increased by the warmth of the bed. No eruption except that produced by scratching.
The above and all Skin Diseases cured by Dr. J. M. VanDyke. New York Office, No. 6 West 16th Street; Philadelphia Office, 1126 Walnut Street. The Doctor can be consulted either by letter or in person at either office.

THREE PAIR Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1 00. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, Dress-Trimmings, &c. Price-List sent free on application.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

GOODALL'S PLAYING CARDS.
The Best and Cheapest.
Sold Every Where.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS, in any quantities. Send for Circular.
MME. L. CENDRIER, 636 Broadway, N. Y.

Union Adams & Co.
ARE OFFERING AT VERY LOW PRICES
HOSIERY AND GEOVES,
UNDERWEAR,
Shirts & Collars,
HANDKERCHIEFS,
SUSPENDERS,
ROBES, JACKETS, &c.
637 BROADWAY.

THE STANDARD LOTTA BUSTLE.


A diploma has been awarded by the American Institute to A. W. Thomas, Patentee & Manufacturer for the lightest, strongest, most durable, comfortable, elastic, and cheapest Bustle in the market. The wearer can sit in any position whatever without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree, it closing entirely up on sitting, and returning with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault). No ladies' wardrobe complete without the Standard Lotta Bustle. For sale every where. Ask for Nos. 10, 11, 15, 18, 22, &c., comprising the various sizes and styles. Patentee and Wholesale Manufacturer, 91 White St., N.Y.; & 801 Race St., Phila.
ASK YOUR STOREKEEPER FOR IT.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.
Trade Mark. Patented.
Sold by all Druggists.

Seeds for Fall Sowing.
Bulbs for Fall Planting.
Plants for Winter Flowering.
Embracing every thing NEW and RARE in great variety, and at LOW RATES. Price-Lists mailed free to all applicants.
Peter Henderson & Co.
Seedsmen, 35 Cortlandt St., New York.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS.
AGENTS WANTED.
SEND FOR CATALOGUE.
Domestic Sewing-Machine Co., N. Y.

Novelties in Laces.
SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

LAFONTAIN'S FRENCH COMPLEXION BEAUTIFIER removes TAN AND FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, AND FLESHWORMS. Price $1 00 per Bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 SIXTH AVENUE. Agents wanted.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

MME. BURLETON, 21 Clinton Place, near B'way, Eighth St., West. The latest style of Fall Bonnets and Round Hats; also, Mourning Bonnets.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

GRANDEST SCHEME EVER KNOWN.
4th Grand Gift Concert
FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE
PUBLIC LIBRARY OF KENTUCKY.
12,000 CASH GIFTS, $1,500,000.
$250,000 FOR $50.
The Fourth Grand Gift Concert, authorized by special act of the Legislature, for the benefit of the Public Library of Kentucky, will take place in Public Library Hall, at Louisville, Ky.,
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1873.
Only Sixty thousand tickets will be sold. The tickets are divided into ten coupons or parts.
At this Concert, which will be the grandest musical display ever witnessed in this country, the unprecedented sum of $1,500,000
divided into 12,000 cash gifts, will be distributed by lot among the ticket-holders.

LIST OF GIFTS.

ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		$250,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		100,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		50,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		25,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		17,500
10 CASH GIFTS	$10,000 each	100,000
30 CASH GIFTS	5,000 each	150,000
50 CASH GIFTS	1,000 each	50,000
80 CASH GIFTS	500 each	40,000
100 CASH GIFTS	400 each	40,000
150 CASH GIFTS	300 each	45,000
250 CASH GIFTS	200 each	50,000
325 CASH GIFTS	100 each	32,500
11,000 CASH GIFTS	50 each	550,000
TOTAL, 12,000 GIFTS, ALL CASH, amounting to		$1,500,000

The distribution will be positive, whether all the tickets are sold or not, and the 12,000 gifts all paid in proportion to the tickets sold.
PRICE OF TICKETS:
Whole tickets, $50; Halves, $25; Tenths, or each coupon, $5; Eleven Whole Tickets for $500; 22½ Tickets for $1,000; 113 Whole Tickets for $5,000; 227 Whole Tickets for $10,000. No discount on less than $500 worth of Tickets at a time.
Tickets now ready for sale, and all orders accompanied by the money promptly filled. Liberal terms given to those who buy to sell again.
THOS. E. BRAMLETTE,
Agent Public Library Ky., and Manager Gift Concert,
Public Library Building, Louisville, Ky.
Or THOS. H. HAYS,
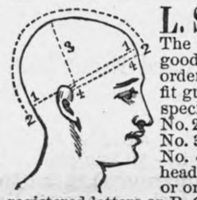
609 Broadway, New York.



L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, Cor. 4th St., N. Y.
The largest stock of Human Hair goods in the city. Wigs made to order by the best artists. A perfect fit guaranteed. The invisible wig a specialty. No. 1, round the head; No. 2, from forehead to nape of neck; No. 3, from ear to ear across crown; No. 4, from ear to ear across forehead. Goods sent C.O.D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

EVERYBODY LIKES a beautiful complexion, and a soft, smooth skin; both are obtained by using 'Wright's Alconated Glycerine Tablet of Solidified Glycerine,' fragrant, transparent, and incomparable as a Toilet Soap. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

OPIUM AND MORPHINE HABIT CURED!
Medicine compounded by a Sufferer, a Surgeon U.S.A. Also cures Drunkenness. It always cures. Send for work on "Opium-eating and its Cure," to
W. B. SQUIRE,
Worthington, Greene Co., Ind.

The New Florence
Is the only Sewing-Machine that feeds the work backward and forward, or to the right and left, as the purchaser may prefer. It has been greatly IMPROVED & SIMPLIFIED, and is far better than any other machine now in the market. ☞ FLORENCE SEWING-MACHINE COMPANY, Florence, Mass.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN Dress Shields will absorb moisture and protect the Dress thoroughly. The Perforated Premium Buckskin Undergarments are recommended by all Physicians. Send for circulars. D. C. HALL & Co., 44 West Broadway, N.Y., Sole Agents and Manufacturers.

V. VIGOUROUX, 122 4th Ave., N.Y.
Stamping, Embroidering, Lingerie Establishment. Ladies' & Babies' Trousseau. Specialty of Initial Monograms for HANDKERCHIEFS, TABLE and BED CLOTHS. Wholesale Department, ☞ 69 EAST TWELFTH STREET. MACHINE AND PERFORATED PATTERNS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.
One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.
An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.
The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.
Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.
In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

DRESS GOODS.

PLAIN, COLORED, FANCY, AND BLACK SILKS,
RICH LACES & PARIS EMBROIDERIES,
CLOAKING AND TRIMMING VELVETS.

FURNISHING GOODS, HOSIERY, AND UNDERWEAR, for INFANTS, MISSES, LADIES, & GENTLEMEN.

BLANKETS, FLANNELS,
SHAWLS, and QUILTS,
FALL WRAPS,
HOUSE JACKETS,
TRAVELING-SHAWLS, RUGS, LAP ROBES, &c.

FULL and COMPLETE LINES of the above goods now open at the LOWEST PRICES.

NEW CARPETINGS.
AXMINSTER, AUBUSSON, and SMYRNA, woven entire, ALL SIZES.
Moquette, Wilton, Velvet, English and American Body Brussels, Tapestry Brussels, 3-ply and Ingrain
CARPETINGS,
ENGLISH AND AMERICAN OIL-CLOTHS, RUGS, DRUGGETS, MATS, &c,
AT VERY LOW PRICES.
UPHOLSTERY DEPARTMENT.
Now open, a full line of
DRAPERY AND FURNITURE MATERIAL,
All at Lowest Prices.

Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

Ladies!

SEND STAMP FOR OUR ELEGANT AND ATTRACTIVE

FALL PRICE-LIST,

Containing full descriptions and prices of

Fine Furs,
Real Laces,
Black Silks,
Ladies' and Children's Underwear,
Millinery Goods,
Dress Trimmings,

AND THOUSANDS OF ARTICLES INDISPENSABLE FOR LADIES' WEAR.

Samples Sent Free.

Goods shipped C. O. D. to any part of the country, with accompanying order to Express Agent, allowing full examination before acceptance.

EHRICH & CO.,

287 & 289 8th Ave., near 24th St.,
NEW YORK.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and Carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.
A DELICATE SOAP FOR THE TOILET.
CASHMERE BOUQUET
CASHMERE BOUQUET
MADE BY
COLGATE & COMPANY,
NEW YORK.

KNABE
Grand, Square, and Upright Pianos,
NEW YORK BRANCH HOUSE, No. 112 5th AVE.
WM. KNABE & CO., Baltimore and New York.

FLOWERS.—WINDOW GARDENING.

Ladies, send stamp for Specimen Copy (free) of
THE LADIES' FLORAL CABINET.—A beautiful new Home Paper, devoted to Flowers, Window Gardening, and Parlor Decorations. Exquisitely illustrated. Ladies will be delighted with it. Delightful home pictures of society. Amusements, with useful hints on housekeeping and Elegancies.
Price $1 50 per year, including 3 Choice Chromos.
" $1 25 " " " 1 " "
☞ GET UP A CLUB. AGENTS WANTED. Send for terms.
WINDOW GARDENING.—A New Book, superbly illustrated, devoted to Culture of Plants, Bulbs, and Flowers for in-doors, with handsome illustrations of Hanging Baskets, Ferneries, and Parlor Decorations. 250 Engravings. Price $1 50. Sent, postpaid, by mail. Book Stores have it.
EVERY WOMAN HER OWN FLOWER GARDENER.—By Daisy Eyebright. A charming New Book on Flowers and Out-Door Gardening for Ladies. Price 50c., or bound in cloth, $1 00. Sent by mail, postpaid.
THE LADIES' CABINET INITIAL NOTE-PAPER.—Rose or Violet Tinted; your own initial. Superb novelty. Handsome present. Highly perfumed. Attractive Chromo on each Box. Price 50c. a Box. 100 Papers at Club Rates. Send stamp for List.
Illustrated Prospectus and Premium List of all the above free on receipt of stamp. Address THE LADIES' FLORAL CABINET, OFFICE, 5 BEEKMAN STREET, NEW YORK. P. O. Box 2445.

THE
LADIES' BAZAAR OF FASHION.

An illustrated eight-page paper devoted to Fashion, Literature, and Art. Subscription price only ONE DOLLAR per year, and a premium to every subscriber of the BEAUTIFUL CHROMO

THE BABY'S BREAKFAST.

Extra Inducements.—To all who subscribe before January 1st, 1874, the publisher will furnish, in addition to the Chromo, the Bazaar for the three remaining months of this year gratis.
Specimen numbers sent free upon application. AGENTS WANTED. Address
Ladies' Bazaar of Fashion,
17 South Sixth St., Philadelphia, Pa.

ENGLISH TRIBUTES
TO RECENT AMERICAN BOOKS.

Miss Dorothy's Charge.

Miss Dorothy's Charge. A Novel. By FRANK LEE BENEDICT, Author of "My Daughter Elinor," "Miss Van Kortland," &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

In "Miss Dorothy's Charge" we have again a vigorous novel from an American hand. There can be no doubt of the superiority of American writers over the great and increasing mass of our own fairly successful novelists, both in skill as to the manipulation of plots and insight in the delineation of character. We may declare our unreserved appreciation of the more important features of the book.—Athenæum, London.

I Go A-Fishing.

I Go A-Fishing. By W. C. Prime. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

Mr. W. C. Prime has published a volume that will be a treat to every contemplative fisherman. * * * He calls it "I Go a-Fishing." The tender charm of the book, its sober eloquence, and its genial breadth, remind one very much of the style of Jeremy Taylor. * * * A rare love of nature, and a simple-hearted adoration of the god of nature, and an intense devotion to the finny denizens of the deep, especially of pools in trout-streams. * * * Its subdued humor, power, its fondness for that which is good, and honest, and natural, its Christianity, without the specialties of sectarianism, should recommend it to every one who likes to cast a fly in a likely pool. * * * Mr. Prime ought to be able to rely on a hearty reception of this book among his English cousins.—Standard, London.

We are very glad to make Mr. Prime's acquaintance. His book comes to us from across the Atlantic, and with it brings his pleasant talk about running brooks, shady forests, and deep, silent lakes of the Adirondacks, in which abound the "speckled beauties" for which he goes a-fishing. Quite apart from the very keen and sportsmanlike descriptions of sport, we have most thoughtful and picturesque writing, which proves to us that Mr. Prime is a true lover of nature as well as an ardent sportsman. He says, and very truly, that "the man who has lived much in the woods forms a stronger attachment for that life than a man ever forms for any other," and he goes con amore into the most vivid pictures of forest life, the writing of which is full of poetry, but which seems to have an underlying tone of sadness all through. "Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought;" and so perhaps those chapters which strike some melancholy note in our minds are the most charming in this book, which contains so much that is not only agreeable but instructive, for in it the angler may find many useful hints.—Vanity Fair, London.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

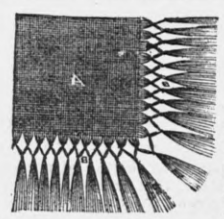
FINE FURS.

A large assortment, at less than manufacturers' prices. Send for Price-List. Orders promptly attended to and sent C. O. D., with privilege of examination.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

DR. NOBLE'S GREAT DISCOVERY.—A certain cure for fever and ague, bilious fever, and chill fever. A tonic. Price $1 per bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 Sixth Ave. Sold every where. Agents wanted.



PATENT
Sewing-Silk Veil

In the above we have overcome the great difficulty, formerly experienced, of procuring a veil with a fringing of the exact shade. The fringes in our veil being woven at the same moment, and with the same material throughout, consisting of the best quality of sewing silk, a reliance may be placed upon their exactness of match, and of their durability, in every respect, the same wearing double the length of time over that of any other veil ever made. Sold in all Fancy, Millinery, and Dry-Goods Houses in the U. S.
Patentees and Sole Manufacturers,
MEYENBERG, PRALL, & CO.,
483 & 485 Broadway, N. Y.

Cut Paper Patterns
OF
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS
IN
HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postillion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)	No. 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER	" 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)	" 6
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt	" 20
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER	" 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)	" 25
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)	" 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old)	" 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)	" 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt	" 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT	" 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT	" 43
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)	" 50

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT	" 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)	" 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT	" 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 17
LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 23
GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 24
BLOUSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 28
LADIES' AND MISSES' BATHING OR GYMNASTIC SUIT	" 30
PLEATED WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 32
ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT	" 39
DEMI-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT, with Basque Back and Square Front	" 43

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Youth Restored by the Use of
BARRY'S
Pearl Cream
which enables any lady of forty to pass in society for TWENTY.
Sold by all druggists, and at the depot, 26 Liberty St., New York.
Only 50 Cents per Bottle.

Harper & Brothers' Latest Publications.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.
THE LAND OF MOAB. The Result of Travels and Discoveries on the East Side of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. By H. B. TRISTRAM, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Master of the Greatham Hospital, and Honorary Canon of Durham. With New Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. Cloth, $2 50.

II.
FLAMMARION'S ATMOSPHERE. The Atmosphere. Translated from the French of CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Edited by JAMES GLAISHER, F.R.S., Superintendent of the Magnetical and Meteorological Department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. With 10 Chromo-Lithographs, and 86 Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

III.
TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS. The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. (Uniform with Tyerman's "Life of John Wesley.")

IV.
THE BAZAR BOOK OF HEALTH. The Dwelling, the Nursery, the Bedroom, the Dining-Room, the Parlor, the Library, the Kitchen, the Sick-Room. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. (Uniform in style and price with the "Bazar Book of Decorum.")

V.
CASTELAR'S OLD ROME AND NEW ITALY. Old Rome and New Italy. By EMILIO CASTELAR. Translated by Mrs. ARTHUR ARNOLD. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

VI.
LIFE OF ALFRED COOKMAN. The Life of the Rev. Alfred Cookman. By H. B. RIDGAWAY, D.D. With Portrait on Steel. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

VII.
I GO A-FISHING. By W. C. PRIME, Author of "Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia," "Tent Life in the Holy Land," "Later Years," "The Old House by the River," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

THE NEW NOVELS
OF
THE SEASON
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

1.
MISS DOROTHY'S CHARGE. By FRANK LEE BENEDICT, Author of "My Daughter Elinor," "Miss Van Kortland," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

2.
STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "Birds of Prey," "Lovels of Arden," "To the Bitter End," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

3.
A SIMPLETON: A Story of the Day. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

4.
TOO SOON: A Study of a Girl's Heart. By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID, Author of "Patty," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

5.
INNOCENT. A Tale of Modern Life. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," "Chronicles of Carlingford," "John: a Love Story," "Brownlows," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

6.
WILKIE COLLINS'S NEW MAGDALEN. The New Magdalen. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "Armadale," "Moonstone," "Man and Wife," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

7.
"'HE COMETH NOT,' SHE SAID." By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "On Guard," "Walter Goring," "Theo Leigh," "Played Out," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.
U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

WANTED—BOOK AGENTS, to sell new and popular books. Books that are admirably adapted to the season, viz: Anecdotes of Public Men, by John W. Forney; Farm Ballads, by Will Carleton; I Go a-Fishing, by W. C. Prime; The Fishing Tourist, by Charles Hallock. Liberal inducements offered. For further particulars, inquire of or address AVERY BILL,
Care of Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

$475 A MONTH and expenses to good Canvassers. Articles new and staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. LININGTON, Chicago.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments, or all the time, than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

$72 00 EACH WEEK. Agents wanted every where. Business strictly legitimate. Particulars free. Address J. WORTH & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

THE personal appearance of distinguished persons is the first thing the present-day correspondent makes a note of and speaks of in his report. So one of them, the other day, who saw Captain Jack after his capture, remarked that his appearance would have been improved if he had been washed before he had been ironed.

A bore has been neatly described as the man who persists in talking about himself when you wish to talk about yourself.

A woman who recently had her butter seized at the market for short weight gave as a reason that the cow from which the butter was made was subject to a cramp, and that caused the butter to shrink in weight.

A Kansas paper describes a man as being "as sociable as a batch of candidates two weeks before election."

An editor in Kentucky declares there is a boy in that State ten years old who weighs only eleven pounds. Either the statement or the boy is decidedly "too thin."

The concluding words of a Mormon obituary notice at Utah are very pathetic: "He leaves thirteen widows and fifty-four children to mourn his loss."

What Latin poet ought to be sold in a limp binding?—Horatius Flaccus.

A colony of wasps built their nest a few weeks ago in a church offensively near the choir. The sexton being appealed to, he said, "I'll fix the rascals," and proceeded to burn the wasps out. The next day, while gazing at the ruins of the church, the sexton was heard to remark, "I knew I could fix the rascals, but I'm sorry the church went along with 'em incidentally."

A doctor called for his little bill.
"Haven't got any money," replied the man.
"Then give me a chair, or a table, or something."
"Got none; I'm a regular bankrupt. You can put some leeches on me, anyhow, and take something out of me."

A school examiner lately gave a bright-looking boy this sentence to correct, "Between you and I this is good butter." The boy shortly returned the slip, thus marked, "Incorrect: the lamp-post is omitted."

"Among all my boys," said an old man, "I never had but one boy who took after me, and that was my son Aaron, who took after me with a club."

QUESTION OF CONSANGUINITY.—If a man marry a ballet-dancer, may it not be said that all the children she may present him will have a step-mother?

THE REV. C.C. WOULD HAVE HAD A DELIGHTFUL SUMMER, BUT NOTWITHSTANDING HIS PERFECT DISGUISE, THE YOUNGEST CHILDREN KNEW HIM FOR A DIVINE.

THEIR CONDUCT AT LAKE GEORGE WAS 'ORRIBLE MEM. THEY EXPECTED US GENTLEMEN TO GROOM OUR OWN 'ORSES MEM.

THE CLOSE OF THE SEASON.

BLACK-EYED SUSAN.—During the hearing of a case at a police court a woman stated that her husband had during their married life "given her one hundred and seven black eyes."

At the examination at a school not far from London, a young tyro in declamation, who had been told by the teacher that he must gesticulate according to the sense, in commencing a piece with "The comet lifts its fiery tail," lifted the tail of his coat to a horizontal position, causing roars of laughter.

"TYPES" OF CIVILIZATION—Printers.

In Connecticut a certain magistrate was called to jail to liberate a worthless debtor.
"Well, John," said the magistrate, on entering, "can you swear that you are not worth twenty dollars, and that you never will be?"
"Why," answered the other, rather chagrined at the question, "I can swear that I am not worth that amount at present."
"Well, well," returned the magistrate, "I can swear the rest, so go along, John."
And the man was sworn and discharged.

A STILL TONGUE SHOWS A WISE HEAD.—All lovers of tranquillity who visit Vienna will certainly shun the Prater.

A girl of the season comments thus on Mormonism: "How absurd! four or five wives to one man, when the fact is, each woman in these times ought to have four or five husbands. It would take about that number to support me decently."

An inscription on a mural tablet recently put up in a rural church is amusing. It ends:

"He was neglected by his doctor;
Treated cruel by his nurse.
His brother robbed his widow:
That makes the matter worse."

Must a doctor have a license to amputate a game leg?

"The time will come," says a veteran observer, "when a town will be of small account unless it can have an earthquake, a ghost, an old woman one hundred years of age, a terrific conflagration, and a railway accident of considerable magnitude."

GOOD FOR TRADE.—'Tis an ill wind that blows nobody good, and the like is true concerning hail, of which recent storms in some districts have much profited the glaziers. A certain gentleman in their line of business is an amateur of classical music. He never omits going, whenever he can, to hear Handel's oratorio, Israel in Egypt, because, in the performance of that sublime composition, he always feels so highly transported with the Hailstone Chorus.

A lunatic writes to ask whether, when a door is not a door, but a jar, the door jam is kept in the said jar.

A lad with a very good appetite swallowed a small leaden bullet. His friends were very much alarmed about it. The doctor was found, heard the dismal tale, and with as much unconcern as he would manifest in a case of common headache, wrote the following laconic note to the lad's father: "Don't alarm yourself. If, after three weeks, the bullet is not removed, give the boy a charge of powder. Yours, etc. P.S.—Don't shoot the boy at any body."

When is the wind barmy? Don't say when it is in the y-east.

It is customary in trade to abbreviate by initials, as "F.O.B.," which means goods will be shipped free on board. So "C.O.D." has been accepted for cash on delivery. A mercantile man sent an order to a tradesman for his wedding cards, putting the usual "C.O.D." in the corner. The initials were not understood. Fancy the feelings of himself and of her who was to be "his very own," on receiving the cards at the latest possible moment with the letters "C.O.D." in the corner of every one of them!

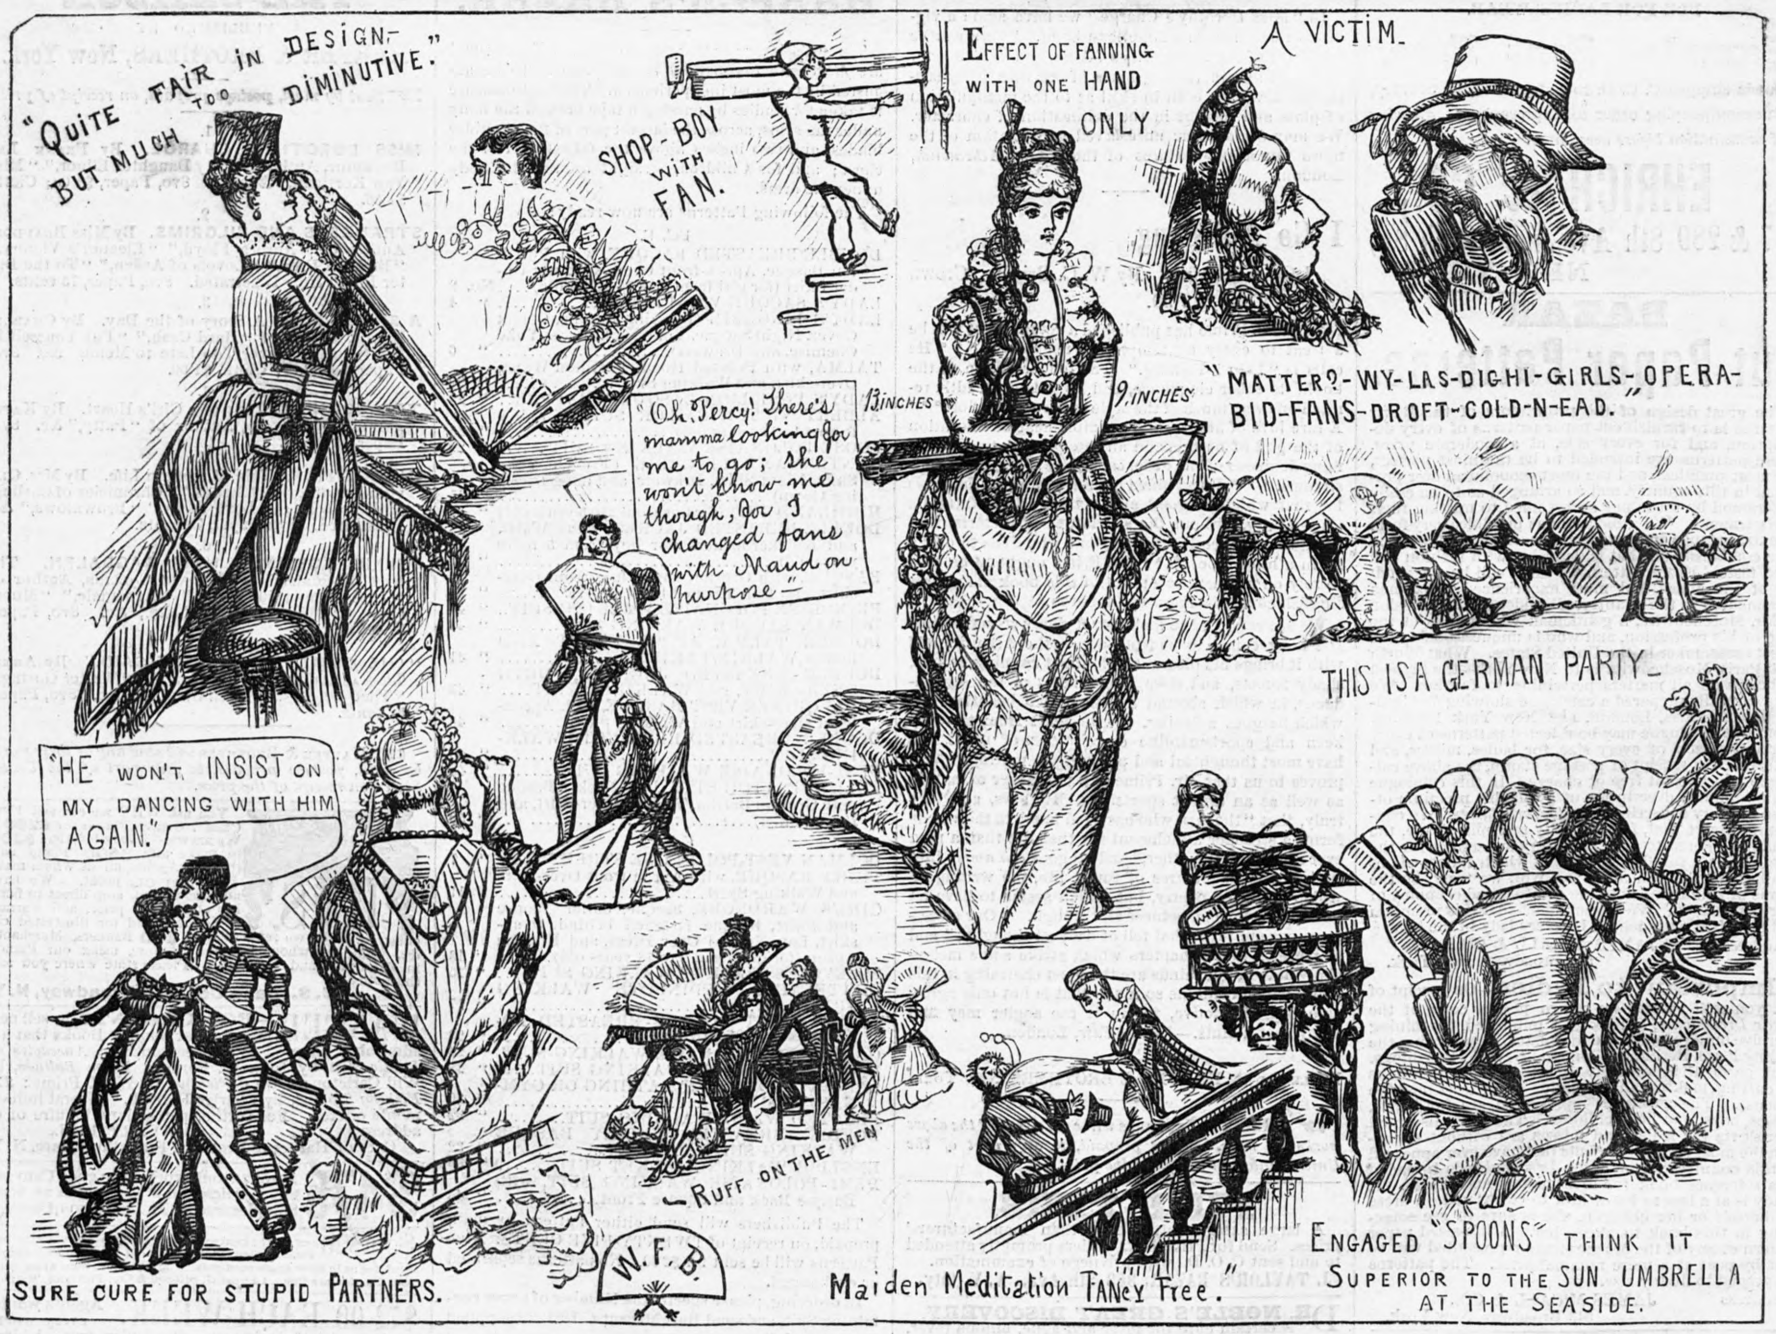
When is a man tied to time?—When he marries a second.

TO WHIST PLAYERS.—Should a chimney-sweep trump his partner's trick when he can not follow soot?

Some of the New Hampshire papers report that an unusual number of people climbed the White Mountains last summer to get a view of the cows pasturing in the meadows below.

The belle who originated the Grecian bend is stopping at Saratoga. Remorse is painted on her once cheerful countenance. She says, though she bent so much, she never arrived at a satisfactory beau.

It is said that a sure way to win success in society is to talk to the young ladies, and listen attentively when the old ones talk to you.



THE FAN OF THE PERIOD.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 43.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

DEMI-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT, WITH BASQUE BACK AND SQUARE FRONTS—BACK AND FRONT—WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

[Cut Paper Patterns of the Demi-Polonaise Walking Suit, with Basque Back and Square Fronts, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Hosted by Google

TO MY WIFE.

AH! say'st thou, love, that I have changed,
And that my moods are sad or worse?
My darling thinks I am estranged,
And even calls my ways perverse.
Ah, no, thy fancy wild hath ranged,
And in its travel found a curse.

When first I loved thee, all absorbed,
I knew no life unfilled by thee;
In thee my being was full-orbed,
And bound, as strong shore binds the sea;
My thought, my feeling, all absorbed,
My heart, my soul, were only thee.

Dear love, we were sweet spendthrifts then
Of hours that ne'er will greet us more:
Oh, blame me not as cold, if when
In daily battle's deafening roar
With all my struggling fellow-men
I do not live them o'er and o'er.

I show my love now in my work,
Which, all for thee, is what you see
Lays on my brow its shadow murk,
And leaves me scarce a moment free;
Yet in each fibre strained will lurk
The pulses that still beat for thee.

So patient bear my absent look,
Nor quarrel with my silence deep,
Nor jealous fight my student book,
Nor blame me if I drop to sleep;
'Tis not neglect that thou must brook,
But that I now must harvest reap.

I thrust my sickle in the grain
Where years ago I sowed and plowed;
My granaries harvest shall contain,
And then I'll leave the rushing crowd
Before dull care or daily strain
Hath all my strength and courage cowed.

Bear with me, love, and meanwhile be
Content to lift thy woman's load;
The faces gathered at thy knee
Will cheer thee on thy lonely road,
And by-and-by we both shall see
That our two lives together flowed.

Demi-Polonaise Walking Suit, with Basque Back and Square Fronts, Figs. 1 and 2.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

See illustration on first page.

THIS stylish and popular suit, which is copied from one just imported from Paris by Messrs. Lord & Taylor, is well suited for either house or street dress, and may be made of any material —silk or woolen. The original is of black silk, in which material it is particularly handsome, and is trimmed with side pleatings of the material, arranged as shown by the illustration.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises two articles—demi-polonaise with basque back and square fronts, and walking skirt.

DEMI-POLONAISE, WITH BASQUE BACK AND SQUARE FRONTS.—This pattern is in five pieces —front, side back, back, sleeve, and pocket. The front is high in the neck, and closes to the waist line with buttons and button-holes. It is fitted by a cross basque seam and two darts on each side. The skirt part is long and straight, and is held together in the back by a sash on each side twelve inches from the top. The sash is ten inches wide and a yard and a half long. One end is laid in three side pleats, and tacked on the under side of the side form at the waist line near the under arm seam. Three pleats are laid twelve inches from the top of the sash, and fastened at the single hole in the back edge of the skirt part; the sash is then tied in a knot or loose loops with long flowing ends. The back is in basque form, and is adjusted to the figure by side forms and a middle seam. An extra width is cut on each seam at the waist line, and laid in a deep box-pleat on the under side, which forms a full box-pleat on each side of the centre on the upper side. The seam is to be left open to the notch at the lower edge of the postilion, to meet the sash in the back. The coat sleeve is sewed plain in the armhole. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back of the armhole, holding the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. The garment is trimmed across the bottom, up the front, and around the neck with a fine side pleating of the material three inches in width, headed by a shell trimming of the same. The shell is carried up the back edge of the front to the waist line, and also around the edge of the postilion and pockets. The perforations show where to baste the seams under the arms and on the shoulders, to take up the cross basque seam and darts, where to place the trimming on the waist, to place the pockets, to fasten the sash, and the size and form of the under part of the sleeve. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the shoulder and under arm seams, and a quarter of an inch for all others. The notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back the hem in front. Put the pattern together by the notches.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for a medium-sized person, 5½ yards.

Extra for trimming, 3 yards.

WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, two side gores, and straight breadth for the back. Cut the front gore and back breadth with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut two pieces each of the patterns given for the side gores. Put the pattern together by the notches, paying no attention to the grain of the paper.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7 yards.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

☞ A Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains more reading matter than an average octavo volume. The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for October 18 was sent out gratuitously an interesting

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing further installments of "PHINEAS REDUX" and the "PARISIANS;" an illustrated account of the recent explorations in the Land of Moab; and other attractive features.

Another EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for October 25.

☞ We would call the particular attention of our readers to the two powerful Illustrated Serial Stories that are commenced in the present Number of the BAZAR.

"SECOND-COUSIN SARAH,"

by F. W. ROBINSON, the popular author of "Little Kate Kirby," "Christie's Faith," etc., is a novel of thrilling interest, which will be read with delight by all the friends of this fascinating novelist.

"THROUGH FIRE AND WATER,"

by FREDERICK TALBOT, is a unique and highly dramatic story, the continuation of which can not fail to be followed with eager curiosity.

"LADY ANNA" will be continued in the following Number.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the new and favorite Demi-Polonaise Walking Suit, with Basque Back and Square Fronts, illustrated on the first page of the present Number, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by Mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 687.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number will contain a rich variety of patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Ladies' Silk, Cashmere, Serge, Alpaca, Vigogne, and Poplin Suits; several different styles of Mantelets, Basques, Jackets, Mantles, and other Fall and Winter Wrappings; Children's Dresses; Lingerie; Fancy-Work, etc., etc.; with choice literary and artistic attractions.

IDLE WOMEN.

IN the busy world, and especially in this, which is supposed to be the busiest part of it, there is a large class of idlers. Of these the most consummate are women; not that they are naturally lazy, but are so made by the conventional forms and habits of society. Nature evidently designed woman for great activity. Her apprehension is quick, her emotions lively, and her body mobile. If she becomes the languid odalisque of the harem, whether of Turk or Christian, she suffers a change to which she is forced to yield by a violence that outrages her nature. She is turned into a morbid product not unlike the famous goose of Strasburg, which is made weak and tender by constraint, and fat by heat and overfeeding. Both, moreover, may be said to be perverted for the same purpose, the woman and goose being alike destined to tickle the palate of luxury.

The traveler who has watched the patient toilers of Europe in their ceaseless efforts to earn a scant subsistence can testify to woman's capacity for work. Of the full day's labor in the field her share is by no means the least. She turns the furrow, guides the ox, fells the tree, digs, roots, sows, and harvests with a vigor and constancy that shame the man's less persistent labor, often rendered intermittent and desultory by frequent intervals of pipe-smoking and beer-drinking. In many parts of Europe the woman not only does her own especial duty of the household, but bears a large share of the labor that is ordinarily regarded as man's particular vocation. Instead of being called his better half, she is fairly entitled to be set down as a good three-fourths of him.

We do not mean to say that it is necessary for an American to go to Europe to find industrious women, but they are certainly more abundant there than here. Necessity occasionally makes woman in our country as elsewhere a hard worker, and there are wives and daughters, especially in the newly settled districts of the United States, whose energies are forced to a higher strain of nerve and muscle than the most severely tasked drudge of Europe. The bias of woman, however, every where with us is toward indolence. She feels that she is not in the enjoyment of her full privileges as an American lady until she has securely established her right to do nothing. Her aspiration is not toward a wider and more elevated scope of labor, which would be desirable and praiseworthy, but the fancied gentility of a fashionable idler.

We are far from wishing to restrict the natural ambition of women with the means of rising, whether innate or accidental, to the narrow limits of the cow-yard or kitchen. We are far from preaching the anti-democratic doctrine of once a dairy-maid, always a dairy-maid—once a scullion, always a scullion; but we do insist, with republican consistency, upon the equal obligation of labor. The coarsening effect of the rude work of many European women, the knotty muscularity of the figure, the doltish visage, the hoarse voice, the horny hand, the masculine stride, and the flat, plumping foot may not be pleasant for the idealist of female grace to contemplate. With her health, rude though it may be, and contentment, stupid as some will regard it, the female drudge of Europe, however, might be envied by many a pampered creature of luxury. The pulpy form, the transparent complexion, the dwindled hands and tapering fingers, the pinched feet, the languid gait and simpering expression, may be elements of female grace according to the conventional conception of woman's beauty, but they are purchased at a fearful price. Inactivity of mind and body is an indispensable part of the cost, and we need only allude to the weakness, nervous irritability, and disease which necessarily follow, with a useless life as the inevitable consequence. Worse than this, in fact; for of such poor stuff mothers must be occasionally made, and their self-inflicted misery entailed upon the innocent generation after them.

Among the prosperous classes in our country, among all those, in fact, whose means will admit of it, the prevailing practice is to bring up the girls to no other vocation than that of husband-catching. Finished, as it is called, at school, they are baited with all the varieties of fashionable finery, and kept ready, tender and enticing, for the matrimonial palate by careful avoidance of work and all preoccupation. If they succeed in getting married, they find enough to do, but prove themselves incapable of doing it; if they fail, they pine away in sickly maidenhood, objectless and hopeless, for they have missed their only aim in life. Intense preoccupation with marriage, and the disappointment which so frequently ensues, are the most common causes, as every doctor will admit, of the numerous ailments of lovely, listless, idle women.

FOLLOWING THE FASHIONS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

HAS any great philosopher, any original thinker, ever said that no man is so wise as all men? If not, I will say it myself rather than it should go unsaid. The fools may be, as LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGUE affirmed, three out of four in every person's acquaintance; the multitude seems sometimes to go blindly and persistently in the wrong track; nevertheless the average common-sense of the world is immense. The course of the people is wildly zigzag, yet a line following their general direction probably comes nearer the right line of advance than any line which the wisest philosopher could mark out.

Loud and deep are the maledictions uttered upon the fashions. Virtuous women denounce them by the fireside. Virtuous men rail at them from pulpit and printing-press. The extravagance, the bankruptcy, the domestic dissensions, a great part of the misery that mars the beauty and disturbs the peace of society, are laid at the door of fashion. But what is fashion? It is simply the common way of doing things. Things must be done. We all agree to that. The human animal was not sent furred or hairy into the world. It must dress itself. In this climate it must dress itself a good deal. The bear and the beaver have no opportunity of setting or following the fashions. They go in a fore-ordained groove. The duck's neck and the peacock's tail are wonderful specimens of splendor in attire, but neither duck nor peacock has any hand in the matter. To man alone is given the high art of using taste, judgment, genius, in his clothes. And high art it is, in spite of all our denunciations.

Man and his Maker are the formers of all the fashions of the world. Man devises his own dress. The Creator devises the dress of all the beasts of the field, the birds of the air, the fish of the sea. If we are to be taught by example, there need be inherently no limit to variety and splendor of costume. So far as usefulness is concerned, all the birds might just as well be gray. Does a fish taste any better because his scales shimmer like opal in the sunshine? Man may wreak himself on invention, but he can never hope to surpass the splendor of the beetle and the butterfly. Why is the cut of a coat, the tint of a gown, unworthy of the human mind, when the Creator has so clothed the grass of the field which to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven? A woman trims her hat, but God made the feather. If the Almighty and All-knowing could find His good pleasure in spreading the blue of the heavens and the green of the meadows—if He enjoyed strewing the earth with blossoms, and filling these autumn woods with every fantasy of color and brilliance—shall we disdain to follow Him with unequal steps, and weave His textures and mingle His hues for the adornment of what He has chosen to be the perfect flower of His world, the crown of His creation, man, little lower than the angels?

Dressing is not a mere whim, arbitrary, superficial, frivolous. Frivolous men and women will develop and display their frivolity in dress as in all other matters; but the fashion of dress is founded on deep principles, shaded by delicate distinctions, fruitful of great results. It is not simply that the sorrow of France drapes all the world in dun; but climate, vigor, nationality, progress, droop the folds or tighten the wraps, blend or blazon the colors. Dress is, indeed, so important, so vital a matter, that it has been thought dangerous for one nationality, though never so superior, to tamper with the costume of another, however inferior. Mr. CHARLES NORDHOFF, an outgrowth of the highest civilization of New York, thinks that "the deleterious habit of wearing clothes has done much to kill off the Hawaiian people." Our missionaries, good and great men as they were, had not sufficiently studied fashion. They probably thought, as most of us think, that "fashion" is the device of some "scarlet woman"—some emanation from the Evil One that lies in wait to devour—and never considered that in their own black coats and white chokers they were as rigidly following the fashions as the most gayly dressed lady at the midnight ball. They did not consider that "fashion," prescribing its scantiness and simplicity to the Hawaiian, had its foundation in the requirements of soil and climate, or was any thing but barbarian, and to be supplanted at the earliest possible moment by the hat and coat and trowsers, the shoes and bonnet and gown, of New England's rigorous skies.

It is not whether you shall or shall not follow the fashion; it is what fashion and whose fashion shall you follow. It is whether you shall follow unintelligently or intelligently, moderately or extravagantly. Mr. NORDHOFF'S party came across a man at work in very scanty attire. Out of respect to his visitors, the man, after receiving them, slipped into the bush, and re-appeared clad in hat and shirt, confidently believing, no doubt, that he had thus approved himself a cosmopolitan. But in rejecting Hawaiian attire he had not become wholly American, and while the first may have been somewhat startling, the second was ridiculous into the bargain. And when to this you add that the gentle and gracious Hawaiians are dying out at the rate of sixty per cent. in forty years, and partly, at least, under the weight of their clothing and in the heavy shade of their close houses, it is surely time to pause and consider whether fashion, in Hawaii and elsewhere, may not have its own sufficient reasons for being.

"If life and death are the same, why do you not kill yourself?" asked a rash man of a Stoic.

"Because they are the same," replied the Stoic.

Fashion is of no account; why should we follow it?

But if it is of no account we may just as well follow it as frown on it. A woman—and a man too—must be dressed. Why not, then, dress like other people? Why not dress like the people who are alive and will make remarks, rather than like the people who are dead and tell no tales? It is certainly pleasanter to be inconspicuous than conspicuous. We do not begrudge the toga to the Romans, but CICERO himself would not like to dine in it where every one else wore his dress-coat. Truth and loyalty are due to the absent; politeness should be paid to the present. A girl should stand up for her grandmother against all comers, but no interpretation of the fifth commandment makes it incumbent upon her to wear the "calash" which sheltered that good lady from the sun during her earthly pilgrimage.

Hosted by Google

There are follies and whimsies in fashion. There is opportunity for individual taste and choice. Nevertheless, the wisest thing for people in general to do is to follow the fashion that prevails. It is only in exceptional cases that they will obtain a larger result of satisfaction at a less outlay of trouble by setting up their own standard. Dress is too important to be denounced, too significant to be neglected, but too pliable to found a fight on!

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE DEMI-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.

THE demi-polonaise walking suit, illustrated on our first page (of which a cut paper pattern is published), is a fashionable model for black or other dark silk suits, or for those made of the new wool diagonals, cashmere, serge, vigogne, de bège, etc. We commend it to the reader for its stylish simplicity, and also because very little material is required for its construction. The demi-polonaise which forms the over dress has long, straight, square-cornered fronts, drawn toward the back by a sash, while the back has merely a basque, which accounts for its name of half-polonaise. The garment is tight-fitting, short on the shoulders, fits smoothly over the hips, and must hang down the sides without a wrinkle. A single breadth of silk is required for each front, to which a narrow sloping piece, like a gore, is added low down on the back. Of course this piece is cut on (without a seam) in wider goods. The model from which our sketch is taken is made of black silk, trimmed with very small side pleatings headed by shell trimming that shows an inner lining of black velvet. This surrounds the whole garment, extending up the back and also up each front, and around the neck, where it forms a ruff. The front, without a vest, buttons from the throat to the waist, whence it falls open, disclosing the skirt trimming, which consists of rows of pleating with shell heading. The basque back has two hollow box-pleats, and may be simply piped with velvet, or arranged to show a velvet facing inside the pleats. The sash of silk lined with velvet holds the two breadths closely together just below the basque, and is tied in a knot, or else hanging loops, instead of a regular bow. The sleeves are close coat-shape, opening up the outside seam in duchesse fashion. Many of these demi-polonaises have a panier puff of the material set in under the basque, or else taking the place of the basque, and producing a very stylish effect. Blue or rose-colored silk is sometimes used for lining the shell trimming of black silk dresses, while dark silk suits have linings of lighter shades of the same color. The richest trimming for black silk demi-polonaises is a band of solid jet galloon with fringe entirely of jet. Very plain black silk suits have merely a three-inch bias band of the silk or of velvet edging the demi-polonaise, with a double piping fold of silk on the upper edge of the band. A dark gray silk had pleatings of the same headed by a velvet band. A black cashmere demi-polonaise had narrow side pleatings and band of gros grain. The black silk skirt was trimmed with three groups of silk pleating, two rows four inches wide in each group, with a shell cashmere trimming above each cluster. A suit of navy blue serge made in the same way had serge pleatings and band, with a piping of black gros grain each side of the band.

"AT THE OPENINGS."

The large furnishing stores have just had their opening or reception days, where velvets, cashmeres, and thousand-dollar dresses were exhibited and sold as recklessly as though the financial crisis and its results were already forgotten. Many variations of the stately dresses described last week were shown, and the early suggestions of the season were confirmed. For instance, it is a fact that French costumes intended for the street are short enough to escape the ground, and these are already adopted here by promenaders on Fifth Avenue. To lift the skirt or half carry it on the arm is ungraceful and wearisome, and ladies are glad to wear the short, trim French skirt. These are also very narrow, and the gores are sewed into the belt in many cases without the slightest fullness. Another pleasant corroboration is that the garments of last year can easily be remodeled to suit the present fashion of scant polonaises, tight redingotes, and square over-skirts. Even the short basques of the past season may be lengthened into the new styles by joining a square basque at the waist, and concealing the seam beneath the universally worn belt. Coat sleeves can be cut closer-fitting, and modernized by having a pleated frill of silk falling over the hand to match the ruff, and a revers cuff, stiffly lined to keep it in shape, turned upward toward the elbow. Pockets behind on polonaises and redingotes, half hidden among the back drapery, are newer than the square side pockets now worn. The hanging aumônière is also seen in various materials. Those made of black lace and jet are worn with any dress. Tight-fitting double-breasted polonaises and basques are without revers, and are lapped either straight or diagonally, and buttoned from the throat to the edge, two rows of buttons quite close together ornamenting the front. A ruff or else a flaring standing collar of the material then trims the neck. There are very elegant dresses innocent of flounces, having simply folds of velvet around the skirt, yet the majority are still trimmed to excess. French dresses show a decided fancy for row upon row of narrow fine side pleating, cut straight, four inches wide, hemmed on each edge, sewed flatly on the upper side, and held by an under thread in the middle. This is not new, nor to be commended, as it is heavy, requires a great deal of material, and the pressed pleats soon cut and fray the threads, but it promises to be much used. Modistes say it is an easy matter to cut up twelve yards of silk for the pleatings of a single costume. Instead of simple side-pleated ruffs, there are many standing and flaring collars, held in position by a wire, with sometimes a bold triple box-pleat behind. The single revers in front is quite pretty, though it has a most one-sided appearance.

The fancy for jet trimming is revived, and promises to surpass the extravagant use made of it a few years ago. Whole polonaises are so nearly covered with jet that you can not rest a finger-tip on a spot where it is not. These are made of black Sicilienne or of cashmere, and are bought by stylish young women, who provide themselves with three or four skirts of black silk variously trimmed. As usual, black is more universally worn than any one of the dark colors, or than all put together. Three darts are found on many of the French basques. The caprice for smoked pearl buttons of a shade to match the costume, whether it be silk or fine wool, is fast putting oxidized silver buttons out of date; cut steel buttons are also preferred to silver ones. Long-looped bows with buckles are also favorite ornaments.

COSTUMES.

One of the most elegant costumes exhibited is of myrtle green silk and velvet. The silk skirt has no flounces, but merely two velvet folds three inches wide, with two silk cords at the head of each. The velvet over-skirt hangs long, smooth, and narrow in front, curves up high on the sides, is without drapery, hangs plainly behind in two long tabs buttoned together, and is edged with deep fringe. Medicis square basque of velvet with silk sleeves, velvet puff below the elbow, and a silk fraise around the neck. A black silk dress has five straight gathered flounces behind, with narrower ruffles on each flounce. Horizontal folds cover the front breadth. On each side is a square hanging over-skirt breadth edged with jet galloon and lace. The basque has three darts, is simply piped on the edge, and has square revers. To complete these silk costumes for the street are velvet, cashmere, and camel's-hair wraps, in Dolman fashion, with square mantilla fronts and sacque backs. These wraps are laden with jet, embroidery, soutache, and fringe, and cost from $150 to $275.

Costumes partly camel's-hair and partly silk are made up with stylish flat trimmings, and cost from $125 upward. The silk skirts are trimmed with two or three bias bands of camel's-hair piped with silk, and perhaps a single straight silk flounce around the edge. Above this is a round apron-front over-skirt of camel's-hair, trimmed with a three-inch silk band, and the suit is completed by a close-fitting English walking jacket of camel's-hair with silk revers. Vigogne and silk suits made in the same manner have also a tight basque of vigogne with silk sleeves. The smoked pearl buttons on such suits are colored to match admirably. Among less expensive goods are three pieces of the coarse but stylish diagonal wools—namely, over-skirt, English basque with four wide pieces in back, and a sleeveless jacket with stylish buttons, pockets, and standing collar—costing altogether from $35 to $40. When worn over a black silk skirt these make a pretty fall costume. Polonaises of the dark rough-surfaced wool fabrics now in vogue, plainly but stylishly made, cost $25 and upward.

DINNER DRESSES.

Open-worked English embroidery on black silk is the novelty for over dresses above the light silks worn at ceremonious dinners and receptions. For instance, a lavender silk dress has a sleeveless basque and square over-skirt, wrought all over in evelet, open wheel, and compass patterns; the needle-work is exquisite, the pale color shows through the open spaces, and the effect is very fine.

There are also black net polonaises, embroidered all over with jet, to wear with black or with colored silk dresses. One of these has a brocaded sash in rose pink and scarlet, draped low in front, as if outlining an apron; the neck has a standing collar of net, with pink lining. Another has blue gros grain ribbon bows and sash. A white polonaise is of perpendicular strips of gros grain, separated by white camel's-hair insertion, edged with lace to match.

The handsomest black velvet dress shown is a demi-train and basque, trimmed with five lengthwise rows of lace, with solid jet passementerie in the middle; a deep flounce crosses the front breadths, meeting the lengthwise tablier, but the train is not trimmed.

EVENING DRESSES.

Full dress toilettes are composed of very light silks, trimmed with velvet of the darkest shade of that color, with crêpe lisse pleatings, flounces of Valenciennes or of white camel's-hair lace, and garlands of flowers. The skirts are very moderate demi-trains. The over-skirts are of fanciful construction, consisting in greater part of velvet sashes, or else whole breadths of lace. Two basques, one high in the neck and the other low, are usually provided; they are made with merely one seam in the back, and have antique sleeves, plain to the elbow and ruffled below.

Blue or pink tulle embroidered is an elegant novelty for over-skirts of light silks. A lovely dress of palest sky blue silk has dark sapphire velvet accessories in the way of flounces, piping, bows, and ruff, while the long over-skirt and sash are of gossamer tulle, sky blue, wrought all over with shaded blue floss. A shell pink faille is trimmed with side pleatings of pink crêpe lisse. A wide pink faille sash, draped low in apron shape, has a garland of shaded leaves laid upon it, and carried up to the waist behind. An opal-tinted silk has deep side-pleated flounces and an apron edged with dark garnet velvet, on which is a wide Valenciennes flounce to soften the high color. The high basques are for dinner-parties and the opera, the low basques for balls. These low corsages are deeply pointed in the neck, back and front, or else all square and only three-quarters low; the shoulder points are curved in every instance, though the back and fronts are sometimes indelicately low. Pleatings standing like ruffs finish off many of these, and the short sleeves have upturned revers. One of the prettiest dresses is pale buff silk, with eight or nine silk pleated flounces covering the back breadths, while the front has a long square apron of buff crêpe lisse bordered with autumn leaves embroidered in chenille. On a blue silk there are smoked pearl buttons that look like opals, and are almost as expensive. The only over-skirt is a breadth of white camel's-hair lace hanging smoothly on each side. The flounces are caught at the top in small shirred puffs, a fashion much used at present.

EVENING WRAPS.

The wraps for evening parties and the opera are of pale-tinted Sicilienne and cashmere, instead of the white cloaks once so popular. They are in Dolman and sacque shapes, with hoods and standing flaring collar or ruff of silk. For ornament they are trimmed with embroidery, lace, fringe, and swan's-down. Pearl-color, Nile green, rose, and pale blue Sicilienne are trimmed with a border of white embroidery, or else are thickly wrought all over with shaded floss of the color of the material, making a beautiful monotone wrap.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; A. T. STEWART & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

THE Shah, on returning to the capital of his dominions, was received with great enthusiasm, the whole population turning out to escort him to his palace. He made a little stump speech to them, saying that he had visited foreign countries for the sole purpose of examining what was new and good, and as far as possible introducing whatever he could that would benefit his government and people. He had a good time, and would now settle down to his work.

—Miss BUNKER, a deaf-mute, and daughter of ENG, one of the Siamese Twins, was recently married in North Carolina to Mr. HAYNES, also a mute. On their homeward journey from church the bridal party came very near being drowned while crossing a swollen stream. The bridegroom, who had never swam before, rescued his bride by swimming and carrying her in his arms a distance of several yards to shore.

—JEDEDIAH WEISS, the oldest native resident of Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, has just died at the age of seventy-eight. For fifty years he was one of a quartette of trombonists, who, in accordance with Moravian usage, announce the death of members of their denomination by playing chorals from the steeple of the church by way of "passing bell."

—A. K. H. B., the author of that charming book, The Recreations of a Country Parson, will publish in a few weeks a new book, entitled A Scotch Communion Sunday, to which are added certain Discourses from a University City.

—The reception of Mr. WILKIE COLLINS by the Lotos Club on the evening of the 27th ult. was a very brilliant affair. His speech in answer to the welcome of Mr. President REID was exceedingly felicitous, as, indeed, were all the speeches made during the evening.

—The oldest instructor in young-idea firing in Rhode Island is Miss HANNAH INMAN, who taught school in Providence seventy-five years ago. She is nearly ninety-four, and has taught in many places in Rhode Island and Massachusetts. The salary varied with the schools. Rhode Island commenced by giving her twenty cents a week, but Massachusetts, clearly discerning her ability, advanced the figures to a quarter of a dollar, and so reaped the benefit of her maturer years.

—Miss ABBY WOODLEIGH, daughter of the Rev. T. A. WOODLEIGH, of East Bennington, has been elected to the professorship of chemistry in the Pennsylvania Female College, Pittsburg. Wages $1300.

—It is said of CALEB CUSHING that when he was appointed judge, many years ago, in Massachusetts, he read sixty volumes of Massachusetts Reports in nineteen days, and that his average study and labor for years have been seventeen hours a day. Why not take advantage of the Ten-hour law?

—The Rev. Dr. EDSON, of Lowell, Massachusetts, has just celebrated his eightieth birthday, and within a few months will, if spared, celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of his ministry, the fiftieth of his marriage, and the fiftieth of the organization of his parish.

—A Boston man would fain have it believed that were Dr. SAMUEL JOHNSON now alive, and in New England, he might say that epizootic spasmodic affections of the nasal organ are not eminently conducive to calligraphic legibility, the perspicuous sphericity of rhetorical sentences, or continuous colloquies uninterrupted by nose-quakes and explosive manifestations of the olfactory arrangements.

—Captain TALBOT, of Plainfield, Connecticut, who died a few days since at the age of one hundred, lacking a few days, was the witness in his day of many remarkable occurrences. He was born in Providence, Rhode Island, during the reign of GEORGE III. Providence was then a straggling sea-port town of four thousand inhabitants. The colony was agitated by the impositions of the mother country, and burning with the ideas of independence. JOSEPH WANTON, who was afterward deposed by the General Assembly for his adherence to the crown, was Governor of the colony. LOUIS XV. reigned in France, FREDERICK the Great in Prussia, and the able and infamous CATHERINE in Russia. The century covered by this life seems, so far as those who have lived the latter part of it can judge, the most important in the records of time. Nearly all the governments of the world have been overturned by revolution, by conquest, or by peaceful changes that have averted by anticipating violent ones. The whole face of civilization has been altered, and science, humanity, and freedom have made advances greater than marked the progress of a thousand years before.

—In Baron STOCKMAR'S memoirs, by his son, a description is given of the curious red-tapery of royal housekeeping by Queen VICTORIA. It is something wonderful. If a pane of glass or the door of a cupboard requires mending, it can not be done without the following process: A requisition is prepared and signed by the Chief Cook, it is then countersigned by the Clerk of the Kitchen, then it is taken to be signed by the Master of the Household, thence it is taken to the Lord Chamberlain's office, where it is authorized, and then laid before the Clerk of the Works under the Office of Woods and Forests, and consequently many a window and cupboard have remained broken for months.

—Mr. HENRI TAINE, so favorably known by his work on English literature, is writing an elaborate history of the French Revolution, which will be mainly founded on an examination of state papers and other contemporary documents which have not been published.

—The most "personal" inscription we have read of in tombstone literature is that on a slab in Pennsylvania, which reads, "In memory of TABITHA, beloved wife of JOSEPH WRIGHT, THOMAS ANDREWS, EBEN HALSTED, EDWARD MURRAY, and CHARLES DEAN, by her devoted husband, CYRUS MORGAN."

—Among the clever impromptu speeches made at the Lotos Club's reception of Mr. WILKIE COLLINS was one by Major-General M'DOWELL, in which he stated the interesting fact that the stories of that distinguished novelist were to be found in the library of every military post throughout the country.

—Miss MARY GRAY RATRAY, of London, recently deceased, left by her will the sum of $100,000, free of duty, to her executors, to be by them divided among such charitable institutions of that city as they may think best.

—"Ik Marvel" is now in his new house at Edgewood, a beautiful spot overlooking New Haven. It is built of stone gathered from the farm itself, which is said to have a gneiss effect.

—Mr. DAVID PRESTON, of Detroit, has seen the results that are sure to follow persistence in a good cause. He has succeeded in raising $60,000 for Albion College, to secure an additional gift, contingently promised, of $50,000. One of the Michigan papers says that he set the example by heading the list with a large donation, and then had all the members of his family give. He talked, gave, and prayed. Scarcely a family in the State but heard his appeal. He had till September 15 to raise the amount. September 9 there were still $6000 to be raised. He did not despair, but worked, and on the 14th he raised the last dollar.

—Ex-President JOHNSON is said to have had $60,000 to his credit, at six per cent. interest, in the First National Bank of Washington at the time of its failure. Should this prove a total failure, the old gentleman will, to use an expression quite common in his own Tennessee, be seriously "disgruntled."

—It is in the mind of Miss THACKERAY, if every thing goes smoothly meanwhile, to come a-visiting the United States next year.

—Dr. LINDEMAN, director of the United States Mint, is doubtless a good man and scientific; but when he expresses the opinion that silver coin may not unlikely be the ordinary circulating medium by the 1st of November next, we are dubious as to his finance. He is said to have issued orders that will insure a coinage of more bullion during the next three months than was ever coined during any similar period in the history of the government.

—We are permitted to mention the occurrence, though not to give the name of the gentleman who stopped in at a Broadway restaurant a few days since, and, asking for a plate of pork and beans, was constrained to open his eyes when he heard the waiter, in loud voice, order, "Brown-stone front for one!"

—Mr. GROTE, the historian, unlike most of the great philosophers and writers, was frank to admit the mistakes of his earlier years. "I have," said he, "outlived three great illusions. The first illusion has been—I always held that if supreme power were held by the people, it would be exercised more righteously than when intrusted to one person or a few. This I have found to be a mistake. 2. I always maintained that Ireland might be made contented and loyal by governing her in the same way as England; therefore I opposed coercion bills and all exceptional legislation in reference to the sister kingdom. But I grieve to say I have now come to a different conclusion. 3. I cherished the persuasion that as people advanced in intelligence and material prosperity they would esteem it a duty to educate their children without state aid. But this I find to be the greatest delusion of all. The rich have done their best to instill into the people the notion that the education of their children belongs to others." Well would it be, and have been, if Mr. MILL and other politicians and philosophers had gone on inquiring, and with so much candor and courage admitted the errors of their youth and immature judgment, after the example of GEORGE GROTE.

—Mr. J. BROWN, an Englishman, has "marched on" to New England with delightful success, having been so fortunate as to find the largest cake of pure gold yet discovered. It weighs 408 ounces, the product of 600 tons of quartz, and the result of six weeks' work. After paying all expenses it gives the possessor a clear profit of $5000.

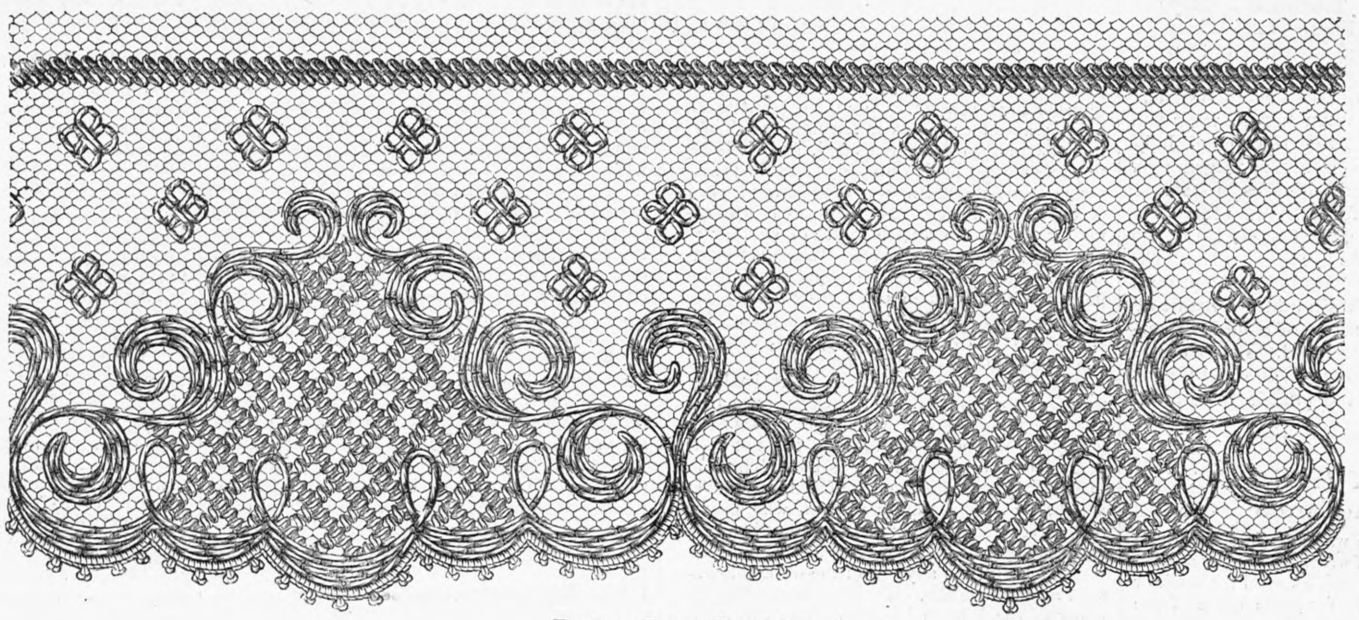
—It comes from London that the splendid mansion which is now being built at Kensington, near Mr. THACKERAY'S old house, and facing Kensington Gardens, is to become the palace of the Duke of Edinburgh and his bride.

—At the recent Northwestern Indiana M. E. Conference, at South Bend, Bishop SIMPSON introduced to the Conference Mr. SCHUYLER COLFAX, who addressed that body in a very felicitous manner. At its conclusion Bishop SIMPSON remarked, "And we all hope that his future may be more brilliant than his past." "Amen," responded the brethren.

Hosted by Google

Darned Tulle Border.

THIS border may be worked on white tulle with glazed cotton, or else on black tulle with filling silk. It is suitable for the high fraises so fashionable at present, and for fichus and other lingerie. Having drawn the design on linen, baste on the tulle smoothly, and work the design with the material selected, observing the illustration. Edge the border with buttonhole stitch scallops on the outer edge.



DARNED TULLE BORDER.

Design for Sofa-Pillow.—Petit Point Embroidery on Cloth.

THIS design is worked on gray cloth with blue, red, and yellow zephyr worsted in petit point. Baste a piece of undivided canvas of the requisite size on the cloth, and work the embroidery, observing the illustration. After finishing the embroidery, draw out the threads of the canvas.

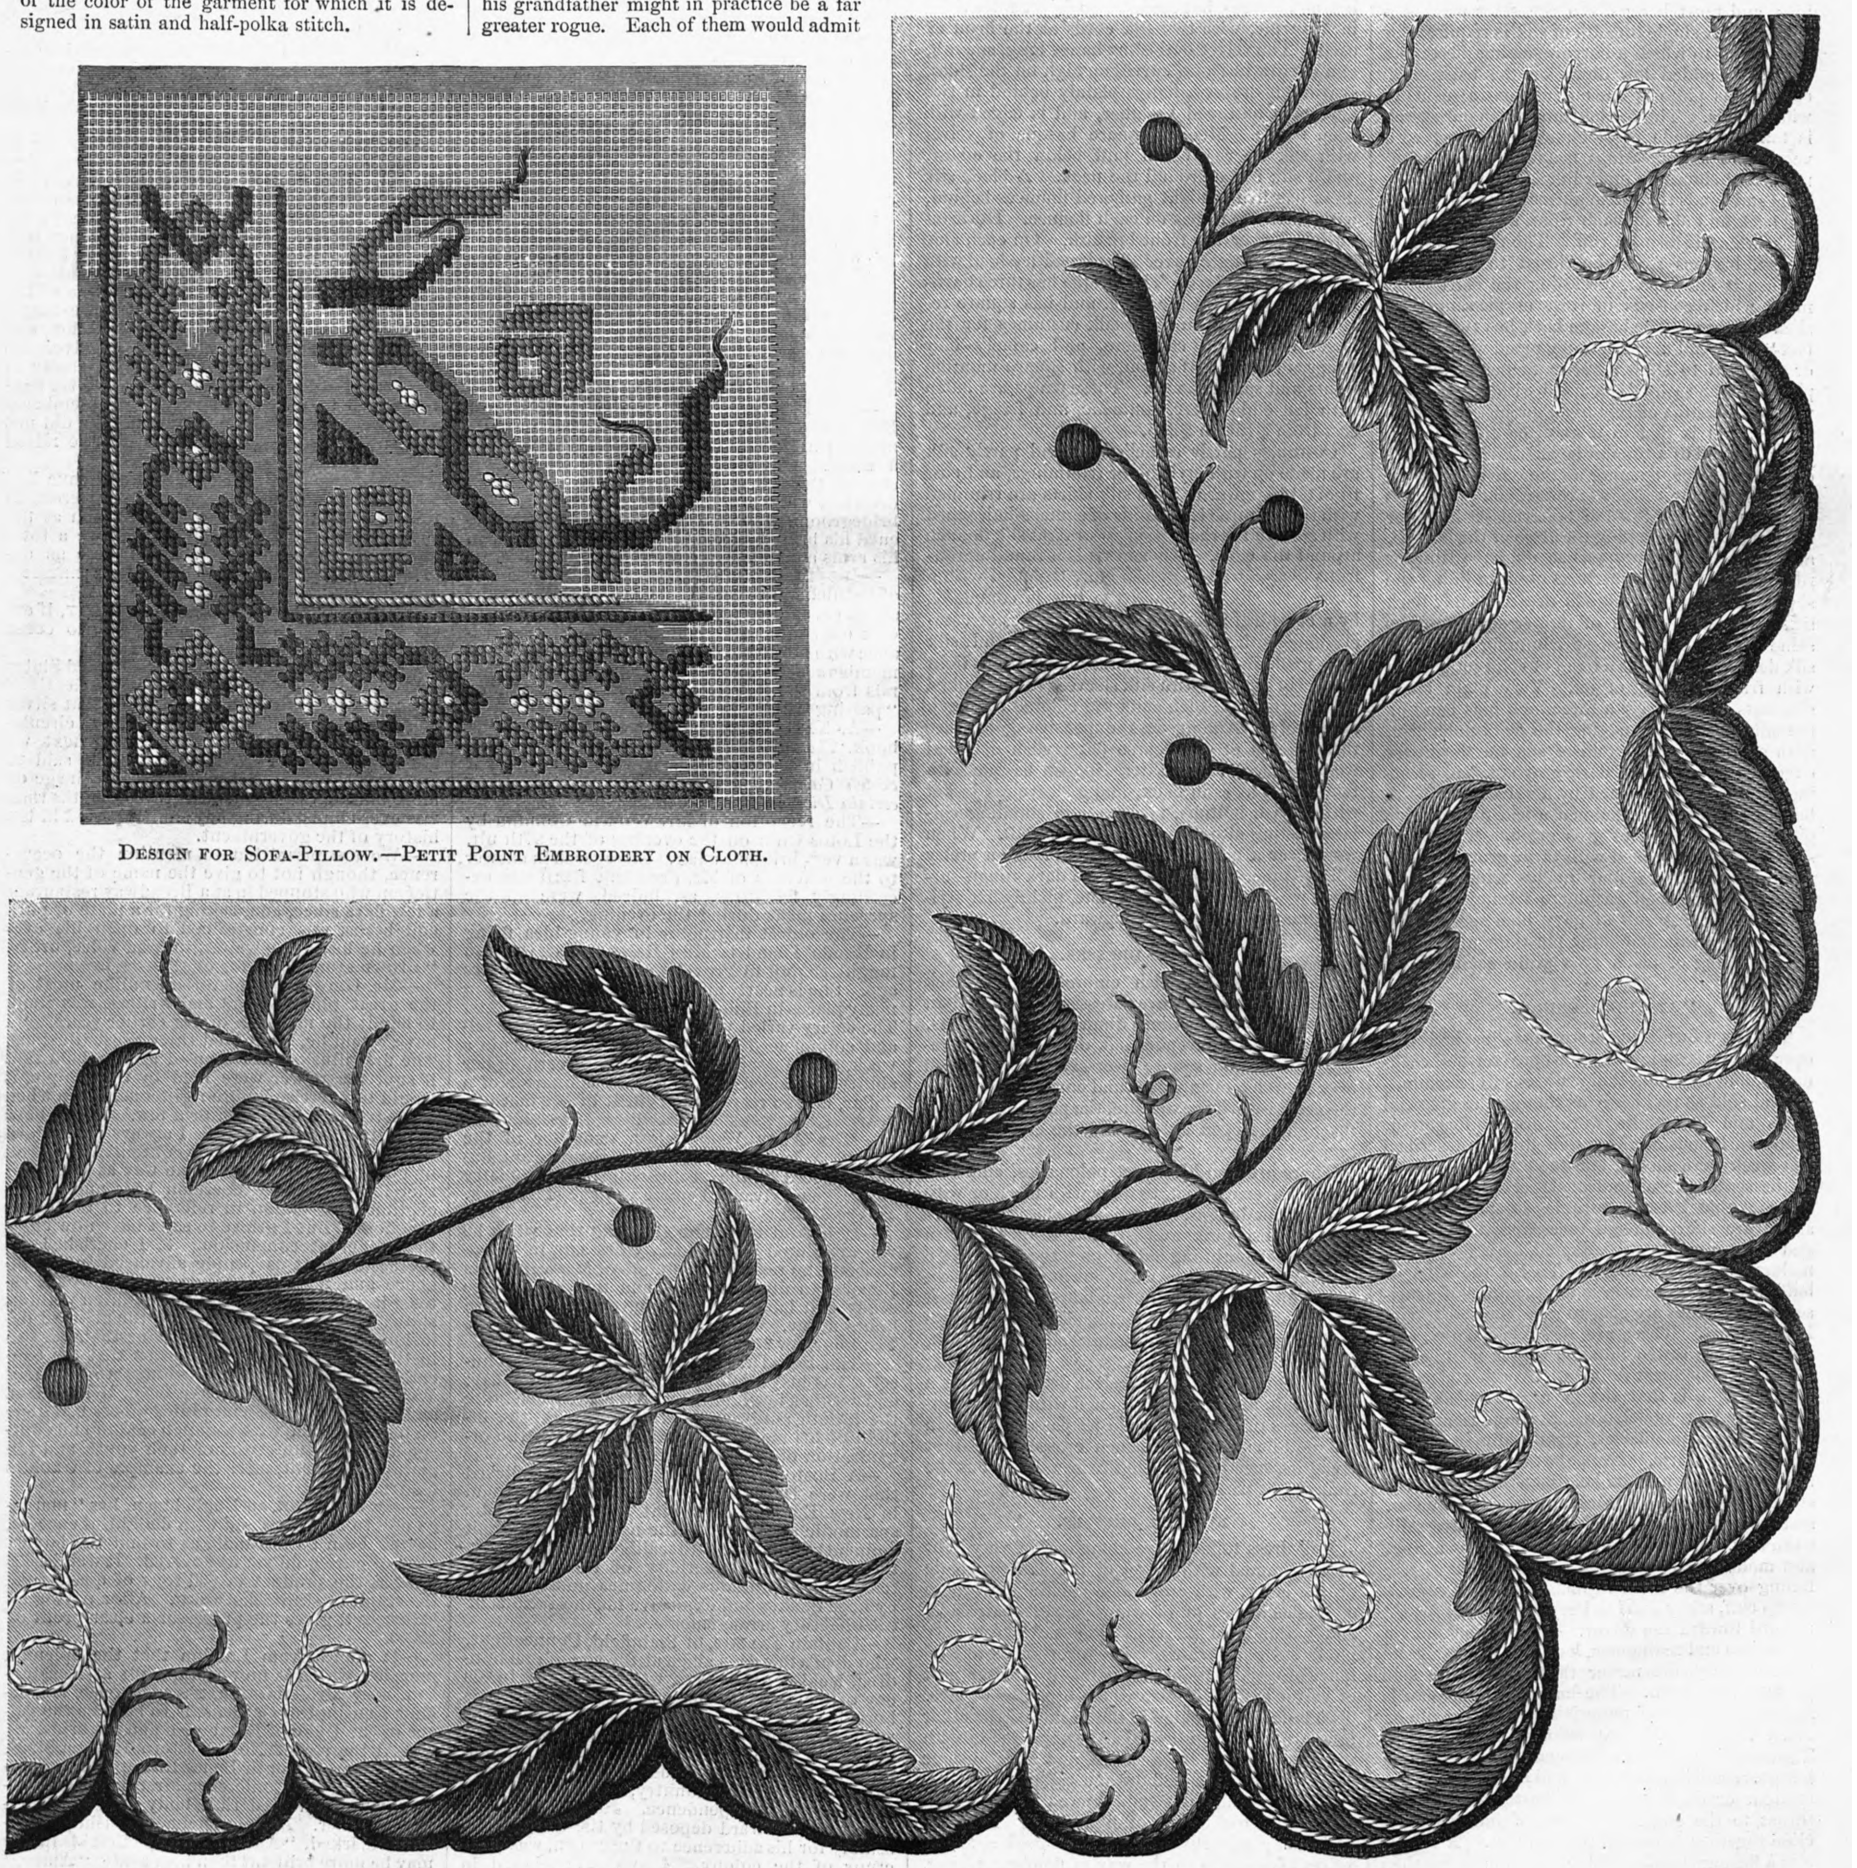
Border for Wrappings, Dresses, etc.

THIS border is designed for trimming dresses, wrappings, etc. It is worked with shaded silk of the color of the garment for which it is designed in satin and half-polka stitch.

COMMERCIAL MORALITY.

WHILE commerce has of late years extended with extraordinary rapidity, the development of a corresponding moral sense has by no means kept pace with it. A shop-keeper at the present day who should keep to the code of his grandfather might in practice be a far greater rogue. Each of them would admit in terms that cheating was wrong; and each of them would in secret put in a saving clause to the effect that to sin really consisted in cheating your next-door neighbor. But then the grandfather lived in a world of next-door neighbors. He was a member of a small society changing very slowly, each of whom had not only a lively interest in his neighbor's honesty, but had the power of constantly keeping an eye upon him. If a dairy-man adulterated his milk, he got a bad character within a little circle, beyond which he had no power of looking, and therefore he was pretty certain of suffering very rapidly for any offenses he might commit. If fate had put it in his power to cheat a man living at the antipodes, he would possibly have felt very little scruple about doing it; but then fate never did put it in his power. On the other hand, his grandson, inheriting the same moral views, has constant relations with the most distant parts of the world, and therefore constant opportunities of cheating people to whom he feels himself bound by no comprehensible tie. He speedily reconciles himself to conduct of which he would see the dishonesty and impolicy if its objects were brought nearer to him. Indeed, it may be said that in some sense the amount of commercial dishonesty is only a measure of the degree in which we can trust each other.

DESIGN FOR SOFA-PILLOW.—PETIT POINT EMBROIDERY ON CLOTH.



EMBROIDERED BORDER FOR WRAPPINGS, DRESSES, ETC.—SATIN AND HALF-POLKA STITCH.—FULL SIZE.

Hosted by Google

"THERE IS A YOUTH IN BRINTON DELL,
AND CLARA WINWOOD LOVES HIM WELL."

MARRIAGE MORN.

I.

'Tis May-time, and the marriage morn
Of Clara Winwood, who was born
In yonder cot
That seems to float upon the corn—
Fair May-time and her marriage morn;
Would it were not!
The bridegroom walks with happy stride;
But he has only won her pride.

II.

She tames her love and gives her hand
Because he is a lord of land,
And he can ride
Ten miles and say, "All this is mine;
And what is mine, my love, is thine."
And she can hide
Her soul, and, though her heart be cold,
Put on a smile to get his gold.

III.

There is a youth in Brinton Dell,
And Clara Winwood loves him well;
And he loves her
Unto the very core of truth—
With all the passion of his youth;
And would it were
That he could prove true love and health
Are far beyond the price of wealth!

IV.

Old women tread the church-yard grass
To see the bride and bridegroom pass;
And children play
Round grave-stones where their sisters sleep;
And older children know and weep,
And turn away.
The gossips stand beneath the trees,
And watch and wait in twos and threes.

V.

The belfry shakes, the warm air swells
With merry peals of bridal bells.
Alas, alas!
For Time will teach the bride by stealth
That love is richer far than wealth.
Alas, alas!
The bridegroom who can buy and sell
Shall meet the youth of Brinton Dell!

THROUGH FIRE AND WATER.

A Tale of City Life.

By FREDERICK TALBOT,

Author of "The Winning Hazard," "Jack Pugh's Legacy," etc., etc.

CHAPTER I.

"Oh, do but think
You stand upon the rivage, and behold
A city on th' inconstant billows dancing."

ON the Temple Pier—high water or thereabouts—the tide still hurrying strongly upward in mid-stream, but hanging lazily about the twirls and eddies by the shore; on the Temple Pier—time, Saturday, one hour past noon, and short of the ebb—stands a group of two or three persons apart from the crowd of river-farers who throng the floating platform.

It is a fine breezy day, and there is a rare spring-tide flooding in. Great masses of muddy, effervescing waters twist and roll, seethe and boil, and flash the foaming crests of their brown wavelets under the eye of the yellow-visaged sun; and hurrying upward, too, upon the breast of this impetuous tide, all the fleet of Thamesis share its throb and pulse.

The swart and noisy tug drags a long train of swinging barges at its tail; the high-piled hay-boat from the Medway drives crabwise on its course, as fast as wind and sail and rushing tide and massive sweep can carry it. Hoys and billy-boys are speeding on; gigs and wherries spin like tops upon their upward way. Steamers, too, gay with pennons, crowded with holiday-makers, dash onward on the crest of the grand tidal wave; and the big Gravesend boat, with the black and white diamond funnel, quite a sea-going craft among this crowd of egg-shells, paddles majestically to her moorings. Giving voice, too, with lively brazen tongue, to all this stir and movement, the band of the Royal Middlesex Rifles peals forth a gallant march; and on the deck of the steamer Citizen K, now lying alongside the pier, are all the members and friends of the Daily Mentor Rowing Club; for this is the great fête-day of the club, and they are all for Putney bound, with favoring wind and tide; and there shall be many races rowed in skiff and gig, in tiny wager-boats and sharp, long-reaching "eight."

The group I mentioned just now consists of a man and woman, respectable people no doubt, but with nothing remarkable about them, and a girl, evidently their daughter. She is remarkable because she is beautiful. The pure and classical contour of her face, her wealth of golden hair, her eyes of steadfast cerulean blue, her firm but ripe and dewy lips, her clear-cut chin, her figure, rounded, shapely, noble, would mark her any where as beautiful.

"Come now, if you're going," cried one of the pier-men, preparing to cast off the gangway.

"Come along, Patty; we can't lose our trip along of your young man," cried the respectable-looking man.

"Oh, one half minute, father; one half minute!" There were distress, disappointment, disenchantment, in the girl's face as she turned away to the boat; and then, all of a sudden, it lightened up into a glow ineffable; her lips parted, her white teeth shone out, her eyes, strained and stretched with watching, rounded with full glowing orbs. This mood, however, lasted for a moment only; and in the next she was the shy, coy maiden, and followed her parents obediently across the narrow gangway into the boat. But it was evident that he had come.

This little scene was watched with much interest and some amusement by a middle-aged man, who wore a light alpaca overcoat and straw-colored gloves—a man with a face good-humored if somewhat coarse, keen and intelligent eyes, mouth mobile but sensual, and light flowing beard and mustache. He was evidently an important man with the Daily Mentor's boat. The master of the steamer touched his hat to him; the printer's devils—redeemed and cleansed—who formed a little knot by the prow of the boat, nudged each other and whispered, "That's Mr. Bilfil." For Mr. Bilfil was a part proprietor of the Daily Mentor, and a great man in many ways.

But Mr. Bilfil frowned a little when he saw a good-looking youth spring from the pier, and, lightly leaping over the side-rails, place himself beside beautiful Patty.

"Oh, we'd quite given you up, Mr. Hulse," said the young lady, in the most indifferent tone she could assume.

"I'm late, am I not? but I couldn't help it. The chief nailed me just as I was starting, and kept me jawing with him for ten minutes. I've had such a run. I'm afraid something will go crack, I'm palpitating so."

"You 'aven't got any thing the matter with your 'art, I hope, Mr. 'Ulse?" said Robinson—he was a compositor in the Daily Mentor office—looking round and winking.

Patty tossed her head. It was not in this way such subjects should be approached.

Edward Hulse was a young man of two or three and twenty years, who had served his articles with Messrs. Paston and Brett, solicitors, the former being his uncle, and was now employed by them at a salary as a clerk. His father was old Fleetwood Hulse, the agent of the South of England Drain-pipe and Tile Company, a man who had seen better—that is, more prosperous—days. Edward lived with his father and mother and his sister Lucy in a house by the river-side, belonging to the Drain-pipe Company, lying close to their wharf—the Ebbsfleet wharf and warehouse. He was decidedly superior in social status to the Robinsons. Both they and he felt it, and were uncomfortable in consequence. Patty, by herself, was glorious, delightful; but Patty, with papa and mamma in company, was still beautiful, still charming, but—well, a little flat.

Edward knew that he was doing a very foolish thing in the estimation of all his sensible friends. He had made Patty's acquaintance in an unorthodox way, helping her over a crossing one day in the City; and fascinated by her beauty, he had improved his opportunities, and there was no doubt—Patty had no doubt—that he was very much in love with her. But each had felt it to be a crucial test when she invited him to join them on this excursion up the river. To appear as Patty's lover before her father and mother was quite a different thing from those delightful surreptitious walks, when he would lie in wait for her as she returned to her home in Trinity Square, and would take one or two delightful turns with her round the Tower Gardens. There, was mystery, romance; here, plain prosaic matter of fact. It was a serious thing, this trip on the river, to Master Edward. It meant making up his mind; it meant being asked as to his "intentions;" it meant making a plunge downward in the social scale; it meant owning for beaux-parents a somewhat vulgar printer and his wife, who let lodgings in Trinity Square, Tower Hill. Now he was a prudent youth, and very much of a Philistine, and was in the habit of looking ahead; and he didn't like all this. But he was fascinated and inthralled by Patty, and he could do no less.

Nevertheless, when Robinson père asked him about his "'art," he shuddered.

But Patty was a girl of tact and nerve, and was quite alive to the difficulties of the position. She neatly brought her father into contact with Parkins, who always engaged him in a political discussion, and, after placing her mamma in a comfortable seat near the boiler, led her lover to the fore part of the boat.

"Let us go into the stern, Patty; there is no-

"OH, JOHN, HOW YOU FRIGHTENED ME!"

Hosted by Google

body there, and we can have a capital talk there. I hate being in a crowd."

Now, although there was not any regulation on the subject, yet it was well understood that the after part of the boat was reserved for the proprietors of the Daily Mentor, their friends, and any of the superior staff who might care to join the party. Consequently Patty hesitated when Edward asked her to go aft with him.

"I don't think it would be liked," she said; "I don't think we have any business there."

A quick look of impatience crossed Edward's face. Again he knew himself in a false position, again felt the gall of social prejudice.

"You won't mind staying with me a little while," said Patty, looking at him meekly. "When we get to Putney you can go ashore and see your fine friends, and leave poor me to myself."

"I'll stay with you any where, always," whispered Edward, fervently, in her ear, ashamed of himself for his short fit of ill temper. But his equanimity was more sorely tried when, shortly afterward, the burly Mr. Bilfil pushed his way to where they were standing.

"Why, Patty," he said, "you're getting prettier and prettier every day."

Patty was pleased with the notice and flattery of Mr. Bilfil. He was to her a prince, the great man of her little world.

"And you've got your sweetheart too, I see. Silly girl, silly girl! if you only knew when you are well off!"

Edward grew hot and furious, and yet didn't know how to resent this tone of superiority. Heroics were out of place; still, to be sat upon by this fat, straw-colored man was unendurable. Just then they touched Waterloo Pier.

"Has the George Peabody gone up?" shouted a man who had just rushed on to the pier.

"Ain't seen 'im; I'd a 'ooked 'im if I 'ad," cried one of the pier-men, who was prodding with his boat-hook at a bundle of brown paper which was circling in an eddy at the pier-side.

"Yes, she's gone," shouted another.

"They shouldn't call boats by masculine names," remarked Mr. Bilfil; "one gets confused in one's genders. Hullo, Markwood, what brings you here?—you ain't a Mentor man?"

Markwood was the man who had been inquiring for the George Peabody, and who, finding he, or she, had passed, had leaped on board Citizen K, the Mentor boat.

"No, captain," cried Markwood, "I've got a little bit of respectability left about me, thank goodness; but I don't mind being seen in your company as far as Putney. I want to see a youngster of mine pull in the London eight.—Hullo, Ned," he said, "you here!"

Markwood was a man whom every body liked. He was a confidential clerk to Messrs. Paston and Brett, and knew as much of law as a Thames waterman, but he was up to every thing else. Did you want a bull-pup or a seat in Parliament, Markwood would introduce you to the man who would provide you with either. He knew all about the crews for the next boat-race, could tell you their weights to an ounce, their styles and capabilities. He would put you on to a good outsider for the Derby; he could tell you about the picture M. was painting, or the book that N. was writing. Always doing a good turn for somebody, he had always time to do another good turn for somebody else. A genial companion over pipes and grog, a tender, capable friend by a sick-bed, there was no one who had known John Markwood who hadn't felt the better for him, who didn't keep a kindly memory of him in his heart. Ned Hulse had been a great pet of his; and when he saw him philandering with a pretty girl, an honest girl too, though not of his own standing, he looked grave and pained. He called Edward to one side, and they thus left Patty under the care of Mr. Bilfil.

"Look here, Ned," he whispered; "is that a girl you could introduce to your sister Lucy—as your future wife? Tell me yes honestly, and I've not another word to say except wishing you well."

"But it isn't a question of future wife," said Ned, pettishly.

"Then it ought to be. You can't go about with a girl like that without compromising yourself and her. You ain't a swell, you know, Ned, who can flare away making fools of any body you please; and if you were such a d——d rogue," said Markwood, "by Jupiter, I'd disown you!"

"Do you think," muttered Edward, "that I'd do any wrong to the girl? There, look at her, Markwood; isn't she a dear creature?"

She had turned round to look after her truant lover; she had tired of Bilfil, his persiflage, his wit; she had cut short some of his innuendoes, but she couldn't quarrel with the man—he was her father's master. So she looked imploringly round to Edward, and he couldn't choose but answer the summons.

Markwood's face puckered up into wrinkles, and then he smiled through his eyes.

"The old story," he said to himself. "They will do it."

CHAPTER II.

"Why, give him gold enough, and marry him to a puppet."

THE late Gilbert Paston, of Brimover Gardens, Kensington, formerly of Ebbsfleet, City, and 675 Borough, merchant and general contractor, was the son of a Kentish grazier holding large tracts of land in Romney Marsh, who added to his profits by dealing in corn and hops. This grazier had three sons, of whom Gilbert was the second born. The eldest succeeded to the land; the youngest, Tom, was placed with a solicitor in Canterbury, whence in due time he migrated to London, and founded the respectable firm of Paston and Brett. Gilbert took to the corn-and-hop trade. An unacknowledged but lucrative branch of this business was smuggling. Nearly all the inhabitants of Romney Marsh were at that time more or less engaged in the contraband trade. Gilbert thus acquired early an initiation into all the secrets of that dangerous traffic; and when he afterward increased his ventures, and took a warehouse in the Borough and another in Lower Bridge Street, and became a prosperous London merchant, there were not wanting ill-natured people who said that Paston still retained a considerable interest in "free trade." Gilbert, however, knew well that in such matters boldness was the true prudence. A few years of successful ventures, carried on with all the resources of capital and intimate knowledge of the forces opposed to him, gave him a considerable fortune, with which he wisely retired, and devoted the rest of his life to securing and increasing his hoard by judicious investments. He was a penurious man, who lived, nevertheless, in a good house and kept good company. He was always ready with a liberal donation for a church or a school, and his name was on the committees of management of most of the hospitals and charities of London. On his relatives he never spent a copper. His eldest brother, who had lived a profuse life as a man enjoying a safe and sufficient income, had been ruined by free trade, or possibly free living, and a fall in prices. A small fund was raised to support him; Gilbert would not contribute a penny. Later on, however, when his brother died, and left a daughter, Margaret, completely unprovided for, Gilbert so far broke through his principles as to take her into his home as housekeeper. As she received no wages, however, and earned her clothes by giving morning lessons in music in the neighborhood, the arrangement was not an unprofitable one for Gilbert. Still he grudged her small expenses of living, and was terrified at the thought that he would have to provide for her at his death.

In Gilbert Paston that peculiar outcome of the love of life which urges men to perpetuate their names in the most lasting way their wits can devise, so that they may not altogether die out, but still leave their dead hands outstretched over the living world, had become paramount. This not unnatural desire had so strongly ingrained itself into his nature that he looked upon any expenditure which detracted from his darling schemes as so much waste. He was determined that he would live to future ages as Gilbert Paston the philanthropist. By a strange sarcasm of Fate he has alone been remembered as Paston the miser.

Gilbert Paston's house in Kensington was the not infrequent resort of literary men and artists. He had some capital specimens of the Dutch masters. He would buy a picture, too, of the modern school, if he saw good value for his money. He had acquired a sufficient technical knowledge of pictures. He was a shrewd, hard-headed thinker and good talker. To smoke for an hour with old Paston, who at any time after seven o'clock might be found in his library, sitting bolt-upright in a straight-backed chair, smoking a long clay, and sipping weak Schiedam-and-water, was a recognized custom with many littérateurs and artists. After Margaret came the practice increased. Margaret was undeniably good-looking, had an instinctive dramatic talent, while her early bringing up had imbued her with ideas refreshingly naïve and original.

There was a square leaden tank on a slab in one corner of the room which was always full of excellent Knaster tobacco; beside it was a square fat bottle of hollands; and Gilbert Paston still kept up sufficient communication with his old Dutch correspondents to insure the excellence of these two commodities. The tobacco and hollands were free to all comers, but no farther hospitality was ever known to be offered to the guest of Gilbert Paston.

Bilfil, a man well known both to city and newspaper people, was often a visitor at Paston's, and after a time declared himself as Margaret's suitor. He was the confidential adviser of the great discounting firm of Grindrod and Gordon. He was also connected with the Daily Mentor, started to represent the interests of commerce, which the great firm had supported by a considerable loan.

Margaret had already had love passages with her cousin, Edward Hulse. But she cast him off without remorse when a serious suitor presented himself.

To Margaret the position she held was so irksome that she was ready to turn a favorable ear to any proposals which would relieve her from it. She didn't stop to consider that in every depth there is still a lower one; that to a young and handsome woman there is a vast balance of hope under the most unfavorable circumstances. She snatched at the first opportunity of escape from her uncle's protection. A union contracted with little feeling on either side, and little knowledge of mutual character, could only accidentally be a happy one. The lucky accident did not occur. Margaret was forced to own that, of all bitter bread of dependence, that received from a husband who is indifferent and unkind is the sourest and bitterest crust of all.

Had things turned out as Bilfil intended they should, their married life would have been much more prosperous. He had not ventured on this step without endeavoring to ascertain Paston's views with regard to his niece. And here his own acuteness had deceived him.

"What I have, Mr. Bilfil," Gilbert told him, "I sha'n't part with till I die, but Margaret will have all the money I have to leave among my relations. But don't you build on that; don't sit waiting for my shoes. You and Margaret start in a quiet way; where there's room for one, there's room for two. I sha'n't forget you, depend on it."

But Bilfil had farther grounds for his assurance that Margaret would inherit a considerable portion of her uncle's property. He had called one day on Paston, and had found him closeted with his lawyer; and sitting down to wait till he was disengaged, he saw in Paston's bold characters, written on a scrap of paper:

MEMORANDA FOR THE DISPOSITION OF MY PERSONALTY.

Margaret to have £150,000,
Thomas " 20,000,
Guy " 5,000.

On that hint he spoke. He had been doubtful before; now his course was clear. Gilbert's health was failing; his life could not be a long one. How altered would be Margaret's position if Paston should chance to die before she were firmly bound to him, Bilfil.

They were married quietly, and Bilfil took lodgings for his bride in South Kensington, that she might be near her uncle. Gilbert did not long survive. One day, while he was at the Drain-pipe Company's office—he had a considerable interest in that concern, which had taken a lease of his old warehouse—while he was looking through the books of the company, he had a paralytic seizure, and was carried home insensible. From that time he never recovered the full use of his faculties. He tried hard to speak, but could only give forth strange, uncouth sounds. As life ebbed away he recovered for a while the partial use of one of his hands, and contrived to scrawl upon a slate—Ebbsfleet.

Nothing more. Nobody knew what he meant; and in trouble and anxiety, and unavailing efforts to make himself understood, the rich man passed away. When his will was read it was found that, with the exception of a legacy of five hundred pounds to his niece Margaret, and a hundred to his old servant Mary, all his property was bequeathed to charities, principal among which was St. Margaret's Home for Incurable Idiots, which received £150,000.

Among the disappointed expectants of the old man's bequests, few, after Bilfil, felt their loss more keenly than Fleetwood Hulse, the manager of the Drain-pipe Company. He had married Paston's half-sister; and although there was no friendship between the men, yet Gilbert had obtained for him the appointment he held, and he had always expected that at least the interest which Paston possessed in the company would be left to him. He had for years counted upon these shares as practically his own. His position in the company's service had been favorably affected by the probability that he would eventually become one of its chief proprietors. Bitter was his disappointment, sad the fruits of his unfounded expectations.

CHAPTER III.

"Come on; in this there can be no dismay—
My ships come home a month before the day."

THE old house by the river-side, which was the official residence of the manager of the South of England Drain-pipe and Tile Company—henceforth to be cited for all purposes, as the acts of Parliament say, as the Drain-pipe Company—although not adapted for fashionable entertainments, was still a snug and comfortable residence. The ground-floor was occupied by the offices of the company, and therefore the dining-room took the place of the old drawing-room; so that it was a custom when you dined with the Hulses for the male portion of the guests to retire instead of the ladies, and to betake themselves to a little room higher up, where tobacco was freely smoked. Or on fine summer evenings they would perhaps adjourn to the old warehouse, where a wooden balcony projected over the river some twenty feet above the water at high tide. The Hulses dined always at six, and in a very comfortable way. A bell would be rung half an hour before dinner—a bell which sounded in the yard of the warehouse, and was incidentally useful to the carters and wagoners as reminding them of the approach of the time for knocking off work. Mr. Hulse was somewhat of a tyrant in his own house. If by six o'clock prompt the whole of his guests had not assembled, there would be black looks on his part till the cloth was removed. When, therefore, as on the present occasion, Edward had not returned by the time the dressing-bell rung, his mother and sister were always nervously anxious lest he should be late for dinner. He had been late several times within the last few weeks without being able to give a satisfactory account of himself, and there had been hot words in consequence.

Lucy Hulse, a girl as fair and white as a snow-drop, whose clear marble shoulders shone all the clearer and whiter for the contrast of a low black silk dress trimmed with violet—Lucy was standing at the window which looked out into the quiet street. The street was wonderfully quiet, considering that it was in the very heart of the City, and that close by pulsated one of the great arteries of English life. A rumbling dray now and again woke the echoes. Sometimes a random cab bound for some sea-going steamer rattled by, but otherwise no sound broke the stillness.

Lucy Hulse had been reared up within hearing of Bow-bells, in as much quietude and seclusion as a maiden of the remotest country village. Once a year, indeed, she would go to see her aunt, a spinster who lived in lodgings in a little hamlet in Wiltshire, surrounded by great chalk deserts—deserts fruitful, indeed, of swedes and oats, but barren of mankind. Here, in a little thatched cottage covered with clematis and honeysuckle, would Lucy endure her annual penitential "change of air." Sometimes, but very rarely of late, her brother Edward would take her from the "Old Swan" Pier up or down the river, but for these excursions she didn't care much. She shrank from the loud noise of a crowd, and was always glad to return to the quiet shades of Lower Bridge Street. She had a wonderful garden there upon the leads looking over the yard, a dove-cote hard by, and chickens down in a little house penned off from the stable. These last were white Dorkings, and she was very proud of her massive-toed pets, who picked and pecked among the pipes and tiles, and came in for many a stray handful of oats from the carters. Up to the last year or two Edward had kept rabbits in the yard, but he had given that up since he had passed his examination and become a full-fledged solicitor, and the only survivor of the flock was a beautiful white doe, which ambled about the yard, and popped in and out of the drain-pipes as she willed.

Lucy Hulse was a regular and devout attendant at the quiet City church of St. Saveall's, where she had an aisle all to herself, and did most of the responses. Fleetwood Hulse rarely went out. Sometimes he would go and see his friend Simball, the clerk of the Fishmeters' Company; but for the most part, when not in his office, he would spend long hours reclining in his easy-chair, with his yellow bandanna over his face, possibly thinking of the better days, either past or to come. He was always kind to Lucy, who loved him very much; but he was a stern disciplinarian with his son, who, nevertheless, had a great respect and affection for the "governor."

Lucy Hulse, her head laid close against the window, was looking sideways up the street, hoping every moment to see her brother. Her father came in and cast a critical glance at the dinner-table, busying himself in decanting some wine.

"Has Edward come in?"

"No, papa; but he won't be long, I think."

"Long indeed! It was only yesterday I told him I would have him in the house before the bell rung. He shall have no dinner at my table."

"Papa, perhaps he's detained on business."

"Fiddle-sticks! With proper arrangement no man need be late for dinner, business or no business. Did you ever know me late for dinner?"

"But it's different with you, papa; and you know Edward is very good."

"Good! he's no more manners than a pig. I'm ashamed of him for a son of mine; yes, I am, Lucy, ashamed! He shall dine in the kitchen if he's not home before the clock strikes the quarter; yes, I say he shall!"

Hulse went off mumbling and grumbling. Lucy renewed her watch, pressing her head closer and closer against the pane the faster the moments flew. At last the big old clock in the yard gave a sort of premonitory choke, as a signal he meant striking.

"Oh!" said Lucy, with a cry of vexation.

"Boh!" said a voice behind, the owner of which caught her in his arms as she started back.

"Oh, John, how you frightened me!"

"Then I'll give you a kiss to re-assure you. By Jove, how nice you look! that dress suits you wonderfully, Lucy."

John was a dark thickset man, with a square good-humored face, bright eyes deeply set, black crisply curling hair. You would have known him as a clergyman by his garb, as a Welshman by his accent, and as Lucy's lover probably by his way of going on.

He was, indeed, the curate of St. Saveall's Church—the curate in charge. He was the son of Archdeacon Jones, of Pumptrisaint, of a younger branch of the Joneses of Tyglas, which branch is supposed to be of the very best and most recherché blood of all the Joneses.

Till nineteen Lucy Hulse had lived on her life without a lover, if you except the office-boy for the time, who was changed so often that he hadn't any time to make an impression upon her heart. She knew that men existed, for she saw them in the streets and on the tops of omnibuses. Otherwise she was as ignorant of the world of mankind as Miranda on her father's solitary and enchanted island.

Then in the most surprising manner this lover, this hero, this demi-god, appeared upon the scene. He had made a pastoral call, having found out from the verger the address of the fair young girl who attended so regularly on his ministrations. He had come again and again, and at last had proposed to marry Lucy, and she had with much trepidation consented, so that he was now on the familiar footing of a lover. And thus it was that, finding herself in his arms, Lucy did not scream or faint, but accepted his warm salute with as little demur as could be expected from so pure and sweet a maid.

Every body thought that Lucy was a very lucky girl to have secured such an eligible sweetheart, for the man was of good connections and prospects. The living of Pumptrisaint, worth a good five hundred a year, with only fifty parishioners, and one of the best trout streams in Wales in its bounds, was in his godfather's gift, and the present incumbent was eighty-five years old.

"Ned not home yet? Oh, what a shocking fellow! Who's coming to-night?"

"Only old Mr. Simball, and Mr. Evan Pugh, of the United Bank."

"What, is Evan coming? Dear, I'm glad of that."

"Yes, only, John—"

"Well?"

"You're not to talk Welsh. Poor Mr. Simball nearly had a fit that day you burst out with all that Welsh. 'Vocal fire-works,' he called it afterward."

"Fire-works, indeed!" said John. "He'd better not let Evan hear him."

"Is Evan so very formidable, then?"

"I should think so; he comes of a fighting family, does Evan. As a rule we are wonderfully peaceable folks, but here and there you meet with a fighting family, and the Pughs of Tredol were always famous for it."

"But he wouldn't hurt poor old Simball, that meek quiet old man?"

"No. Not him, but his son perhaps, or his nephew, eh? Evan would never rest till he'd found out somebody belonging to him who could fight, and then he'd go into him. But he's one of the best-hearted fellows under the sun, is Evan Pugh; yes, indeed."

Hosted by Google

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

LOST HOURS.

I WEEN the vigil that I keep
Is a sad and a solemn thing,
Where the chill October breezes sweep,
And the ferns lie withering.
For I pass the years in long review,
The years I have trifled past,
The years when life was bright and new:
Ah, what have they brought at last?
And I cry, as I look at my drooping flowers,
My baffled hopes, and my failing powers,
"Oh, my lost, lost hours!"

What a harvest might have been garnered in,
When the golden grain was wasted!
What a nectar of life it was mine to win,
When the draught was barely tasted!
What happy memories might have shone,
Had folly never stained them!
What noble heights to rest upon,
If a steadier foot had gained them!
And I cry, as I sit 'mid my faded flowers,
"Rashness and weakness have fatal dowers.
Oh, my lost, lost hours!"

Too late for battle, too late for fame,
Comes the vision of better life;
With eyes that are smarting with tears of shame
I gaze at the world's hot strife.
The patient love can not pardon now,
Or the proud believing cheer;
Where the white cross gleams and the violets grow
Lie the loved that made life so dear.
Kind Nature renews her perished flowers,
But Death knows nothing of sun or showers.
"Oh, my lost, lost hours!"

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

The Queen forgotten!—Identification extraordinary!—The Lion and the Sword.

ONE of the most amusing incidents that have ever gladdened "the best circles" has just occurred in the Highlands (where, as a general rule, funny things do not occur), and has been received in this almost depopulated metropolis with little short of rapture. Imagine a huge club-house, its furniture covered with brown holland, its walls draped with brown paper, the echoes of a few footsteps making its emptiness indescribably dreary; half a dozen men compelled to be in town on business (one poor devil collecting "gossip" for the United States). dining in the only chamber not filled by plasterers and decorators, and adjoining a smoking-room one-half of which is a lumber-room—imagine, I say, to men under such circumstances a really good story making its way. A party of shipwrecked starving mariners happening on a turtle is the only thing that can be likened to it. Well, into this smoking-room enters one newly arrived from the North, "in the garb of old Gaul," bonnet, fillibeg, and sporran complete. "So glad to see you, old fellow! you are the first swallow whose return proclaims the winter."

"Not a bit of it; I am going back to-morrow morning by the limited mail to the moors. Only I thought I'd just look in to see whether any of you were here, and because I've got something worth hearing to tell you!"

A few quavering cheers here attested our gratitude and small numbers.

"You all know Macpherson, by name at all events; once a page at court, and a great favorite with her Majesty; then in the Guards, where he didn't do quite so well; afterward of nowhere in particular. In point of fact, he has been obliged to live in Scotland for the last ten years; drinks whisky in the daytime, and lots of it. Well, Lord Dunronald asked him to his castle the other day, when the Queen came to see the falls, and lunch. In the afternoon she came out of the pavilion and walked about a bit among the company. Macpherson was standing alone, a little 'fou' with his mid-day dram, and up she came to him. 'It is many years since I saw you, Sir, but I never forget old friends. How are you, Mr. Macpherson?'

"'Madam,' said he, holding out his hand, which she took most graciously, 'you are very good. I remember your face quite well—but—I'm very sorry—but if you were to give me a thousand pounds I can't recollect your name.'"

Some people in this country flatter themselves that all the "horrors" come from your side of the Atlantic. All the horrid fights, and all the wicked murders, and all the railway smashes, and all the gigantic frauds. This is, however, a delusion. The great excitement in London at present is still the discovery of new fragments of that unhappy woman whom some wretch has murdered, cut up, and thrown into the Thames. Every species of suggestion has been exhausted—one Irish gentleman of our acquaintance thinks it may have been a case of very determined suicide—as to the crime and its perpetrator, and up to yesterday we had come no nearer to the truth than when that dreadful face was first found, skinned, so as to prevent recognition. To-day, however, a clew appears to be discovered: such of the limbs, etc., as have been picked up have been carefully sewed together, and from certain marks upon it the body is said to have been identified by three persons. If this be so, and the murderer should be tracked, it will be the most extraordinary exemplification of the proverb "Murder will out" that our criminal annals have as yet afforded. Because upward of thirty persons have applied to see the remains upon the ground that they have missing relatives answering to the published description, it is generally remarked that undiscovered murders must be much more common than is supposed. It must be remembered, however, that a morbid curiosity is always developed in such cases, and it is as likely as not that all these applications are mere false devices to gratify it. Nay, the very brutality of the mode of procedure in this murder evidences the immense difficulty of disposing of a human body in a town. As in the poem of Eugene Aram, neither earth nor water will keep the secret, and fire tells it at once, though not to the ear. A favorite cat once died in our house, and remained in it much longer than we wanted it to do through sheer impossibility of disposing of its remains. To throw it into the street was (very properly) to incur a heavy fine; the dust-cart man was forbidden to receive it; the police would not take charge of it; we had nowhere to bury it except by pulling up the kitchen floor; and to burn it was to create a public nuisance. In the end we put it into a sack, and gave a boy a dollar to throw it into the canal. He was seen to do it by a watchman and taken up as a murderer, and the canal was dragged for the corpse. Altogether, what with law expenses, drags, and the fines for spoiling the canal, the burial of that cat cost me a hundred dollars. How, then, can a person of limited means ever get rid of a human body? If the identifiers in the present case are found to be mistaken, the sewed-together fragments are to be photographed and published. You may depend on getting a photo.

There are other sensational excitements to be experienced even in these days, which, rather significantly, by-the-bye, are called "the dead season." A lady of my acquaintance, who lives opposite Mrs. Dickens (the novelist's widow), was busy among the plants in her balcony the other morning very early, when suddenly she heard a terrible explosion, and a sheet of flame, along with one of Mrs. Dickens's parlor-maids, burst out of the opposite window. The next moment the front-door blew out, and then the pyrotechnic display was over. The poor maid, who had just come (and very much) from the country, had, it appears, blown out the gas upon the previous evening, and in revenge, when she came to light the fire in the morning, the gas blew her out, as described above. She is, I am glad to say, likely to recover, in spite of very serious injuries. But imagine the alarm of Mrs. Dickens and the folks above stairs!

The Shah has gone back to his own place at last, where, it is to be hoped, he will remain; but his latest act before leaving Europe was very characteristic. He bestowed his famous order of the Lion and Sword, for which all the great politicians have been diplomatizing, and for the most part in vain—their shoulders being judged unequal for so tremendous an honor—upon a conjurer at Constantinople.

I told you from the first of what sort this little despot was—self-willed, childish, and utterly contemptible, save when cruelty made him loathsome; but the great world would have it that he had large ideas, and had come to Europe to improve his mind. His French jargon being almost unintelligible, and even he himself being aware of it, he was generally silent, and that, forsooth, was taken as proof of his sagacity: "he thought the more;" he was gauging the mental powers of all our politicians and philosophers while regarding them with those cold lack-lustre eyes of his. The great Coleridge, if you remember, had the same opinion of some bucolic personage at table, who listened to his eloquence with dumb appreciation until some apple-dumplings were placed before him, when he exclaimed, with rapture, "Ah, them's the jockeys for me!" Street conjurers are evidently the "jockeys" for his Majesty of Persia, and our European politicians have shown themselves "no conjurers" in not having discovered the fact.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

CURIOSITIES OF LUNACY.

THERE are cases where blows on the head have benefited the brain, and produced extraordinary changes for the better. Mabillon was almost an idiot till, at the age of twenty-six, he fell down a stone staircase, fractured his skull, and was trepanned. From that moment he became a genius. Doctor Prichard mentions a case of three brothers who were all nearly idiots. One of them was injured on the head, and from that time he brightened up, and is now a successful barrister. Wallenstein, too, they say, was a mere fool till he fell out of a window, and awoke with enlarged capabilities. A patient in an asylum was the victim of many delusions. He was paying off the national debt, going into partnership with Baron Rothschild, and forming a lodge of female Freemasons. One day an epileptic patient, irritated at being perpetually asked to buy imaginary shares, gave him a tremendous blow on the bridge of the nose. From that time he improved rapidly, and acknowledged that the blow had had a sobering effect, and had quite knocked the nonsense out of him.

There is no doubt that this was the secret of that cruel old remedy for madness, the circulating swing, mentioned favorably by physicians of the last century. This horrible swing was a small box fixed upon a pivot, and worked by a windlass. The "inflexible" maniac, or the maniac expecting a paroxysm, was firmly strapped in a sitting or recumbent posture. The box was then whirled round at the average velocity of a hundred revolutions a minute, and its beneficial effect was supposed to be heightened by reversing the motion every six or eight minutes, and by stopping it occasionally with a sudden jerk. The results of this swing (which occasionally brought on concussion of the brain) were profound and protracted sleep, intense perspiration, mental exhaustion, and a not unnatural horror of any recurrence to the same remedy, which left a moral impression that acted as a permanent restraint. That the results were often beneficial we have indisputable evidence.

The cases of suspended consciousness after brain injury are well worthy attention. A man who awakes out of sleep is conscious of a lapse of time, and can generally even guess its duration; but the man struck on the brain is often unconscious of any lapse. A man was struck in the street, and was afterward delirious. He was unconscious after the blow for fourteen days. He was then delirious and maniacal for ten weeks. When he became more tranquil they brought him to the asylum in a strait-waistcoat. He soon recovered, but when he became conscious he had clean forgotten the fourteen days' trance, and the ten weeks' delirium and mania. At the battle of the Nile an English captain was struck on the head by a shot, and became unconscious. He was taken home with the wounded, and remained in Greenwich Hospital fifteen months deprived of sense and speech. At the end of that period an operation was performed, and the brain relieved from the pressure. He instantly rose from his bed, and continued the orders to the sailors which had been so abruptly interrupted fifteen months before. Dr. Abercrombie gives an analogous case. A lady was struck with apoplexy while sitting at the whist-table. It was Thursday evening when she fell, and she lay in a stupor all Friday and Saturday. On Sunday she suddenly recovered her consciousness; and her first words were, "What are trumps?" The clock-work had stopped at that point, and now the pendulum again commenced to swing.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

HAPPY they whose usual summer flitting from the city was postponed until "autumn's hues had tinged the golden grain!" It may be a blessing to escape midsummer heats intensified by brick walls and stone pavements, and lounge away the sultry days as best we may amidst rural surroundings. But the country in August does not compare in beauty and glory with the country in October. These are not "melancholy days," although the softened air and changing foliage tone down the feelings, and we watch the varying face of nature with subdued emotions and a strange tenderness gathering in our hearts. Do those gorgeous golden leaves foreshadow the dying year? Do those crimson hues gleaming in the sunlight speak of decay? True, a month hence they may be brown and sere, but now the surpassing magnificence of the forest trees glorifies the country landscape. On this bright October morning we are sitting by an open window, looking out upon a beautiful New England village. The soft air steals in gently, laden with autumnal fragrance. The trees which thickly border the streets and cluster around the houses present a picture not only charming to the artist's eye, but attractive even to the most unobservant. Some of the maples are still unchanged, but through their dark green foliage gleam the brilliant red and orange of other trees, which have not a single green leaf remaining. Here and there one single fiery bough peers proudly out amidst surrounding green, like a banner of victory, while crimson, yellow, and green, like mosaic-work thickly mottled, give some grand old trees a wondrous beauty. Every day some marked change is observed; in a few days more, as we have seen it in previous Octobers, the whole village will glitter with golden-leaved trees, the green having wholly disappeared—and the sight is a glorious one. This is the time to gather bright leaves and ferns to press for winter bouquets. Turn away from the village, and go into the wild forest not far off, where one may find a great variety in every gradation of change, and gather freely from the abundance. Autumnal leaves should be pressed quickly after gathering, as they will soon dry and curl; ferns must be pressed immediately, or they lose their delicate beauty. Leaves may be dried by smoothing them with a warm iron, when one has not time or conveniences for pressing in the ordinary way, but the brilliancy is often diminished by the process. Many persons varnish them, but, to our thinking, this gives an unnatural glitter to the surface, which is not pleasing to the eye. Bouquets tastefully arranged from pressed autumn leaves and ferns, with a judicious mingling of dried grasses and grains, are charming ornaments for the house during the winter season, when it is difficult, and often impossible, to procure fresh flowers. It is not enough to put them into the best parlor, which is reserved for company; let their bright presence cheer the common family rooms, where parents and children socially gather from day to day.

Is this true? A recent letter from London says:

"Last year and this several female artists, whose works had been previously rejected, sent their contributions under feigned masculine names, and, in nearly every case, the pictures so sent were accepted, applauded, and well hung for the admiration of the public! A lady of Richmond borrowed the name of a gentleman of her acquaintance, and the pictures supposed to be by him were sold at a very large price; and it was only because of a largely increased demand on the said gentleman for income tax that the ruse had to be confessed."

Do English picture-buyers make so slight inquiry concerning the genuineness of their purchases?

It is rumored that a posthumous work by De Foe, the renowned author of Robinson Crusoe, is about to be given to the public. The writer apparently was uncertain what to call his book, as it bears two titles—Six Months in the Air, and Sixty Days out of the Body.

The Avenue St. Nicholas, extending from One Hundred and Tenth Street at Sixth Avenue to One Hundred and Fifty-fifth Street near Tenth Avenue, is now completed and open to the public, with the exception of a small section, which will soon be finished. The whole extent of the avenue is about two and a half miles, and it is finished as a gravel road, especially designed for pleasure travel. This furnishes the residents of Carmansville and Washington Heights a direct roadway to the Central Park and the east side of the city.

It is related that a parrot, which could sing Shoo-Fly as well as any of the gamins of New York, was sold to a gentleman in Bridgeport a short time ago. Another was sold that sang Up in a Balloon so well that it attracted crowds of listeners. The manner in which this bird would commence its vocalism was somewhat amusing. It would say, "Mother, what do you want to-day?" An imaginary lady would reply, "Up in a Balloon." The parrot would answer, "All right, come ahead," and commence singing.

The Inter-State Industrial Exposition, which was formally opened at Chicago on September 25, will doubtless prove a complete success during its session of six weeks. The immense building in which it is held is 800 feet long by 200 wide, with double galleries around its entire length; and on the opening occasion it was entirely filled with visitors, the estimated number being 20,000 persons. The main hall is given up almost entirely to exhibitors, the only exception being a magnificent fountain under the centre of the main dome, in the middle of a basin forty feet in diameter, which will be kept filled with water. The fountain is of bronze, and is enriched with life-size figures. The building will be brilliantly lighted with gas, and the music in the evening will be one of the attractive features. The art hall is divided into three rooms, one for sculpture and architectural drawings, one for paintings, and the third for photographs, drawings, etc. The most notable painting on exhibition is an allegorical picture of Chicago, presented to the city by an artist on the staff of the London Graphic.

Some years ago a singular phenomenon was noticed in connection with the new stone dam at Lewiston, Maine, which excited some fear among people who could not understand the cause; and now a similar phenomenon is in operation at Waterville, in the same State. At certain times the water falls over the dam in such a way as to rattle the windows and the dishes in china closets in houses quite a distance from the falls. The compression of air between the perpendicular face of the dam and the stream of water descending a little distance in front of it produces this curious and sometimes annoying phenomenon; but it was a long time before people were convinced that the mysterious shaking originated in this way.

A trade novelty is a price-list of books, issued by a leading house of Philadelphia, with telegraphic index. A word is printed opposite each title, by which that book may be ordered by telegraph at the expense of but two words. For instance, to order ten copies of the new 8vo edition of Loomis's Treatise on Algebra, twenty of the 12mo edition of same, and four of Flayfair's Euclid, the following would suffice: "Ten attain, twenty attach, four abet."

A correspondent of the Belgravia magazine informs its readers that his children have a trough full of tame toads, each of which answers to its own name by coming when called. The children are very fond of them, and pet them in a wonderful manner, carrying them about the garden, and holding them up to any insect they may chance to fancy, so that they may swallow it. Upon one occasion one of the children, who had received an orange, was seen with her own special toad seated on her hand, partaking with his mistress of the orange in alternate sucks and bites. The toad seems to be more easily and quickly tamed than most animals.

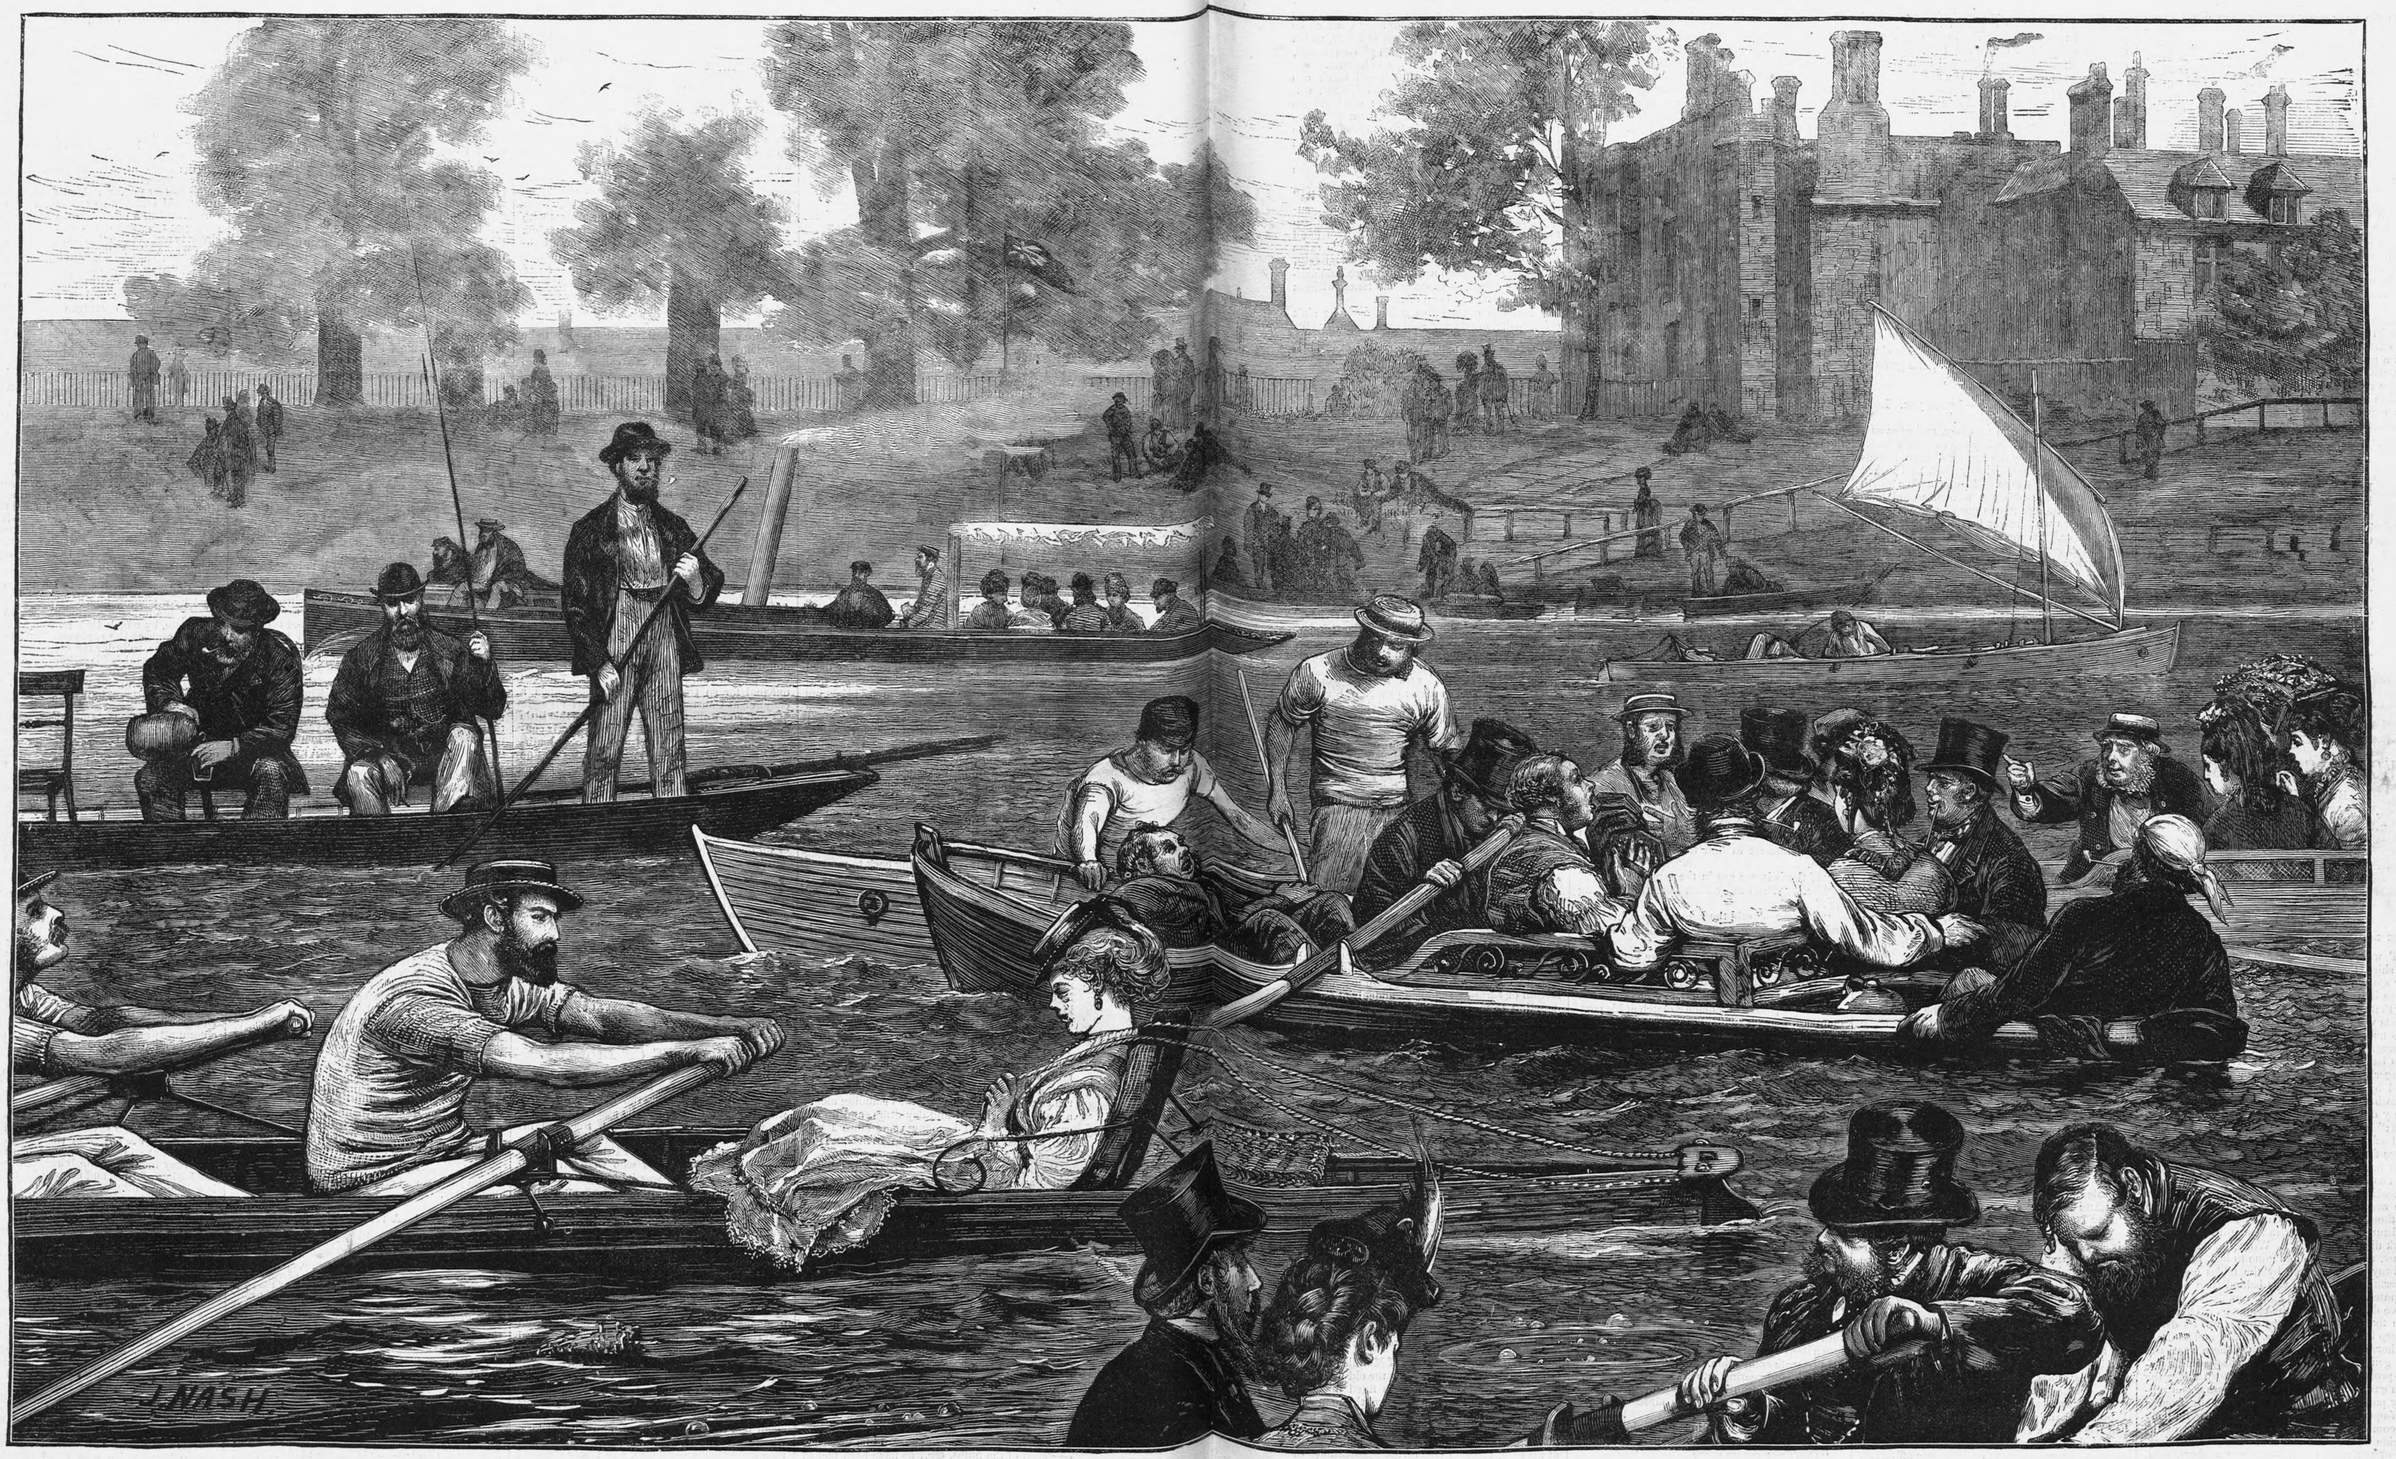
The disturbed condition of financial matters touches not alone the interests of brokers, bankers, and large dealers. It is felt by the working men and women throughout the community. Some large firms and manufacturing establishments have been obliged to discharge their employés; and although it is believed that the necessity for such measures will not long exist, the loss of a single day's wages is often the cause of suffering among those whose families are dependent upon their daily earnings. It is indeed wonderful how the interests of all classes in the community are linked together. No one stands alone in a nation. What is injurious to the rich man is harmful to the poor in financial affairs, and the misfortunes of the laboring classes react upon the wealthy. Prosperity in a country depends upon union of interests among the people.

It is a common saying that all enmities and resentments are buried in the grave. It is sad, indeed, that so many wait until death comes before they look with forgiving tenderness upon the failings, follies, and errors of others. There is solemn warning as well as touching pathos in a poem which recently appeared in the Christian Union. We quote one verse:

"Oh, friends, I pray to-night,
Keep not your kisses for my dead, cold brow;
The way is lonely; let me feel them now.
Think gently of me; I am travel-worn;
My faltering feet are pierced with many a thorn;
Forgive, O hearts estranged, forgive, I plead;
When dreamless rest is mine I shall not need
The tenderness for which I long to-night."

Alas, that there were no steam-tugs in the day, and at the port, when the noble Paul and the lovely Virginia perished in sight of land! A Paul who wooed a Philadelphia Virginia lately went to Chicago himself by rail, while Virginia traveled alone to Buffalo by cars, and thence to Chicago by the lakes. Paul waiting on the Chicago pier for the arrival of the steamer which bore the beloved one, saw tokens of an approaching storm—not of air and water, indeed, but of human elements composed; in other words, a gathering of fraternal relatives and police officers, waiting to burst upon the fated vessel, wreck all his dear hopes, and ingulf the fair one in hopeless waters. Should Paul permit his Virginia to be thus lost in sight of land? Never. Accordingly he quietly sought the captain of a convenient little tug-boat, which in a moment was on its way to Grasse Point, where it met the steamer, took on board the young lady, and reached the city an hour before the larger craft. And before the latter was made fast to the pier, Virginia was lost indeed: she was Mrs. Paul.

Hosted by Google



SATURDAY AFTERNOON AT HAMPTON COURT, ENGLAND.—[See Page 682.]

Hosted by Google

SATURDAY AFTERNOON ON THE THAMES AT HAMPTON COURT.

See illustration on double page.

THE upper reaches of the Thames, especially between Putney and Staines, form such a delightful recreation ground for the pent-up Londoners during the summer months that we could wish the river were still more circuitous in its windings, and that the dear old stream—once styled silver-footed by Robert Herrick, and not altogether undeserving the epithet even now, when seen sparkling in the rays of a slanting sun—we could wish, we repeat, that Old Father Thames ran like a girdle of health round the whole of this vast city. The time to see the Upper Thames in its glory is on a balmy Saturday afternoon. A stranger might almost imagine that some famous regatta was in progress, the water is so dotted with pleasure-boats of all sorts and descriptions. Supposing the spectator takes his stand on Cholmondeley Walk, Richmond, or even further up, at Hampton Court, where our sketch was made, what a moving panorama is unfolded to his gaze! To say nothing of the racing boats, the fours and eights, which fly past with their rowers keeping admirable time and their energetic little cockswains bending to their work, we have other sights equally attractive. We have the pair-oar steered by a pretty girl, the sister, possibly, of one of the oarsmen, the inamorata of the other; the steam-launch, a delightful vessel to be on board of, inasmuch as you go darting about regardless of wind and tide, but a pestilent little monster to nervous aquarians, who never know which is their proper side of the river; we have the sailing boat, the best vehicle of all for the dolce far niente; we have the capacious wherry, and lastly we have the Thames anglers in their punt.

PENCILINGS.

How faint a pencil trace!
How easy to efface!
Nothing more
Than print where bird has hopped
Or rain has lightly dropped
On the shore.

The sand has turned to stone,
And there those prints are shown
Petrified:
Faint notes of by-gone years,
Though blistered o'er with tears,
Still abide.

I almost cast away
Two little lines one day
Scored in lead;
And never dreamed they were
Alone to speak of her
Who is dead?

SECOND-COUSIN SARAH.

By F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Little Kate Kirby," "For Her Sake," "A Bridge of Glass," "Mattie: A Stray," "No Man's Friend," etc., etc.

Book the First.

REUBEN CULWICK.

CHAPTER I.

THE LAD WHO HELPED WITH THE LUGGAGE.

IT was wintry weather down in Worcestershire, though the May of the year in which our story opens was already two weeks old. It was a late spring, the country people said, meaning that the hail and sleet and rain and bitter east winds were still in the ascendant, and that there was not a glimpse of sunshine from week's end to week's end. Times were hard and business was bad, and people already croaked about the danger to the harvest—it was a world that shivered by the fire still, and waited for a change. Weather-wise folk looked up at the leaden sky every day, shook their heads, and said, "More wet;" and the wet came down as though they had asked for it, and washed out the energy from three-fourths of humankind in Worcester.

It had been raining all day in the loyal city, just as it had rained the day before, and the day preceding that. It was raining at ten o'clock in the evening in as vigorous and lively a fashion as though it had just commenced, and the wind had turned out with extra strength to add to the dark night's discomfort. Worcester had lost her heart, and given up and gone to bed, and at the railway station, where by the tables one could ascertain that a train was behind time by three minutes, there was a faint semblance of life, more depressing than the elements. There was one fly, with its windows drawn up, its driver asleep in the interior of his vehicle, and its drab-by horse coughing like a man. There was a wet old gentleman, glittering like a beetle in his water-proof as he walked up and down under the dim gas lamps of the station. There was a railway porter's head peering occasionally from a half-open door, and declining to allow its body to come forward until the glaring eyes of the engine were seen advancing through the miseries of the night; and there was a short, thin, haggard scrap of a youth, in tattered corduroys and a red comforter, curled up on a porter's truck, and sleeping placidly in one of the thoroughest draughts of which that excessively breezy station can boast.

The train that was overdue was not calculated to rouse the officials into energy, or bring the hotel vehicles from the city for the passengers, or entice able-bodied men and boys, in the hope of perquisites, from their homes; it came from a dull dead branch line, and was going on to Gloucester; it was not likely to land many travelers en route or take up many at that hour of the night. When it arrived at last, it came into the station noiselessly and in a spiritless condition, as though the steam were low and the engine-driver had just buried his wife, and only one bespotted window was slowly lowered in a third-class carriage as the train glided to the platform. From this window an ungloved hand and arm protruded and unlatched the door, and then a stalwart man of four or five and twenty years of age, a bright-faced, brown-bearded man, stepped out, dragged forth a portmanteau and a hat-box, stood aside to allow of the brisk entrance of the man in the shiny water-proof, and looked around him in that half-sharp, half-vague manner common to individuals who land themselves in places that are new to them, or have changed much since their last farewell of them. The guard slammed the door, the engine gave a melancholy wail, and toiled on with its burden; the youth in corduroys sat up on the barrow and stared at the portmanteau and hat-box rather than at their owner; the fly-driver, who had roused himself, called out, "Carriage, Sir?" and not receiving a response with that promptitude which he considered due to his position, cut the coughing horse viciously under the chin with his whip, and drove off at full speed.

The traveler, after a hasty glance at the sky, called out in a sharp, clear voice to the porter, who was slouching toward his room again,

"Here—I want you a moment."

The porter, an uncivil specimen of his class, hesitated, looked over his shoulder, and grunted forth to the third-class passenger,

"There's no more trains."

"I don't want any trains—I want you. Look alive, young man, if you please."

The young man, who was fifty, and gray as a badger, seemed impressed by the traveler's briskness, and flattered by the compliment paid to his youth, for he slouched slowly back and looked into the traveler's face. It was a face worth looking at—at least some women would have thought so, though it was not so much a handsome face as what might be termed a speaking countenance. It was sharply defined, with a pair of full gray laughing eyes, at variance or in contrast to a mouth and chin that were significant of their owner having a will of his own; it was a face of more than ordinary keenness and intelligence, and an early outlook at the world had not scared or depressed it, unless appearances were against it and him.

"I expected a carriage for me to-night."

"What sort of carriage?"

"A private carriage from Mr. Culwick's, of Sedge Hill. Do you know Mr. Culwick by sight, or his coachman?"

"There has been nothing here but cabs all day—and there's nothing likely to come now, I reckon."

"No, I reckon not."

The traveler looked at his portmanteau and hat-box.

"Where's the parcel office?"

"That's shut."

"Can they be sent to the hotel?"

"Not to-night, I think."

"Do you want any body to carry your luggage, Sir?" asked a weak voice; and the lad who had been dozing away time on the barrow obtruded in an edgewise manner into the conversation. The traveler glanced at him, and said,

"It is too heavy for you, my man."

"No, it isn't," said the youth, with alacrity; "I'm very strong. I have been waiting for a job all night, Sir—if you don't mind, Sir—for I am very strong; I am, indeed!"

The eagerness of the request, the reiteration of his powers, the contrast which his words presented to his white cheeks and eager dark eyes, attracted anew the attention of the gentleman for whom no carriage had arrived, before the railway porter turned upon the applicant.

"You get out of this, young shaver. You've been here a sight too long already," cried the porter, "and I have had my hi on you these two hours. It's no use your hanging about as if—"

The boy cowered for an instant, and then turned quickly on the man.

"Don't lay a hand upon me—you had better not touch me," he cried, warmly. "I am talking to this gentleman, not to you. I am doing no one any harm—am I, Sir?"

"Not that I see," answered the traveler, thus appealed to.

"And I'm very strong, Sir," he urged again. "May I try. I'll carry it easily—see now!"

The portmanteau was raised and flung upon his shoulder, the other hand caught up the leather hat-box, and the white face looked round the burden inquiringly.

"Where to, Sir?"

"To Muddleton's Hotel—do you know Muddleton's?"

"All right, Sir."

The youth strode into the wind and rain, and the traveler, after giving a tug to his cap, put his hands in the pockets of his heavy coat, and followed his guide across and out of the station-yard.

Yes, it was raining hard in the good city of Worcester; the good city, in fact, seemed to have had more than a fair proportion of rain, judging by the choked-up gutters and the rivers of water in the roadway, that went swirling into off streets with hissing, gurgling noises.

The youth turned the corner with the luggage, and the proprietor found him leaning against the brick wall of a house when he had turned after him.

"Which way, Sir?" he inquired.

"Which way!" echoed the stranger; "why, straight along there. Don't you know your way?"

"Can't say that I know much about hotels: I haven't been at this kind of work a great while, Sir."

"How long?" inquired the traveler, somewhat curiously.

"Three hours and a half."

"Come, that's perseverance, if we take the weather into consideration. You are the lad to make your way in the world, in good time, though—"

"Though I haven't made much way yet," said the other, as he started off again with his burden, as if anxious to get beyond his companion's questioning. This was an impossible feat, however, handicapped as he was with a hat-box and a heavy portmanteau—such a heavy portmanteau that all the worldly goods of the owner must be stowed away inside, he thought, unless the gentleman was in the iron trade, and traveling with samples.

There was no intention in the stranger's mind of allowing his fragile-looking porter to get very far ahead of him; it was not politic, it was not safe, and—yes, he was a curious man in his way. One or two long strides took him to the youth's side again, and once more the sharp black eyes peered round the portmanteau in a half-nervous, half-observant way, as a dumb animal might have done at its master.

"I'm very strong, Sir—don't touch the portmanteau, please, and I shall get on all right. Muddleton's is not very far now, I suppose," said the volunteer, breathing more quickly as he toiled onward in the roadway, splashing through mire and puddle without regard to any selection of ground.

"Half a mile or so."

"Good gracious!" the lad ejaculated to himself. It was beyond his distance, and he should snap half-way on the journey, he was afraid, but he struggled on; and the traveler marching by his side, and with his head bent down to keep the rain from his face, did not perceive that his attendant reeled a little in his progress.

"Three hours and a half," said he at last. "What have you been doing before this?"

"Nothing particular."

"Living on your means?"

"No."

"On your wits?"

The lad trudged on and did not answer him. He wavered more in his gait, and splashed the legs of his companion with superfluous mud and water, and the man walked by his side, studying the roadway still, and unobservant of the failing efforts of the weak boy whom he had intrusted with a heavy task. He was more interested in the youth's past state than in his present condition, and regarded him in the abstract.

"Who are you, boy?" he said, without looking up, and in the tone of a man only half interested in his subject; "what have you come to this sleepy city for?"

"I—don't know," was the reply, and a more sullen reply it was than usual, despite its jerkiness.

"Not for a living?"

"No."

"To find a friend?"

"No."

"Have you run away from home? Is that it?"

The man looked at the lad at this query—looked with a grave earnestness that betokened a keener interest in him than he had hitherto shown.

"If that's it, we are in the same boat, boy," said he. "I ran away from home ever so long ago."

"Because—" said the lad, curious in his turn, and even stopping short for an instant for the answer.

"Because there was no place like home!—no place so confoundedly uncomfortable and unsympathetic and hard-cornered—and so I put on my hat and walked out. And yet, after all—" He paused and made a clutch at his portmanteau, that he suddenly thought was in peril of slipping from the lad's shoulders. "Here, hold hard, youngster. What's the matter?"

"It's all right; let me be. I can carry it; I said I could," cried the boy, with excitement, and marching himself and luggage away from the touch of the elder man. This sudden effort seemed too much for the overtaxed strength of the youth; he reeled away toward the foot-path, and went on with weak and tottering legs for a few more moments, when he suddenly collapsed. It was an utter break-down at the very instant that the traveler had become aware of the position, and was striding forward to render assistance, and the result was chaos—the youth all of a heap on the curb-stone, with the hat-box under him, and the portmanteau in the roadway like a big boulder in a mountain stream, with eddying currents surging round it and meeting on the other side.

It was a scene that surprised the traveler, and disturbed his equanimity; for something like bad language escaped him, as with the instinct of self-preservation—that glorious first law of nature—he lifted his portmanteau from the road into a deep doorway, and turned round to nspect his prostrate companion. When he was leaning over him, and peering into his face, the little anger that was in him hastily evaporated, and was replaced by a kindly sympathy more worthy of the man.

"You are ill—you are hurt," he said.

"No; let me be; I shall get up in a minute."

"Can't you get up now?"

"I'm a little bit giddy still—the street turned round all of a sudden—but I will go on with the luggage presently."

"Oh no, you won't," said the man, dryly; "you should have never attempted it. I was a brute not to see. By Jove, the kid's going to faint!"

He put his arms round him, and lifted him into the doorway, as he might have lifted an infant, and looked again at the white wan face under the old Scotch cap, which was pulled lightly over the forehead in a hang-dog fashion.

"Poor little beggar!" he muttered, "why did I load him like this, and loaf along by his side like a nigger-driver?—Here, what's your name! can't you open your eyes, just for a moment, till I—"

Here his anxiety took the form of action, for, still holding the boy's head on his shoulder, he kicked with energy at the door against which he was leaning, and awoke the whole house, which was supposed, at the first alarm of its inmates, to be a sheet of flame from top to bottom.

A snuffy old woman, in an old black cap weighed down by grimy artificial flowers, was the first to wrench open the door; she had been sleeping by the fire, sitting up for a late husband, and she appeared with a bound on the door-step, and nearly fell over the strange couple in her haste.

"Water—a glass of water, please," cried the traveler. "This child has fainted."

"What—who—water—whose child is it?" she called forth. Then she realized the urgency of the case, and ran back into the room, returning very quickly with a light in one hand and a glass of water in the other, at the same time as heads peered down the narrow staircase, and some one opened a window above, and asked twenty questions in stentorian tones, without getting an answer to one of them.

"You can come into the house—if he ain't going to die, mind you," said the woman. "Has he been run over?"

"No, crushed, that's all. Give me the water."

The water was passed to the stranger, who held it to the lips of the fainting lad.

"Take off his cap, please," he said, "and then let him be. He will get the air that way."

The Scotch cap was twitched off, and then the woman, and the man who was supporting the lad, leaned forward and stared with amazement at two small side-combs which were in the head, and which had been used for fixing and drawing up beneath the Scotch cap a profusion of raven hair.

"Mussy on us, it's a gal!" cried the old woman. "Why, what's her game?"

"Ay, what's her game?" said the man, very thoughtfully, as he echoed back the slangy question of his interlocutor.

The girl was still insensible, when some one in his shirt and trowsers came shuffling down stairs with a cup in his hand.

"If gin's any good, she can take a sip of this."

"Have you any brandy?" asked the traveler.

"Oh, you're a blessed sight too partikler, guv'ner. No, we ain't got no brandy, no shampain, nor any think."

"Sperits is sperits," said the old woman; "and if you're fool enough to waste it, Simkins, on a brazen chit like that, walking about in men's clothes in that undecent way, do so if you like."

"She don't look very brazen, does she, Sir?" said the man, with a hoarse laugh, as the gentleman took the cup from his hand.

"No," was the answer, as a few drops of the spirit were given to the girl, who heaved a deep sigh, and put her thin hands to her head, as if she missed her cap already.

"She's coming round," he said.

"She's been shamming," said the old woman, who had grown strangely uncharitable within the last few moments.

"She will do if we can get her home," said the traveler. "Are you better?—how do you feel now?" he asked, kindly.

"I'm all right," was the slow answer; "I—I think so. What has been—the—"

Then she stood up slowly, with her hands pressed to her temples, glared from the traveler to the woman with the light, gave a faint little scream of surprise, snatched suddenly at the cap dangling from the fingers of the woman, and with one wild spring forward passed from them into the rain and wind, and vanished away in the darkness.

The traveler made one or two strides after her, and then stopped.

"Why should I follow her, and annoy her farther?" he said, as he paused.

He remembered that he had given his strange porter no remuneration for services thus abruptly terminated, and started off again, but it was too late; and another memory coming to him that he was leaving his luggage in the street, he went back for it, and discovered that it was being taken into the house by the Samaritans with a certain amount of undue haste.

"Thank you," he said, politely. He shouldered his portmanteau, picked up his damaged hat-case, and marched off to Muddleton's Hotel, where the waiter received him urbanely, but was puzzled at the quantity of mud which he brought in along with his luggage.

CHAPTER II.

ORDERS FOR THE MORNING.

SITTING in the coffee-room of Muddleton's Hotel, his slippered feet planted on the old-fashioned brass fender, and his gray eyes fixed upon the dancing flames of the big coal fire, the man who had come to Worcester thought out the incidents of the day, and sketched forth a map of progress for the morrow. Warm and dry and at his ease, the wan face of the masquerader of an hour ago came before him more often than he had bargained for, the girl being apart from his life, and only a stray incident by the way-side of a career that had been eventful and varied. He was a man of the world, and had seen strange sights and met with strange chances and mischances, and yet he had not been at any time more perplexed than on this night of coming back to home. He was a man whom other folks' trouble disturbed, apparently—hence not a selfish man highly developed. There was a stern story, he was sure, of much privation marking the life of that weak woman who had struggled into a man's dress, and hung about Worcester railway station for man's work and man's wages; and he had experienced privation himself, and lived it down in some degree, not losing sympathy with it, or growing callous to it. He did not want the incident of that night to trouble him, but it would—why, he hardly knew, for poverty is common enough and eccentric enough. Perhaps it was on his conscience that the girl had toiled hard for a sixpence, and he had not rewarded her for her labor. Would she think that she was not to be paid on account of the non-fulfillment of the contract between them?—that the bargain had been struck, but not carried out?—that he was a man who expected every scrap of his money's worth for his money, like— Ah! well, he would not mention names; perhaps even he had altered for the better with advancing years.

Hosted by Google

He rang the bell, and the waiter entered.

"If any body should ask for me—"

"Yes, Sir. What name, Sir?"

"Reuben Culwick," he replied; "but he—she—will not know my name. The party who helped me with my portmanteau from the station, I mean, and who left me in a hurry. She—he—is aware that I am staying here for the night; therefore be good enough to ask him—her—the lad, I mean, or whoever comes," he added, with a dash, "into the room to-night or to-morrow morning. Do you understand?" he inquired, as the waiter listened open-mouthed to these rambling instructions.

"Yes, Sir—perfectly. Any body who comes; man or woman. Yes, Sir," he said, with great briskness.

"Stop one moment," said Mr. Culwick, as the man flitted toward the door. "I shall want a trap to Sedge Hill to-morrow."

"At what time, Sir?"

"Ten in the morning."

"To go and return?"

"And return?" he said, inquiringly to himself. "Yes, and return! That is certain."

"Beg pardon, Sir?" said the waiter, interrogatively.

"To take me to Sedge Hill, and bring me back to Worcester, at ten in the morning," he repeated, in a decisive tone; and the waiter having withdrawn, he lighted a cigar, and set himself to his coal-fire studies once more. The instructions which he had given had sufficed to turn the current of his ideas, and the adventure of the night passed away from his mind with the deeper thoughts that followed it.

"And return!" he said, and took his cigar from his mouth to laugh to himself more than once—and odd laughs they were, of various degrees of hilarity, from the hearty and unaffected to the laugh with the inner ring in it, the undercurrent, as it were, of something which was scarcely irony, and which might have been interpreted into a lurking sorrow or regret by any one who had known his history.

"Yes, Reuben," he said, when, at a later hour, he was going up stairs to his room, "to return! Positively the last appearance of Reuben Culwick at Sedge Hill. Will there be much of a crowd to see the gentleman under those interesting circumstances?"

He had made up his mind to solve the riddle quickly for himself, and at ten in the morning he was standing in front of Mr. Muddleton's Hotel, drawing on a pair of gloves, and critically inspecting the animal which the proprietor had harnessed to the dog-cart. There was a faint prospect of a dry day, if not a fine one; the clouds were not so low as usual, and the wind had changed during the night. Reuben Culwick looked up and down the street, and thought of his little adventure in Worcester last night. The waiter, not too busy, was standing at the door, interested in the temporary departure of the customer, and Reuben turned to him.

"Has any one called this morning for me?"

"No, Sir."

"If any one should call about helping me with the portmanteau last night, give—him—half a crown."

"Half a crown, Sir?" said the waiter. "Yes, Sir."

"And ask her to call again," added Reuben Culwick, as he sprang into the trap and drove off.

"Give him half a crown, and ask her to call again," said the waiter, looking after him. "He doesn't know what he's saying! The old man at Sedge Hill will never make him out. A regular Culwick he is, and no mistake about it."

And there was no mistake about it, that Reuben Culwick was still remembered at Muddleton's Hotel.

CHAPTER III.

THE HOME THAT THERE WAS NO PLACE LIKE.

Whether Sedge Hill should lie to the east or west, the north or south, of Worcester city matters not to the purport of our story; and it may not be politic to enter too minutely into the details of location. That it was a big stone house seven miles from Worcester is sufficient to relate. It was called Sedge Hill from the rising ground on which it had been built, and from the wooded acclivity beyond it, where from the summit was a glorious view of miles of English landscape, with the cathedral towering above the house roofs of the distant city, and the Severn winding like a band of silver through a fair green country, well loved by art and poetry. Sedge Hill—speaking solely of the mansion to which that title had been given—was a staring edifice of considerable proportions, with an aspect of newness about it that fourteen years had not done much to soften. It had been built to the order of the present proprietor, who had made much money by cotton stockings, and had risen from twenty shillings a week at the loom to the splendor of his present life. It was a new house to suit the new man who had been lucky enough to get rich. There were spacious grounds beyond—even the larches on the hill were part and parcel of the domain—and there was a big room at the side that was new to Reuben Culwick since he had last stood in his father's house, and it was this that he pulled up his horse to inspect before turning into the carriage-drive.

"Improvements," he said to himself. "Even the house has grown since I was here."

Then he went rapidly along the drive, drew up in front of the house, and stepped lightly and briskly from the trap, giving the reins to a rosy-faced young man in livery, who emerged from some stabling in the rear to be of service to the new-comer.

"Old Jones has gone, then?" he said to the servant.

"Yes, Sir."

"Dead?"

"Oh no, Sir. He's with Squire Black, of Holston."

"And you reign in his stead. Well, we can not all reign."

He knocked and rang, looking steadily through the glass doors the while. Another new face—a smart young house-maid, whom he had never seen before, to replace Mrs. Perkins, who was stout and sallow—came to the door and admitted him.

"Is Mr. Culwick in?"

"Yes, Sir; but he's engaged just now."

"Will you be kind enough to give him my card?"

The maid-servant took the card and departed, and Reuben Culwick, like the merest stranger, and feeling like a stranger, very doubtful of his reception, walked up and down the spacious hall with his hands behind him, and his hat in his hands.

Presently the servant re-appeared.

"Will you step this way, if you please, Sir?"

Reuben followed the servant along a corridor to a door at the extremity—the door of the new room, he was certain, from his old remembrance of the house. The door was opened, and his name announced, and he felt that he was passing into a spacious apartment, the walls of which were bright and rich with many pictures, and the ceiling paneled and massive, with ground glass in the panels, for the proper transfusion of light on Mr. Simon Culwick's "collection." When Simon Culwick had lost his son Reuben, he had taken to the "masters," ancient and modern, and given them all the love that was in his heart. It was not much, but they had had every scrap of it. In learning to love pictures he had forgotten how to love men.

But it was not at the paintings which enriched the walls that Reuben Culwick gazed with so much of curious earnestness, but at the big broad-faced man sitting before the fire in a capacious leathern chair, and who was looking curiously and steadily at him. There was a pretty fair-haired young woman, in gray silk, sitting at the table in the recess of a bay-window, reading, and Reuben was conscious of her presence, that was all. She rose not at his entrance, only looked toward him with a certain degree of curiosity as he advanced, and then turned to the pages of her book, or affected to do so, as he held his hand out to his father.

"So you have thought of me at last, have you?" was rolled out in a gruff bass, as a large, white, gouty-looking hand was placed in that of his son.

"So I have come back at last," answered Reuben Culwick.

"You can sit down," said the father.

"Thank you," said the son.

This was the meeting after five years' absence—the calm after the great storm which had happened in that house five years ago. This was the home that the son had never liked, that he felt he did not like now, although he had come to it of his own free-will. There was a pause, during which each man took stock of the other without any particular reserve. The father had not altered much—his whiskers were grayer, and the shadowing beneath the eyes was somewhat deeper, and that was all. There was the same sense of power, or obduracy, in the big broad chin and the thin closed indrawn lips, and it was easy to guess from whom Reuben Culwick had inherited his decisive-looking mouth.

In the son there was a vast change, and the father noted it at once, being an observant man in his way. This was not the stripling who had walked out of his house rather than obey his command; who had replied angrily to his own anger; who had been as disobedient as he had been dictatorial and unyielding. This was a man of the world, with his will hardened by contact with the rough surfaces of which the world was full, and probably more difficult to deal with than ever. Time had improved him, and made a man of him, and given him self-possession and courage and brains—and he had lacked all these when he had flown out of the house in his last passion. But he would be forever lacking in obedience—the father, Simon Culwick, was assured of that already.

"I got your letter," said the father, "and I might have sent the carriage for you, had it not rained so much."

"THIS WAS THE MEETING AFTER FIVE YEARS' ABSENCE."

"The horses might have caught cold instead of me," said the son, dryly; "but I didn't want the carriage. I was glad that I had not further to go last night than Worcester."

He looked toward the lady in the bay-window at this juncture, and his father noticed the wandering gaze, and paid no attention to the hint which it conveyed.

"Well, what have you been doing? What" (after a pause, and with another steady and impassive stare at his son) "do you purpose doing now that you are here?"

"Is it worth while entering into that question at once?"

"Why not?" was the rejoinder.

"It may give rise to discussion, and you and I never agreed together in debate, Sir," said Reuben, half deferentially and yet half satirically.

He had come back—long ago he had owned himself in a great degree in the wrong—he had wished to see his father again, and the reception had already chilled him, though it was no more, no less, than he had expected from the first. He had not come for argument, to own more than his share of error—scarcely to own that a second time, having already explained in his letter almost as much as it was necessary to explain.

"I suppose, after all that has passed, you have no intention of sitting down in the house, and waiting complacently for my death and my money?" the father inquired.

"You told me that I should never have a penny of your money, if you remember, Sir," said the son, calmly.

"And you never will," was the blunt answer.

"I have never expected it after that day, or after that oath," said Reuben Culwick.

"Why should you?" said Mr. Culwick, in a loud tone of voice, and yet without betraying any passion. "Have I been known in all my life to break my word? Has not sticking to my word, through thick and thin, in evil report and good report, made me what I am?"

"Yes."

"I would rather break my own heart than break my word. You know it," said the father, boastfully.

"Fifty hearts as well as your own—yes, I know it," answered the other, with an unflinching gaze at his father, "and hence I come to you, not for assistance, I don't want it—not for affection, I don't expect it—but with the simple motive which I hope that my letter conveyed to you last week—to see you, to express sorrow for a long alienation, to feel glad that you are well, to tell you that I am not unhappy, and to go away again."

The son's tones seemed to impress the father, who subsided into his easy-chair, from which he had leaned forward, as if cowed by the cold, clear-ringing tones of the voice which fell upon his ears, a voice which subdued him, and an arrogance that had been always difficult to quell—which touched him, though he never owned that—which made him even prouder of his son, though the time never came for him to own that either.

The young woman in the background leaned forward with clasped hands, until he caught her glance again, when she once more turned her eyes upon her book.

"Have you made your fortune?" asked the father, in a different voice.

"On the contrary, I have been somewhat unsuccessful."

"How do you live?"

"I write—a little," he added, modestly.

"And earn a little. I can guess the drudgery—don't tell me any more about it."

"It is a long story that would scarcely interest you."

"It would not interest me in the least."

There was another long pause, during which the son, still at his ease, still singularly hard despite his respectful manner, glanced around at the pictures on the walls, admired them even secretly, but not enviously, wondered at their cost, and looked once more in the direction of the lady, whose pensive face and quiet grace he admired also, and at whose presence he wondered in a greater degree, though he repressed all exhibition of surprise.

Suddenly the father said, with that singular abruptness characteristic of the man,

"You can stay here if you like."

"For how long?" asked the son, surprised at last out of his assumption of stoical composure.

"Till we disagree again," said the father, with a short, forced laugh. "That will not be many days, I suppose?"

"One moment, Sir," said Reuben Culwick, with grave politeness, and still studying his father, and experimentalizing upon him with grave philosophy. "A mistake parted us, and we are laying the foundation of another already, unless I explain the first."

"Go on."

"I may speak before this lady?"

"Yes."

"I was hardly twenty-one—a rash and foolish young fellow—when you wanted me to marry your friend's daughter."

"You would have been rich—you would have been respected—it would have been for the best."

"No, I think not."

"I say, 'Yes.'"

"I refused to entertain the proposal, if you remember.

"Remember! remember it!" cried the father, turning pale with anger. "Do you rake this up again to insult me?"

"No, to enlighten you," said the other. "At that period, Mr. Culwick, I had promised my mother that I would not marry the lady."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

CARRIAGE COSTUME.

See illustration on page 684.

This elegant costume is of dark olive brown silk, with over-skirt, sash, bows, and ruff of pale blue China crape. The skirt has a tablier of small pleatings and puffs, while the back breadths are trimmed with lapped pleated flounces. The over-skirt is confined to the back, and consists of two blue puffs with a side sash and brown pearl buckles. The châtelaine waist, fitted like a corset, is edged with a blue puff and has blue loops behind. Blue revers and ruff. Puffed sleeves, with a blue bow below the elbow. Olive silk bonnet with blue loops, plumes, and tea-roses. Pale buff gloves.

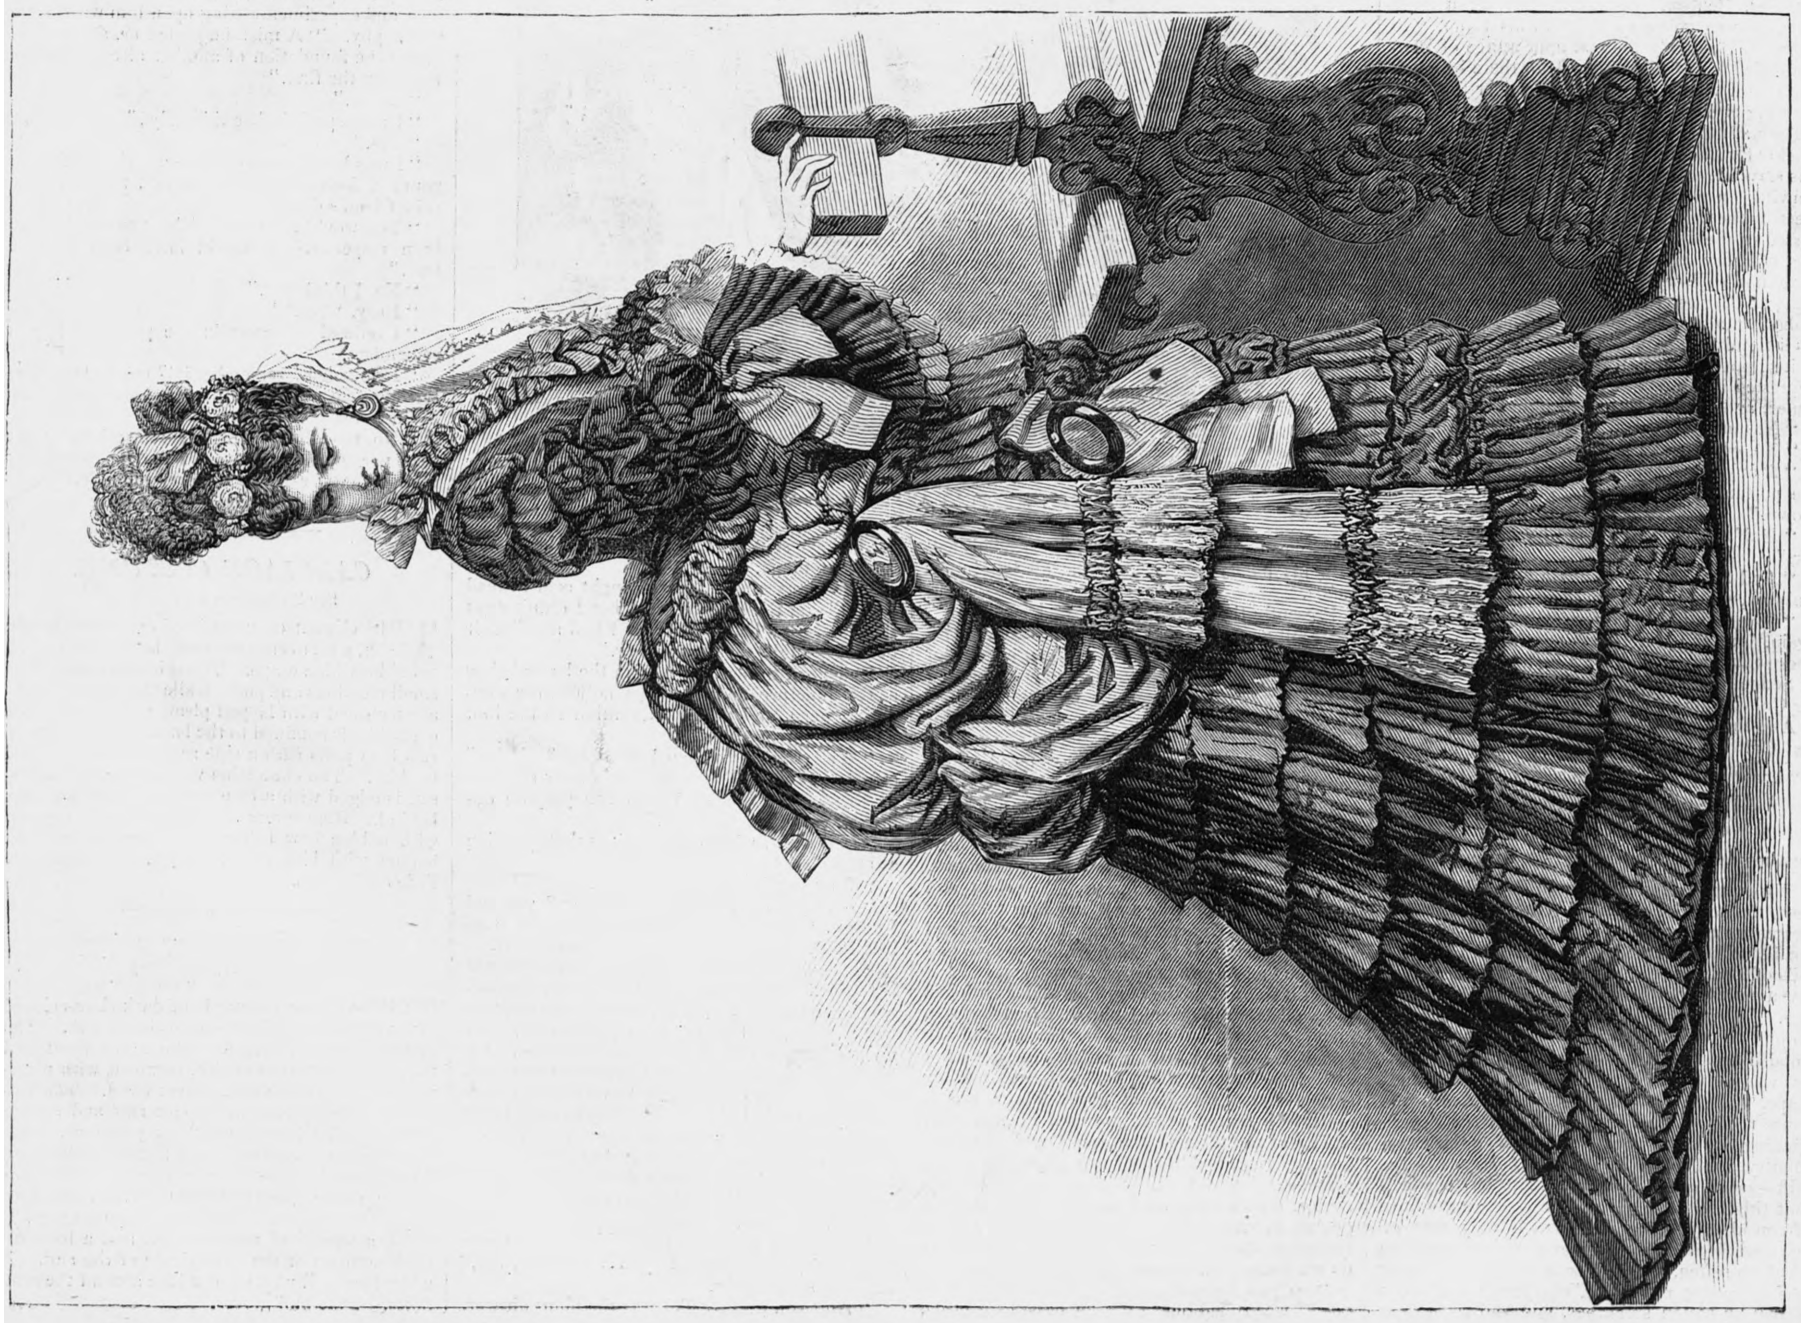
VISITING TOILETTE.

See illustration on page 684.

This visiting toilette is of dark slate-colored velvet and lighter slate-colored silk. The plain skirt is of velvet. The apron-front and trained over-skirt is of silk, trimmed with pleatings of the same and a velvet band. The velvet sleeveless jacket has a silk ruff and square tabs behind trimmed with silk pleatings. Silk sleeves with velvet cuffs and similar trimmings. The flaring-brimmed bonnet of dark velvet has a bow under the right side and an indented point on the left. The trimmings are velvet loops, a wreath of velvet asters, and a high ostrich pompon of the light shade of the silk. A white lace ruff, with similar lace around the armholes. Pale buff gloves.

Hosted by Google

VISITING TOILETTE.—[SEE PAGE 683.]



CARRIAGE COSTUME.—[SEE PAGE 683.]

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—Black Tulle Cap.
Fig. 4.—Swiss Muslin and Watered Ribbon Cap.
Fig. 7.—Black Figured Tulle and Lace Cap.

Fig. 3.—Figured Swiss Muslin Cap.
Fig. 6.—Crape and Blonde Cap with Spray of Flowers.

Figs. 1–8.—LADIES' BREAKFAST AND DRESS CAPS.

Fig. 2.—Swiss Muslin and Silk Ribbon Cap.
Fig. 5.—Tulle, Blonde, and Gros Grain Ribbon Cap.
Fig. 8.—Tulle Cap with Gros Grain and Velvet Ribbon.

Ladies' Breakfast and Dress Caps, Figs. 1–8.

Fig. 1.—Black Tulle Cap. This cap is made of figured tulle and black lace two inches and a half wide, arranged on a stiff lace foundation, and trimmed with black watered ribbon two inches and three-quarters wide, yellow flowers, a garland of russet leaves, and several black enameled leaves. In the back set a bow of watered ribbon and lace.

Fig. 2.—Swiss Muslin and Silk Ribbon Cap. This cap is made of plain white Swiss muslin, bordered with insertion half an inch wide and lace three-quarters of an inch wide, and trimmed with bows of brown and yellow silk ribbon. Set a bow of Swiss muslin and lace in the back.

Fig. 3.—Figured Swiss Muslin Cap. This cap is trimmed with a standing ruffle of plain Swiss muslin, which is edged on the top with lace insertion three-quarters of an inch wide and lace of the same width. The cap is bordered with a ruche of white tulle, and is trimmed, besides, with blue gros grain ribbon two inches and three-quarters wide.

Fig. 4.—Swiss Muslin and Watered Ribbon Cap. This cap of white Swiss muslin is bordered with lace an inch and a quarter wide. The seam of the lace is covered with a wound brown watered ribbon. The remainder of the trimming consists of loops and ends of light and dark brown watered ribbon and a red velvet bow.

Fig. 5.—Tulle, Blonde, and Gros Grain Ribbon Cap. This cap is made of black figured tulle, which is underlaid with white figured tulle, and of black and white blonde, and is trimmed with blue gros grain ribbon two inches and seven-eighths wide.

Fig. 6.—Crape and Blonde Cap with Spray of Flowers. This cap is made of pleated lilac crape and white blonde two inches and a half wide on a stiff lace foundation, and is trimmed with lilac gros grain ribbon and a spray of flowers. In the back is set a veil of white figured tulle and blonde.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 7.—BLACK FIGURED TULLE AND LACE CAP. This cap is trimmed with bows of black gros grain ribbon. In front is a band of jet, and on the right side a rose.

Fig. 8.—TULLE CAP WITH GROS GRAIN AND VELVET RIBBON. This cap is made of white figured silk tulle, white blonde an inch and three-quarters and two inches and seven-eighths wide, and black lace an inch and seven-eighths wide. The trimming consists of loops of violet gros grain ribbon two inches and seven-eighths wide, and velvet ribbon of the same color an inch and a quarter wide.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. B.—A quarter of an ounce of ammonia to half a pint of sweet-oil is the recipe you want.

M.—If you will send in your address we will endeavor to give you the information you desire.

DESPAIR.—You eat too much rich cake and confectionery, or bad food of some kind. Cosmetics will not do much till your digestion is right. Do you take a hot soap-and-water bath all over twice a week? Ask your mamma, who must be an indulgent one, to furnish you with Graham crackers instead of bread, and cracked wheat, with raisins and spice, instead of pastry. Live out-of-doors. Then try the carbolic remedy to be given in a new number of "Ugly Girl" papers. You will be in trim for it when it appears if you begin now.

N. B.—Pour half a tea-cupful of boiling water on a tea-spoonful of oxalic acid, and dip the spots in it while hot; lay them in the sun a few moments, and rinse in hot soda water. See that the acid is pure. Strong spirits of ammonia will discharge ink spots. Wash out as soon as they disappear, rubbing the spots with a paper-knife to get out the ink.

CORDELIA.—Banting's tract on obesity is out of print, but the substance of the whole essay was given in one of the "Ugly Girl" papers a short time ago.

L. J. H.—Wash your neck with hot water and soap every day, and once a week use hot chloride water, made by pouring a pint of boiling water on a tea-spoonful of chloride of lime. Let it cool a little, and wash your neck with a flannel dipped in it, washing off immediately with vinegar and water. The tar and olive-oil recipe was given in No. XI. of "Ugly Girl" papers, No. 44, Vol. V., of the Bazar. Bathe your head daily with hot water, in which a spoonful of ammonia is mixed, and brush ten minutes every night. Braid it, and clip the ends once a month.

MARY.—Dip your grasses and flowers in melted spermaceti to preserve them. Grasses may be dipped in thin varnish, and hung up to dry. Flowers are very difficult to preserve, and are not beautiful when kept. You will find it more satisfactory to turn your attention to raising fresh ones.

MINNEHAHA.—A braided letter-case, a book-rack in worsted and beads, the back of a Turkish chair in wool-work, a handsome linen dust-robe for driving, a pillow in appliqué cloth for an office lounge, a set of handkerchief, collar and cuff, comb and glove boxes in wool, silk, and beads are quite as useful to a gentleman as a lady. A small velvet bracket for his room, a set of book-markers, or an embroidered case for a choice book is a pretty gift.—Will find a recipe for you if there is one. A thorough course of purifying for the blood is to be recommended.

A LADY.—The recipe for pâté amérasive directs that bitter almonds shall be used—almonds amères.

MRS. H. H.—Lace is not appropriate with mourning when crape is worn.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Put gum-arabic in the starch used for linen, and you will get a good gloss.

SUSIE K.—For your début party get a white muslin or else pink tulle or tarlatan dress. Wear your hair with puffs and a braid on top, or else in ropes of hair around the head and down the back as a chatêlaine. Read the New York Fashions of Bazar No. 41, Vol. VI.

MRS. V. A. M'C.—We do not make purchases, or sell dress goods.

YOUNG MOTHER.—The short clothes worn by year-old babies are all white, and are usually made of their long dresses shortened. The same high-neck, long-sleeve yoke dresses are used as are made for infants.

ELEANOR.—Tulle is preferable to tarlatan and more expensive, but either will do. Make with three puffs covering the three front breadths, and flounce it to the waist behind. Half-high basque corsage, with a lining of white glazed linen. Clusters and garlands of variegated roses. The skirt is a demi-train, dragging half a yard on the floor. Make a jocky basque for your alpaca, and trim by description given in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 40, Vol. VI. Get granite or slate (blue-gray) for your best suit. Have it a silk skirt, with cashmere or camel's-hair over dress, if you can afford it; if not, get de bège or else serge. Your Dolman is still stylish. Get a violet delaine wrapper, and for common wear get one of indigo blue calico with white irregular lines through it. Pompadour hair is passée.—Dispense with the ceremonious first visit, and go to see the lady, as she requests, in her year of mourning.

THE FALLING LEAVES betoken approaching winter, when nothing makes a parlor so cheerful or a kitchen so neat as a well-polished stove, and DIXON'S STOVE POLISH will do it in five minutes, without dust or smell. Established Forty-Six Years. Try it. Made only by THE JOSEPH DIXON CRUCIBLE CO., Jersey City, N. J.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS, in any quantities. Send for Circular. MME. L. CENDRIER, 636 Broadway, N. Y.

Just Published:

SMITH'S INSTRUCTION-BOOK;

OR, THE

SECRETS OF DRESSMAKING.

This book has been accurately and carefully prepared for the single purpose of giving minute instructions upon every point of the CUTTING, FITTING, and MAKING-UP of Ladies' and Children's Garments. It is clear and complete; by the aid it gives, ANY person can become MASTER of the "ART" of Dressmaking. It is just such a book as will be APPRECIATED and highly-prized by every MOTHER and every DRESSMAKER. It contains many illustrations of our standard patterns. ☞ It will be mailed to any address upon receipt of TEN CENTS. Address,

A. BURDETTE SMITH,
914 BROADWAY,
P. O. Box 5055. New York City.

Fashions Opening!

Fro Smith's Illustrated Pattern Bazaar.

1360—THE REDINGOTE—FAMED for beautifying any style of figure. Is a complete costume with any kind of skirt. Double-breasted and rolling-collar Requires only eight yards of twenty-seven-inch goods. All sizes. Price of pattern, with a CLOTH MODEL, 50 cts. Mailed.

172—WAIST—Is a new and bewitching design. The back sets out just enough to give a modest, graceful effect. In any material. All sizes. Price of pattern and CLOTH MODEL, 25 cts. Mailed.

We give a perfect CLOTH MODEL with every pattern, which shows just how to put the garment together after being cut by the pattern. They are PERFECT GUIDES.

Immense Premiums Given!
Smith's Illustrated Pattern Bazaar
Only ONE DOLLAR a Year.

PREMIUM to every subscriber of patterns of their selection to the value of One Dollar, Free, OR, in place of Patterns, you may choose ONE of the following beautiful Oil Chromos, viz.: WHITTIER'S "BAREFOOT BOY," 10x14 inches; "THE UNWELCOME VISITOR," 13x17 inches; "THE MATRON," 13x17 inches; "THE PET LAMB," 14x17 inches. Two stamps must be enclosed for postage on each chromo. These pictures sell readily for from $1 to $3 each. Send two stamps for Catalogue of Styles.

CLUB.—One Chromo Extra will be given to the person who sends us three subscribers at one time. Two extra for five, etc.

"SMITH'S INSTRUCTION BOOK," or, "Secrets of Dressmaking" in Ladies' and Children's Garments will be ready in a few days. Price, 10 cents. Mailed.

A. BURDETTE SMITH,
P.O. Box 5055. 914 Broadway, New York City.

A. SELIG,

(SUCCESSOR TO S. M. PEYSER),

No. 813 Broadway, New York,

Is daily receiving new importations of rich DRESS TRIMMINGS, such as beaded LACES, GIMPS, FRINGES, BUTTONS, and ORNAMENTS of the latest styles. Also a full assortment of BERLIN ZEPHYRS, Filling, Floss and Embroidery SILKS, CHENILLES, Worsted and Silk EMBROIDERIES of every description, as STRIPS for Chairs, SLIPPERS, Footrests, Towel-racks, Fire and Light SCREENS, LAMBREQUINS and CUSHIONS in GOBLIN and any other style of EMBROIDERY. GUIPURE and POINT LACE work and materials for making the same. Particular attention paid to orders.

Designing and Embroidering of every description done at the lowest possible prices.

PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, $3; SCIENCE OF HEALTH, $2; and either of Harpers, $4, all sent a year for $7, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS.
AGENTS WANTED.
SEND FOR CATALOGUE.
Domestic Sewing-Machine Co., N. Y.

THREE PAIR Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1 00. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, Dress-Trimmings, &c. Price-List sent free on application.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON
Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 39 East 33d St., N. Y.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN Dress Shields will absorb moisture and protect the Dress thoroughly. The Perforated Premium Buckskin Undergarments are recommended by all Physicians. Send for circulars. D. C. HALL & Co., 44 West Broadway, N.Y., Sole Agents and Manufacturers.

LAFONTAIN'S FRENCH COMPLEXION BEAUTIFIER removes TAN AND FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, AND FLESHWORMS. Price $1 00 per Bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 SIXTH AVENUE. Agents wanted.

GOODALL'S PLAYING CARDS.
The Best and Cheapest.
Sold Every Where.

MME. BURLETON, 21 Clinton Place, near B'way, Eighth St., West. The latest style of Fall Bonnets and Round Hats; also, Mourning Bonnets.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

Union Adams & Co.

ARE OFFERING AT VERY LOW PRICES

HOSIERY AND GLOVES,

UNDERWEAR,

Shirts & Collars,

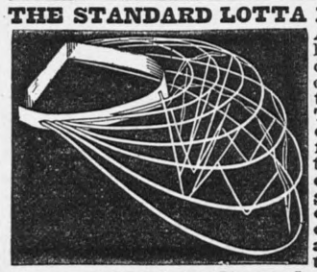
HANDKERCHIEFS,

SUSPENDERS,

ROBES, JACKETS, &c.

637 BROADWAY.

THE STANDARD LOTTA BUSTLE.



A diploma has been awarded by the American Institute to A. W. Thomas, Patentee & Manufacturer for the lightest, strongest, most durable, comfortable, elastic, and cheapest Bustle in the market. The wearer can sit in any position whatever without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree, it closing entirely up on sitting, and returning with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault). No ladies' wardrobe complete without the Standard Lotta Bustle. For sale every where. Ask for Nos. 10, 11, 15, 18, 22, &c., comprising the various sizes and styles. Patentee and Wholesale Manufacturer, 91 White St., N.Y.; & 801 Race St., Phila.

ASK YOUR STOREKEEPER FOR IT.

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, Cor. 4th St., N. Y. The largest stock of Human Hair goods in the city. Wigs made to order by the best artists. A perfect fit guaranteed. The invisible wig a specialty. No. 1, round the head; No. 2, from forehead to nape of neck; No. 3, from ear to ear across crown; No. 4, from ear to ear across forehead. Goods sent C.O.D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

ESTABLISHED 1801.
BARRY'S TRICOPHEROUS
ERADICATES
SCURF AND DANDRUFF,
Perfumes the head, and forces a new growth of
HAIR ON BALD PLACES.
Sold by Druggists every where.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.
Trade Mark. Patented.
Sold by all Druggists.

V. VIGOUROUX, 122 4th Ave., N.Y.
Stamping, Embroidering, Lingerie Establishment. Ladies' & Babies' Trousseau. Specialty of Initial Monograms for HANDKERCHIEFS, TABLE and BED CLOTHS. Wholesale Department, ☞ 69 EAST TWELFTH STREET. MACHINE AND PERFORATED PATTERNS.

DR. NOBLE'S GREAT DISCOVERY.—A certain cure for fever and ague, bilious fever, and chill fever. A tonic. Price $1 per bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 Sixth Ave. Sold every where. Agents wanted.

A. HARAUX'S STAMPING AND Embroidering Establishment is at No. 90 FOURTH AVENUE, a few doors above A. T. Stewart & Co.

HENRY PROPACH, Dressmaker, 17 East 16th St., has received the last Fall and Winter Styles. All orders will be executed in the SHORTEST TIME.

GRANDEST SCHEME EVER KNOWN.

4th Grand Gift Concert

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE

PUBLIC LIBRARY OF KENTUCKY.

12,000 CASH GIFTS, $1,500,000.

$250,000 FOR $50.

The Fourth Grand Gift Concert, authorized by special act of the Legislature, for the benefit of the Public Library of Kentucky, will take place in Public Library Hall, at Louisville, Ky.,

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1873.

Only Sixty thousand tickets will be sold. The tickets are divided into ten coupons or parts.

At this Concert, which will be the grandest musical display ever witnessed in this country, the unprecedented sum of

$1,500,000

divided into 12,000 cash gifts, will be distributed by lot among the ticket-holders.

LIST OF GIFTS.

ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		$250,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		100,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		50,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		25,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		17,500
10 CASH GIFTS	$10,000 each	100,000
30 CASH GIFTS	5,000 each	150,000
50 CASH GIFTS	1,000 each	50,000
80 CASH GIFTS	500 each	40,000
100 CASH GIFTS	400 each	40,000
150 CASH GIFTS	300 each	45,000
250 CASH GIFTS	200 each	50,000
325 CASH GIFTS	100 each	32,500
11,000 CASH GIFTS	50 each	550,000
TOTAL, 12,000 GIFTS, ALL CASH, amounting to		$1,500,000

The distribution will be positive, whether all the tickets are sold or not, and the 12,000 gifts all paid in proportion to the tickets sold.

PRICE OF TICKETS:

Whole tickets, $50; Halves, $25; Tenths, or each coupon, $5; Eleven Whole Tickets for $500; 22½ Tickets for $1,000; 113 Whole Tickets for $5,000; 227 Whole Tickets for $10,000. No discount on less than $500 worth of Tickets at a time.

Tickets now ready for sale, and all orders accompanied by the money promptly filled. Liberal terms given to those who buy to sell again.

THOS. E. BRAMLETTE,
Agent Public Library Ky., and Manager Gift Concert, Public Library Building, Louisville, Ky.
Or THOS. H. HAYS,
609 Broadway, New York.

PATENT Sewing-Silk Veil

In the above we have overcome the great difficulty, formerly experienced, of procuring a veil with a fringing of the exact shade. The fringes in our veil being woven at the same moment, and with the same material throughout, consisting of the best quality of sewing silk, a reliance may be placed upon their exactness of match, and of their durability, in every respect, the same wearing double the length of time over that of any other veil ever made. Sold in all Fancy, Millinery, and Dry-Goods Houses in the U. S.

Patentees and Sole Manufacturers,
MEYENBERG, PRALL, & CO.,
483 & 485 Broadway, N. Y.

FALL IMPORTATIONS.

MILLER & GRANT,

879 Broadway, N. Y.,

ARE DAILY RECEIVING

NEW IMPORTATIONS OF RICH LACES, EMBROIDERIES, RIBBONS, DRESS TRIMMINGS, &c., &c.

ALSO, NOVELTIES IN FANCY GOODS.

☞ ELEGANT DESIGNS IN OXIDIZED SILVER.

WATERS' CONCERTO PARLOR ORGANS

are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. The CONCERTO STOP is the best ever placed in any Organ. It is produced by a third set of reeds peculiarly voiced, the EFFECT of which is MOST CHARMING and SOUL STIRRING, while its IMITATION of the HUMAN VOICE is SUPERB. Terms liberal.

A GREAT OFFER. HORACE WATERS & SON, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of 100 PIANOS and ORGANS of first-class makers, including WATERS', at extremely low prices for cash, or part cash, and balance in small monthly payments. New 7-Octave first-class PIANOS, all modern improvements, for $275 cash. Organs $55, $75. DOUBLE-REED ORGANS, $100; 4-STOP, $110; 8-STOP, $125, upwards. ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES MAILED for one stamp. A large discount to Ministers, Churches, Sunday-Schools, Temperance Societies, Lodges, etc. AGENTS WANTED.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

ICE PLANT.—A sparkling beauty for pot or basket; apparently covered with Crystal Ice; indigenous here. 100 fresh seed mailed for $1. Liberal additions for larger orders. Address A. BLAKELY, San Diego, Cal.

MISS M. E. COOK, 461 Sixth Avenue. Suits, Redingotes, Sacques, Ladies' and Children's Undergarments, Corsets, Infants' Wardrobes, Wedding Trousseaux. Agent for Love's Celebrated Hand-Made Corsets, also made to order. MME. JACOBS.

Hosted by Google

RETAIL.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

BLACK, COLORED, AND

FANCY SILKS.

In consequenee of the

DECLINE OF PRICES

in

FRANCE,

they will offer as follows:

BLACK SILKS,

an article of excellent value heretofore sold at

$3 25 reduced to $2 50.

$2 75 reduced to $2 25.

$2 25 reduced to $1 50.

In

SUBSTANTIAL VALUE

an equal, probably, has never been offered in this country.

In COLORED and

FANCY SILKS,

a reduction in the same ratio has been made.

AN UNEQUALLED ASSORTMENT

in ELEGANT variety is on exhibition, and BUYERS will find this opportunity an EXCEPTIONAL ONE for purchasing.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

Ladies!

SEND STAMP FOR OUR ELEGANT AND ATTRACTIVE

FALL CATALOGUE

Containing full descriptions and prices of

Fine Furs,
Real Laces,
Black Silks,
Ladies' and Children's Underwear,
Millinery Goods,
Dress Trimmings,

AND THOUSANDS OF ARTICLES INDISPENSABLE FOR LADIES' WEAR.

Samples Sent Free.

Goods shipped C. O. D. to any part of the country, with accompanying order to Express Agent, allowing full examination before acceptance.

EHRICH & CO.,

287 & 289 8th Ave., near 24th St.,

NEW YORK.

GRAND EXPOSITION OF

Fall & Winter Garments.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

HAVE OPENED THEIR PARIS & CITY MADE

EVENING PROMENADE & RECEPTION

COSTUMES,

CAMEL'S-HAIR AND CASHMERE DOLMANS, MANTLES, &c.,

Combining the most RECHERCHE NOVELTIES introduced this season.

The following departments have now on exhibition full and complete assortments of the latest fabrics and at the LOWEST PRICES, viz.:

PLAIN, COLORED, AND FANCY SILKS.
BLACK SILKS.
IRISH POPLINS.
BLACK AND COLORED VELVETS.
PARIS EMBROIDERIES.
RICH LACES.
PARASOLS AND UMBRELLAS.
FRENCH AND ENGLISH DRESS GOODS.
CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, AND COATINGS.
FURS AND FUR TRIMMINGS.

GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING DEPARTMENT.

INFANTS', MISSES', & LADIES'

Furnishing Departments,

COMPLETE OUTFITS (ready made and to order).

INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS AND SCARFS,

CASHMERE AND WOOLEN SHAWLS.

Mourning Goods Department

REPLETE WITH EVERY NOVELTY.

HOSIERY AND UNDERWEAR

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

BLANKETS, FLANNELS, QUILTS.

Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

FALL IMPORTATIONS.

BLACK CASSIMERES & MERINOS,
BOMBAZINE & EMPRESS CLOTH.
Henrietta, Tamise, and Persian Cloth.
Crepe, Parisienne, and Bombazine Cloth.
Drap d'Ete Cloth.
BLACK ALPACAS,
BLACK SILKS,
STRIPED SILKS,
SERGES FOR SUITINGS.

Complete Suits of Monrning, ready made or to order, on a few hours' notice.

JACKSON'S,

BROADWAY AND WAVERLEY PLACE.

FLOWERS.—WINDOW GARDENING.

Ladies, send stamp for Specimen Copy (free) of THE LADIES' FLORAL CABINET.—A beautiful new Home Paper, devoted to Flowers, Window Gardening, and Parlor Decorations. Exquisitely illustrated. Ladies will be delighted with it. Delightful home pictures of society. Amusements, with useful hints on housekeeping and Elegancies.

Price $1 50 per year, including 3 Choice Chromos.
" $1 25 " " " 1 " "

☞ GET UP A CLUB. AGENTS WANTED. Send for terms.

WINDOW GARDENING.—A New Book, superbly illustrated, devoted to Culture of Plants, Bulbs, and Flowers for in-doors, with handsome illustrations of Hanging Baskets, Ferneries, and Parlor Decorations. 250 Engravings. Price $1 50. Sent, postpaid, by mail. Book Stores have it.

EVERY WOMAN HER OWN FLOWER GARDENER.—By Daisy Eyebright. A charming New Book on Flowers and Out-Door Gardening for Ladies. Price 50c., or bound in cloth, $1 00. Sent by mail, postpaid.

THE LADIES' CABINET INITIAL NOTE-PAPER.—Rose or Violet Tinted; your own initial. Superb novelty. Handsome present. Highly perfumed. Attractive Chromo on each Box. Price 50c. a Box. 100 Papers at Club Rates. Send stamp for List.

Illustrated Prospectus and Premium List of all the above free on receipt of stamp. Address THE LADIES' FLORAL CABINET, OFFICE, 5 BEEKMAN STREET, NEW YORK. P. O. Box 2445.

STERN BROTHERS,

SIXTH AVE. & TWENTY-THIRD STREET,

367 SIXTH AVE., 367

110 WEST 23d ST., 110

Having completed their extensive alterations in fitting up the upper part of their

SIXTH AVENUE BUILDING

For the exclusive use of

LADIES' SUITS, REDINGOTES, CLOAKS, DOLMANS, AND CAPES,

☞ With an entirely new and elegant line of

LADIES' & CHILD'S UNDERGARMENTS, LADIES' MOURNING WRAPPERS, HOOP-SKIRTS, AND CORSETS, INFANTS' GOODS, &c.,

Are now prepared to offer

GREAT INDUCEMENTS

in all the above lines of goods, consequent upon taking advantage of the present state of the market in buying LARGE LOTS FOR CASH.

☞ Ladies out of the city, in ordering, can depend upon getting the utmost value, and only first-class goods, OR THE SAME CAN BE RETURNED.

THE LAGEST ASSORTMENT OF

DRESS AND CLOAK TRIMMINGS, GUIPURE, YAK, & THREAD LACES, RIBBONS, AND MILLINERY GOODS

To be found in the city.

OUR OWN IMPORTATIONS.

ESPECIAL ATTENTION PAID TO ORDERS.

STERN BROTHERS.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Every baby must have it. Is THOROUGHLY WATER-PROOF, protects clothing, retains linen diaper. avoids pins, permits circulation of air. Recommended by physicians and all mothers whose children have worn them. Made in 4 sizes—1, smallest; 4 largest—exclusively by EUREKA DIAPER CO., 532 Broadway, N. Y. Sample mailed on receipt of $1. Sold also by Stewart, Claflin, Lord & Taylor, Arnold & Constable and first-class Infants Clothing, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA DIAPER; see they bear stamp of EUREKA PATENT DIAPER CO. Take no other. Agents wanted.

FINE FURS.

A large assortment, at less than manufacturers' prices. Send for Price-List. Orders promptly attended to and sent C. O. D., with privilege of examination.

J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

$5to$20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments, or all the time, than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

$475 A MONTH and expenses to good Canvassers. Articles new and staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. LINNGTON, Chicago.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.

HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old)	" 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)	" 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt	" 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT	" 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT	" 43
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)	" 50

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT	" 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt	" 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)	" 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT	" 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT	" 17
LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 23
GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 24
BLOUSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 28
LADIES' AND MISSES' BATHING OR GYMNASTIC SUIT	" 30
PLEATED WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 32
ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT	" 39
DEMI-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT, with Basque Back and Square Front	" 43

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

$72 00 EACH WEEK. Agents wanted every where. Business strictly legitimate. Particulars free. Address J. WORTH & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Harper & Brothers' Latest Publications.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.

NAST'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC FOR 1874. With 86 Original Illustrations by THOMAS NAST. Price 25 cents.

II.

DAWSON'S EARTH AND MAN. The Story of the Earth and Man. By J. W. DAWSON, LL.D., F.R.S., F.G.S., Principal and Vice-Chancellor of McGill University, Montreal. With Twenty Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

III.

THE LAND OF MOAB. The Result of Travels and Discoveries on the East Side of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. By H. B. TRISTRAM, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Master of the Greatham Hospital, and Honorary Canon of Durham. With New Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. Cloth, $2 50.

IV.

FLAMMARION'S ATMOSPHERE. The Atmosphere. Translated from the French of CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Edited by JAMES GLAISHER, F.R.S., Superintendent of the Magnetical and Meteorological Department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. With 10 Chromo-Lithographs, and 86 Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

V.

TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS. The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. (Uniform with Tyerman's "Life of John Wesley.")

VI.

THE BAZAR BOOK OF HEALTH. The Dwelling, the Nursery, the Bedroom, the Dining-Room, the Parlor, the Library, the Kitchen, the Sick-Room. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. (Uniform in style and price with the "Bazar Book of Decorum.")

VII.

CASTELAR'S OLD ROME AND NEW ITALY. Old Rome and New Italy. By EMILIO CASTELAR. Translated by Mrs. ARTHUR ARNOLD. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

THE NEW NOVELS

OF

THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

1.

THE TWO WIDOWS. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Denis Donne," "Called to Account," "Played Out," "A Passion in Tatters," "The Dower House," "Maud Mohan," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

2.

MISS DOROTHY'S CHARGE. By FRANK LEE BENEDICT, Author of "My Daughter Elinor," "Miss Van Kortland," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

3.

STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "Birds of Prey," "Lovels of Arden," "To the Bitter End," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

4.

A SIMPLETON: A Story of the Day. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

5.

TOO SOON: A Study of a Girl's Heart. By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID, Author of "Patty," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

6.

INNOCENT. A Tale of Modern Life. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," "Chronicles of Carlingford," "John: a Love Story," "Brownlows," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

EVERYBODY LIKES a beautiful complexion, and a soft, smooth skin; both are obtained by using 'Wright's Alconated Glycerine Tablet of Solidified Glycerine,' fragrant, transparent, and incomparable as a Toilet Soap. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

WORKING CLASS Male or Female, $30 a week employment at home, day or evening; no capital; instructions & valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-c. return stamp, M. YOUNG & Co., 173 Greenwich St., N. Y.

Book Canvassers Wanted.

THE Subscriber desires to call the attention of experienced and successful Book Agents to "M'CLINTOCK AND STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE." The Fifth Volume of this work is now published. This Cyclopædia is unlike any other now sold by subscription or otherwise. The other volumes will be published at about yearly intervals. Does not the sale of this work offer pecuniary advantages to Book Agents that can not be obtained on the sale of any other work now being sold by subscription? The inducements are liberal, and good Territory is yet to be had. For further particulars, inquire of or address

AVERY BILL,

Care Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Book Canvassers Wanted.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Boston, Mass.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and Carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$125 A MONTH to Lady Agents every where. Address ELLIS M'F'G Co., Waltham, Mass.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ

AN unfortunate man in Indianapolis, who lost several toes by a car wheel, was consoled by an Irishman near by with, "Whisht, there! you're making more noise than many a man I've seen with his head off."

THE END OF A BOOKWORM.—To be buried in a book.

An auctioneering firm announce their intention to dispose of "a useful brown tradesman's horse." The advertisers must have been the clever individuals who offered a reward for the recovery of a blue lady's parasol and a drab gentleman's coat.

Why is an I O U like a confirmed toper?—Invariably found in liquor.

"Gracious me!" exclaimed a lady in a witness-box, "how should I know any thing about any thing I don't know any thing about?"

A pompous philosopher extracted the following reply from an advanced free-school lad to the query,

"How is the earth divided, my lad?"

"By earthquakes, Sir."

In the advertisement of a ladies' school in Washington references are given to several defunct gentlemen and ladies, but no information is given through what medium the references may be heard from.

They have a new drink in Philadelphia called the Quaker cocktail. It is served in a broad-brimmed glass.

While a compositor on the Montreal Witness was setting up an advertisement for a lost canary, a few days ago, the bird flew in at the office window. This shows the value of advertising.

INK.

I'm tender-hearted, truly:
  Destroy a worm? Not I!
I would not e'en unduly
  Compel a flea to fly.
And yet, without compunction,
  I could—I gravely think—
That man destroy, with unction,
  Who first invented ink!

It stains my weary fingers,
  It spoils my Sunday clo's,
And through my dreams it lingers
  To banish true repose.
Mandragora nor poppy
  Can win for me a wink—
That man invented "copy"
  Who first invented ink.

'Tis well for those at gray light
  Who douse the midnight ile;
But I from dusk till daylight
  Must shed ink's fluid vile.
I straight to bottom dive must;
  They never quit the brink—
Not much in Heav'n he thrive must
  Who first invented ink.

And just when toil is over,
  And on my sofa flat
I lie as if in clover,
  I hear the post's rat-tat.
And Jobkins sends me verses,
  And Bobkins writes for chink—
On him then fall my curses
  Who first invented ink.

The average inventor
  Is mostly known to fame,
But Maunder (who's my Mentor)
  Does not record one name—
And I'm, for one, contented
  To see in Lethe sink
His name who first invented
  That hateful fluid—ink!

NOT TO BE CAUGHT.

MRS. SPRATT (hearing that Leviathan Brown, the millionaire, will marry only an economical girl, thoroughly posted in housekeeping affairs, arranges matters with her daughters). "Come in, Mr. Brown, right into the Kitchen, and see my Darlings Mending and Dusting and Baking, just as they are. Ah! you won't find them Dressed, and Loitering about in the Drawing-Room! The Dear Girls find their Pleasure in the Kitchen."

THE LATEST KIND OF VERDICT.—"Decidedly guilty, though with some little doubt as to whether he is really the right man." They hanged him, anyhow.

A man referring to the sudden death of a relative, was asked if he lived high. "Well, I can't say he did," said Terence, "but he died high." Like the banks in these days, he was suspended.

A Scotchman thus recently addressed his daughter:

"Fat's this I hear ye're gaun to dee, Jeannie?"

"Weel, I'm just gaun to marry that farm ower by there, and live wi' the bit mannie on't."

Some Dutch officials have been assassinated at Benkoelen, near Lais. How they found the place on the map, and got there, does not appear.

In a certain greenroom a couple of actors the other day got warm in discussing the Reformation, and one of them wound up his argument with the words, "That's what Martin Luther does for you!" They were overheard, and the conversation was interrupted by an outsider, who wanted to know, "When's he coming down, and what line of business does he play?" He had mistaken the reformer for some new star.

The "cast of countenance" of an English tragedian at present in Paris is described by a French critic as that of "Don Quixote giving away tracts."

"What is love, Nanny?" asked a Scotch minister of one of his parishioners, alluding, of course, to the word in its Scriptural sense.

"Hoot, fye, Sir," answered the blate Nanny, blushing to the een-holes, "dinna ask me sic a daft-like question. I'm sure ye ken as weel as me that love's just next to cholera. Love is just the worst inside complaint for a lad or lassie to have."

EXPRESSION OF MR. BROWN'S FACE ON LEAVING THE HOUSE.

In connection with the meeting of the Association for the Advancement of Science, at Lyons, the story is told of a well-known Geneva professor, that, on the occasion of one of the expeditions of the association into the country, they were thrown upon the resources of a second-rate café for refreshment. The professor demanded of the garçon if they had any chiccory.

"Yes;" and a supply was brought.

"Have you any more?"

"Certainly;" and some more made its appearance.

"Is this all?"

"Yes, monsieur, that is all our supply."

"Now, will you make us some coffee?"

EXTRACT OF MEAT—Bones, of course.

The other day, at a concert, a gentleman having put his hat upon a chair to keep a place, returned to claim it after a short absence. The hat he found sure enough where it had been left, only there was a stout lady sitting on it.

"Madam," said he, "you are sitting on my hat."

The lady blushed a little, turned round, and said, in the blandest manner, "Oh, I beg pardon! I'm sure I thought it was my husband's."

Smith has given out his latest bonbon poem. It is the following:

"Two places on the earth there be—
One where my girl is not, the other there is she."

The other day a Dublin tutor who had repeatedly to reprimand a youth for inability to find an article if it was the least out of its usual position, came out in a passion with the following: "I suppose if you found your head not on its usual place some day, you wouldn't know where to go and look for it."

MORE CURIOUS THAN A WOMAN.—Talk about the curiosity of women! We will back a fly against any woman. Just watch him as he traverses a bald man's cranium, halts on the eyelid, and, taking a cursory glance around him, waltzes over to the end of the nose, peeps up one nostril, and having satisfied his curiosity there, curvets over the upper lip and takes a glance up the other. With a satisfactory smile at having seen all there is to be seen there, he makes a bee-line for the chin, stopping a moment to explore the cavity formed by the closed lips. Arriving at the chin, he takes a notion to creep down under the shirt collar, but suddenly hesitating, he turns round as if he had forgotten something, and proceeds to an exploration of the ears. This concluded, he carries out his original intention, and disappears between the neck and shirt collar, emerging, after the lapse of some minutes, with an air seeming to say he had performed his duty. What matter the frantic attempts to catch him, the enraged gestures, and the profane language? They disturb his equanimity not a moment. Driven from one spot, he alights on another; he finds he has only got a duty to perform, and he does it.

A correspondent says that "kissing a lady with an Elizabethan ruff on is about as much fun as embracing a circular saw going at a weak pace."

Which is the vainest bird, the peacock or the weathercock?

SHE "DIDN'T FRIGHTEN."—A pious old lady at New Bedford boasted in prayer-meeting that she wasn't afraid of the devil. A young chap present, with a view to testing her faith and courage, followed her home, and in a lonely, secluded spot, crept up behind her and whispered, "I am the devil." But the good woman never heeded him, and again and again he introduced himself in the same style. Finally, finding the thing was getting monotonous, she turned to him with the ejaculation, "Well, nobody denies it." That young man don't follow the frightening business any more.

A RUMOR THAT QUICKLY SPREADS—A peacock's tail.

TEN GOLDEN RULES.

Never leave off wearing a coat unless you have another to take its place.

Never trouble another to eat a dinner you have ordered for yourself.

Never lend a quarter if you have only ten cents in your pocket.

Never buy a watch if you can get some one to give it to you.

Never ask your principal creditor the best way to go through the Bankruptcy Court.

Never attempt to eat soup with a tooth-pick when there is a spoon handy.

Never take your boots to be mended by a cobbler whom you have offended.

Never wear your old hat if you can borrow a new one.

Never order a steak at a place where your credit is bad, and the waiter wears strong boots.

Never pay a bill unless you have sufficient money to spare.

A boy of sixteen, employed the other day in manipulating some old government stores, thought, from the smell, that two small pills which he found must be gunpowder. He tried with a match, and found that he was correct in his surmises. The jury returned a verdict of accidental death. This precocious youth adds another to the long list of martyrs to science.

A certain army surgeon applied to the Sanitary Commission for "consecrated beef and desecrated vegetables."

Upon the marriage of Mrs. Wheat, of Virginia, the editor hopes that her path may be floury, and that she may never be thrashed by her husband.

AN INCOMPLETE EDUCATION.

"What! Shivering in the Middle of August! How's that?"
"Oh, Sir, please, Sir, we was only Taught 'ow to Beg in the Winter-Time, Sir!"

ANY EXCUSE IN A STORM.

SWEET EMMELINE (to her love, who is enjoying a nice sail). "Do you feel Seasick, Richard dear?"
RICHARD (with wonderful bravery). "No, no. Umph! I think the Shrimps I had for Breakfast this Morning must have been Alive!"

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 44.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

A PLEA FOR MY SHADY WINDOW.

IN the cultivation of window or greenhouse plants all true lovers of flowers have had some experience; for no one who enjoys the beauty of the summer garden, and plants and tends and gathers for months from that luxuriant store, can altogether forego the pleasure of having something green and growing to cheer and interest her during the long winter, while nature is asleep under the snow. So, while the days are still soft and balmy and the nights free from heavy frosts, the provident florist begins preparations for the winter garden that is to bloom in every window of her parlor, making there a continual greenness and fragrance until the spring-time shall come once more. It is only October, but none too soon to pot the geraniums, and take cuttings of the salvias, and cut back the fuchsias and all the tall plants that are to be housed for next season. One can not quite consent to abandon the overgrown favorites that have made the garden so gorgeous, so they are trimmed into convenient sizes, and brought in under shelter until the weather has really become cold. By thus beginning work in good time, they will recover themselves nicely before it is time to bring them in-doors, and need not be placed in a stove room until some weeks later. Then we separate the winter bloomers from those that are merely to be housed for next summer, putting them into less conspicuous places, but giving our choicest nooks and sunniest windows to the lovely sweet jasmines and Chinese primroses, oxalis, geraniums, and other companion favorites, which will soon be very gay with blossoms. Verbenas may

Fig. 1.—BLACK SILK HOUSE DRESS.—BACK.—[See Fig. 4.] For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 36-45.

Fig. 2.—DRESS FOR CHILD FROM 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD. For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 13 TO 15 YEARS OLD. For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—BLACK SILK HOUSE DRESS.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 1.] For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 36-45.

FIGS. 1-4.—LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S FALL AND WINTER SUITS.

Hosted by Google

remain out until quite hard frosts have blackened the tops of many of the tenderer plants, and then, if you desire to preserve specimens of the different colors for next season's bedding, you have only to take up some of the little roots and crowd them together into a shallow box, and set them in a place where they will be safe from freezing. There they will quietly flourish until spring, when they can easily be separated for setting out.

But what shall we do if there be no sunny window for these blooming flowers—only north exposures, which no one need choose for a window-garden? Must we give up all prospects of a greenery merely because circumstances are thus unpropitious? Not willingly; so we turn to the lovely fern family, and there, among the wonderful tribe of cryptogams, depend upon it, we shall find all we ought to desire. Here are mosses and lycopodiums, and all the curious and beautiful ferns of this and other countries, hundreds of varieties, ready for you to choose from. Besides, you may plant a variegated begonia, or any other thing that loves the damp, in among them, and let them flourish together under your glass, for glass they must have, if you would see your fernery in perfection. A Wardian case is the best thing for this purpose. As to the cost, that will be no more than for an ordinary table, such as one would purchase for the parlor, but here, all in one, we have table and garden besides. The zinc-lined tray contains the earth, rich leaf mould from the woods, and, once planted, the glass cover will produce a damp atmosphere around the ferns that will keep them ever green. They will require little attention beyond an occasional watering with a fine rose, and will retain their beauty for years. My own window-garden has one of these in the centre, and side brackets support pots from which ivy is trained up on either side until it completely encircles the window, meeting overhead in the centre, where a hanging basket is suspended. From that droop graceful plants of tradescantia, saxifrage, and Kenilworth ivy, the whole forming a bower from which I can look out as from a green curtain, and it is an all-sufficient screen from outside observation.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

☞ A Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains more reading matter than an average octavo volume. The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for October 25 was sent out gratuitously a splendidly illustrated

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing a further installment of "PHINEAS REDUX," with an illustration, and other literary and pictorial attractions.

Another EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for November 1.

☞ A Cut Paper Pattern of the new and popular Tight-fitting Double-breasted Redingote, with French Round Skirt, will be published with our next Number. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 703.

THE SINGLE WOMAN.

ONE of the most extreme forms of contempt with which a good wife is ever visited is that in which some one calls her a "married old maid." Under such reproach she is expected to abase herself, and incontinently mend her ways, as far as may be, by abandoning precision and regularity in favor of the disorderly and slatternly style preferred by her reprover. One would naturally suppose, from the form of the anathema, that to be an "old maid" at all was to be in that state of outer darkness where the unconverted gnash their teeth, but to be a "married old maid" was simply to cling to evil after conversion and the experience of grace!

Yet what is the really obnoxious point eliciting the reproach? It is simply a confession that the single woman has discovered an economy of time, of labor, and of temper by having a place for every thing, and every thing in its place; that she has learned that only positive genius can afford to disregard method and routine, not because the routine, if genius could adopt it, would not be more advantageous in the long-run, but because Pegasus can not work in harness, while there are too few of us having positive genius to make it worth considering; and that, conscious of every body's obligations to the world and the Maker of the world, she disposes of herself and her surroundings in such wise as to meet those obligations in the readiest way possible. And is it, after all, so depraved a habit to insist, for instance, upon keeping free of dust and dirt? Sooner or later we must return to our primal element, we know; but need we hasten the day? Is it so unwise a course, that of having one's belongings in such order that a hand can be laid on them in the dark? Is it really, in point either of health or of gratification, so flagitious to take an exquisite care of the person? And is it a positive weakness to let the heart melt over a tale of woe, however false, or to extend kindness to the otherwise unprotected animals who partially shield one from loneliness? Yet all this is the short-coming of the typical "old maid." Qualities producing such results are the ones most ridiculed in her; and we must confess that we believe the picture has always been drawn by her two practical enemies, the single man and the slovenly wife.

According to our belief, it is the duty of every wife, as well as of every maid, to do all these things, and not to leave the rest undone. It does not follow that because she is neat and methodical, she is to harass the life out of every one who is not; that in order to have her wise way, she is to keep herself in everlasting strife. The quiet word, the discreet manner, obviate all that, and there is peace in the house, and order too. But for our own part, we have never succeeded in meeting the typical person spoken of above. If she ever existed, she is, for all our research, as extinct as the dodo. The spinsters of our acquaintance are not gaunt and spiny furies; they are plump and debonair women—two or three of them usually living together in the best of spirits, with few cares or vexations or restraints from the outer world; and if they have not the great blessings that happy marriages confer, they have at least the satisfaction of feeling that they are not the victims of unhappy marriages, and that their lives and nerves are unconsumed in the vain endeavor to pamper and please somebody out of whom all loving effort could only succeed in manufacturing a tyrant. They have their long friendships that have lasted since their school-girl days, and that they have found the time to cultivate and to enjoy; their house is the charmed resort of the children of married friends, of nephews and nieces; if they earn money, they work as they please, without hampering, and spend without interference; if they have an income, there is no one to accuse them of wasting it in those charities that delight their souls; their church, their sewing societies, their book clubs, their gossips, are perpetual pleasures; they have the minister to worship, if still unsatisfied—always a good lay figure for the purpose; and the children whom sometimes, in that great longing of the mother-heart which is a part of every woman, they adopt turn out quite as well as their neighbors' children do, if not a little better.

Or, if they are not the fortunate controllers of a home of their own, these single women whom we have met are sojourners in the families of sisters and brothers, and are acting there as a constant breakwater to every wave of trouble. They rock the cradle in these families, and take the baby to wean, and look over the wash, and mend the clothes, and darn the stockings; they remember the recipes for the richest cake and the best preserves, make the cookies and the turn-overs, spread the bread with jam between meals for the hungry little mouths, make up the luncheon baskets, catch together the surreptitious rents, compose quarrels, get punishments condoned, and smuggle up the longed-for bit of gingerbread to the child sent supperless to bed. In sickness they do the nursing, they do the sitting-up at night, they make the messes, take the doctor's directions, dress the blisters, and are present at the surgical operations. When company comes, the queen is in the parlor eating bread and honey—that is, entertaining and being entertained, for dignity requires it as the head of the house; but the single woman, fortunately, has no dignity to maintain: she can run errands in her morning gown, and see the too early caller, and is now to be found superintending and overlooking, and often doing, till all is as it should be, in order to maintain her sister's or brother's reputation for elegant hospitality. She is expected to do for every body, but to have little done for her; to feel for every body, but to have no feelings of her own. In fact, she is performing the office of friend and lady, nurse, housekeeper, and servant; and usually with no other reward than the pittance of her clothes, which, by some unaccountable process of reasoning, are considered to be a gift. But what the house would be without this single woman in it—companion, reconciler, helper—one can hardly conjecture. Frequently she is well enough appreciated and known to be invaluable; but let the contrary be the case, and let sickness, or death, or even possibly a late marriage, take her away, and then only too soon it is realized that blessings brighten as they take their flight.

Even possibly marriage may take her away, we said just now; for it seems to be formally recognized, in total forgetfulness of the adage which says, "There never swam a goose so gray but what could find a mate," that the single woman never had the chance to "improve her condition." It never seems to be supposed for a moment that she is unmarried because she is faithful to an early attachment; because she will not debase herself by marriage without love; because she will not take a husband at a pinch; because, in short, she is too virtuous or too fastidious.

It is possible that there may come a time when people will learn to let alone that in the affairs of others which does not concern themselves, when the things belonging to an individual's private and inner life may remain unquestioned, and only conformity with the requirements of law and society be considered. In that time the "old maid" will receive an equal respect with the "old bachelor." Why this is not the case to-day is a riddle for the Sphinx. Certainly the one wrongs nobody by her celibacy, for it is not to be presumed but that, with her feminine need of leaning and loving, she would have married long ago if the right person had sought her; but the other, in the surplusage of women, has the world before him where to choose, and by his willfully single state he wrongs a good wife of a good husband, children of a protecting father, and the community of a member who has some better stake in society and the well-being of the race and the world than his poor stocks and bonds. Still the planet has moved, ever since the days of GALILEO, at any rate; and as the typical "old maid" slowly fades into a thing of the past, and remains typical of nothing but the envy and malice of her slanderers, her successor espouses a career, a trade, an occupation, and is beginning to meet with whatever portion of honor may be due her as a human being, and one performing her duty in her day and generation: so that, after all, the wife may thank her stars if she is never saluted with worse reproach than that of being a "married old maid."

VIVE LA FRANCE!

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

JUST as grace had been vouchsafed me to preach, through the Bazar, to a world lying in wickedness the gospel of every man's ownership in himself, whether he be artist, author, or hod-carrier, the following paragraph in the daily paper fell under my notice:

"A French provincial paper has been sentenced to pay fifty francs each to seventeen persons whose names are published on a list of pilgrims. The publication was true and harmless, but French law forbids journals to meddle with the private affairs of individuals."

It is no longer surprising that the French have paid their war tax to the Germans with unparalleled promptness. They lay the axe at the root of the tree. When, scarcely three years ago, France was crushed to the earth, bleeding, prostrate, beneath the unsparing heel of Prussia, who could have believed that she would so soon arise, alert, erect, elastic? In this short time she has paid her enormous impost, freed herself from the foot of the invader, and is ready to tread once more the old path to glory, if, indeed, this new path be not better—the path of industry, economy, thrift, and quiet; the path bordered with happy homes and trodden by happy feet.

Why did not France faint under her burden, and falter into a third, fourth, fifth rate nation, as was so often prophesied? The answer is easy. France cherishes the individual. National greatness depends upon individual character. A nation is patriotic, self-sacrificing, noble, according as the individuals which compose it are noble, self-sacrificing, patriotic. Individuals are great according as they are left to grow. Of two trees planted and cultivated alike, the one which is defended from harm thrives, and the one that is suffered to be a tying-post to every team that draws up before the grocery, to be gnawed by every hungry horse and whittled by every roving urchin, dwindles to a sickly, spindling dwarf. France, wise in her generation, recognizes this fact, and in the day of her sore need finds her account in it. She stands over her citizens with a drawn sword, and protects the right of private persons to their privacy. She will not have their names so much as mentioned. It is no matter that what you say of them is true. You shall not say it. It is no matter that what you say is harmless. You shall not say it. Honey and gall are alike illegal. French law forbids journals to meddle with the private affairs of individuals. Talk about personal liberty! One would barter a good deal of personal liberty for a little of this sweet tyranny. Talk of the freedom of the press! Oh for one hour of this beautiful, beneficent censorship of the press—this decent and decorous despotism!

We have our free schools and Sunday-schools, our trial by jury, our caucuses and town-meetings, and we debase ourselves before the Dagon of publicity, drag alike the trivialities and the sanctities of life into the open day; and so far from framing laws against it, we let men arise here and there and justify it. We not only do these things, but take pleasure in them that do them. The strong and active disapprobation that once greeted such profaneness is melting, or deadening into indifference, yielding before a prurient curiosity. We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

France has never boasted of her free schools, to my knowledge. DE TOCQUEVILLE complimented us by a closer study than many of our own statesmen give; LEFEBVRE is never weary of praising us; and the good DE GASPARIN stuck closer than a brother through all the ups and downs of our civil war. The gallant nation, as modest as brave! (Shall I take rank hereby as an original discoverer?) But this great country that would learn of us might first teach us a lesson it is richly worth while to know. Without free schools or town-meeting, priest-ridden it may be, and overburdened with her BOURBONS and BONAPARTES, she has contrived to distill the fine essence of learning and liberty and religion, the last result of chivalry and courtesy. Spite of all defects in her institutions, all inferiority in her methods, her delicacy and dignity and reverence for "the holy spirit of man" have crystallized into law, while we are still floundering about in gross and vapid personalities. What are the public consequences? When France is weighted, every man rounds his back to the burden. The private individual, whose privacy she has so jealously guarded, brings out of his private hoard wherewithal to compass her swift redemption. He rejoices to ransom the country that has protected his peace as well as his purse from the spoiler, and in protecting his peace has indirectly but effectually filled his purse.

We boast American energy, and when a gossip prints that A, the artist, has a pink sofa and a yellow carpet in his dining-room, the American critic yawns, and says that public curiosity respecting artists is a fixed fact, and we may as well give in to it. What does the effete monarchy of Europe do? Takes the gossip by the throat, and makes him pay ten dollars! How long would public curiosity be a fixed fact if the curiosity-monger had to pay ten dollars a word for every paragraph he wrote to gratify it? How strenuously would the newspapers permit B, the poet, to go to the Isles of Shoals in peace; how silently would they survey the feet of C, the preacher, beautiful upon the mountains; with what profound indifference would they suffer D, the statesman, to go back and forth between Saratoga and New York, if they were mulcted in a good golden eagle for every word they uttered concerning his movements? Fly swifter round, ye wheels of time, and bring the welcome day when our dear but derelict country shall not only have established freedom in the coarser concerns of life, but shall rival France in the strictness and imperiousness with which, either by velvet glove or iron hand, she defends the inalienable rights of privacy, and protects humble but innocent citizens against those roaring and reporting lions that walk up and down society, seeking whom they may devour!

And hasten, O Bazar, to print this paper, lest some pestilent fellow arise and quench the bright millennial spark by affirming that France has no such law, and that there, as here, every man does that which is right and lucrative, "spicy" and "racy," and "taking" in his own eyes; that there, as here, a person belongs not to himself, but to all who may, however wrongly, be supposed to take an interest in the details of his garb, history, or journeyings—

"For, so to interpose a little ease,
Let our frail thoughts dally with false surmise."

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FASHIONABLE dress-makers, who receive the choicest and therefore the latest importations from Paris, have just exhibited their selections, and a review of them will settle any indecision that may have been felt about the best styles for the winter. The new costumes combine simplicity with richness, by using plain styles and rich fabrics. Modistes say the change may not be marked at present, but will come gradually, and the height of the season will show far more simple dressing than is now seen. This will be specially true of street dresses, such as the short suits of woolen fabrics that are worn in the morning, afternoon, and indeed for general day wear, church, shopping, etc.

Hosted by Google

ROUND SKIRTS.

Round skirts are again the fashion. "No lady in Paris walks out in a dress that touches the ground," is the report of leading modistes just returned from abroad. The Bazar has said this repeatedly while deploring the draggled skirts of American women, and is glad to chronicle the fact that it has become the fashion here to walk in the trim French skirt, round, short, and narrow. The new skirts are "round," inasmuch as they appear to be of the same length all around, instead of training slightly behind; short, because they escape the ground; and narrow, because their greatest width is from three yards to three and a quarter. The usual number of narrow gores is used for these skirts, and they are made to cling flatly in front and on the sides by tapes attached to the second side seams, and tied behind the person, or else by wearing them over the new sloping bustles.

WORTH'S NOVELTY IN SKIRTS.

While speaking of skirts we must not omit to mention a new feature found in Worth's skirts, an innovation that produces a pretty effect, though somewhat opposed to the short skirts we have just described, and intended more particularly for carriage dresses made partly of silk and partly of velvet. This consists of a narrow skirt of five breadths, viz., a wide gored front breadth, one narrow gore on each side, and two full straight back breadths. This brings a seam down the back, and this seam is left open three-eighths of a yard from the bottom; the flounce which surrounds the skirt is taken in this seam, and held there in deep triple pleats, adding an extra breadth, and giving a graceful fan or pigeon tail slope to the slightly drooping skirt. The dresses in which this skirt is used are worthy of description, as they represent other stylish features, and because they have met with general approval. First is a carriage and reception costume of dark brown with pink hues, like old-fashioned ashes-of-roses, and is combined with pink silk. The skirt has the front breadth of pink silk, representing an under-petticoat, with a row of cut steel buttons down the front, and milliners' folds on each side of the buttons. A flounce of the brown silk surrounds the other widths, and is pleated in behind. The very long over-skirt of four straight breadths of brown silk springs open from the belt in front, disclosing the pink tablier, and is without any trimming, though faced under the edges with pink silk. The basque is square, opening over a pink vest, with revers and flaring collar, and also coat sleeves. The reader's attention is called to the plain long over-skirt with square corners, utterly without ornament, the single flounce on the lower skirt, the plain tablier with merely buttons and folds, and the simple untrimmed basque, for it is in these features that the stylish simplicity of new costumes consist. A second dress is of the conventional black silk and velvet, one of those handsome street costumes in which Worth excels. The silk skirt has two scant velvet flounces placed quite apart, and edged with the universally worn side pleating of silk an eighth of a yard deep. The lower flounce is pleated in the back seam at the bottom. The over-skirt, sloping backward from the front of the belt, and almost concealing the back of the lower skirt, consists of two straight breadths of silk each two yards long, edged with a bias velvet fold, left open up the back, draped in voluminous but soft flat pleats behind, and tacked to the second side seam of the skirt to keep it from being blown up by the wind or displaced when the wearer sits. The plain basque is of velvet with silk sleeves.

SATIN REDIVIVUS.

Another hint in the latest importations is that satin is about to be revived. On some new dresses it is seen as velvet is now used, in the way of pipings, facings, vests, sleeveless jackets, and also in the long square single breadth on each side, which now form the only over-skirts provided for many elaborately trimmed dinner dresses.

WOOL AND SILK.

New features are also seen in the wool and silk suits just imported. There is a caprice for trimming the silk skirts of such suits with silk flounces bound and headed by bands of the camel's-hair used for the over dress; on some silk skirts there are so many camel's-hair bands that it is difficult to tell which is the dress and which the trimming. Redingotes are as long and flat as possible in front, with basque backs, or else a shaped flat trimming that extends the whole length of the back. Many stylish polonaises have the back cut in Marguerite shape, with the side body seam beginning in the shoulder instead of in the armhole. Bands of the new silver-marten fur (which is said to be coon-skin) are used for trimming redingotes of diagonal cloths, and a gay fancy is an Indian border like that on India shawls for edging camel's-hair polonaises. The silk or velvet skirts worn with fine wool redingotes are simply trimmed alike all around, instead of having fanciful tabliers, and must escape the ground.

Notwithstanding the introduction of novelties for trimming, the prevailing taste is for long plain redingotes, without ornament other than necessary buttons, pockets, cuffs, and collar, and which depend for their beauty upon their perfection of fit, their adaptability, and good material. Some of these have the round revers collar of velvet or silk, while others are buttoned close to the throat, and finished with a standing silk collar, either made flaring or else in the English shape with turned-over points.

VELVET AND SILK.

Polka-dotted velvet in the stylish dark shades is a new fabric just received. Dark velvet polonaises with silk sleeves and silk skirts make elegant suits for winter; one much admired is of chestnut brown velvet, cut with short square basque front and Marguerite back without drapery, and square on the sides. Long looped bows of silk, with the ends caught in funnel-shaped passementerie ornaments, trim the sides, and smoked pearl buttons fasten the front. The sleeves are of lighter brown silk, and the silk skirt has a tablier of reversed pleating. Similar dresses in black velvet and silk will be very elegant.

EMBROIDERED DRESSES.

Rich dresses, that look as if copied from old portraits, have the sleeves and front breadth made entirely of open-worked embroidery on black silk placed over the colored silk of the dress, and producing a beautiful effect. For instance, a soft green silk made with plain bodice and train has a tablier of black English embroidery laid on the silk, and a single garland of roses embroidered diagonally on the front, as though it had fallen there. A sleeveless jacket, or else sleeves of the black open-work, is then added. The effect is far richer than if lace were used, and it is a matter of comment this winter that so little lace is seen. Perhaps these embroideries will supply the place of that favorite garniture. There are also embroideries of silk and jet on black tulle for black silk dresses, and colored embroidery on white tulle for light silks for evening.

VARIOUS HINTS ABOUT DRESSES.

A single row of trimming straight down the middle of the front breadth of the skirt is very stylish. For instance, a row of shell pleating, of cut steel buttons, or else three or four of the new bows made of long loops of doubled silk, with the ends finished with an ornament like the head of tassels, or the funnel-shaped affairs that suggest the upholsterer's ornaments on curtains.

Horizontal and diagonal tabliers are newer than those made of several perpendicular bands or puffs. The crosswise tabliers are reversed pleats, or else careless-looking folds, tacked on each width, or else groups of crescent-shaped folds with bands of jet trimming between each group. Diagonal tabliers are merely piped bands of the material of the trimming, or else shirred puffs.

Throat knots, side knots fastened on the left of the belt, or else a knot with long ends for the front of the waist, are ornaments found on French dresses. They are sometimes made of watered ribbon, especially on black dresses, but are most frequently of doubled silk, two or three inches wide when finished. As we have said before, the bow of the period is not regular and stiff, but is in two or three loose, long, irregular loops, united by a knotted strap; when worn on the belt, the ends hang almost to the bottom of the dress; when placed back of the side, this takes the place of the sash.

New sashes of black velvet are two long straight pendent streamers, trimmed with lace and jet, or else fringed, while half-way down them a pretty little pocket is simulated. Sashes of wide ribbon are now worn directly in the middle of the back, and consist of two long ends with the top laid over the flat loops, that avoid giving a bouffant appearance.

Tortoise-shell buttons, very large and exquisitely carved, are just introduced for trimming suits of camel's-hair, velvet polonaises, jackets, etc. They are very handsome, and also very expensive.

White silk tabliers, wrought all over with "white jet"—frosty-looking white beads—are to be used for ball dresses of white and pale-tinted silks.

Demi-trained skirts of dinner dresses are without over-skirts, but are trimmed with three kinds of trimming. The back breadths are flounced from the belt to the edge, the side breadths are covered by a long square-cornered width of satin or velvet tacked flatly to the skirt, and the front breadths have a tablier of reversed pleats or else of diagonal bands.

Sleeveless basques of light blue or pink silk, with insertions of Valenciennes lace let in the silk, are worn over dinner dresses of black silk.

The long heavy over-skirts now worn are sewed to the belts of the lower skirts, making only two pieces in the costume—that is, the basque and skirt. In such cases the over-skirt must open behind, just as the lower skirt does. Ladies will find it a good plan to tack the new over-skirts (in several places in the seams) to the lower skirt, since the simple straight breadths now used are easily blown out of place, and the beauty of the costume impaired thereby. In some plain but extravagant dresses the long straight breadths are made of doubled silk. This, however, seems useless expense, as a deep facing is quite sufficient.

FANCY JEWELRY.

The Oriental necklace of many rows of jet beads is again in fashion. The beads graduate smaller toward the back, and have but one row there, while from three to seven rows fall low on the bodice.

New French jewelry imported by the modistes is of mixed silver and gold. Ear-rings have large gold disks, with open filigree of silver above, showing the burnished gold beneath. There are coiled serpents and animals' heads of silver on buttons of French gilt and various devices. One pretty fashion for ear-rings is a gold arrow with turquoise barb, to be worn with the arrow thrust through the ear. Turquoises and pearls are the stones most seen in these fancy ornaments. Balls linked by chains are worn for fastening cuffs and collar.

For information received thanks are due Mrs. CONNELLY; Miss SWITZER; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; and ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.

PERSONAL.

SIR EDWIN LANDSEER, who died a few days since in England, was for forty-five years prominently before the art world as the first artist of his class. Many of his best sketches were gifts to the late Duchess of Bedford, at whose beautiful seat, The Doune, in Scotland, he was accustomed to spend a large part of each autumn. Indeed, it seemed to be understood that had he chosen to say the word, he might have become the husband of the duchess; but the marriage would have been unacceptable to her children, and he refrained. He never married. He was often accused, says a writer in the New York Times, of the English foible of a fondness for fine company. But in his case the excuse that CHARLES II. made for himself—viz., that the women all ran after him more than he after them—was true as regarded his fine friends; and when a man finds himself an honored and much-sought-for guest in the splendid homes of dukes and earls, where art, splendor, and intellect are to be found, it is pardonable if, especially when his natural bias particularly leads him to appreciate the beautiful in all its forms, he shows a tendency to frequent places where especially he finds it. In conversation he was very agreeable, and told a story particularly well.

—A few evenings since, at the opera, Madame NILSSON was unable to sing the part of Lucia, owing to illness. The part was undertaken at three hours' notice, and without rehearsal, by Mlle. TORRIANI, who achieved an unexpected and brilliant success. During the evening a becoming act of grateful recognition was made by NILSSON to her fair substitute by sending her a costly and beautiful bouquet, emblematic of love and peace, with a note expressing thanks for her considerate and timely assistance. Mlle. TORRIANI, who thus unselfishly consented to make her début in this country under peculiarly trying circumstances, is a young and handsome blonde, with a pure, high soprano voice and fine dramatic power, and is a valuable addition to Mr. STRAKOSCH'S popular company.

—Mr. PAUL DU CHAILLU has returned to the streets and avenues of his esteemed New York, after a scamper through the northern regions of Europe in quest of information and things with which to delight those who will flock to his lectures, and the thousands who in good time will read all about it in a volume to be issued by HARPER & BROTHERS.

—WILLIAM MINER sleeps with his fathers—cut off at one hundred and two. He was a Frenchman by birth, came to this city with LAFAYETTE, and with that eminent French gentleman assisted in the Revolutionary war. Latterly he lived at Northampton, Massachusetts, where he died.

—Miss EDMONIA LEWIS, the tinted sculptress, is in San Francisco, where she is to be honored by a public reception, designed as a mark of esteem. The papers urge the purchase of one of her works of art, but the colored brothers have their hearts set upon a banquet of the most gorge-ous description, and the colored expression of esteem will break out in that shape.

—WILLIAM EVERETT, son of the late EDWARD EVERETT, has abandoned law and authorship, and taken to the ministry. He possesses fervor and ability. His father is said to have frequently, in the latter years of his life, expressed regret at having left the pulpit for politics.

—Milan is said to be thronged with young foreigners learning vocal music, besides at least 3000 musical souls who are ready and eager for operatic or concert engagements. Boston and New England send many aspirants, among whom are Messrs. SPRAGUE and PACKARD, training for opera. Mr. JULIUS PERKINS, of Boston, a fine basso, has been engaged by MAPLESON, of London, to appear in La Favorita, Faust, and other operas. He is ranked among the very best of new bassos. Miss BARTON, of Salem, Massachusetts, has fine operatic prospects; ditto Miss ANTONIA BONNERY, of Boston; and Miss BLANCHE DAVENPORT, sister of FANNY DAVENPORT, the actress.

—Miss ANCELIA NINE, of North Adams, Massachusetts, has just entered the connubial state with one of the very many Messrs. BROWN. What a falling off! Nine to be blended, so to speak, with another, and the whole to count only as one.

—The Rev. Dr. LITTLEDALE, of England, estimates that out of the 20,000 clergy of the English Church, 10,000 are of the High-Church party, 5000 of the Low-Church, 3000 of the non-descript, and 2000 of the Broad-Church.

—The portrait of WASHINGTON, by STUART, which hangs in Faneuil Hall, Boston, was presented to the city by SAMUEL PARKMAN, the father of the physician murdered by Dr. WEBSTER.

—EDMOND ABOUT, while about in the wine-shops of Paris, discovered a waiter with a remarkable tenor voice. The Grand Opera people have undertaken his musical education. Name, CELLER; age, twenty-eight; manly form; good-looking.

—CUSTER and ROSSER, two notable men in their way, have been sketched by Professor PHELPS, who accompanied the Yellowstone expedition. "In the afternoon," he writes, "General CUSTER came over to our tent, and himself and ROSSER for an hour or more rehearsed the incidents of the war, in which they participated on opposite sides. They were fellow-cadets at West Point in 1861, ROSSER in the first and CUSTER in the second class; but owing to the necessities of the war both classes were graduated at the same time, ROSSER, however, having been ordered home two or three weeks before the close of the academic year, never received his diploma. Being a Virginian, he took service in the Confederate army, and before the close of the war he as well as CUSTER rose to the brevet rank of major-general. Both were cavalry officers, and they were pitted against each other on many a hard-fought field with varying fortunes. They were foemen at Five Forks, the Wilderness, Gettysburg, and nearly all the battle-fields of the Old Dominion. Until this occasion they had met but once since the close of the war. The interview was exceedingly pleasant and deeply interesting. Their mutual questions and explanations concerning the many combats to which they had been parties cleared up points which before were mysterious, and afforded an entertainment to their only auditor on this occasion that was well worth the trip to Dakota to enjoy. In physique as well as in the general type of their characters these two noted cavalry men are as different as could be conceived. General CUSTER is of medium stature, with body slightly inclined forward in walking, face spare, nose rather large and pointed, and hair hanging in slight curls to the shoulders. His manner is quick and nervous, and somewhat eccentric. As a soldier he is bold, dashing, and energetic. Were he a religionist, you would expect him to be a first-class fanatic, for it is impossible for such a man to do any thing by halves. ROSSER is a man about six feet two inches in height, broad and erect, with a well-knit frame, and weighing about 220 pounds. His face is round and full, his hair black, his complexion fair, and with a ruddy tinge. He impresses you in his physical presence as a man of great strength and endurance. In conversation his voice is never pitched on a high key, but is deliberate without being slow, and energetic without being demonstrative. He is one who is eminently fitted to exert great influence over men, and to retain a hold on their confidence. He is a growing man. At the close of the war he gracefully accepted the situation, came North, and entered upon the work of railway engineering. He is at present the engineer in charge of the Dakota division of the Northern Pacific Railway, and is personally superintending the operations of the extension of the line to the Yellowstone."

—Senator SUMNER has written a letter in favor of the annexation of Charlestown to Boston, and at the same time invented a new word. He says, "I doubt if the future Boston will be content until it holds and possesses all the territory which hugs the harbor bearing its name, so that in Boston Harbor nobody shall land except in Boston. Evidently Boston should contain all Bostonians, which it does not now. I know no better way of accomplishing this result than by widening the circle of its jurisdiction. But there is a stronger reason. Every capital is a natural focus of life, politically, socially, and commercially, and every person living in this natural focus properly belongs to the capital. So it is with London, Paris, and Vienna, each of which is composed of suburbs and faubourgs grouped about the original city; and so in reality it is with Boston, for the places about the city, though called by different names, are parts of the same unity, which needs nothing now but a common name." He concludes his letter by saying, "With these views, I find the various processes of annexion only a natural manifestation to be encouraged always, and to be welcomed under proper conditions of population and public opinion. I say 'annexion' rather than 'annexation.' Where a word is so much used, better save a syllable, especially as the shorter is the better." So we may count upon having a new and more graceful word for a proceeding that is of frequent occurrence.

—ALPHONSE KARR, one of the most popular of the littérateurs of Paris, is queer in this regard: A long time ago he quarreled with M. BERTIN, of the Journal des Débats, which resulted in his swearing that he would not write a line for the press for twenty years. This odd vow he faithfully kept, notwithstanding the most tempting offers. He bought a beautiful villa and garden near Nice, and became a zealous horticulturist. He sent thousands of bouquets to the Paris market, but the venture was not profitable. When the twenty years had expired KARR returned to his newspaper work, and is to-day as brilliant as ever.

—The British Premier is a little better paid than the Federal, Mr. GLADSTONE receiving, as First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer, $87,500 a year, while our cabinet ministers are shaved down to $10,000.

—PLUMONT, a celebrated Italian actress, and said to be the successor of RISTORI, will accompany SALVINI to this country. The portraits of SALVINI now ornament the more conspicuous cigar shops, barber shops, and bar-rooms of this metropolis.

—We must be on the watch for Mr. PROCTOR, the English astronomer, who is coming over to make us see stars. An English critic calls him "a perfect glutton for work, without an idle nerve in his whole body."

—Dr. BARTON is the name of the gentleman who, on being told that Mr. VOWEL was dead, quietly replied, "Let us be thankful it was neither U nor I."

—EDMUND YATES, who tells us so many things about that Shah, says that when the potentate went to Manchester and saw some six hundred buxom girls in full employment in the spinning-mills, he was so struck with the sight that he proposed to buy the whole establishment—looms, lassies, and all—especially the lassies, and transport them to Teheran; and he felt quite hurt when they told him the thing couldn't be done. E. Y. also says that Mr. Shah would get outside of his uniform and jewels during some portion of every evening, and, slipping on a plain frock-coat and plain cap, go off for a promenade, entering all sorts of shops, and generally buying a lot of toys and trinkets that our Yankee children would disdain to touch with a long stick.

—If ever there existed a body calculated to stir up another body, and set all one's nerves in a flutter, it is that young man SWINBURNE. OLIVE HARPER has met the party in London, and does not like the party. He is fearfully ugly, and so fidgety that you wish he would keep still for just one moment. He lives with his father a short distance from town, and every now and then he escapes, takes a run up to London, and has a "time." "But," says O. HARPER, "he seems to have the kindest feelings for his fellow-men. To see this famous poet (SWINBURNE) write is a terrible experience. He took a sudden inspiration in my room one day, and, without a word of explanation or apology, seated himself at my writing-table, displaced all my things, and commenced writing. His whole face worked vehemently; he pounded steadily with his left hand on the table, and his feet kept time in unison with his body to the monotonous thumping. As soon as he had finished he jumped up, seized his hat, and, with a hurried 'good-by,' rushed off to find his friend WATTS, to whom he always submits every line for criticism. His handwriting is as cranky and nervous as his manner."

—Prince ROLAND BONAPARTE, grand-nephew of NAPOLEON I., and second cousin of the late Emperor of the French, has been entered as a pupil at the British Naval Academy. He is the first BONAPARTE who has taken to the water.

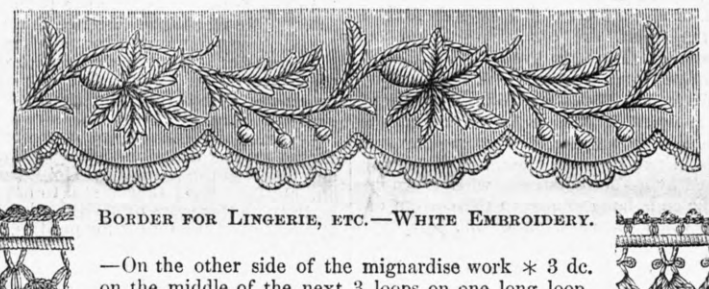
—Madame CARVALHO, who was recently a guest at the château of Baroness de Rothschild, accompanied herself in airs from MOZART'S Marriage of Figaro on the clavecin which belonged to MARIE ANTOINETTE.

Hosted by Google

VELVET MANTELET.

Velvet Mantelet.

THIS mantelet is made of brown velvet, and is trimmed with passementerie borders and agrafes of light and dark brown silk, and with brown guipure lace. Cut the mantelet from Fig. 3, No. II., of the present Supplement, paying no attention, however, to the straight line given on the pattern.



BORDER FOR LINGERIE, ETC.—WHITE EMBROIDERY.

Border for Lingerie, etc. White Embroidery.

THIS border is worked on Swiss muslin or batiste with white cotton in half-polka and satin stitch, and is bordered along the scalloped outer edge with button-hole stitches.

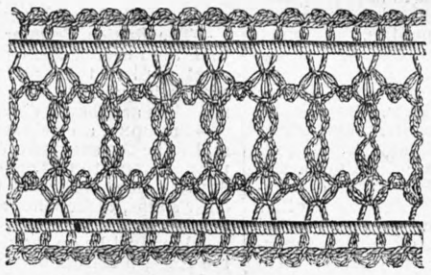


Fig. 1.—MIGNARDISE AND CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Mignardise and Crochet Insertion for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE insertions are worked with mignardise, woven, as seen in the illustration, with single standing loops on one side and treble loops fastened on one long loop on the other side, and with twisted crochet cotton, No. 80.

Fig. 1 is worked in two equal parts, counting two rounds each. First crochet on the side furnished with single loops the 1st round.—* 1 sc. (single crochet) on the next loop, 3 ch. (chain stitch), 1 sdc. (short double crochet) on the first of the 3 ch., 1 dc. (double crochet) on the sc. worked previously; repeat from *. 2d round.—On the other side of the mignardise work * 1 sc. on the first of the 3 loops on the next long loop, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the middle loop, 3 ch., 1 dc. on the last sc., 3 ch., 1 dc. on the same sc. on which the last dc. was worked, 3 ch., fasten to the same sc. on which 2 dc. have already been worked, 3 ch., 1 sc. on the third of the 3 loops on this loop, 1 p. (picot, consisting of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these); repeat from *. This completes the first half of the insertion; work the second half in a similar manner, but in working the 2d round, fasten to the finished half as shown by the illustration.

The insertion shown by Fig. 2 is also worked in two equal parts, each of which counts 3 rounds: 1st round.—On the side of the mignardise furnished with single loops work always alternately 1 sc. on the next loop, 4 ch., 1 dc. on the sc. worked previously. 2d round.—On the other side of the mignardise work * 3 dc. on the middle of the next 3 loops on one long loop, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the third of the 4 ch., 1 sdc. on the second of the 4 ch., 1 dc. on the first of the 4 ch., 3 dc. on the same loop on which the first 3 dc. were worked; repeat from *. 3d round.—Always alternately 1 slip stitch on the next ch. in the preceding round which forms the extremity of the point, 6 ch. This completes one-half of the insertion. The second half is worked in a similar manner, but in working the 3d round, fasten to the finished half as shown by the illustration.

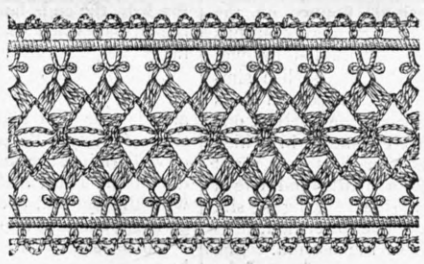

Fig. 2.—MIGNARDISE AND CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

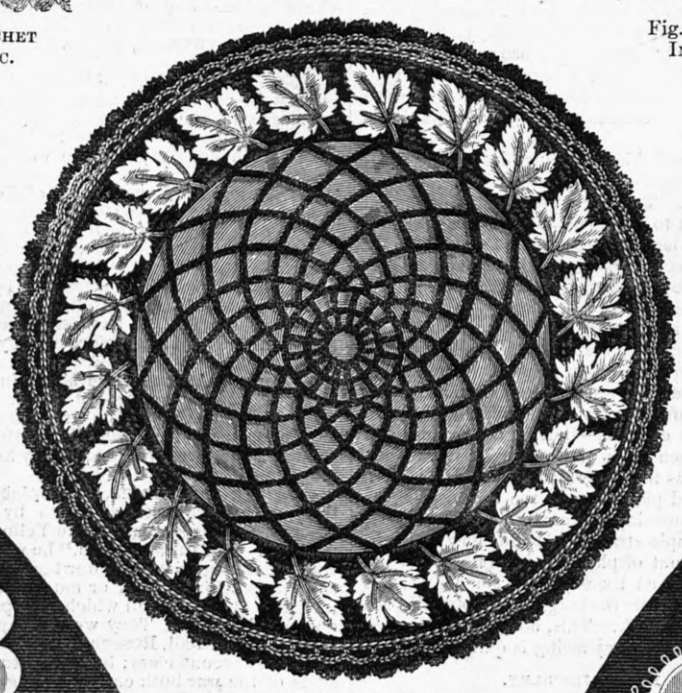
EMBROIDERED MANTELET.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Fig. 3.



MAT FOR CANDLESTICKS, VASES, BOTTLES, ETC.—CROCHET-WORK AND APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.

Mat for Candlesticks, Vases, Bottles, etc.—Crochet-Work and Application Embroidery.

THIS mat may be worked in any size desired. The original is suitable for candlesticks, vases, etc., and is four inches and seven-eighths in diameter, not including the edge. When worked of greater size, the mat is suitable for lamps, etc. To make the mat work with black worsted a foundation of 12 st., close these in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and work 10 rounds as follows: 1st round.—4 ch. (chain stitch), the first 3 of which count as first dc. (double crochet); 15 times alternately 1 dc. on the foundation, 1 ch.; finally, 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. in this round. 2d round.—5 ch., the first 3 of which count as first dc., 15 times alternately 2 ch., 1 dc. on the next dc. in the preceding round; finally, 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. in this round. 3d round.—Always alternately 1 sc. (single crochet) on the next 2 ch. in the preceding round, 4 ch.; finally, 1 sl. on the first sc. of this round. 4th round.—2 sl. on the next 2 st. of the preceding round, 1 sc. on the following st. of the preceding round, always alternately 5 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop; finally, 5 ch., 1 sl. on the first sc. in this round. 5th round.—2 sl. on the next 2 st. in the preceding round, 1 sc. on the following st., always alternately 6 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop; finally, 6 ch., 1 sl. on the first sc. in this round. 6th–9th rounds.—Like the 5th round, but increase the number of ch. in every new round by 1 ch. each, and regulate the number of sl. also by this at the beginning of each round. 10th round.—4

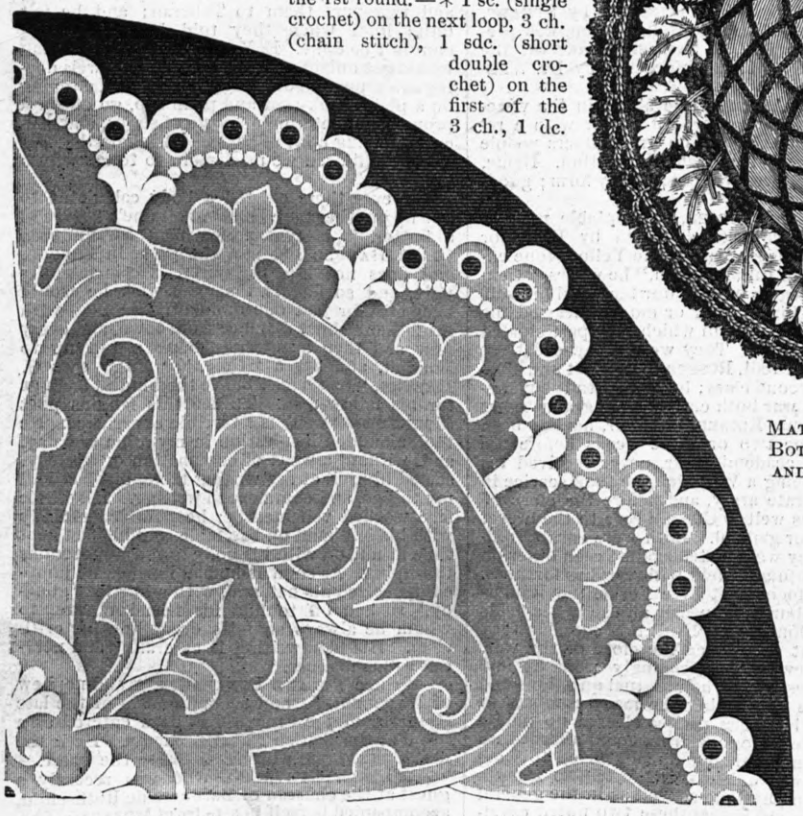


Fig. 1.—DESIGN OF COVER FOR TOILETTE CUSHIONS, ETC. APPLICATION AND WHITE EMBROIDERY.

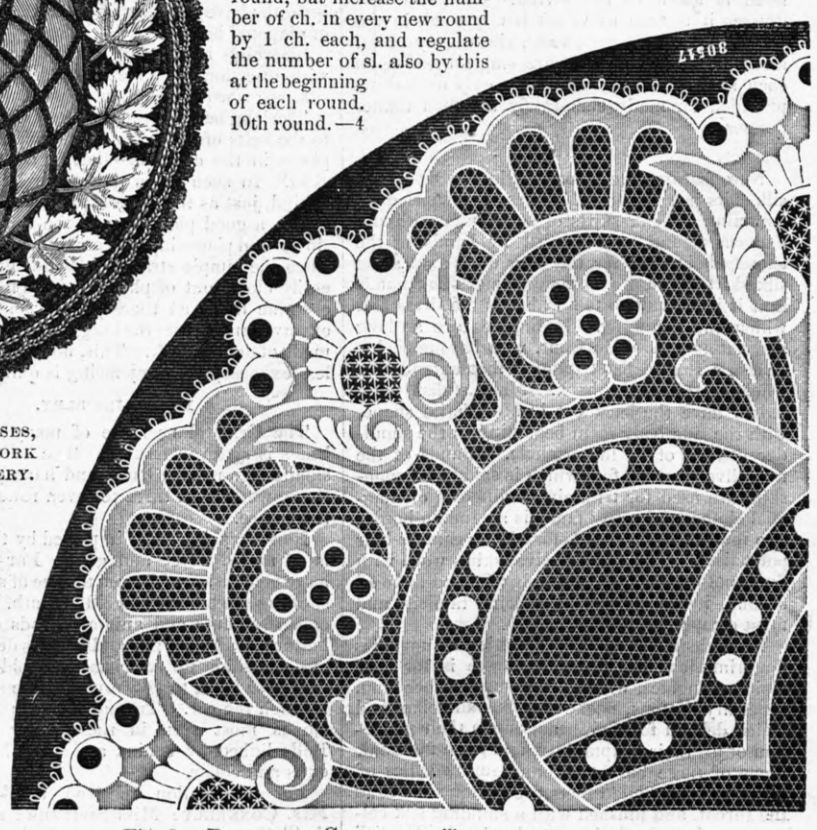

Fig. 2.—DESIGN OF COVER FOR TOILETTE CUSHIONS, ETC. APPLICATION AND WHITE EMBROIDERY.

Hosted by Google

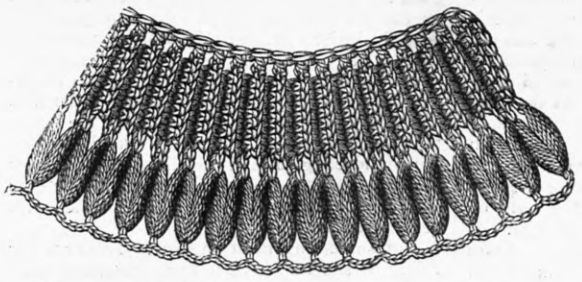

Fig. 1.—CHILD'S COLLAR.—SERPENTINE BRAID AND CROCHET-WORK.

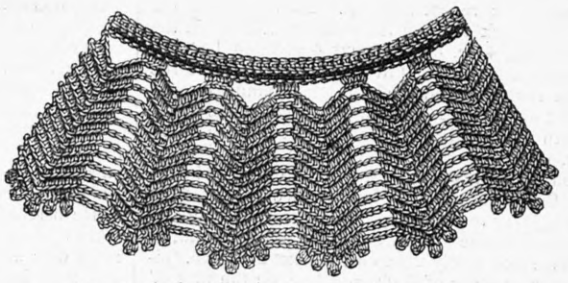

Fig. 2.—CHILD'S COLLAR.—CROCHET-WORK.

sl. on the next 4 st. of the preceding round, 1 sc. on the following st., always alternately 8 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop; finally, 8 ch., 1 sl. on the first sc. of this round. The next six rounds are worked in sc. on a cord foundation. In the first of these rounds surround the st. of the 10th round, and crochet on each ch. scallop always 10 sc., on the sc. always 1 sc. In the following rounds widen the requisite number of stitches in order to obtain the round shape.—In the last of these six rounds worked in sc. on a cord foundation always crochet the lower veins with black worsted, and the upper veins with red filling silk. Then work one more round with similar silk as follows: Always alternately 4 ch., 1 sc. on the third following st. of the preceding round. Ornament the close edge of the mat, as shown by the illustration, with leaves of white cloth, which are fastened on with red filling silk. The open-work part of the work is underlaid with red satin, and the mat is finally furnished with a lining of black cloth, which projects half an inch from the outer edge of the crochet-work, and is pinked in scallops. The colors can, of course, be varied to suit the taste, or to correspond with the furniture of the room.

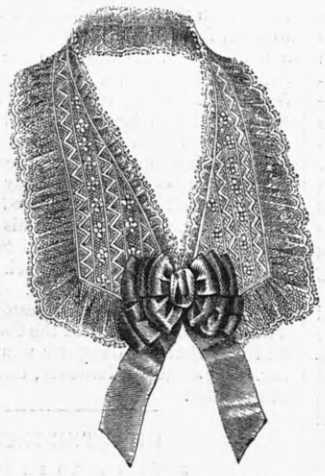

Fig. 1.—INSERTION AND LACE COLLAR.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Fig. 24.

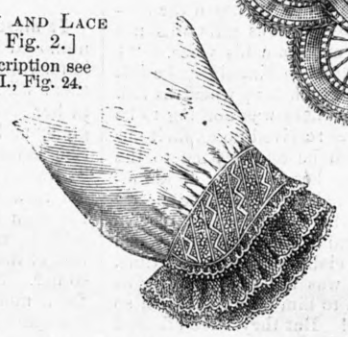

Fig. 2.—INSERTION AND LACE SLEEVE.—[See Fig. 1.]
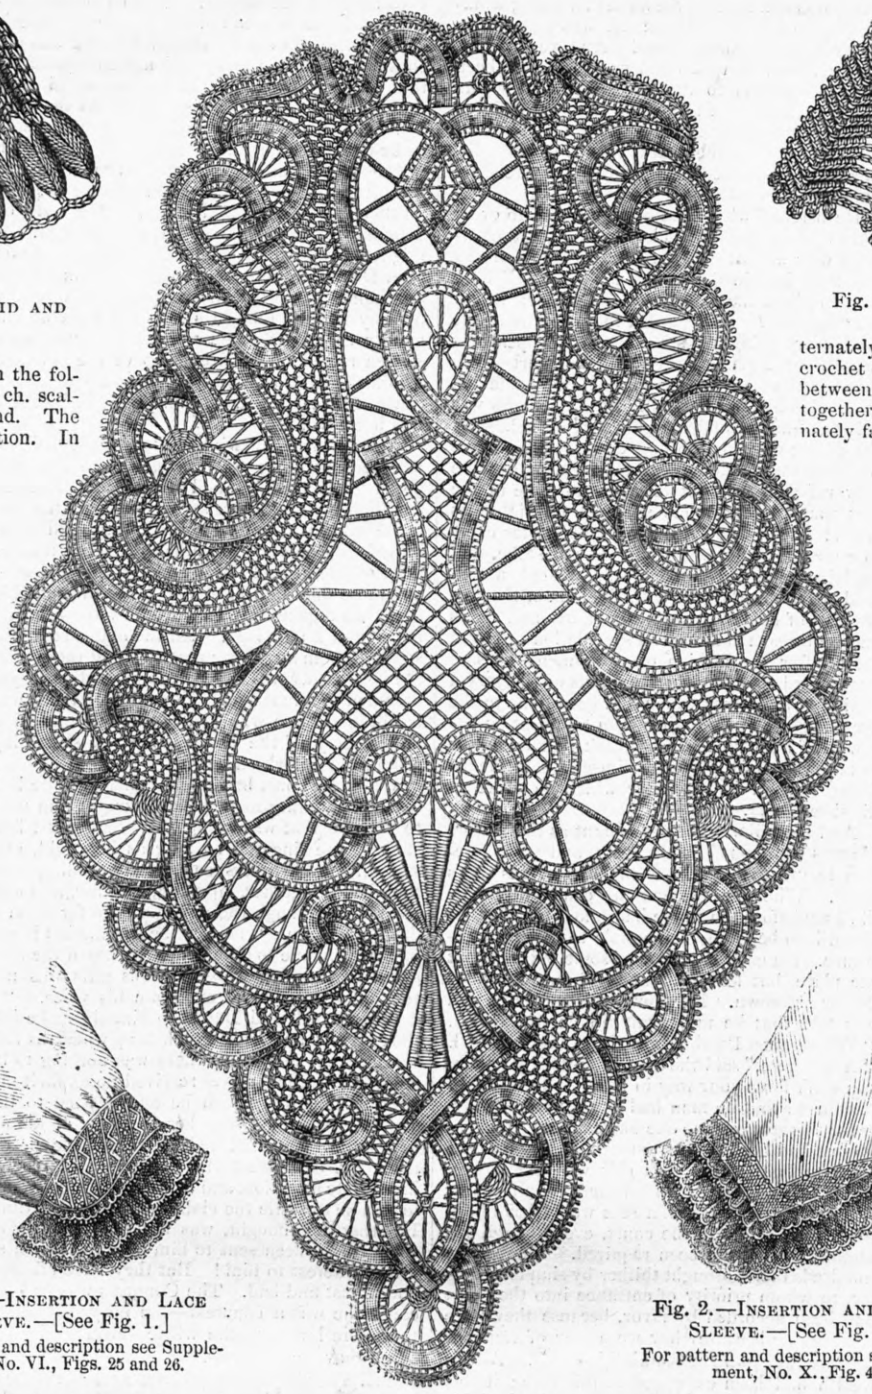
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 25 and 26.



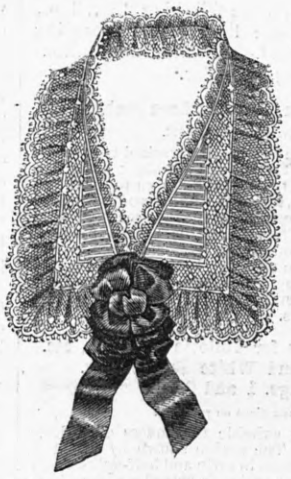


Fig. 1.—INSERTION AND LACE COLLAR.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Fig. 46.

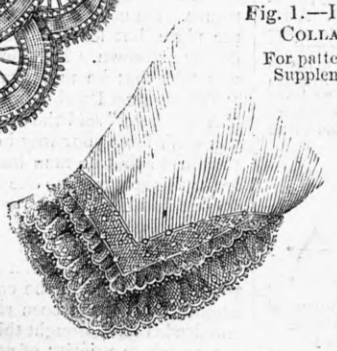

Fig. 2.—INSERTION AND LACE SLEEVE.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Fig. 47.

ternately 1 sc. on each point of the braid, 4 ch. Finally, crochet on the wrong side of the collar on the lower hollows between the points, in order to hold the latter more tightly together, one round in the following manner: Always alternately fasten together the side edges of the next two points with 1 sc., and then work 2 ch.

For the collar shown by Fig. 2 work with twisted crochet cotton, No. 50, a ch. foundation rather tight and very even, which should be long enough to suit the width of the neck; the number of st., however, should be divisible by seven. On this foundation crochet three rounds, going back and forth, as follows: 1st round.—1 sc. on each st. 2d and 3d rounds.—1 sc. on the back vein of each sc. in the preceding round. Crochet on the other side of the foundation st., on the free veins, the 4th round.—1 sc. on the second st., then always alternately 9 ch., pass over 3 st., 4 sc. on the next 4 st.; at the end of the round, instead of 4 sc., work only 1 sc. on the st. before the last in the preceding round. This and the following rounds are worked separately lengthwise. The thread ends at the beginning or end of the rounds are crocheted on. 5th round.—Pass over 1 st., * 4 sc. on the next 4 st. in the preceding round, 3 sc. on the next st., 4 sc. on the next 4 st., 2 ch., with these pass

CRAVAT OR BARBE END.
POINT LACE EMBROIDERY.

Children's Collars.—Serpentine Braid and Crochet-Work. Figs. 1 and 2.

THE collar shown by Fig. 1 is worked with serpentine braid and twisted crochet cotton, No. 30, partly crosswise and partly lengthwise, in the following manner: Make a foundation of 10 st. (stitch), fasten to the next point of the braid, and, going back on the foundation st., crochet the 1st round.—1 ch. (chain stitch), pass over 1 st., 1 sc. (single crochet) on each st. 2d round.—Turn the work, 1 ch., 7 sc. on the back veins of the next 7 st., 3 ch. 3d round.—Turn the work, fasten to the next point of the braid, pass over 1 st., 9 sc. on the back veins of the next 9 st. in the preceding round. Then always repeat the 2d and 3d rounds to the requisite length (100 times in the original). Border the collar on the neck with one round as follows: 1 dc. (double crochet) on each of the single ch. at the beginning of every second following round on the part worked crosswise, crocheting the upper veins of the dc. loosely, however. The outer edge of the collar is bordered also with one round as follows: Always al-

Fig. 1.—VIGOGNE MANTELET.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 27-29.

Fig. 2.—VIGOGNE MANTELET.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 27-29.

Hosted by Google

over 4 st.; repeat from *. At the end of the round work 4 sc. on the next 4 st., 3 sc. on the next st., 4 sc. on the next 4 st., and 1 st. remains unnoticed. 6th–15th rounds.—Like the 5th round, but in the 9th–12th rounds, instead of 2 ch. crochet always 3 ch., and in the 10th–12th rounds always pass over 5 st. instead of 4 st. of the preceding round. In the 13th–15th rounds, instead of 2 ch. work 4 ch., and in the 14th and 15th rounds always pass over 6 st. of the preceding round instead of 4 st. 16th round.—Pass over the first st. in the preceding round, * twice alternately 2 sc. on the next 2 st., 1 p. (picot, consisting of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these); then 2 sc. on the next st., 1 p., 2 sc. on the same st. on which the preceding 2 sc. were worked, twice alternately 1 p., 2 sc. on the next 2 st., 4 ch., with these pass over 6 st. of the preceding round; repeat from *. At the end of the round work twice alternately 2 sc. on the next 2 st., 1 p., then 2 sc. on the next st., 1 p., 2 sc. on the same st. on which the last 2 sc. were worked, 1 p., 2 sc. on the following 2 st., 1 p., 1 sc. on the next st.; 1 st. of the preceding round is left unnoticed. A button and button-hole serve for closing the collar.

Cravat or Barbe End.—Point Lace Embroidery.

See illustration on page 693.

THIS cravat or barbe end may be worked with white point lace braid and thread, or with black point lace braid and silk. First transfer the design to linen, run on the point lace braid, following the lines of the design, and fasten the braid together at the intersecting points with a few stitches. Then stretch the threads as shown by the illustration, and partly overcast them, partly darn them in point de reprise. Work the wheels and lace stitches, observing the illustration, separate the work from the linen, and surround the cravat or barbe end with woven picots.

Designs of Covers for Toilette Cushions, etc. Application and White Embroidery. Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 692.

THESE designs are suitable for covers of toilette cushions, mats, etc. The design shown by Fig. 1 is worked with white cotton in satin and half-polka stitch on Swiss muslin, under which is basted a piece of batiste. The outer edge is button-hole stitched. After finishing the embroidery cut away the batiste along the outlines of the design, observing the illustration. The design shown by Fig. 2 is worked on tulle in Swiss application. Having worked the embroidery in satin and half-polka stitch, button-hole stitch the scallops on the outer edge, in doing which form picots, as shown by the illustration. Then cut away the Swiss muslin, observing the illustration.

(Continued from No. 42, page 663.)

LADY ANNA.

BY ANTHONY TROLLOPE,

Author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," "Orley Farm," "The Eustace Diamonds," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXIX.

DANIEL THWAITE ALONE.

THERE were two persons in the court who heard the statement of the Solicitor-General with equal interest—and perhaps with equal disapprobation—whose motives and ideas on the subject were exactly opposite. These two were the Rev. Mr. Lovel, the uncle of the plaintiff, and Daniel Thwaite, the tailor, whose whole life had been passed in furthering the cause of the defendants. The parson, from the moment in which he had heard that the young lady whom he had entertained in his house had engaged herself to marry the tailor, had reverted to his old suspicions—suspicions which, indeed, he had never altogether laid aside. It had been very grievous to him to prefer a doubtful Lady Anna to a most indubitable Lady Fitzwarren. He liked the old-established things—things which had always been unsuspected, which were not only respectable but firm-rooted. For twenty years he had been certain that the Countess was a false countess; and he, too, had lamented with deep inward lamentation over the loss of the wealth which ought to have gone to support the family earldom. It was monstrous to him that the property of one Earl Lovel should not appertain to the next Earl. He would on the moment have had the laws with reference to the succession of personal property altered, with retrospective action, so that so great an iniquity should be impossible. When the case against the so-called Countess was, as it were, abandoned by the Solicitor-General, and the great interests at stake thrown up, he would have put the conduct of the matter into other hands. Then had come upon him the bitterness of having to entertain in his own house the now almost undisputed—though by him still suspected—heiress, on behalf of his nephew, of a nephew who did not treat him well. And now the heiress had shown what she really was by declaring her intention of marrying a tailor! When that became known, he did hope that the Solicitor-General would change his purpose and fight the cause.

The ladies of the family, the two aunts, had affected to disbelieve the paragraph which Lady Fitzwarren had shown them with so much triumph. The rector had declared that it was just the kind of thing that he had expected. Aunt Julia, speaking freely, had said that it was just the kind of thing which she, knowing the girl, could not believe. Then the rector had come up to town to hear the trial, and on the day preceding it had asked his nephew as to the truth of the rumor which had reached him. "It is true," said the young lord, knitting his brow, "but it had better not be talked about."

"Why not talked about? All the world knows it. It has been in the newspapers."

"Any one wishing to oblige me will not mention it," said the Earl. This was too bad. It could not be possible—for the honor of all the Lovels it could not surely be possible—that Lord Lovel was still seeking the hand of a young woman who had confessed that she was engaged to marry a journeyman tailor! And yet to him, the uncle—to him who had not long since been in loco parentis to the lord—the lord would vouchsafe no further reply than that above given! The rector almost made himself believe that, great as might be the sorrow caused by such disruption, it would become his duty to quarrel with the head of his family!

He listened with most attentive ears to every word spoken by the Solicitor-General, and quarreled with almost every word. Would not any one have imagined that this advocate had been paid to plead the cause, not of the Earl, but of the Countess? As regarded the interests of the Earl, every thing was surrendered. Appeal was made for the sympathies of all the court—and, through the newspapers, for the sympathies of all England—not on behalf of the Earl who was being defrauded of his rights, but on behalf of the young woman who had disgraced the name which she pretended to call her own, and whose only refuge from that disgrace must be in the fact that to that name she had no righteous claim! Even when this apostate barrister came to a recapitulation of the property at stake, and explained the cause of its being vested, not in land, as is now the case with the bulk of the possessions of noble lords—but in shares and funds and ventures of commercial speculation here and there, after the fashion of tradesmen—he said not a word to stir up in the minds of the jury a feeling of the injury which had been done to the present Earl. "Only that I am told that he has a wife of his own I should think that he meant to marry one of the women himself," said the indignant rector in the letter which he wrote to his sister Julia.

And the tailor was as indignant as the rector. He was summoned as a witness, and was therefore bound to attend—at the loss of his day's work. When he reached the court, which he did long before the judge had taken his seat, he found it to be almost impossible to effect an entrance. He gave his name to some officer about the place, but learned that his name was altogether unknown. He showed his subpœna, and was told that he must wait till he was called. "Where must I wait?" asked the angry radical. "Any where," said the man in authority; "but you can't force your way in here." Then he remembered that no man had as yet paid so dearly for this struggle, no one had suffered so much, no one had been so instrumental in bringing the truth to light, as he, and this was the way in which he was treated! Had there been any justice in those concerned, a seat would have been provided for him in the court, even though his attendance had not been required. There were hundreds there, brought thither by simple curiosity, to whom priority of entrance into the court had been accorded by favor, because they were wealthy, or because they were men of rank, or because they had friends high in office. All his wealth had been expended in this case; it was he who had been the most constant friend of this Countess; but for him and his father there might probably have been no question of a trial at this day. And yet he was allowed to beg for admittance, and to be shoved out of court because he had no friends. "The court is a public court, and is open to the public," he said, as he thrust his shoulders forward with a resolution that he would effect an entrance. Then he was taken in hand by two constables and pushed back through the doorway—to the great detriment of the apple-woman who sat there in those days.

But by pluck and resolution he succeeded in making good some inch of standing-room within the court before the Solicitor-General began his statement, and he was able to hear every word that was said. That statement was not more pleasing to him than to the rector of Yoxham. His first quarrel was with the assertion that titles of nobility are in England the outward emblem of noble conduct. No words that might have been uttered could have been more directly antagonistic to his feelings and political creed. It had been the accident of his life that he should have been concerned with ladies who were noble by marriage and birth, and that it had become a duty to him to help to claim on their behalf empty names which were in themselves odious to him. It had been the woman's right to be acknowledged as the wife of the man who had disowned her, and the girl's right to be known as his legitimate daughter. Therefore had he been concerned. But he had declared to himself, from his first crude conception of an opinion on the subject, that it would be hard to touch pitch and not be defiled. The lords of whom he heard were, or were believed by him to be, bloated with luxury, were both rich and idle, were gamblers, debauchers of other men's wives, deniers of all rights of citizenship, drones who were positively authorized to eat the honey collected by the working bees. With his half-knowledge, his ill-gotten and ill-digested information, with his reading, which had all been on one side, he had been unable as yet to catch a glimpse of the fact that from the ranks of the nobility are taken the greater proportion of the hard-working servants of the state. His eyes saw merely the power, the privileges, the titles, the ribbons, and the money—and he hated a lord. When, therefore, the Solicitor-General spoke of the recognized virtue of titles in England, the tailor uttered words of scorn to his stranger neighbor. "And yet this man calls himself a Liberal, and voted for the Reform Bill," he said. "In course he did," replied the stranger; "that was the way of his party." "There isn't an honest man among them all," said the tailor to himself. This was at the beginning of the speech, and he listened on through five long hours, not losing a word of the argument, not missing a single point made in favor of the Countess and her daughter. It became clear to him at any rate that the daughter would inherit the money. When the Solicitor-General came to speak of the nature of the evidence collected in Italy, Daniel Thwaite was unconsciously carried away into a firm conviction that all those concerned in the matter in Italy were swindlers. The girl was no doubt the heiress. The feeling of all the court was with her—as he could well perceive. But in all that speech not one single word was said of the friend who had been true to the girl and to her mother through all their struggles and adversity. The name of Thomas Thwaite was not once mentioned. It might have been expedient for them to ignore him, Daniel, the son; but surely, had there been any honor among them, any feeling of common honesty toward folk so low in the scale of humanity as tailors, some word would have been spoken to tell of the friendship of the old man who had gone to his grave almost a pauper because of his truth and constancy. But no—there was not a word!

And he listened, with anxious ears, to learn whether any thing would be said as to that proposed "alliance"—he had always heard it called an alliance with a grim smile—between the two noble cousins. Heaven and earth had been moved to promote "the alliance." But the Solicitor-General said not a word on the subject—any more than he did of that other disreputable social arrangement, which would have been no more than a marriage. All the audience might suppose, from any thing that was said there, that the young lady was fancy-free and had never yet dreamed of a husband. Nevertheless there was hardly one there who had not heard something of the story of the Earl's suit—and something also of the tailor's success.

When the court broke up Daniel Thwaite had reached standing-room which brought him near to the seat that was occupied by Sergeant Bluestone. He lingered as long as he could, and saw all the barristers concerned standing with their heads together, laughing, chatting, and well pleased, as though the day had been for them a day of pleasure. "I fancy the speculation is too bad for any one to take it up," he heard the Sergeant say, among whose various gifts was not that of being able to moderate his voice. "I dare say not," said Daniel to himself, as he left the court; "and yet we took it up when the risk was greater, and when there was nothing to be gained." He had as yet received no explicit answer to the note which he had written to the Countess when he sent her the copy of his father's will. He had, indeed, received a notice from Mr. Goffe that the matter would receive immediate attention, and that the Countess hoped to be able to settle the claim in a very short time. But that, he thought, was not such a letter as should have been sent to him on an occasion so full of interest to him! But they were all hard and unjust and bad. The Countess was bad because she was a countess—the lawyers because they were lawyers—the whole Lovel family because they were Lovels. At this moment poor Daniel Thwaite was very bitter against all mankind. He would, he thought, go at once to the Western world of which he was always dreaming, if he could only get that sum of £500 which was manifestly due to him.

But as he wandered away after the court was up, getting some wretched solitary meal at a cheap eating-house on his road, he endeavored to fix his thoughts on the question of the girl's affection to himself. Taking all that had been said in that courtly lawyer's speech this morning as the ground-work of his present judgment, what should he judge to be her condition at the moment? He had heard on all sides that it was intended that she should marry the young Earl, and it had been said in his hearing that such would be declared before the judge. No such declaration had been made. Not a word had been uttered to signify that such an "alliance" was contemplated. Efforts had been made with him to induce him to withdraw his claim to the girl's hand. The Countess had urged him, and the lawyers had urged him. Most assuredly they would not have done so—would have in no wise troubled themselves with him at all—had they been able to prevail with Lady Anna. And why had they not so prevailed? The girl doubtless had been subjected to every temptation. She was kept secure from his interference. Hitherto he had not even made an effort to see her since she had left the house in which he himself lived. She had nothing to fear from him. She had been sojourning among those Lovels, who would doubtless have made the way to deceit and luxury easy for her. He could not doubt but that she had been solicited to enter into this alliance. Could he be justified in flattering himself that she had hitherto resisted temptation because in her heart of hearts she was true to her first love? He was true. He was conscious of his own constancy. He was sure of himself that he was bound to her by his love, and not by the hope of any worldly advantage. And why should he think that she was weaker, vainer, less noble than himself? Had he not evidence to show him that she was strong enough to resist a temptation to which he had never been subjected? He had read of women who were above the gilt and glitter of the world. When he was disposed to think that she could be false, no terms of reproach seemed to him too severe to heap upon her name; and yet, when he found that he had no ground on which to accuse her, even in his own thoughts, of treachery to himself, he could hardly bring himself to think it possible that she should not be treacherous. She had sworn to him, as he had sworn to her, and was he not bound to believe her oath?

Then he remembered what the poet had said to him. The poet had advised him to desist altogether, and had told him that it would certainly be best for the girl that he should do so. The poet had not based his advice on the ground that the girl would prove false, but that it would be good for the girl to be allowed to be false—good for the girl that she should be encouraged to be false, in order that she might become an earl's wife! But he thought that it would be bad for any woman to be an earl's wife; and so thinking, how could he abandon his love in order that he might hand her over to a fashion of life which he himself despised? The poet must be wrong. He would cling to his love till he should know that his love was false to him. Should he ever learn that, then his love should be troubled with him no further.

But something must be done. Even on her behalf, if she were true to him, something must be done. Was it not pusillanimous in him to make no attempt to see his love, and to tell her that he, at any rate, was true to her? These people, who were now his enemies, the lawyers and the Lovels, with the Countess at the head of them, had used him like a dog, had repudiated him without remorse, had not a word even to say of the services which his father had rendered. Was he bound by honor or duty to stand on any terms with them? Could there be any thing due to them from him? Did it not behoove him as a man to find his way into the girl's presence, and to assist her with his courage? He did not fear them. What cause had he to fear them? In all that had been between them his actions to them had been kind and good, whereas they were treating him with the basest ingratitude.

But how should he see Lady Anna? As he thought of all this he wandered up from Westminster, where he had eaten his dinner, to Russell Square and into Keppel Street, hesitating whether he would at once knock at the door and ask to see Lady Anna Lovel. Lady Anna was still staying with Mrs. Bluestone; but Daniel Thwaite had not believed the Countess when she told him that her daughter was not living with her. He doubted, however, and did not knock at the door.

CHAPTER XXX.

JUSTICE IS TO BE DONE.

IT must not be thought that the Countess was unmoved when she received Daniel Thwaite's letter from Keswick inclosing the copy of his father's will. She was all alone, and she sat long in her solitude, thinking of the friend who was gone, and who had been always true to her. She herself would have done for old Thomas Thwaite any service which a woman could render to a man, so strongly did she feel all that the man had done for her. As she had once said, no menial office performed by her on behalf of the old tailor would have been degrading to her. She had eaten his bread, and she never for a moment forgot the obligation. The slow tears stood in her eyes as she thought of the long, long hours which she had passed in his company, while, almost desponding herself, she had received courage from his persistency. And her feeling for the son would have been the same—had not the future position of her daughter and the standing of the house of Lovel been at stake. It was not in her nature to be ungrateful; but neither was it in her nature to postpone the whole object of her existence to her gratitude. Even though she should appear to the world as a monster of ingratitude, she must treat the surviving Thwaite as her bitterest enemy as long as he maintained his pretensions to her daughter's hand. She could have no friendly communication with him. She herself would hold no communication with him at all, if she might possibly avoid it, lest she should be drawn into some renewed relation of friendship with him. He was her enemy—her enemy in such fierce degree that she was always plotting the means of ridding herself altogether of his presence and influence. To her thinking the man had turned upon her most treacherously, and was using, for his own purposes and his own aggrandizement, that familiarity with her affairs which he had acquired by reason of his father's generosity. She believed but little in his love; but whether he loved the girl or merely sought her money was all one to her. Her whole life had been passed in an effort to prove her daughter to be a lady of rank, and she would rather sacrifice her life in the basest manner than live to see all her efforts annulled by a low marriage. Love, indeed, and romance! What was the love of one individual, what was the romance of a childish girl, to the honor and well-being of an ancient and noble family? It was her ambition to see her girl become the Countess Lovel, and no feeling of gratitude should stand in her way. She would rather slay that low-born artisan with her own hand than know that he had the right to claim her as his mother-in-law. Nevertheless, the slow tears crept down her cheeks as she thought of former days, and of the little parlor behind the tailor's shop at Keswick in which the two children had been wont to play.

But the money must be paid, or, at least, the debt must be acknowledged. As soon as she had somewhat recovered herself she opened the old desk which had for years been the receptacle of all her papers, and, taking out sundry scribbled documents, went to work at a sum in addition. It can not be said of her that she was a good accountant, but she had been so far careful as to have kept entries of all the moneys she had received from Thomas Thwaite. She had once carried in her head a correct idea of the entire sum she owed him; but now she set down the items with dates, and made the account fair on a sheet of note-paper. So much money she certainly did owe to Daniel Thwaite, and so much she would certainly pay if ever the means of paying it should be hers. Then she went off with her account to Mr. Goffe.

Mr. Goffe did not think that the matter pressed. The payment of large sums which have been long due never is pressing in the eyes of lawyers. Men are always supposed to have a hundred pounds in their waistcoat pockets, but arrangements have to be made for the settling of thousands. "You had better let me write him a line and tell him that it shall be looked to as soon as the question as to the property is decided," said Mr. Goffe. But this did not suit the views of the Countess. She spoke out very openly as to all that she owed to the father, and as to her eternal enmity to the son. It behooved her to pay the debt, if only that she might be able to treat the man altogether as an enemy. She had understood that, even pending the trial, a portion of the income would be allowed by the courts for her use and for the expenses of the trial. It was assented that this money should be paid. Could steps be taken by which it might be settled at once? Mr. Goffe, taking the memorandum, said that he would see what could be done, and then wrote his short note to Daniel Thwaite. When he had computed the interest which must undoubtedly be paid on the borrowed money, he found that a sum of about £9000 was due to the tailor. "Nine thousand pounds!" said one Mr. Goffe to another. "That will be better to him than marrying the daughter of an earl." Could Daniel have heard the words, he would have taken the lawyer by the throat and have endeavored to teach him what love is.

Hosted by Google

Then the trial came on. Before the day fixed had come round, but only just before it, Mr. Goffe showed the account to Sergeant Bluestone. "God bless my soul!" said the Sergeant. "There should be some vouchers for such an amount as that." Mr. Goffe declared that there were no vouchers, except for a very trifling part of it; but still thought that the amount should be allowed. The Countess was quite willing to make oath, if need be, that the money had been supplied to her. Then the further consideration of the question was for the moment postponed, and the trial came on.

On the Tuesday, which had been left a vacant day as regarded the trial, there was a meeting—like all other proceedings in this cause, very irregular in its nature—at the chambers of the Solicitor-General, at which Sergeant Bluestone attended with Messrs. Hardy, Mainsail, Flick, and Goffe; and at this meeting, among other matters of business, mention was made of the debt due by the Countess to Daniel Thwaite. Of this debt the Solicitor-General had not as yet heard, though he had heard of the devoted friendship of the old tailor. That support had been afforded to some extent, that for a period the shelter of old Thwaite's roof had been lent to the Countess, that the man had been generous and trusting, he did know. He had learned, of course, that thence had sprung that early familiarity which had enabled the younger Thwaite to make his engagement with Lady Anna. That something should be paid when the ladies came by their own he was aware. But the ladies were not his clients, and into the circumstances he had not inquired. Now he was astounded and almost scandalized by the amount of the debt.

"Do you mean to say that he advanced £9000 in hard cash?" said the Solicitor-General.

"That includes interest at five per cent., Sir William, and also a small sum for bills paid by Thomas Thwaite on her behalf. She has had in actual cash about £7000."

"And where has it gone?"

"A good deal of it through my hands," said Mr. Goffe, boldly. "During two or three years she had no income at all, and during the last twenty years she has been at law for her rights. He advanced all the money when that trial for bigamy took place."

"God bless my soul!" said Mr. Sergeant Bluestone.

"Did he leave a will?" asked the Solicitor-General.

"Oh yes; a will which has been proved, and of which I have a copy. There was nothing else to leave but this debt, and that is left to the son."

"It should certainly be paid without delay," said Mr. Hardy. Mr. Mainsail questioned whether they could get the money. Mr. Goffe doubted whether it could be had before the whole affair was settled. Mr. Flick was sure that on due representation the amount would be advanced at once. The income of the property was already accumulating in the hands of the court, and there was an anxiety that all just demands—demands which might be considered to be justly made on the family property—should be paid without delay. "I think there would hardly be a question," said Mr. Hardy.

"Seven thousand pounds advanced by these two small tradesmen to the Countess Lovel," said the Solicitor-General, "and that done at a time when no relation of her own or of her husband would lend her a penny! I wish I had known that when I went into court yesterday."

"It would hardly have done any good," said the Sergeant.

"It would have enabled one, at any rate, to give credit where credit is due. And this son is the man who claims to be affianced to the Lady Anna?"

"The same man, Sir William," said Mr. Goffe.

"One is almost inclined to think that he deserves her."

"I can't agree with you there at all," said the Sergeant, angrily.

"One, at any rate, is not astonished that the young lady should think so," continued the Solicitor-General. "Upon my word, I don't know how we are to expect that she should throw her early lover overboard after such evidence of devotion."

"The marriage would be too incongruous," said Mr. Hardy.

"Quite horrible," said the Sergeant.

"It distresses one to think of it," said Mr. Goffe.

"It would be much better that she should not be Lady Anna at all, if she is to do that," said Mr. Mainsail.

"Very much better," said Mr. Flick, shaking his head, and remembering that he was employed by Lord Lovel and not by the Countess—a fact of which it seemed to him that the Solicitor-General altogether forgot the importance.

"Gentlemen, you have no romance among you," said Sir William. "Have not generosity and valor always prevailed over wealth and rank with ladies in story?"

"I do not remember any valorous tailors who have succeeded with ladies of high degree," said Mr. Hardy.

"Did not the lady of the Strachy marry the yeoman of the wardrobe?" asked the Solicitor-General.

"I don't know that we care much about romance here," said the Sergeant. "The marriage would be so abominable that it is not to be thought of."

"The tailor should, at any rate, get his money," said the Solicitor-General; "and I will undertake to say that if the case be as represented by Mr. Goffe—"

"It certainly is," said the attorney.

"Then there will be no difficulty in raising the funds for paying it. If he is not to have his wife, at any rate let him have his money. I think, Mr. Flick, that intimation should be made to him that Earl Lovel will join the Countess in immediate application to the court for means to settle his claim. Circumstanced as we are at present, there can be no doubt that such application will have the desired result. It should, of course, be intimated that Sergeant Bluestone and myself are both of opinion that the money should be allowed for the purpose."

As the immediate result of this conversation, Daniel Thwaite received on the following morning letters both from Mr. Goffe and Mr. Flick. The former intimated to him that a sum of nine thousand odd pounds was held to be due to him by the Countess, and that immediate steps would be taken for its payment. That from Mr. Flick, which was much shorter than the letter from his brother attorney, merely stated that as a very large sum of money appeared to be due by the Countess Lovel to the estate of the late Thomas Thwaite, for sums advanced to the Countess during the last twenty years, the present Earl Lovel had been advised to join the Countess in application to the courts that the amount due might be paid out of the income of the property left by the late Earl; and that that application would be made "immediately." Mr. Goffe, in his letter, went on to make certain suggestions, and to give much advice. As this very large debt, of which no proof was extant, was freely admitted by the Countess, and as steps were being at once taken to insure payment of the whole sum named to Daniel Thwaite, as his father's heir, it was hoped that Daniel Thwaite would at once abandon his preposterous claim to the hand of Lady Anna Lovel. Then Mr. Goffe put forward in glowing colors the iniquity of which Daniel Thwaite would be guilty should he continue his fruitless endeavors to postpone the re-establishment of a noble family which was thus showing its united benevolence by paying to him the money which it owed him.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ADRIENNE LECOUVREUR.

THE celebrated Adrienne Lecouvreur was a hat-maker's daughter, an amateur actress, then a strolling player. In 1717 she burst upon Paris, and in one month she enchanted the city by her acting in Monimia, Electra, and Bérénice, and had been named one of the king's company for the first parts in tragedy and comedy. Adrienne's magic lay in her natural simplicity. She spoke as the character she represented might be expected to speak. This natural style had been suggested by Molière, and had been attempted by Baron, but unsuccessfully. It was given to the silver-tongued Adrienne to subdue her audience by this exquisite simplicity of nature. The play-going world was enthusiastic. Whence did the new charmer come? She came from long training in the provinces, and was the glory of many a provincial city before, in 1717, she put her foot on the stage of the capital, and at the age of twenty-seven began her brilliant but brief artistic career of thirteen years. Tracing her early life back, people found her a baby, true child of Paris. In her little-girlhood she saw Polyeucte at the play-house close by her father's house. She immediately got up the tragedy, with other little actors and actresses. Madame la Présidente La Jay, hearing of the ability of the troupe, and of the excellence of Adrienne as Pauline at the rehearsals in a grocer's warehouse, lent the court-yard of her hôtel in the Rue Garancière, where a stage was erected, and the tragedy acted, in presence of an audience which included members of the noblest families in France. All Paris was talking of the marvelous skill of the young company, but especially of Adrienne, when the association called the "Comédie Française," which had the exclusive right of acting the legitimate drama, arose in its spite, screamed "Privilege!" and got the company suppressed.

The little Adrienne, however, devoted herself to the stage; and when she came to Paris, after long and earnest experience in the provinces, her new subjects hailed their new queen—queen of tragedy, that is to say; for when she took comedy by the hand the muse bore with, rather than smiled upon her; and, wanting sympathy, Adrienne felt none. Outside the stage her heart and soul were surrendered to the great soldier and utterly worthless fellow, Maurice de Saxe. He was the only man to whom she ever gave her heart, and he had given his to so many, there was little left for her worth the having. What little there was was coveted by the Princesse de Bouillon. Adrienne died while this aristocratic rival was flinging herself at the feet of the handsome maréchal, and the wrathful popular voice, lamenting the loss of the dramatic queen, accused the princess of having poisoned the actress.

Adrienne Lecouvreur (whose story has been twice told in French dramas, and once marvelously illustrated by the genius of Rachel), before she made her exit from the world thought of the poor of her district, and she left them several thousands of francs. The curé of St. Sulpice was told of the death and of the legacy. The good man took the money, and refused to allow the body to be buried in consecrated ground. Princes of the church went to her petits soupers, but they would neither say "rest her soul" nor sanction decent rest to her body; and yet charity had beautified the one, as talent and dignity had marked the other. The corpse of this exquisite actress (she was only forty when she died) was carried in a fiacre, accompanied by a faithful few, to a timber-yard in the Faubourg St. Germain; a hired porter dug the shallow grave of the tragedy queen, and I remember, in my youthful days, a stone post at the corner of the Rue de Bourgogne and the Rue de Grenelle which was said to stand over the spot where Monimia had been so ingloriously buried. It was then a solitary place, significantly named La Grenouillière.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE Evangelical Alliance, whose recent session in this city brought together a great number of distinguished men from all parts of the United States and Europe, is the most important religious council which has ever been convened on this continent. There is nothing sectarian about this great Protestant association. Its members work together in perfect freedom, yet harmoniously, notwithstanding the many creeds and nationalities of which it is composed. Its delegates are from all denominations, and came in the interests of a common religion from England, Ireland, Scotland, Canada, Germany, France, Spain, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Turkey, Greece, Italy, and India. The Evangelical Alliance was organized in London in 1846 by a convention consisting of eight hundred members, representing fifty evangelical sects from every Protestant country in Europe and America. Successive meetings have been held at Paris, in 1855; at Berlin, 1857; at Geneva, 1860; and at Amsterdam, 1867. The New York meeting ranks as the sixth General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance. At the session in Amsterdam an invitation was received from the American division of the Alliance requesting that the next Conference be held in the city of New York. It was accepted, and arrangements finally completed for the delegates to meet here in 1870. The Franco-German war caused its postponement until October 2, 1873. The chief object of this Alliance is to promote sympathy of feeling and union of action among Christians, and it is believed that its influence will do much toward healing any divisions which may have hitherto existed among different denominations. The meetings of the Conference in this city were thronged with interested visitors. The number of actual delegates was about 340, among whom were many eminent divines whose reputation for ecclesiastical learning is world-wide. The ten days' session was introduced by a social reunion at Association Hall, where many of the meetings were held, and the final service was conducted in the Academy of Music, on which occasion addresses were made in several different languages.

When the Stock Exchange was first opened, after having been closed seven days, a strange scene was witnessed. For an hour before the appointed time an unruly crowd had sought vainly to gain admittance at the doors. But a force of policemen guarded the building, and only members of the Stock Exchange were allowed to enter until ten o'clock. The instant the doors were opened there was a rush for the galleries, and every one stood on tiptoe to watch the brokers below, and catch the first figures of stock. The brokers came crowding into the room amidst the wildest confusion and noise. They seemed good-natured enough, but crazy with excitement. With difficulty quiet was obtained for the president to speak, and then every body hushed only in expectation of hearing startling news of business failures. They heard nothing of the kind, however; with a few brief remarks the president stated the rules which had been adopted by the Governing Committee, for the conducting of the business of the Exchange. Wild and long-continued applause followed the reading of these resolutions; and then the brokers remembered that there were stocks to be bought and sold. For a while the ordinary spectator could only fancy that a fearful riot was going on, such were the strange, confusing shouts; but gradually the excitement subsided, and business proceeded in the ordinary way.

Through the efforts of the Children's Aid Society, about one hundred children are sent to Western homes every week from this city. Thus thousands of poor little ones who would suffer from cold and hunger during the coming winter are provided with comfortable homes.

A new use is suggested for water-melons. Perhaps it may not be generally known that a fine white vinegar can be made from the juice. After the crimson part has been eaten, the remainder can be scraped to extract the juice, which is to be carefully strained and put into jugs, and these set in the sunshine. At a certain period the vinegar will be very bitter, but in time acquires a clear, fine, strong flavor.

Great preparations were recently made for the reception of Queen Victoria at Inverlochy Castle, but a terrible downfall of rain prevented any public demonstration. But her Majesty did not seem to be disturbed thereby; as soon as the severity of the storm had passed, she made a tour of the castle grounds, and walked along the public road, which was very muddy, being accompanied by the Princess Beatrice. It is further recorded of her in the Queen, that on arriving at the castle she passed through the kitchen on the way to her own apartments, and spoke in a pleasant manner to several of the domestic servants. There was a glimpse of sunshine in the afternoon, and the royal party drove toward Spean Bridge. Her Majesty appeared to be delighted with the prospect. The clouds then darkened the Ben Nevis range of mountains, and shortly afterward rain fell heavily. Still her Majesty kept her carriage open. When passing the right side of the river Spean the weather cleared up, and there was a beautiful view of Brocklitter and the falls of Mucomer. While at the top of Mucomer Brae the low-lying mist cleared off, and a splendid panorama burst upon the view. The drive then was through Colords, Errachad, Strone, Muirshearlich, Banavie, against a pelting rain-fall. Still no carriage hood was put up. At Banavie the canal was crossed. Lochy looked grand, tumbling down in full flood. Her Majesty, who appeared greatly interested in the general flood, arrived at Inverlochy Castle at half past six o'clock, drenched, but seemingly delighted with the journey. The length of the drive could not be much under twenty miles. Queen Victoria certainly is a good traveler, and not frightened by bad weather.

England alone, of all civilized countries, has sent no home-grown tobacco to the Vienna Exposition.

The new Masonic Temple in Philadelphia was five years in course of erection, and is considered the most magnificent structure devoted to Masonry in the world. The aggregate cost of it, including the sum paid for the ground, was $1,575,000. The furnishing is in magnificent style, and it is worthy of record that all the furniture was made in this country, and required the labor of 250 mechanics constantly for six months. The doors are marvels of strength, solidity, and beauty of finish. The windows are of stained glass, ornamented with many Masonic emblems. The carpets were manufactured in England from original designs furnished here. For safety in case of fire, four tanks are situated in the attic and in the grand tower, and hold 60,000 gallons of water.

The yellow fever at Shreveport is described as "the Mexican vomito," which was brought into the town by the Transatlantic Circus, a strolling company from Vera Cruz, which had traveled along the line of the Texas Pacific Railway, and had left the seeds of contagion along their route. Two other causes, in the opinion of the citizens, aided to intensify the malignant and fatal character of the pestilence, and these were the unhealthy condition of the town, arising from the removal of the Red River raft, and the infected atmosphere caused by dead cattle upon a sunken steamboat which lies in the river near the town. While the circus was in Shreveport several of the members died of the disease, and after it left others who remained also perished. So fatal is the fever that few who are attacked recover. Three days is generally the limit of the sickness, and many die in forty-eight hours' time.

A learned professor intimates that all who die under one hundred years of age are guilty of suicide! The process of reasoning by which he arrives at this conclusion is something as follows: Duration of life is measured by the time of growth; the camel is eight years in growing, and lives five times eight years; the horse is five years in growing, and lives twenty-five years; man, being twenty years in growing, should live five times twenty years. So Providence having intended man to live a century, he would arrive at that age if he did not kill himself by unwholesome modes of living, violent passions, and exposure to accidents. Surely, according to this theory, the human race might well adopt new and more healthful modes of eating, sleeping, working, and recreating, in the hope of becoming centenarians.

The too common practice of moaning over our mistakes, and bewailing them constantly, and referring to them all the evils that afflict us, is most injurious to our future, and a great hinderance to real improvement of character. One of the chief causes of mistakes in action is allowing impulse rather than reason to control. Consequently mistakes will be best avoided by carefully submitting sudden impulses to the searching ordeal of reason before acting upon them. Then if one is governed by principle, and steadfastly adheres to the right, he is in possession of the best safeguards against mistakes.

An effort is now being made to collect a library of interesting books for the use of the prisoners in Ludlow Street jail. Similar libraries have been established in connection with prisons in several Western cities, and with good result.

The Fan of the Marchioness is the name of a play said to have been written by King Louis II. of Bavaria in Alexandrine verse. The following curious story concerning it is recorded by the Court Journal:

"About four months ago the actors of the Royal Theatre received from the manager the cast of The Fan of the Marchioness, whose author, he said, wished to remain unknown, but which was to be rehearsed immediately. A week afterward the first rehearsal took place, and a few days later the actors and actresses who were to appear in it were startled by the notification that they were to play the piece after midnight. The most rigorous secrecy was enjoined upon them, and immediate dismissal was threatened to those who should talk about the affair. Who had ever heard of such a theatrical performance? The actors were all there, and when the curtain went up they vainly looked for an audience. No one was present but a young man, dressed in a loose suit of gray, his handsome face adorned with a small, well-trimmed mustache. The young man was seated in the left proscenium box, and seemed to follow the performance with rapt attention. The experienced actors did their best to play their parts well. None of them had ever performed under more singular, not to say discouraging, circumstances. Applause there was none. The curtain went down and it went up again before a dark and empty house. The only spectator was to all appearances highly interested, but not even once did he clap his hands. Finally, just as the neighboring clock of St. Catharine's Church struck four, the play was over, and the actors went home. This singular performance has been repeated since then a dozen times."

Hosted by Google

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE nearer we approach the winter season the more evident it is that there will be no radical change in the present style of dress. People would gladly abandon the pretty over-skirts and polonaises, whose only fault is that they have lasted too long, but they dare not do so, for they know not what to put in their place. For this reason even the most audacious, who insist on shaking off the polonaise, still preserve its semblance while abandoning the thing itself, and arrange their trimmings so as to simulate at least the outline of the polonaise, which they give up only because they are tired of it. I will give a type of one of these dresses, which, without a polonaise, has the appearance of a polonaise suit:

Skirt of gros bleu serge, bordered on the bottom with a deep flounce. The front is likewise trimmed to the waist with flounces, the first of which (that placed immediately above the wide flounce on the bottom) extends not only across the front breadth, but some distance each side of it; the upper flounces gradually diminish in length to the top. Each flounce is edged with a narrow triple bias fold of silk of the same color. The waist forms a jacket and vest in front; in the back it forms a pouf, and is prolonged in two rather long straight breadths. This waist, which is a sort of polonaise without the front breadths, is of the same material as the dress, and is likewise edged with a triple fold, and also with a fringe of black fur. This fringe, which is very expensive, is one of the most elegant trimmings of the season. The waist is trimmed besides with oxidized silver buttons, set on in pairs, which are connected by a chain of the same metal.

For a simple dress the following is, to my taste, the prettiest that I have seen: Plain black velvet skirt, with large high-necked vest of the same velvet. Over-skirt of rather light gray cloth, drawn tightly back, and looped quite high on the hips. Tight-fitting casaque of the same cloth, open all the way in front, so as to show the black velvet vest, and cut away at the sides to display the large flat basques of the vest. The only trimming on the casaque and the over-skirt is a bias fold of the same cloth, stitched on each side with black silk. The casaque is finished with steel buttons. I should say that black velvet skirts reign supreme, and are to be found in every wardrobe.

Woolen fabrics of all kinds, but especially the thickest and coarsest-looking, camel's-hair, among others, are adopted for morning costumes by the richest and most elegant women, who would think it in the worst possible taste to go out before four o'clock in a silk velvet dress. Up to this time nothing is permissible but woolen stuffs or velveteen. Woolen polonaises are worn indifferently over skirts of the same material or of velveteen, either black or of the color of the dress.

Bonnets continue their upward flight. The crowns are necessarily larger than ever, since they are destined to contain the masses of hair that are piled up on the top of the head, instead of resting on them as formerly, like a fish on its bed of parsley. As to the brims adapted to these crowns, they differ greatly in form. We have round brims, which are the most numerous, oval brims, brims turned up in a three-cornered cockade, brims rolled like a pipe, and many others besides. The most moderate among these bonnets are round, and are edged with a band of curled feathers, which is very becoming to the face. A large feather lies across the crown of the bonnet, with the end falling over the nape of the neck. The most undecided colors, and, moreover, the mixture of these colors, are still in vogue.

Not content with preparing dresses with two shades of the same color, or even with two different colors, our modistes are now taking three colors for a dress. The following is a costume just made for a young lady: Black faille skirt, with no other trimming than five double bias folds, composed each of one olive velvet and one pale blue faille fold. This skirt is demi-trained. Sleeveless waist of olive velvet, with long sleeves of pale blue faille, and pale blue buttons. The neck is finished with a Medicis frill of olive velvet lined with pale blue faille. On each side is a very large loop and two square ends of olive velvet, edged with a bias fold of pale blue faille; these two bows are connected by a broad band of olive velvet, which forms a sort of pouf. Pale blue faille bonnet, trimmed with olive velvet. This last color, moreover, will continue very fashionable during the coming winter, combined with pale blue ornaments and accessories. The revers, cuffs, lappets, etc., will be of satin, reps, or velvet on woolen or faille dresses of a different color. For instance, a dress of dark felt faille will have flounces of the material bound with pink and black. The revers, collar, and cuffs will be of pink faille, bound with felt and then black.

We also note among the trimmings used for dinner and evening dresses, écru thread guipure embroidered with black jet; this is employed not only for écru dresses, but for those of all colors, beginning with black. It is used for tabliers, which are set in the front of the dress, and are finished by a wide scarf of the same, forming a sort of pouf, and large loops with ends of uneven lengths.

There is little more change in wrappings than in dresses. We have still the small basque, adjusted to the waist, with revers, collar, and cuffs of faille or velvet; the talma, but with a double fold in the back, and fitted to the waist by a belt fastening in front under the garment; and the Dolman, which is more in favor than ever. There is little new, except the revival of the old-fashioned long cloak, with sleeves, and with or without a hood, lined with silk and wadded, or else lined throughout with fur. This kind of wrapping, which is essentially comfortable, is that preferred by the ladies of the old nobility of the Faubourg St. Germain, as we say in Paris—those who through taste and for decorum's sake reject eccentric garments. And not only these, but also those who like to be comfortable without pro-

Fig. 1.—TIGHT-FITTING TRICOT BEAVER CLOTH BASQUE.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 18–23.

Fig. 2.—TIGHT-FITTING TRICOT BEAVER CLOTH BASQUE.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 18–23.

Fig. 1.—STEEL BLUE SERGE BASQUE.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 11–17.

BROWN CLOTH MANTLE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 4–10.

Fig. 2.—STEEL BLUE SERGE BASQUE.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 11–17.

Fig. 1.—CLOTH BASQUE WITH FUR TRIMMING.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 30–35.

Fig. 2.—CLOTH BASQUE WITH FUR TRIMMING.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 30–35.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—CASHMERE MANTELET.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 2.—CASHMERE MANTELET.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1 and 2.

fessing as austere principles with respect to dress as the preceding dames, wear the long wadded or fur-lined cloaks, which have huge flowing sleeves, that are never put on. These cloaks are made of black cashmere, edged with fur fringes. They are too long to be worn any where but in a carriage, and for this reason will remain a very elegant wrapping designed to be thrown over costly dresses—in fact, to serve as the water-proof of those who are never exposed to the rain.

Among wrappings should also be classed the sleeveless spencer, which has come into very general use. This, made of black velvet, may be worn with almost any dress. When the dress is trimmed with a different color, the spencer may be of velvet or silk of the same color as the ribbons, belt, ruches, etc.

Short suits, which are universally worn for walking dresses and for morning calls, are not admissible for evening, dinner, or reception toilettes. For these occasions, trained or demi-trained dresses are indispensable; one is at liberty, however, either to wear the long skirt in all its austerity, without overskirt, polonaise, or drapery, or to accompany it with a polonaise, tunic, or over dress of black or white lace. The essential point is that the dress shall be long enough not to be mistaken for the short suit which is so convenient and decorous in the street, where it is both ungraceful and uncomfortable to walk holding up a train.

Although the ball season will not open in France until January, a few ball toilettes are already in preparation for the dancing parties which are given in the country-houses during November. These dresses are made with long or demi trains; almost all the low corsages have basques pleated behind. In the guise of a bertha there are Medici ruches and scalloped laces encircling the upper part of the waist, and held upright by slender metal wires, precisely as in the times of the Valois. Light-colored silk gauzes will be much worn for ball dresses; these gauzes will be embroidered with black or white jet, or else with floss silk, color on color. And with these dresses will always be worn over-skirts edged with feather or fur fringe, or with wide or narrow lace.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

ANGLO-SAXON FASHIONS.

THE garments worn by the Anglo-Saxon women were few and simple. An under-garment, sometimes of linen, sometimes of various colors, reached nearly to the ground, so as to cover the greater part of the feet; the sleeves, descending to the wrists, were arranged in small rolls or wrinkles as high as the elbows.

The exterior garment—gunna, or gown—was a long robe with loose sleeves, confined with a girdle adorned with embroidery, for which the Anglo-Saxon ladies were so famed.

The mantle, an essential part of the dress, hung down before and behind, except when looped up by the raised arms. No change for three centuries took place in its form or in the manner of wearing it.

But the most indispensable part of dress appropriated to the Anglo-Saxon women was the kerchief, by the Normans called couvrechef, or headdress, always worn out-of-doors. Its breadth was sufficient to reach from the top of the forehead to the shoulders, and covered the head completely, so that no part of the hair could be seen. It was usually wrapped round the neck so as entirely to cover the chest, one end of it being sometimes left loose, flowing on one side or the other of the shoulders, and must have been of great elegance. It was worn of various colors—green, blue, or red.

Although the kerchief completely concealed the hair, yet this was carefully cherished, and allowed to grow most luxuriantly, probably twisted and curled with irons, like that of the men, whose flowing golden hair often hung down on either side of the shoulders. The Anglo-Saxons were celebrated throughout Europe for

Fig. 1.—VIGOGNE MANTELET.—BACK.—[See Fig. 2.]
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—VIGOGNE MANTELET.—FRONT.
For description see Supplement.

Hosted by Google

their jewelry, their gold filigree ornaments. Rings and bracelets were not abundant, for they cared more for the decoration of their necks.

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. XX.

DID you ever go to see a lady, not of uneasy but of uncertain age, and find yourself unexpectedly ushered into the family sitting-room by a new servant, who did not know the ways of the house? Did you find her with the remarkable ornament of a court-plaster lozenge an inch wide between her eyes, and one at the outer ends of her eyebrows? Did concern express itself lest she had fallen down stairs, or had a difference with the cat? Were these insinuations parried with veteran resources, and were you dissuaded from farther inquiry by the delicate remark that it would interest her more than you to give the history of her scratches? Of course you felt there was a mystery about those bits of court-plaster, and perhaps feel so to this day, if nature has not given you the mind of a detective. If so, your patience is to be rewarded. The secret of those patches was not scratches, but wrinkles.

I trust due tribute will be paid to the ingenuity of failing age, which has perfected this device for warding off its unwelcome tokens. The rationale of the plan is very simple. The plaster contracts the skin, and prevents its sinking into creases and lines. It also protects and softens it. Within the week I have heard of one oldish lady who wears these ornamental appendages all the time in the house when not receiving company, and covers parts of her face with a dough made of well-mumbled bread to keep her skin fair. The heroism of the resistance to time must be applauded, but whether the play is worth the candle is an open question. The beauty of age lies not in flesh like that of sixteen, but in clear and lofty expression, in the look of experience and not unkindly shrewdness, in the finish of self-repression, of calmness and trust and sympathy. These things grow on a face as it loses freshness and roundness, just as the sky begins to show through thinning boughs.

It would be the greatest of blessings for some people to learn to accept themselves and their gifts. If they could stand apart from themselves a while to see their becoming styles and acceptable points, much of their repining would be dropped as superfluous. Every thing and every body is beautiful in its season. There is a wholesome plainness that accords with domestic life and natural surroundings, as the bark of trees relieves their green. The color that comes of health, the gentleness and sweetness that come of a conquered self, are elements of beauty that make any face tolerable. How dear the plain faces are that have watched our childhood, with whom we have grown so closely that feature and form have lost their significance, so that we really don't know whether they are homely or not, and see only the love or the humor that lives in their faces. Very ugly people are happily indifferent to their looks in general, and the degrees of imperfection may always be lessened by judicious use of the arts of dress.

A woman young and homely may make herself agreeable by the complete neatness of a comparatively simple toilette. Let her eschew dresses of two colors, or shades even, though the latter are allowable, if of nice material, and the shadings very soft. Where the complexion is dull, there must be some warm or lively tinges of color in the costume, and vice versa. But it is easier to dress real figures than to generalize, and suggestions are understood better.

Cornelia Jackson is the rector's daughter in Uppercut, and hasn't above $200 a year to spend on her clothes and to buy Christmas presents with. She is a little too plump, is brown, with some warm color in her cheeks in summer, and has dark hair. Her face never would be noticed except for the jollity lurking in it, which she takes from her father. In winter and fall, when she looks pale, she "tones up" with a morning dress of all-wool stuff, one of those brown grounds with small bunches of brilliant crimson or purple flowers—a cheery pattern that the rector likes to have meet him behind the coffee-urn of a cold morning, with crisp white ruffles, set off by the brown dress. Crimson or purple, soft brilliant shades, are her colors for neck-ties. Her street dress is a dark walnut brown cloth, trimmed with cross-cut velvet the same shade. The over-skirts of Cornelia's dresses are always long, so that she will not look like a fishing-bob or doll pincushion; and there is deep rose-color about her bonnet: not roses, by-the-way—she has an unspoken feeling that it is not for every body to wear roses—but velvety mallows and double stocks, imitations of fragrant pleasing garden flowers that are very like herself. The brown and crimson maiden of a winter's day is a pleasant sight, when the gray of the church and white of the snow need something warm and eye-filling to come between them. In summer she chooses, or her cousin in New York chooses for her, not the light percales that every one else is wearing, nor the grays and stone-colors that walk to church every Sunday, but écru linens, with relief of black or brown for morning, when she goes from pantry to garden, and from sewing-machine to nursery. Afternoons she doesn't divide herself by putting on a white blouse and colored skirt, or a buff redingote over a black train, but wears a dress of one color, that looks as if it meant to stay at home. White nansook is her delight, its semi-transparency wonderfully suiting her clear brownness, but solid white linen or cambric she eschews. Soft violet jaconet, and the whole family of lilacs, are made for her; and she is luxurious in ruffles and flounces on her demi-trained skirts, since she makes and irons them often herself. Black grenadine, of course, she wears, with high lining to give her waist its full length, every bit of which it needs; and she is not too utilitarian to neglect the aid which a modest demi-train on a house dress gives to her height. All the girls may wear puffed waists and pleated waists; she knows they are not for her plump shoulders, though the clusters of fine tucks on a blouse give length to her bust, and divide the width of the back. Shawls she never wears, nor short perky basques, that are considered—I don't know why—the proper thing for stout figures. The long polonaise, and the short English jacket, which by its high shoulders and simple lines conveys a decent comeliness of figure, whoever wears it, are her choice. If she had a party dress, it would be white French muslin, or light green silvery silk, trimmed with pleatings of tulle, and with either she would wear her mother's pearls, or her own fine carbuncles.

Mrs. Senator, with all her fortune and position, is doomed to hear people speak of her in under-tone, "She is rich, but very plain." Being a sage woman, she does not waste her efforts on trying to alter her thin features, nor does she make herself ridiculous by a false complexion of rouge and pearl-powder, though her face and her hair are about of a brownness. But on her entry into Washington society she defied criticism by appearing with that same brown hair frizzed to show its lights and shades, without a tinge of gold or auburn, and give the best outline to her head, her gypsy face opposed to a dead white silk, of Parisian origin, with flounce of pleated muslin, and corsage trimmings of rich lace. It is a real dress and a real woman that is described, and it is no fiction to say that she was the success of the evening. The colorless dress without reflets, and her ornaments of clustered pearls, were most artistic contrast with the nut brown hair and dusky face. A spot of color would have destroyed the charm. The dress stamped her, as she was, a woman of skill sufficient to draw from the most unlikely combination against her the elements of novel and complete success.

The girl who sits near me at the hotel table tries my eyes with her thin, curious features, her pale, frizzed hair, that makes her face more peaked, and her oversized skirts. She ought not to wear those light dresses, for she has no color, and her thin complexion is not even clear. She has that difficult figure to dispose of that is at once girlish and tall, without seeming so. A trained dress would make her look lean at once, so she should dispense with any tournure, and let her dresses brush the floor a few inches, wearing as many small flounces below the knee as fashion and sense allow. If her mother, who is rather a strict lady, would insist on having the girl's dresses made with puffed waists, or loose blouses of thick linen, instead of the Victoria lawns that iron so flat, and show the poor shoulder-blades so, the effect would be rather delightful. She ought to wear puffed grenadines, and lenos of maroon, rosy lilac, or deep green—the first lighted with pale rosy bows at the throat and in the hair, the latter with light green and white, the lilac with periwinkle knots. How one would like to dress her over again, and turn the poor thing out charming as she ought to be. Her hair-dressing would all have to be done over again. Sharp-featured people shouldn't wear curls, which make the peaked effect still more visible. Soft waves, drawn lightly away from the face and brushed up from the neck behind, would be better, and smooth braids best of all, with little waves peeping out under the braids. If the young woman could train herself not to be excitable, or to smile so overcomingly, and not be so eager to meet new acquaintances, she would make a pleasing impression, while now she gets snubbed in a tacit way, and those who take her up out of pity don't feel as if they got paid for it. But if women with hay-colored hair could be brought to believe that light leaf brown wasn't the color, of all others, for their style, one would overlook minor deficiencies.

One is tempted to think sometimes that the loss is great in not adopting the French plan of lining houses with mirrors. If people caught sight continually of themselves, they would hardly indulge in the grimaces and gaucheries which they now inflict on the world. It could hardly lead to vanity, unless manners were without a fault, and would settle a hundred vexing problems of dress and demeanor. One is not always to be censured for studying the glass. The orator must use it to learn how to deliver his sentences with proper facial play and easy gesture. The public singer studies with a mirror on the music-rack to get the right position of the mouth for issuing the voice without making a face. The want of such precaution mars the work of some great artists with blemishes which all but undo the effect of their talents. The injunction that all things should be done decently and in order means that they should be pleasing. The study of ourselves can hardly be complete without the aid of the mirror, which shows us the cold smile, the vacant gaze, or the bashful one we give our fellow-beings, instead of the decent attention, the kind, full glance it is meet they should have from us, and which we prefer to receive from them. It shows the frown, the sour melancholy, which creep over the face in reveries, and leads us to be pleasant that we may look so. How much confidence one glance at a mirror has given us in going to receive a visitor, and what kindly warning of what was amiss in expression or toilette before it was too late! Is our vanity so easily excited that we are ready to fall in love with ourselves at sight? Indeed, the intimate knowledge of our appearance which the glass can give is more likely to make one genuinely humble. In a world which has among its maxims the gay and wicked refrain of "manners for us, morals for those who like them," good people can hardly afford to neglect either their mirrors or their toilettes.

SECOND-COUSIN SARAH.

By F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Little Kate Kirby," "For Her Sake," "A Bridge of Glass," "Mattie: A Stray," "No Man's Friend," etc., etc.

Book the First.

REUBEN CULWICK.

CHAPTER IV.

UNSUCCESSFUL.

THE effect of Reuben Culwick's announcement upon his father was remarkable. The big man rose from his chair with his two large hands clinched, and his face of a deep purplish hue, and glared at his son in speechless wrath. For an instant it appeared as if he were contemplating a rush at this disobedient offspring, as in days past, being a man fierce and uncontrollable, he had done, to the boy's alarm, and the dismay of a poor fragile woman long set apart from him; but the son sat immovably in the chair, which had been placed a few paces from his irascible parent, and regarded him imperturbably.

Simon Culwick sank slowly and heavily into his seat again, and panted for a while. The dark coloring left the face, but the bushy black brows retained their lower curves over the eyes, and the mouth was hard and fixed, until the lips parted slightly to allow a few words to escape.

"And this is the first time you tell me that you were in league with your mother?"

"Yes," answered Reuben, politely. "I was a willful lad who had not been brought up well, or looked after carefully, and I had been only taught to fear you. My mother, who had been separated from you for some years, I was learning to respect then. When we quarreled, I went to take care of her as well as I could. I was with her when she died."

"You know how I hated your play-acting mother—how she hated me."

"Yes."

"Why do you tell me that you sided with her, when it would be so much the better policy to keep this to yourself?" said the father, bitterly.

"Because I am not afraid of you any longer—because I see now where you were wrong, and where she—"

"That 'll do," interrupted the father; "what was the objection to the lady?"

"She did not like her," said the son; "she distrusted her."

"Very likely," was the reply; "she distrusted every body. Perhaps it is well you didn't marry. You might have had a son to grow up and be a blight upon you," said Simon Culwick, bitterly.

"Heaven forbid that any blight should come from that direction!"

"And you expect me to forgive this deceit as old men do at the end of a play?"

"Or toward the end of their lives," added Reuben.

"Don't talk to me of the end of my life," he cried; "I dare say you have thought enough of it—have considered that it would be as well to sink your cursed pride and your curseder temper, and come here in prodigal-son fashion. But it won't do; I'm not a man to be hoodwinked in that way."

"Yes, I have thought of the end of your life," answered Reuben Culwick, moodily.

"It was an infernal liberty," said the father; "I shall live as long as you."

"And it seemed hard," the son continued, "to die in enmity with each other. We were both in the wrong—both obstinate men; and I should have been glad to make peace."

"And make money."

"That I can do for myself," was the reply.

"It's lucky you can, for I shall never make any for you," said Simon Culwick, shortly. "Had you come here penitent—had you not preferred your mother to me, and your mother's advice to mine, I might have given you another chance; but I have not made up my mind to do that, understand me, for I doubt you still."

"Nevertheless, I am not sorry to have seen you, father," said Reuben, rising; "I came out of my way—a long way out of it—to reach Worcester. I am glad to find you well. Good-day."

He extended his hand again, but this time his father refused to take it.

"You have come out of your way to give me a fresh wound—that's all," said the father, sullenly, "and you have done it effectually. I don't want you to trouble me again. Should I at any time want you, I'll send for you."

He had intended this for merciless irony; but Reuben Culwick took a card from his pocket and laid it on the mantel-piece.

"A line will always find me at this address," he said, "and I shall be always glad to hear from you."

"I dare say you will," muttered the father.

"Otherwise," he added, and his mouth assumed the firm expression of his father's, "we shall never meet. I shall come not here again in all my life."

"You will not come here again at my invitation," said the father, as decisively as the son. "I can't forgive you—why should I? I never forgave any body. I never forgave your mother. Your two aunts offended me years ago, you know. Have I ever forgiven them? One died last summer, and I wouldn't go to see her—wouldn't go near her—and the other one is in St. Oswald's Almshouses, blind as a bat, and living on eight shillings a week. Eight shillings a week, and those pictures there cost me eighty thousand pounds."

"A good investment," said Reuben Culwick, coolly, and critically looking round the walls; "they will increase in value year by year, Sir."

As he looked round, he became aware for the first time that the lady in the bay-window had disappeared. She had passed from the room silently, through a second door at the extremity of the picture-gallery.

"And I never gave her a penny in my life," added Mr. Culwick senior.

"Poor old Sarah—blind, is she? and in the almshouses too? I am sorry."

"What the devil have you to be sorry about?"

"I liked old Sarah," said Reuben; "she was one of the few friends I had when I was a boy, and when you were not rich."

"No," answered Simon Culwick, half to himself.

"But I am detaining you," said Reuben; "and I am pledged to reach London to-night. Good-by again."

He did not offer his hand to his father a second time, and the father only murmured a few indistinct words by way of farewell salutation.

When he had reached the door, Simon Culwick called out his name, and Reuben paused and turned.

"I am not deceitful," said the father, "and I may as well tell you that I have made my will, and that you will never be a penny the better for it. It is all left—all," he added, "away from an undutiful son."

"You threatened me with disinheritance years ago, and," said Reuben, perhaps a little acridly, "you are a man of your word."

"Else I should not be the man I am."

"Possibly not."

There was a moment's pause, and then Reuben Culwick quitted his father's presence, and closed the door after him. He went from the room into the corridor with so thoughtful a mien that he was not for the moment aware that the young lady in gray silk whom he had seen in the bay-window was stepping back from the big fleecy mat at the door, to allow of his egress. When he saw her she put her finger to her lips, and he repressed an exclamation of surprise.

"Go back," she said, with an excitement that astonished him; "don't give up—don't leave him like that—it's your last chance."

"You have been listening," said Reuben, coldly.

"To every word," was the honest confession; "and you have not said a word to please him, and much to offend. Why did you come, if in no better spirit than this?"

"I came to be friends with him."

"And you have failed."

"Hardly. He understands that I bear him no ill will—my own father, madam!—for years of much privation and neglect."

"Go back to him. Tell him how sorry you are for every thing—do something before you go that will leave behind a better impression," she urged again.

"No; I can't go back."

"You are as hard as he is," she cried; "as if it mattered what you said to him—as if it were not worth a struggle to regain your position here."

"I should struggle in vain; I—but may I ask why a young lady whom I see for the first time, and whose position in this happy house is a mystery to me, should take so great an interest in my welfare?"

"I don't take any interest in you," was the sharp reply; "but I know that you are poor and proud and foolish, and that your father is not as heartless as you fancy."

"And who are you?" said the wondering Reuben.

"Only the housekeeper, Sir," she said, quaintly; "keeping house for Simon Culwick—and in your place. You should hate me as a usurper already," she added, mockingly, "if you had any spirit in you."

"The housekeeper—yes—but," he said, wonderingly, and without regarding her strange taunts, "I was not aware—"

"Why should you be aware of any thing about me, you who are as quarrelsome and strange as your father, and have kept away so long? There, go home, and think of the best way to bring that old man to his senses."

"And interfere with your chance," said Reuben, lightly. He was in better spirits already, and the odd manner of this young lady interested him.

"I have no chance," she answered, "or I should not be very anxious for you to get back. I should be too selfish—I should try and keep you away, being as fond of money as your father is."

"I hardly believe this."

"Mr. Reuben Culwick can believe exactly what he pleases," said the young lady, spreading out her skirts and making him a very low obeisance, which he felt bound to return with almost the same degree of mock solemnity, after which he would have continued the conversation, had she not darted along the corridor and disappeared.

"A queer young woman," muttered Reuben, as he walked to the front-door and let himself out of the house. The horse and chaise that he had hired of Muddleton's were still in charge of the rosy-faced groom, whom he presented with a fee, and then drove away without looking once behind him. He had fulfilled his task; it had failed, as he had been sure all along that it would fail, knowing so much better than any one else what his father was like, and how unlike—Heaven forgive him!—to all other fathers of whom he had heard men speak, and whom, in his pilgrimage, he had encountered. Ah! it was lucky that he had not turned out a worse man, considering his early training and his early neglect, the want of sympathy with him and his boyish pursuits and aspirations, the total absence of all affection, his own utter loneliness of youth, and the world left to tempt him, rather than afford him grave experience. Why had he not grown up an arrant scamp, a thorough blackguard, as some will, left to the blight of such neglect as his, and then faced suddenly with bitter tyranny and exaction? What had saved him?—Heaven, his own strong will, or his play-acting mother whose life he had shared at the last?

Hosted by Google

He drove into the city of Worcester with his face graver and more thoughtful than he had driven away from it that morning, although he had foreseen much of the result of his journey, and had prepared for it. The position was a strange one, stranger than our readers are aware of at present; and that fair-faced, energetic young lady who had reproved him rendered the world before him a serious subject for contemplation. He should remember coming to Worcester again to the last day of his life. It was a new beginning; even in the rain last night he had stepped from the common-place to a something like romance, but he had forgotten the first incident of his arrival until he was in Muddleton's coffee-room, and the waiter, with his hands on the table, was leaning across the white cloth toward him.

"Beg pardon, Sir, but he's been."

"Who has been?" asked Reuben.

"The young man who helped to carry the luggage last night for you."

"Has she, by Jove?" said Reuben.

The waiter's eyes rounded and enlarged, but he had been bred in too polite a sphere to express any opinion, although that number forty-eight, which was the number of Reuben's room, should be so ignorant of the sex of the party who assisted him last night was extraordinarily bewildering, unless drink had done for forty-eight before his arrival.

"Yessir. And he said," he added, with the slightest emphasis on the pronoun, "that he thought half a crown a precious little, considering how he had spoiled his things with your box. 'The infernal box,' he called it, along with other names."

"She said that!"

"He tried it on very hard for another shilling, but I told him that I had my orders from you direct, and could not afford to advance, and that it was like his impudence to come at all. I said that, Sir," added the waiter, deferentially, "because he got awful saucy, and we had to put him out of the house. His langwidge, Sir, was bad."

"What kind of a man was he?" asked Reuben Culwick.

"A shortish young man, Sir."

"Yes; and thin?"

"Like a lath."

"And very pale?"

"Yessir, and dirty."

"A womanish kind of face, with big eyes—black eyes?"

"Oh no, Sir—not a bit womanish. He was as full of pock-marks as a cribbage-board, and his eyes were particularly small, Sir."

"Very good—or rather very bad," said Reuben Culwick; "half crown poorer, and the man has got the money instead of the woman."

"Indeed, Sir—yessir;" and the waiter departed. Outside the door he tapped his forehead significantly, and jerked his thumb over his shoulder in the direction of the room he had quitted; this was for the instruction or amusement of another waiter coming down stairs with an empty soda-water bottle and glass on a tray.

"Mad as a March hare, Bob," he said, sententiously.

"Who?" said Bob.

"Forty-eight."

"That's young Culwick, ain't it?"

"Yes."

"Oh, he always was a rum un."

CHAPTER V.

ST. OSWALD'S.

REUBEN CULWICK had an early dinner at Muddleton's, thereby dispensing with the luxury of a lunch. After dinner he spent some time poring over a time-table, and finally rang the bell.

"I shall want my luggage taken to the station this afternoon," he said to the waiter who had doubted his sanity; "I wish to catch the 5.15 train for London."

"Yessir."

"And the bill, please, at once."

"Yessir."

After he had defrayed the expenses of his board and lodging at Muddleton's he sat with his hands in his pockets, considering many things of grave perplexity. The waiter left him; when business took him into the coffee-room again, number forty-eight was laughing to himself just as lunatics of a cheerful frame of mind, or of no mind at all, are in the habit of doing.

"Why shouldn't I?" Reuben Culwick said to himself; "I shall not have another chance—she's one of the family—I may never see Worcester again."

He beckoned the waiter to him.

"The St. Oswald Almshouses are at the top of Foregate Street, are they not?"

"Yessir—in the Tithing."

"Ah! the Tithing. I have been so long away that I forget names and places—every thing but injuries," he muttered; then he turned to the waiter, impressed once more upon him the necessity of his luggage being at the railway station by 5.15 P.M., and strolled leisurely out of the hotel, after a "good-day" to the man who had attended upon him. He did not go direct to the Tithing, but wandered round the cathedral, and strolled to the bridge, over which he looked at the Severn, and where he hesitated strangely.

"What is the use? I shall only hear the recital of her grievances, real and imaginary—disturb her and myself—feel myself in the way, and leave her none the happier. What's the use of my going, after all? I am as helpless, poor, and blind as she is!"

He did not see the use of it in the sluggish waters that flowed on beneath the arch of the bridge, and at which he gazed so steadfastly—he had even turned away as from an unthankful task of which the river warned him, when a second impulse set him with his face from the railway station, and took him with rapid strides in the direction upon which he had first resolved. The church clocks were striking three when he paused at the gateway which opened upon the inner quadrangle of houses dedicated to St. Oswald—one of the few kings of whom good-wearing saints have been made—and looked through at the court-yard and the pavement checkered with shadow, and thought what a silent and ghost-like place it was, lying apart from the turmoil of the town. The doors of some of the almshouses were open, and at one of them was a faint sign of life, in the form of a young woman, poorly but neatly clad in a black and white striped cotton dress, who was sitting with her elbows planted on her knees, her hands supporting her temples, and her face bent close over a book that lay upon her lap. As Reuben advanced he saw that the watcher on the threshold had tired of her volume, and closed her eyes in sleep.

It was a selfish necessity to arouse her, for there was no one about of whom to make inquiries, and time and train would not wait for Reuben Culwick. The young woman had plenty of opportunity for sleep, if she could begin at that early hour of the afternoon, thought Reuben, as he lightly touched her shoulder.

The sleeper moved uneasily, and then jerked her head back suddenly, and looked at this intruder upon the quiet sanctuary of St. Oswald's.

"Can you tell me where—"

Reuben Culwick paused in his inquiry, for the white pinched face and the big black eyes were the face and eyes of the strange girl who had volunteered to carry his luggage last night, and collapsed by the way. He could not be mistaken; he had looked too anxiously at her as she lay in her swoon to be deceived, despite her feminine guise at this crisis, and the taller woman that she looked in it. The big black eyes blinked like a cat's in the sun, and the lashes quivered in unison; but then he had awakened her from slumber, and there was no sign of recognition on her countenance. There was a certain amount of contraction of the eyebrows, that might have indicated a half scowl at the traveler for waking her thus unceremoniously.

"Do you know me?" Reuben said, changing his tone and question.

"No," was the slow reply; "I've never seen you before."

"Not at Worcester station, at ten o'clock last night, when you helped me with a heavy portmanteau that I was selfish enough to let you carry for me?" he continued.

"I helped you with a portmanteau!" said the girl, scoffingly, "at Worcester station! Yes, that's very likely!"

"It was you," said Reuben, sternly, as he continued to stare at her, and as the girl's cool denial of the fact began to aggravate him. "Why do you tell me that it was not?"

The young woman did not answer readily. She rose to her feet—a tall, angular girl, smitten sorely by poverty—and leaned against the door-post, peering at her questioner with her brow still contracted.

"Why should I help you?" she said at last. "Can't you help yourself?"

"You fainted away; you were weak, and gave up. Why deny this?"

"I don't know what you are talking about," was the sullen answer. "Who told you that you would find your friend in such a place as this, I should like to know?"

"Then you were not at Worcester station last night?" said Reuben, still persistently.

"No," was the response.

"This is a very nice young woman," muttered Reuben Culwick; "if I could have lied as complacently as that to my father, I might be now on a fair way to re-instatement."

The girl was turning away as if with the intention of passing into the house, when Reuben remembered the object of his quest.

"Will you tell me, please, in which of these small establishments resides Sarah Eastbell?" he asked.

The girl paused, and then swung herself rapidly round and faced him again.

"What next?" she cried, angrily, "and what's next after that?" she added. "I'm Sarah Eastbell, and if you have any thing to say against me, say it. I'm not ashamed of my name; I never was—I never did any thing wrong in my life. Now, then, what is it that you want?"

"You are Sarah Eastbell!" said Reuben, with a new interest asserting itself. "Then you are—no, you can't be," added our hero, exhibiting again that incoherence which had already bewildered the waiter at Muddleton's.

"Will you tell me what you want here?" asked Miss Eastbell, peremptorily.

"I want to see an older lady than yourself, of the same name, and residing, I believe, in one of these almshouses."

"Oh, indeed! What for?" was the cautious inquiry.

"Upon no particular business—a friendly call, that's all," said Reuben, lightly.

"My grandmother is not well enough to see company."

"She will see me," replied Reuben Culwick.

"She is not able to—"

The statement concerning Mrs. Eastbell's idiosyncrasies was destined never to be completed, for a short, sharp "Sarah!" in an excruciatingly high key, that was like the twang of a wire, and left a humming sound in Reuben's ears, came from an inner room on the left-hand side of the doorway.

"Coming!" said the tall girl; and she disappeared at once, and left Mr. Culwick on the threshold, half resolved to follow her. He did not do so, however; he lingered there politely, while some mutterings and murmurings went on in the inner room, and he felt that he was the subject of discourse, and that Miss Eastbell was giving a very bad account of him, and prejudicing her grandmother against him. This young woman was a being to be wary of.

"I don't care what he is, or what he wants," he heard the shrill voice say again, "and so let him come in, Sally."

"But—"

"Ah! it's no good your 'butting' me, Sally; I will hear what he has to say. Perhaps he's brought a fortune with him!"

"Very well," answered Sarah Eastbell the Younger; and before Reuben was prepared for her re-appearance she was standing in the doorway again.

"You can come in," said the girl, sullenly.

CHAPTER VI.

"SECOND-COUSIN SARAH."

SHE led the way to a small room, scrupulously clean, with a bed in the centre of the room, and an old woman in the centre of the bed. There was nothing to be seen of Mrs. Eastbell but her face, and a grim, yellow, parchment face it was, cut up by a hundred wrinkles, and brought strongly into relief by the white sheet drawn under her chin, and the voluminous frilled cap in which her head was framed. The eyes were closed, though the pupils were restlessly moving beneath the lids, which were to be lifted never again in St. Oswald's.

"Well, Sir," said the head above the sheet, "will you please to state what business you have with old Sarah Eastbell, who has been past business for the last ten years?"

It was a crisp and not wholly shrill voice, now that it had dropped an octave or two. The visitor walked to the bedside, sat down in a rush-bottomed chair that was there, and looked hard at her.

"When I saw you last you were a bustling little woman, carrying your years well," said Reuben Culwick, tenderly. "I am sorry to find an old friend brought down as low as this."

The pupils beneath the sealed lids were motionless for an instant, and seemed listening in themselves to the man's voice; then they began to move to and fro with great rapidity.

"I think that I should know the voice. But it can't be—"

"Can't be whose voice?" he asked, as she paused.

"It can't be Reuben's, can it?" she asked, eagerly.

"Yes, it can."

"Now to think of that, after these years, and here!" said Mrs. Eastbell. "That's kind of you, Reu; I'm very glad," and the old lady fought hard with the sheet, and got a thin yellow hand above the bedclothes, and extended it in the direction of her nephew, laughing in an odd chuckling way that portended future hysterics, if she were not careful. Reuben shook the hand in his, and the girl stood by the mantelpiece, watching the greeting furtively.

"What made you think of me?" said the old woman, after a moment's pause.

"I came to Worcester last night. I heard this morning for the first time that you were here."

"Who told you?"

"My father."

It was a face despite its sightlessness that expressed a great deal, Reuben Culwick thought, as the gray eyebrows arched themselves, and the mouth became rounded.

"You are friends, then? He has forgiven you?" she said.

"No."

"Ah! he will presently," said Mrs. Eastbell, with an easy confidence; "there are many good points about my brother Simon, and it is only a question of time. All things come round in time, Reu—even good luck. That's what I often tell our Sally."

Sally winced suddenly at this introduction of her name into the discourse, and Reuben looked across his prostrate relative toward the young attendant, who drew a pattern on the floor with the point of her boot, and did not return his glances.

"Some day Simon will walk in here just as you have done, and say how sorry he is for all the past," said the old woman. "Sometimes I lie awake fancying I can hear his footsteps coming across the paved yard toward me."

"You should not fancy that."

"Why not?" was the quick reply. "It does me good."

"I would not build upon his offering you any help," said Reuben Culwick.

"I don't want any help. Eight shillings a week keep more life in me than I know what to do with. I'm very happy, though it's an awful place for flies. Sally does a little work when she can get it, and is a dear, kind nurse, who never tires of me. She'll read the Bible half the day to me, when I'm too ill to run about much. A good girl, Sally!"

"I am very glad to hear it," answered Reuben.

He would not have dispelled the old woman's faith in her granddaughter by a word—by any question hinging on last night's mystery, or to-day's prevarication. This was a woman who had faith in every body, and extracted happiness even from an almshouse in a shady corner of Worcester city.

"When I am gone I should like somebody to get Sally a good place. Don't you know any one who wants an honest, hard-working, truthful girl?"

"Not at present," said Reuben, glancing across at Sarah Eastbell again, who was still tracing hieroglyphics on the floor. She looked up this time as he replied to her grandmother, and shrugged her shoulders either at the old woman's criticism or at the wild idea of her being indebted to him for her future position in life.

"Will she be wholly alone in the world some day?" asked Reuben Culwick, inquisitively.

"She has not a friend; she will make plenty, of course, but she has them to make."

"My cousin Mark was her father, then. Is he—"

"Yes, he's dead. So's his wife. They were a worthy couple, but they were very unlucky, and so better out of the world than in it," said the grandmother. "When they died last year I offered Sally part of my home, and my sister tried to do something for Tom, but he went to sea."

"Tom is Sarah's brother, I suppose?"

"Yes."

"And at sea now?"

"And at sea now, doing favorably, thank his stars!"

Reuben Culwick had his doubts of Thomas Eastbell. In his mind he had already associated him with an uncivil young vagabond who had called for money at Muddleton's Hotel, and considered himself but ill remunerated by half a crown for work at which he had never assisted.

"Oh, you hear from him occasionally?"

"Yes; and Sally reads me all his letters."

Reuben looked once more across at Sally Eastbell. She was staring at him eagerly until he met her gaze, when the dark eyes shifted to the floor again, and a deep red blush, a brick-dust kind of blush, burned itself slowly in her cheeks, and staid there as long as he looked in her direction. He was glad that she could blush; he was surprised at her; he was curious enough to wish that he could fathom the little mystery about her, and arrive at the secret of her motives and the history of her life. She was decidedly a strange girl, living a strange existence in the house of her grandmother, and playing, as it seemed to him, a double part. Unless he was really deceived—and this was not the girl who had met him in man's clothes last night, but some one strangely and wonderfully like her!

He could not resist a question which rose to his lips, and which brought to Sarah Eastbell's countenance the old sullen expression which had struck him first that day.

"Does Sarah sleep here—live with you altogether?"

"Yes," answered the old woman; "it's very selfish of me to keep her to myself, but, please the Lord, it will not last a great while longer. She's young—she's industrious, and will be always able to get her living—any where—and if you hear of any thing that will suit her, you will bear her in mind, Reuben?"

"I shall not forget her," said Reuben, dryly.

"She shall come and tell you when I'm gone, if you let me know where you live," added Mrs. Eastbell, in a brisk, business-like manner; "it is as well to arrange these little matters."

"I live at Hope Lodge, Hope Street, Camberwell."

"That's right, Reu—always live in Hope, my lad."

It was a feeble joke which nobody appreciated but this light-hearted old blind woman, and she appreciated it for the three of them, and lay chuckling over it until it nearly choked her.

"You haven't told me much about your life, and what you're doing, Reu. But you're not going away yet."

"I must leave in ten minutes," said Reuben, looking at his watch.

"What—not stop and take a cup of tea with your old aunt?" cried Mrs. Eastbell.

"I must be in town to-night."

"You find something to do in town, then?"

"Oh yes."

"And money for the doing of it?"

"Yes—heaps of money," he said, laughingly.

"If I ever get strong enough to come to London, Sally shall bring me to Hope Lodge."

This was another joke to which her two listeners did not take readily. They were blind witticisms to match her malady.

"I am going now," said Reuben Culwick, stooping over her. "Good-by, aunt."

"Good-by, lad. Thank you for a visit which will cheer me up for days; and think of something for my Sally, if you can."

How strongly impressed that sullen girl by the fire-place was on the old woman's mind he did not fully comprehend until this last moment of their meeting.

"Grandmother!" said Sarah the Younger, deprecatingly; but Mrs. Eastbell went on, the thin bony hand clinging to her nephew's tightly.

"She's every thing to me, but I wouldn't mind parting with her at once—to-morrow, if you should hear of a decent situation for her. Any body can mind me—and I don't want to stop the way to her advancement. She's clever at her needle—she reads well—she's quick at figures—in any tradesman's shop, now, she'd be very handy—and she's only seventeen; so young, Reu, to be alone in the world after I am gone!"

"Yes," said Reuben, "so young!"

"So young, and so willful and deceptive, he thought also—after he had parted with his aunt and said "Good-day" to Sally Eastbell, and walked into the little square court-yard, where the rain had begun to patter briskly again, as though there had been no wet weather for weeks, and it was coming down to make up for lost time.

He was looking at the leaden clouds which were deepening overhead, when Sarah Eastbell stole to his side and twitched his arm.

"You need not trouble yourself to think of any thing for me," she said, ungraciously; "you wouldn't have done so, I dare say—but it's as well to tell you I don't want any help from you; and as for leaving her before she dies—well, I'd rather die myself, much!" she added, with a sudden passion exhibiting itself.

Hosted by Google

"You are attached to her?" said Reuben Culwick, quickly.

"She's the only friend I ever had," was the girl's answer, as she relapsed into her old moodiness of manner.

"Your father and mother?"

"Don't speak of them," said the girl, shuddering, "oh, don't speak of them."

"Your brother Tom—who is getting on so famously?"

"Toward the gallows," cried the girl.

"What does it all mean? Why do you tell that poor old woman—"

"So many lies?—because the lies come handiest," she said, defiantly, "and I have been bred upon them, and they're natural to me. That's all."

"Will you tell me one truth before I go?" he said. "Come, now, Sarah Eastbell—Second-cousin Sarah—in whom I am interested." Reuben Culwick spoke with tenderness; he possessed a wondrous sympathetic voice, and the girl looked at him till the sullen expression of her face softened and then died away.

"'Second-cousin Sarah!'" she quoted; and a faint smile flickered round her mouth for an instant. "Well, go on."

"You will answer straightforwardly?"

"You will not go back and tell her, and make her miserable, then?" she said, as though by way of compromise.

"I will not."

"Go on, then, Second-cousin Reuben," she added, half scornfully, half lightly.

"You are the girl who helped me with my trunk last night?"

"Yes," was the quick response.

"And you thought that I had come to tell your grandmother about it?"

"Yes."

"Why were you so anxious to earn money, and in so strange a fashion?"

"Oh," said the girl, turning away, "you're too curious."

"Come," he said, snatching at her arm, "an honest confession, and then good-by, Sarah Eastbell."

"I sha'n't tell you," she answered, struggling to get her arm away.

"Was it for yourself?"

"No."

"For Tom?"

"No."

"To make good something that Tom had taken from his grandmother?" said Reuben.

"Ah! you know, then," cried Sarah Eastbell, wrenching herself from her second cousin's clutch, and running with great swiftness into the house, the door of which she closed with a noise that shook the place and startled Mrs. Eastbell from dream-land.

"What's that?" said the grandmother—"thunder?"

"Yes, it looks like a storm outside," answered the girl.

"I should think it did, when it has nearly shaken me out of bed," said Mrs. Eastbell; "but I dare say it will clear the air, and kill some of the flies. I hope poor Reu will not get wet going to the station."

"Can't he take a cab?"

"I don't believe he can afford it, Sally. He's like you and me, girl, very poor and beastly proud."

"Is he? I should have thought that he had been a gentleman."

"Gentlemen don't live in Hope Street, Camberwell, I know," said Mrs. Eastbell.

"But they can afford to leave money for their poor relations, poked under the pillow of the bed," cried the granddaughter, whose quick dark eyes had detected the corner of a bank-note peeping from the pillow on which Mrs. Eastbell's head was resting. "Why, this is the luck you and I have been talking about so long!"

"I didn't want his money," muttered the old woman; "I'm not so poor but what I pay my way. He's a very silly fellow—he always was."

"Indeed!"

"He never could keep money—he was always doing something or other that was foolish. How much is it, Sally?"

"It is a five-pound note."

"Put it in the tea-pot, girl," said the old woman; "it will come in handy presently. I can have a comfortable funeral now."

Sally Eastbell made a clattering noise with the lid of an old china tea-pot, which, with its spout off, formed the central ornament of a high mantel-piece, but she did not deposit the note therein. That was not a safe receptacle for money. Tom knew of that!

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

MADAME M'MAHON.

MADAME M'MAHON.

EVERY afternoon between two and three a portly-looking lady, with a kindly expression of countenance, with large blue eyes, and hair slightly tinged with gray, may be seen to leave the Executive Mansion at Versailles, leading a little girl by the hand, and devoting her attention immediately to a number of poor people who seem to have waited for her, and among whom she and her pretty little companion then distribute alms, addressing a few benevolent words to each of the recipients of their charities.

When the two, whom the most casual beholder will at once recognize to be mother and daughter, appear, the two sentinels respectfully present arms. They leisurely walk down the superb avenue, and move among the other promenaders in the most unostentatious manner, standing still every now and then, and exchanging a few pleasant words with acquaintances. But for the glances which most of the passers-by send after the lady, you would believe that she was the wife of some government employé—perhaps of a deputy in the National Assembly; for she wears a simple black dress, and her bonnet, although of faultless shape, can not have cost many dollars. And yet she is at the present time the foremost lady in France, the consort of Marshal M'Mahon, President of the French Republic.

The career of this eminent lady, although the papers have had very little to say about her, has nevertheless been an eventful one, and in her present exalted station, notwithstanding her quiet, unobtrusive demeanor, she is known to exert a momentous influence upon the decisions of her husband. The latter admires pluck, and it may be truly said that he has a most plucky wife. Indeed, it was an act of heroism on her part that first attracted his attention toward her.

It was on the 1st of December, 1838, at an advanced hour of the night, that a fire broke out in the female seminary of Limoges. The flames spread with such rapidity that the fair young inmates could be rescued only with the utmost difficulty. At last, when all of them were believed to be assembled, shivering in their thin night dresses, in front of the burning edifice, the cry resounded suddenly, "Louise de Bailly is still in the building!"

The lookers-on stood as if petrified, and the firemen did not venture to enter the house, which now looked like a fiery furnace. Poor Mademoiselle de Bailly was already given up as hopelessly lost, when all of a sudden a tall young girl, with her blonde hair hanging loose over her shoulders, and her deep blue eyes flashing out the heavenly fire of inspiration and indomitable courage, rushed from among her terrified young sisters, and exclaiming, "I will try to find her!" ran toward the burning building.

A thousand voices shouted, "Do not risk your life thus foolishly!"

Others prayed for "dear Héloïse," who thus recklessly risked her own life in order to save that of one of her young classmates. But none of the warning exclamations deterred the heroic girl from her purpose. In a few seconds she had entered the front-door, undaunted by the blinding smoke and the flames that were momentarily gaining ground.

For the spectators of this thrilling scene this was a moment of supreme suspense. The strongest hearts quailed when the heroic girl did not immediately return.....A minute, nay, two, elapsed, and minutes under such circumstances are eternities.....But all at once her white night-gown appeared in the door.....Yes, it was she; and by the hand she led the missing, terrified Louise de Bailly.....

Such a shout as went up from the hearts of the relieved crowd! Such praises as were showered upon the brave young girl!

But she herself was half ashamed of being thus féted. "Mon Dieu!" she exclaimed, "it was easy enough for me to ascend that stairway; it was not yet on fire. Only the smoke troubled me a little. Had I waited a minute longer, poor little Louise would have been lost."

At the reopening of the seminary, a few months later, M. Sarreguin asked Mademoiselle Héloïse to step forward, and presented her, in the name of King Louis Philippe, a handsome gold medal for saving a human life, and praised her courage and devotion in eloquent terms of enthusiasm.

The girl thus honored blushed deeply, and when the hall in which the opening ceremonies were held resounded with heart-felt applause, Mademoiselle Héloïse was more confused than at that memorable moment when she had rushed into the flames.

Among the spectators on this occasion was a young officer of the garrison of Limoges, who seemed to be deeply interested in the heroine of the day. He asked what her full name was, and was told that she was the daughter of M. Antoine Gilbert de Morin, Seigneur de Valleau.

This information made the inquirer somewhat thoughtful. Perhaps the fact that M. De Morin was one of the wealthiest and proudest noblemen of the surrounding country had something to do with this.

Captain M'Mahon (that was the name of the young officer), however, was not much disturbed by this information. True, he was then but a captain in the French army, and had nothing but his pay to depend on, but then he had excellent prospects of once becoming rich; his family was as old, if not older, than that of Héloïse's father, and a French soldier always has a marshal's bâton in his knapsack.

How he managed to get acquainted with Mademoiselle De Morin we can not tell, but certain it is, when the young lady, some time afterward, was told by her father that he had selected a husband for her, she startled him by the announcement that he might save himself that trouble, and that she had already made her own choice.

The old gentleman was at first astonished, and then became furious. But his daughter briefly told him that she wanted no one but Captain M'Mahon, of the Fourth Regiment of the Line.

And now began a curious struggle between the exasperated father and the determined daughter. Notwithstanding the efforts of M. De Morin to intercept Héloïse's correspondence with her lover, frequent letters were exchanged between the two; and when Captain M'Mahon was sent to Algeria, they pledged themselves to remain true to one another. This separation lasted three years, until 1842, when M'Mahon, who had greatly distinguished himself in Africa, suddenly fell heir to considerable property. This softened the obdurate heart of M. De Morin, and in 1844 Héloïse became the wife of Lieutenant-Colonel M'Mahon.

She accompanied him to Africa, and wrote from thence to the Gazette de France a series of anonymous sketches on Algerian life, which were favorably noticed by the critics, and which, oddly enough, were generally attributed to a distinguished officer of the French army.

In 1849 Madame M'Mahon returned to France, where the successive deaths of her three children almost broke her heart. She took up her abode at her husband's property, Sully, near Autun, and lived in the deepest retirement, from which she emerged only after the Crimean war, when her husband's gallantry had made him the most popular general in France.

She moved into a modest house with him in Paris, avoiding as much as possible to come in contact with the imperial court, for which she entertained an invincible repugnance, partly, probably, on account of the to her distasteful frivolities of the Empress and her surroundings, and partly too because, having been brought up amidst all the prejudices and hauteur of the old aristocracy, she could not bring herself to relish the parvenus that ruled supreme at the Tuileries.

On one occasion, shortly before New-Year's, le jour d'étrennes, she met the Emperor Napoleon the Third while walking with her two children through a large Parisian toy store. The Emperor was piqued by the coldness which the duchess had displayed toward his court, and he adroitly tried to conquer her aversion. Taking her children by the hand, the autocrat caused them to select the most superb toys, until she finally interfered, and said to the Emperor:

"Sire, your kindness is unfortunately useless. What will my little ones do with these beautiful things in Africa, whither I shall take them to-morrow, and rejoin my husband?"

The Emperor bit his lips. He had failed in his purpose to conciliate her.

It is needless to recapitulate here the events of the next few years. Like every true daughter of France, Madame M'Mahon suffered intensely. The news of her husband's defeat at Woerth prostrated her so that her life was despaired of; and when she returned to Versailles after the war she looked ten years older, and her hair had assumed a silvery tinge. Those who know her best say that she has an excellent heart, that she is nobly ambitious, a generous foe, endowed with considerable literary talents, keen-sighted in politics, and a fervent Christian.

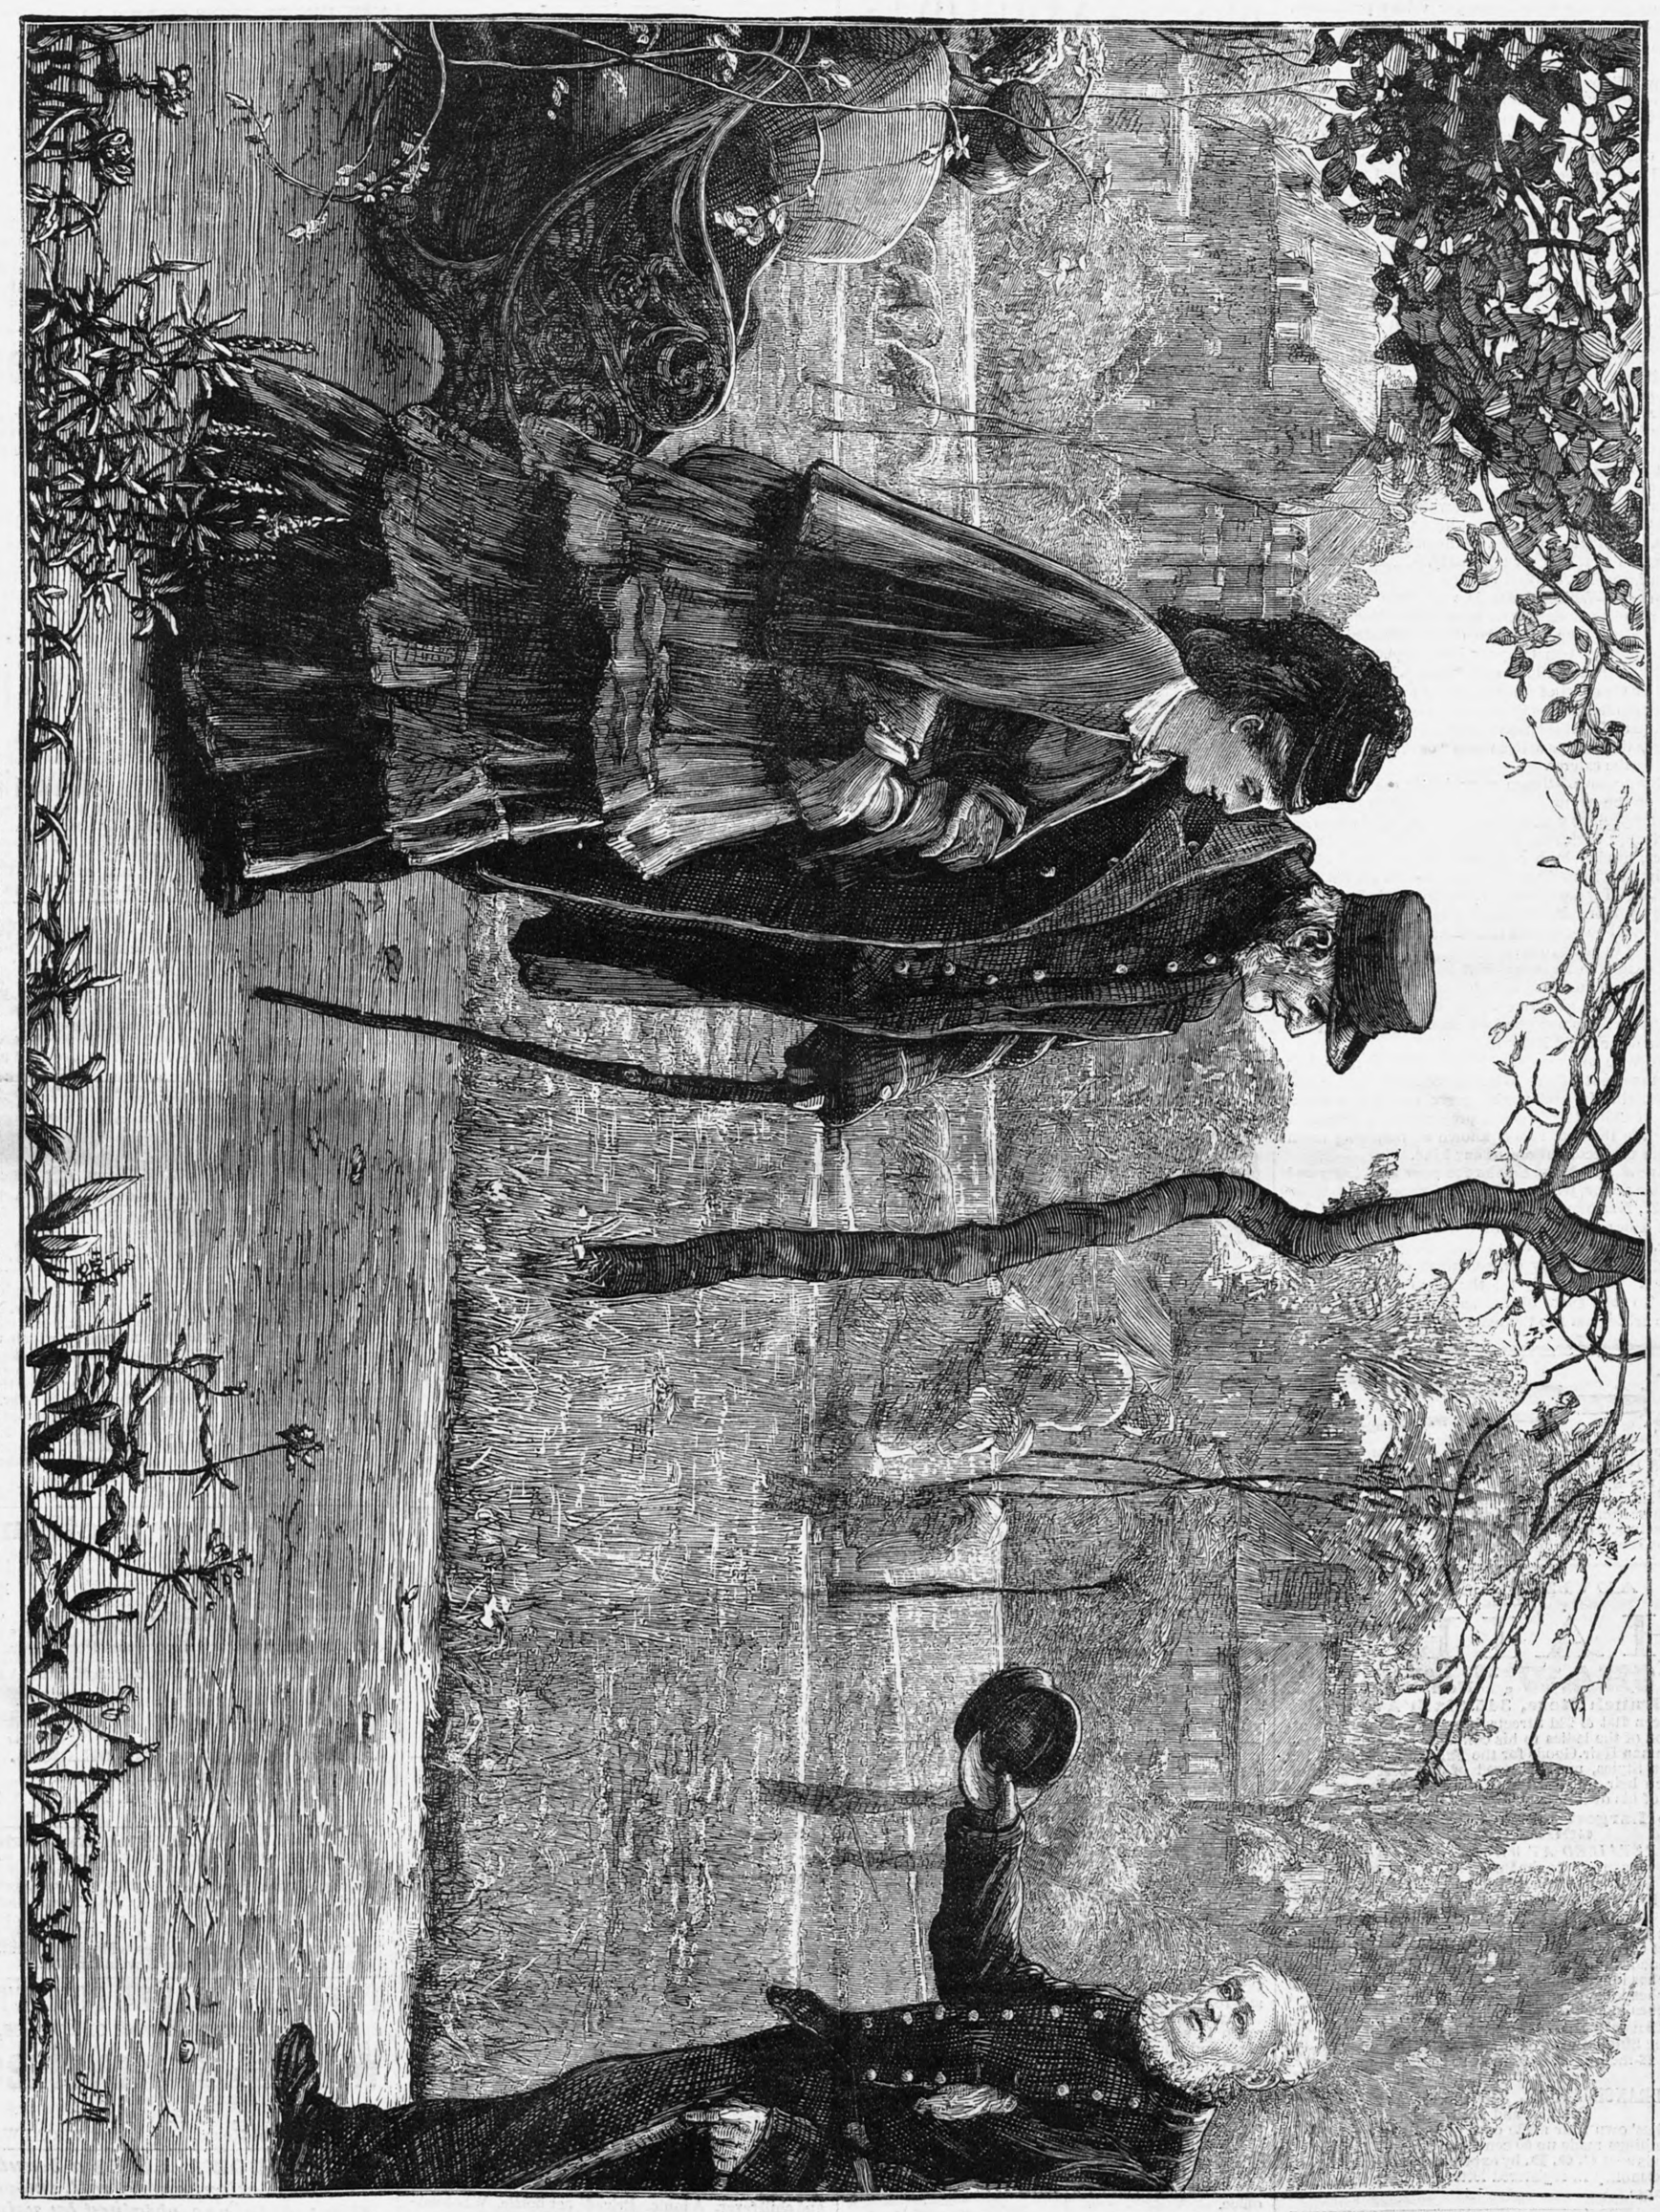
"THERE WAS NOTHING TO BE SEEN OF MRS. EASTBELL BUT HER FACE."

Hosted by Google

SUNDAY EVENING IN CHELSEA HOSPITAL GARDENS, LONDON.

THE time-honored method of exercising charity, by collecting together a number of superannuated persons, and compelling them to live under fixed rules and regulations in the same building or series of buildings, has of late fallen into considerable disfavor. In truth, there is not the same necessity for such arrangements as there was formerly. When steam locomotion was unknown, when roads were indifferent and highwaymen numerous, it would have been a matter of no small difficulty to pay pensions to a number of veteran soldiers or sailors scattered over the surface of a large country, nor would it have been easy to ascertain if the persons supposed to be in receipt of pensions were actually alive to enjoy them. Science has altered all this, and the modern doctrine of laissez faire, which proclaims that a man should be allowed to do just what he pleases so long as he does not annoy his neighbor, favors the system of out-pensions. And it possesses many substantial advantages. Soldiers and sailors who have passed the active part of their lives in crowded barracks, or between the decks of ships of war, are especially alive to the attractions of snugness and homeliness. They don't want to be summoned to their meals at a fixed hour by the clang of a bell; they prefer a bit of dinner cooked as they please and when they please; nor are they always so anxious to associate with comrades of their own cloth. To a certain extent all trades herd together, but, nevertheless, in their hours of relaxation, men like to mix with people of different pursuits to their own.

A few of the old institutions still remain, however, in England—among others, Chelsea Hospital, for superannuated soldiers, which was founded in the reign of CHARLES II., through the influence, it is said, of NELL GWYNNE, and completed by Sir CHRISTOPHER WREN in the time of WILLIAM III. It is a fine brick edifice, with stone porticoes, laid out in three quadrangles, surrounded by spacious grounds which extend to the river, and which comprise the once celebrated Ranelagh Gardens, the fashionable resort of the English nobility, and of royalty itself, during the days of the earlier GEORGES. The establishment supports over five hundred in-door pensioners, and from seventy to eighty thousand out-pensioners. The expenditure, which amounts to more than seven million dollars per annum, is defrayed by a Parliamentary grant. It is on the north bank of the Thames, southwest of London, and about four and a half miles from St. Paul's. The gardens are very beautiful, and form a picturesque feature in the river landscape. Here, in the picture before us, we see the old pensioner, in his scarlet uniform with blue facings, leaning on the arm of his granddaughter, perhaps, and replying to the salutation of a former brother-in-arms.



SUNDAY EVENING IN CHELSEA HOSPITAL GARDENS, LONDON.

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MAZEPPA.—A cashmere walking jacket will look well trimmed with a bias repped silk band, collar, cuffs, and lappets. Have a redingote with your brown dress, and trim with yak braid. Make your black silk with a demi-polonaise by hints given in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI.

OSWEGO.—Dress your hair with ropes and puffs, or else puffs and braids, in the way described in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 41, Vol. VI. It is too early to give the best styles for velvet polonaises. For black silks read Bazar No. 39, Vol. VI.

BETSY.—Thread lace is a suitable trimming for black silk.

RUBY.—Trim your cloth redingote with revers collar, pockets, cuff, belt, and inch-wide border all around of heavy repped silk. Fasten the belt behind with an oxidized silver clasp. Hoops are entirely out of fashion. Get a walking coat of warm merino or cashmere, lined and wadded, for your child just walking.

OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Your camel's-hair is a stylish shade, and will look well as you now have it. If you prefer a vest, you should have one of olive silk—not black. There is no charge for information given in this column.

ANXIOUS.—Get purple merino of a darker shade. For black alpaca read Bazar No. 40, Vol. VI.

E. S. G.—The sailor suits continue in fashion, and the Bazar pattern sent you for girl's dress is what you need. For girls use black and dark blue flannel (almost black), and brighten them by red merino collars, cuffs, pockets, sash, and bands on the skirt; also use lighter blue trimmings. Trim the boy's suit with darker blue or black braid, and let him wear bright scarlet, blue, or striped merino long hose. We will give an article on children's fashions at our earliest convenience.

FITZ AND OTHERS.—Have a regular wedding table for your breakfast at 10 A.M., with a variety of meats, salads, cake, fruits, and ices. Ornament the table with flowers, as if for an evening party.—Read about yak lace in Bazar No. 41, Vol. VI.

LOUIE R.—White alpaca is very little used now. Have a tight polonaise, and trim it with black velvet, or else dark blue. Use the double-breasted jockey basque suit pattern for your black alpaca, and trim with bias bands and blue steel buttons. A silk evening dress for a girl of fourteen is not as appropriate as thinner stuffs, such as Swiss muslin or tarlatan.

BLANCHE K.—It is customary at dancing parties here to cover the carpets with a white "dancing cloth," provided by the caterer.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Steam your black cashmere, and press on the wrong side. French scourers here have some mysterious way, called dry pressure, of renewing it perfectly. Trim the lower skirt with a box-pleated flounce, headed by a cluster of folds. Read about veils in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 41, Vol. VI.

B. S. L.—Try a weak solution of ammonia for premature gray hair. Papers containing the "Ugly Girl" articles will be sent from this office. They are not yet published in book form.

A DELIGHTED READER.—Hot baths and a lotion of one-fourth of an ounce carbolic acid and three-fourths of an ounce of glycerine to one ounce of bay rum or camphor will remove flesh-worms. Apply the wash twice a day and let it dry in.

MRS. W. AND AUBURN.—Mask or moth is caused by a derangement of the liver. Take a taraxacum pill three nights in each week for six weeks, and use a wash of chlorate of potash prepared by a druggist. These are the best means known of removing moth patches or discolorations of any kind.

JEANNIE M.—Many thanks for your kind letter and valuable recipe, which will be used at once.

X. Z., NELLIE, AND OTHERS.—Make a paste of fine wood ashes that collect at the back of stoves and water. Spread this over the place where superfluous hair grows, let it dry on, and wash off with diluted vinegar. Repeat daily till the hair dries and comes out. To take spots off the nails wet a bit of flannel, dip in ashes, and rub the nails.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HAIR!!!

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, corner Fourth Street,
Branch Store, 345 Sixth Avenue,
Between 21st & 22d Streets, begs leave to call the attention of the ladies to his complete and superb stock of Human Hair Goods for the Fall, comprising all the Latest Styles, manufactured of the best quality of French hair only, without any intermixing whatsoever, of his own importation and manufacture.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

RETAILED AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

☞ I can offer to the Public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors.

All goods WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches.....$1 and upward.
Finest Quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed,
18 inches long, 4 ounces weight.....$5 00
22 inches long, 4 ounces weight..... 6 00
26 inches long, 4 ounces weight..... 8 00
32 inches long, 4 ounces weight.....10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.
Long Single Curls, naturally Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.

BRANCH STORE, 345 SIXTH AVENUE,
Bet. 21st and 22d Streets.
Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS, in any quantities. Send for Circular.
MME. L. CENDRIER, 636 Broadway, N. Y.

Union Adams & Co.

ARE OFFERING AT VERY LOW PRICES

HOSIERY AND GLOVES,

UNDERWEAR,

Shirts & Collars,

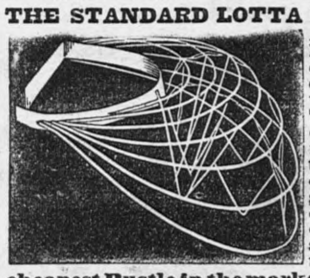
HANDKERCHIEFS,

SUSPENDERS,

ROBES JACKETS, &c.

637 BROADWAY.

THE STANDARD LOTTA BUSTLE. ☞ ASK YOUR STOREKEEPER FOR IT.



A diploma has been awarded by the American Institute to A. W. Thomas, Patentee & Manufacturer for the lightest, strongest, most durable, comfortable, elastic, and cheapest Bustle in the market. The wearer can sit in any position whatever without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree, it closing entirely up on sitting, and returning with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault). No ladies' wardrobe complete without the Standard Lotta Bustle. For sale every where. Ask for Nos. 10, 11, 15, 18, 22, &c., comprising the various sizes and styles. Patentee and Wholesale Manufacturer, 91 White St., N.Y.; & 801 Race St., Phila.

A SINGLE APPLICATION OF
BARRY'S
Pearl Cream
REMOVES WRINKLES, FRECKLES,
SUN-BURN, AND TAN.
Sold by all druggists, and at the depot, 26 Liberty St., New York.
Only 50 Cents per Bottle.

A. SELIG,

(SUCCESSOR TO S. M. PEYSER),
No. 813 Broadway, New York,

Is daily receiving new importations of rich DRESS TRIMMINGS, such as beaded LACES, GIMPS, FRINGES, BUTTONS, and ORNAMENTS of the latest styles. Also a full assortment of BERLIN ZEPHYRS, Filling, Floss and Embroidery SILKS, CHENILLES, Worsted and Silk EMBROIDERIES of every description, as STRIPS for Chairs, SLIPPERS, Footrests, Towel-racks, Fire and Light SCREENS, LAMBREQUINS and CUSHIONS in GOBLIN and any other style of EMBROIDERY. GUIPURE and POINT LACE work and materials for making the same. Particular attention paid to orders.

Designing and Embroidering of every description done at the lowest possible prices.

RENEW.—Either of Harper's, $4, and Phrenological, $3, for $6 a year; or, with Science of Health, $2, for $5 a year; all three, $7; by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

Skin Diseases a Specialty.

DR. J. M. VANDYKE, Graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, is the only regular physician that makes the treatment of Skin Diseases a specialty. Those who wish to consult him, either in person or by letter, will find him to be first-class in his specialty.

Skin Diseases and their Symptoms.

ACNE, (PIMPLES, BLACKHEADS).—Symptoms—Hard, small pimples with black points; affect the forehead, cheeks, and nose of both sexes.

ECZEMA, (TETTER).—Symptoms—Blisters form, which burst and dry into a yellowish or dark crust, may be in the form of scales; affects all parts of the body.

WOMEN'S RED RASH OF THE FACE.—Symptoms—Congestion of the skin of the face, with red patches and red spots, pimples, and roughness of the skin.

BARBER'S ITCH.—Symptoms—First, a red, itchy patch is seen, mattery pustules form, become quite hard, and shaving becomes painful. A burning sensation is present.

PRURIGO, (INTENSE ITCHING), Which begins when the clothing is removed; increased by the warmth of the bed. No eruption except that produced by scratching.

The above and all Skin Diseases cured by Dr. J. M. VanDyke. New York Office, No. 6 West 16th Street; Philadelphia Office, 1126 Walnut Street. The Doctor can be consulted either by letter or in person at either office.

A. HARAUX'S STAMPING AND Embroidering Establishment is at No. 90 FOURTH AVENUE, a few doors above A. T. Stewart & Co.

LAFONTAIN'S FRENCH COMPLEXION BEAUTIFIER removes TAN AND FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, AND FLESHWORMS. Price $1 00 per Bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 SIXTH AVENUE. Agents wanted.

MME. BURLETON, 21 Clinton Place, near B'way, Eighth St., West. The latest style of Fall Bonnets and Round Hats; also, Mourning Bonnets.

GRANDEST SCHEME EVER KNOWN.

4th Grand Gift Concert

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE
PUBLIC LIBRARY OF KENTUCKY.

12,000 CASH GIFTS, $1,500,000.

$250,000 FOR $50.

The Fourth Grand Gift Concert, authorized by special act of the Legislature, for the benefit of the Public Library of Kentucky, will take place in Public Library Hall, at Louisville, Ky.,

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1873.

Only Sixty thousand tickets will be sold. The tickets are divided into ten coupons or parts.

At this Concert, which will be the grandest musical display ever witnessed in this country, the unprecedented sum of

$1,500,000

divided into 12,000 cash gifts, will be distributed by lot among the ticket-holders.

LIST OF GIFTS.

ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		$250,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		100,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		50,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		25,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		17,500
10 CASH GIFTS	$10,000 each	100,000
30 CASH GIFTS	5,000 each	150,000
50 CASH GIFTS	1,000 each	50,000
80 CASH GIFTS	500 each	40,000
100 CASH GIFTS	400 each	40,000
150 CASH GIFTS	300 each	45,000
250 CASH GIFTS	200 each	50,000
325 CASH GIFTS	100 each	32,500
11,000 CASH GIFTS	50 each	550,000
TOTAL, 12,000 GIFTS, ALL CASH, amounting to		$1,500,000

The distribution will be positive, whether all the tickets are sold or not, and the 12,000 gifts all paid in proportion to the tickets sold.

PRICE OF TICKETS:

Whole tickets, $50; Halves, $25; Tenths, or each coupon, $5; Eleven Whole Tickets for $500; 22¾ Tickets for $1,000; 113 Whole Tickets for $5,000; 227 Whole Tickets for $10,000. No discount on less than $500 worth of Tickets at a time.

Tickets now ready for sale, and all orders accompanied by the money promptly filled. Liberal terms given to those who buy to sell again.

THOS. E. BRAMLETTE,
Agent Public Library Ky., and Manager Gift Concert,
Public Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

Or THOS. H. HAYS,
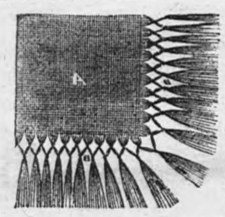
609 Broadway, New York.



PATENT
Sewing-Silk Veil

In the above we have overcome the great difficulty, formerly experienced, of procuring a veil with a fringing of the exact shade. The fringes in our veil being woven at the same moment, and with the same material throughout, consisting of the best quality of sewing silk, a reliance may be placed upon their exactness of match, and of their durability, in every respect, the same wearing double the length of time over that of any other veil ever made. Sold in all Fancy, Millinery, and Dry-Goods Houses in the U. S.

Patentees and Sole Manufacturers,

MEYENBERG, PRALL, & CO.,
483 & 485 Broadway, N. Y.

THREE PAIR Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, and Dress-Trimmings, together with a choice assortment of

FINE FURS

at less than manufacturers' prices. Send for Price-List of Furs, and all kinds of Millinery Goods and Dress Trimmings. All orders filled with care, and sent C. O. D., with the privilege of examination.

J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT. Trade Mark. Patented.

Sold by all Druggists.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN Dress Shields will absorb moisture and protect the Dress thoroughly. The Perforated Premium Buckskin Undergarments are recommended by all Physicians. Send for circulars. D. C. HALL & CO., 44 West Broadway, N.Y., Sole Agents and Manufacturers.

V. VIGOUROUX, 122 4th Ave., N.Y.
Stamping, Embroidering, Lingerie Establishment. Ladies' & Babies' Trousseau. Specialty of Initial Monograms for HANDKERCHIEFS, TABLE and BED CLOTHS. Wholesale Department, ☞ 69 EAST TWELFTH STREET. MACHINE AND PERFORATED PATTERNS.

DR. NOBLE'S GREAT DISCOVERY.—A certain cure for fever and ague, bilious fever, and chill fever. A tonic. Price $1 per bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 Sixth Ave. Sold every where. Agents wanted.

HENRY PROPACH, Dressmaker, 17 East 16th St., has received the last Fall and Winter Styles. All orders will be executed in the SHORTEST TIME.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

1873. FALL 1873.
ANNOUNCEMENT.

MILLER & GRANT,
879 Broadway, N. Y.,
ARE DAILY RECEIVING
NEW IMPORTATIONS OF RICH LACES,
EMBROIDERIES, RIBBONS,
DRESS TRIMMINGS, &c., &c.
ALSO, NOVELTIES IN FANCY GOODS.
☞ ELEGANT DESIGNS IN OXIDIZED SILVER.

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, Cor. 4th St., N. Y.
The largest stock of Human Hair goods in the city. Wigs made to order by the best artists. A perfect fit guaranteed. The invisible wig a specialty. No. 1, round the head; No. 2, from forehead to nape of neck; No. 3, from ear to ear across crown; No. 4, from ear to ear across forehead. Goods sent C.O.D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

Florida Orange Groves.

Aurantia Grove, Indian River—a combination of Groves of all sizes. Prices, from $50 up, including care. An opportunity to own an Orange Grove, without any interference with present occupation.

WINTER HOMES FREE FROM FROST.

Ask those who have visited Florida about the profits of Orange culture. A LIFE SUPPORT FROM A SMALL OUTLAY. For circulars, maps, and full information, address BLISS, HOOD, & BENT, P. O. Box 5712, New York City.

OFFICE, 20 MURRAY STREET.

BEAUTIFY THE SKIN

BY USING LAIRD'S
"Bloom of Youth."
This harmless & delightful toilet preparation will remove all discolorations and blemishes from the skin, leaving it SOFT, CLEAR, SMOOTH, and BEAUTIFUL.
SOLD AT ALL DRUGGISTS.

The New Florence

Is the only Sewing-Machine that feeds the work backward and forward, or to the right and left, as the purchaser may prefer. It has been greatly IMPROVED & SIMPLIFIED, and is far better than any other machine now in the market. ☞ FLORENCE SEWING-MACHINE COMPANY, Florence, Mass.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS.

AGENTS WANTED.
SEND FOR CATALOGUE.
Domestic Sewing-Machine Co., N. Y.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

For Marking Clothing.

A Stencil Plate, like cut, with brush and indelible ink, postpaid, for 50c. Umbrella Plate, with name and address, ready to attach, 35c. Circulars free. J. F. MARSH, S. E. cor. Second and Dock, Phila., Pa.

ALUMINOUS AND ORNAMENTAL
BUILDING PAPER
Paper Carpeting and Oil Cloth.
Send for Samples and Price-List.
W. H. H. ROGERS & CO., 2 & 3 College Place, N. Y.
F. N. DAVIS & CO., Beloit, Wis.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE Exhibition, now open in the Great Hall, with entrances on 2d and 3d Aves., by 63d St. Admission 50 cents; children 25 cents. Daily, from 9 A.M. to 10 P.M. Processes in actual operation. The wonderful Corset Loom. Ladies' Boots and Shoes made by machinery. Men's Clothing manufactured by machinery. Glove-Making by machinery, and a host of novelties. Music by Keating, day and evening. Will close November 15th.

THE BEST SHAPED CORSETS,
☞ The Newest Styles of Bustles,
With THE LATEST PARIS Novelties,
ARE TO BE FOUND AT
J. C. DEVIN'S,
Under Sturtevant House, 1192 BROADWAY.

EVERYBODY LIKES a beautiful complexion, and a soft, smooth skin; both are obtained by using 'Wright's Alconated Glycerine Tablet of Solidified Glycerine,' fragrant, transparent, and incomparable as a Toilet Soap. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

FOR VALUABLE RECEIPTS, Invaluable Instructions as to HOW TO LIVE, and PICTURE amply worth the money, send 10c. to NATIONAL NEWS AND ART AGENCY, Box 421, Washington, D. C.

Hosted by Google

RETAIL.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Will continue to offer during

This Week

Full Lines of FABRICS for PERSONAL AND HOUSEHOLD WEAR AND USE.

IN

DRESS GOODS,
SILKS, VELVETS,
FLANNELS & BLANKETS,
SUITS, SHAWLS,
MOURNING GOODS,
UNDERWEAR,
MEN'S & WOMEN'S HOSIERY,
SMALL WARES in VARIETY,
BONNETS, LACES,
EMBROIDERIES,
RIBBONS & FLOWERS,
UPHOLSTERY,
CARPETS, &c.,

Their stocks are unusually full and unprecedentedly attractive.

PRICES

THE VERY MINIMUM OF MARKET VALUE, FOR

CASH.

Buyers are respectfully invited to examine, as they can not fail to be satisfied with either variety, style, or price.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

BLACK SILKS from AUCTION.

SPECIAL BARGAINS. CALL AND SEE.

JACKSON'S,

BROADWAY AND WAVERLEY PLACE.

FALL AND WINTER DRESS GOODS, &c.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

GREAT REDUCTION

IN PRICES IN THE VARIOUS DEPARTMENTS OF

ENGLISH & FRENCH DRESS GOODS,
PLAIN COLORED, FANCY, & BLACK SILKS,
PARIS EMBROIDERIES,
HANDKERCHIEFS,
LACES OF EVERY DESCRIPTION,
BLANKETS, FLANNELS, QUILTS, &c.

INFANTS', MISSES', & LADIES' FURNISHING DEPARTMENTS,
COMPLETE OUTFITS (ready-made and to order).
INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS AND SCARFS,
CASHMERE & WOOLEN SHAWLS,
MOURNING DRESS GOODS,
CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, & COATINGS,
HOSIERY AND UNDERWEAR,
GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING GOODS,
&c., &c.,
AT PRICES EQUALLY LOW.

PARIS AND CITY MADE

FALL & WINTER GARMENTS

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

NOW OPEN.

FURS, FURS.

A splendid assortment of rich and medium-priced Furs.
RUSSIAN AND HUDSON BAY SABLE,
SILVER & BLUE FOX, OTTER, BEAVER, GREBE, CHINCHILLA, LYNX, SEAL, BLACK MARTEN, ERMINE, MINK, AND SILVER CONEY,
FUR ROBES, SEAL SACQUES AND HATS, and

FUR TRIMMINGS

IN EVERY VARIETY.

Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

FROM THE LATE AUCTIONS,

CASHMERES AND MERINOS at a Great Sacrifice.

JACKSON'S,

BROADWAY AND WAVERLEY PLACE.

FALL CATALOGUE

Send Stamp for the most complete Price-List of MILLINERY AND FANCY GOODS ever issued.

Fine Furs a Specialty.

☞ Goods shipped C.O.D., to any part of the country, with full power of examination before acceptance.

EHRICH & CO.,

287 & 289 8th AVE., Near 24th ST., New York.

SAMPLES FREE!!—The Saturday Evening Post, 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia, gives a beautiful Chromo or large Steel Engraving to every yearly subscriber! Samples free!

RUNNING FERN.—I can now supply all persons with this Beautiful Decorative Vine. ☞ 100 pieces pressed, $5 00; 100 pieces, not pressed, $2 50. Address, A. A. WILLIAMS, Hartford, Conn.

$475 A MONTH and expenses to good Canvassers. Articles new and staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. LINNGTON, Chicago.

$375 A MONTH to Male or Female Agents. NOVELTY COMPANY, Biddeford, Me.

A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.

CASHMERE BOUQUET

A DELICATE SOAP FOR THE TOILET.

CASHMERE BOUQUET

MADE BY

COLGATE & COMPANY,

NEW YORK.

KNABE Grand, Square, and Upright Pianos,

NEW YORK BRANCH HOUSE, No. 112 5th AVE.

WM. KNABE & CO., Baltimore and New York.

FLOWERS.—WINDOW GARDENING.

Ladies, send stamp for Specimen Copy (free) of THE LADIES' FLORAL CABINET.—A beautiful new Home Paper, devoted to Flowers, Window Gardening, and Parlor Decorations. Exquisitely illustrated. Ladies will be delighted with it. Delightful home pictures of society. Amusements, with useful hints on housekeeping and Elegancies.

Price $1 50 per year, including 3 Choice Chromos.
" $1 25 " " " 1 " "

☞ GET UP A CLUB. AGENTS WANTED. Send for terms.

WINDOW GARDENING.—A New Book, superbly illustrated, devoted to Culture of Plants, Bulbs, and Flowers for in-doors, with handsome illustrations of Hanging Baskets, Ferneries, and Parlor Decorations. 250 Engravings. Price $1 50. Sent, postpaid, by mail. Book Stores have it.

EVERY WOMAN HER OWN FLOWER GARDENER.—By Daisy Eyebright. A charming New Book on Flowers and Out-Door Gardening for Ladies. Price 50c., or bound in cloth, $1 00. Sent by mail, postpaid.

THE LADIES' CABINET INITIAL NOTE-PAPER.—Rose or Violet Tinted; your own initial. Superb novelty. Handsome present. Highly perfumed. Attractive Chromo on each Box. Price 50c. a Box. 100 Papers at Club Rates. Send stamp for List.

Illustrated Prospectus and Premium List of all the above free on receipt of stamp. Address THE LADIES' FLORAL CABINET, OFFICE, 5 BEEKMAN STREET, NEW YORK. P. O. Box 2445.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. IV.

LADY'S GORED WRAPPER..... No. 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK..... " 11
GIRL'S PRINCESSE SUIT (for girl from 2 to 8 years old)..... " 25
CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT (for child from 6 months to 4 years old)..... " 27
BOY'S KNEE-BREECHES, VEST, AND JACKET (for boy from 4 to 9 years old).... " 29
YOUTH'S ENGLISH WALKING COAT, VEST, AND PANTALOONS (for youth from 8 to 15 years old)..... " 33
INFANT'S WARDROBE (Cloak, Gored Robe, Yoke Slip, Night Slip, Petticoat, and Shirt).. " 35
LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER..... " 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
GENTLEMAN'S SHORT DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP..... " 46
PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 48

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postilion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old).... " 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER..... " 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)..... " 6
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 20
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER.. " 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)..... " 25
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT..... " 42
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)..... " 50

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)..... " 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT.... " 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 17
LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 23
GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT. " 24
BLOUSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 28
LADIES' AND MISSES' BATHING OR GYMNASTIC SUIT..... " 30
PLEATED WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 32
DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 32
ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT..... " 39
DEMI-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT, with Basque Back and Square Front..... " 43
TIGHT-FITTING DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE, with French Round Skirt..... " 45

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and Carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

WORKING CLASS Male or Female, $30 a week employment at home, day or evening; no capital; instructions & valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-c. return stamp, M. YOUNG & Co., 173 Greenwich St., N.Y.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments, or all the time, than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

BAZAR

Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00: postage payable by the Subscriber at the office where received.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Harper & Brothers' Latest Publications.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.

NAST'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC FOR 1874. With 86 Original Illustrations by THOMAS NAST. Price 25 cents.

II.

DAWSON'S EARTH AND MAN. The Story of the Earth and Man. By J. W. DAWSON, LL.D., F.R.S., F.G.S., Principal and Vice-Chancellor of McGill University, Montreal. With Twenty Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

III.

THE LAND OF MOAB. The Result of Travels and Discoveries on the East Side of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. By H. B. TRISTRAM, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Master of the Greatham Hospital, and Honorary Canon of Durham. With New Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. Cloth, $2 50.

IV.

FLAMMARION'S ATMOSPHERE. The Atmosphere. Translated from the French of CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Edited by JAMES GLAISHER, F.R.S., Superintendent of the Magnetical and Meteorological Department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. With 10 Chromo-Lithographs, and 86 Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

V.

TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS. The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. (Uniform with Tyerman's "Life of John Wesley.")

VI.

THE BAZAR BOOK OF HEALTH. The Dwelling, the Nursery, the Bedroom, the Dining-Room, the Parlor, the Library, the Kitchen, the Sick-Room. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. (Uniform in style and price with the "Bazar Book of Decorum.")

VII.

CASTELAR'S OLD ROME AND NEW ITALY. Old Rome and New Italy. By EMILIO CASTELAR. Translated by Mrs. ARTHUR ARNOLD. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

VIII.

LIFE OF ALFRED COOKMAN. The Life of the Rev. Alfred Cookman. By H. B. RIDGAWAY, D.D. With Portrait on Steel. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

IX.

I GO A-FISHING. By W. C. PRIME, Author of "Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia," "Tent Life in the Holy Land," "Later Years," "The Old House by the River," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

THE NEW NOVELS

OF

THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

1.

THE TWO WIDOWS. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Denis Donne," "Called to Account," "Played Out," "A Passion in Tatters," "The Dower House," "Maud Mohan," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

2.

MISS DOROTHY'S CHARGE. By FRANK LEE BENEDICT, Author of "My Daughter Elinor," "Miss Van Kortland," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

3.

STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "Birds of Prey," "Lovels of Arden," "To the Bitter End," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

4.

A SIMPLETON: A Story of the Day. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

5.

TOO SOON: A Study of a Girl's Heart. By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID, Author of "Patty," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

6.

INNOCENT. A Tale of Modern Life. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "Agnes," "Chronicles of Carlingford," "John: a Love Story," "Brownlows," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

7.

WILKIE COLLINS'S NEW MAGDALEN. The New Magdalen. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "Armadale," "Moonstone," "Man and Wife," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

Book Canvassers Wanted.

THE Subscriber desires to call the attention of experienced and successful Book Agents to "M'CLINTOCK AND STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE." The Fifth Volume of this work is now published. This Cyclopædia is unlike any other now sold by subscription or otherwise. The other volumes will be published at about yearly intervals. Does not the sale of this work offer pecuniary advantages to Book Agents that can not be obtained on the sale of any other work now being sold by subscription? The inducements are liberal, and good Territory is yet to be had. For further particulars, inquire of or address

AVERY BILL,

Care Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Book Canvassers Wanted.

$125 A month to Lady Agents every where. Address ELLIS M'F'G Co., Waltham, Mass.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

THE Socialists in Spain are well named. They never murder less than four people at a time. This is sociality.

Why is a recruiting sergeant like the wind?—Because he blows where he 'listeth.

There is a time at which lamb becomes mutton; there is a time at which the mint-sauce of flirtation has to be discarded for the currant jelly of serious intentions.

Singers often complain they are not in voice. Now what is always in voice?—Why, invoice, to be sure.

A LEGAL ATTACHMENT—Matrimony.

A Scotch parson had a farming neighbor who was in the habit of shooting on Sundays, but after a while this Sabbath-breaker joined the church. One day the minister to whose church he belonged met a friend of the farmer, and said,

"Do you see any difference in Mr. P—— since he joined the church?"

"Oh yes," replied the friend, "a great difference. Before, when he went out to shoot on Sunday, he carried his gun over his shoulder, but now he carries it under his coat."

Why is a wafer like Cupid?—Because it is the go-between which forms mutual attachments.

When a man milks a cow he should not attempt to smoke a cigar at the same time. A young man out in the country tried it, and got along well enough until he lowered his head and touched the cow's flank with the lighted end of his weed. The next instant himself and cigar were dreadfully "put out." The cow introduced about two tons weight into one of her hind-legs, and then passed it under the milker's left jaw. When he ceased whirling around, and myriads of stars had disappeared, he said farming was the hardest work a man could put his hands to.

A PUBLIC NOTICE WHICH MUST BE A GREAT HARDSHIP TO THE BIRDS ABOUT TOWN—"No bills allowed."

GALLEY-SLAVES—Night compositors.

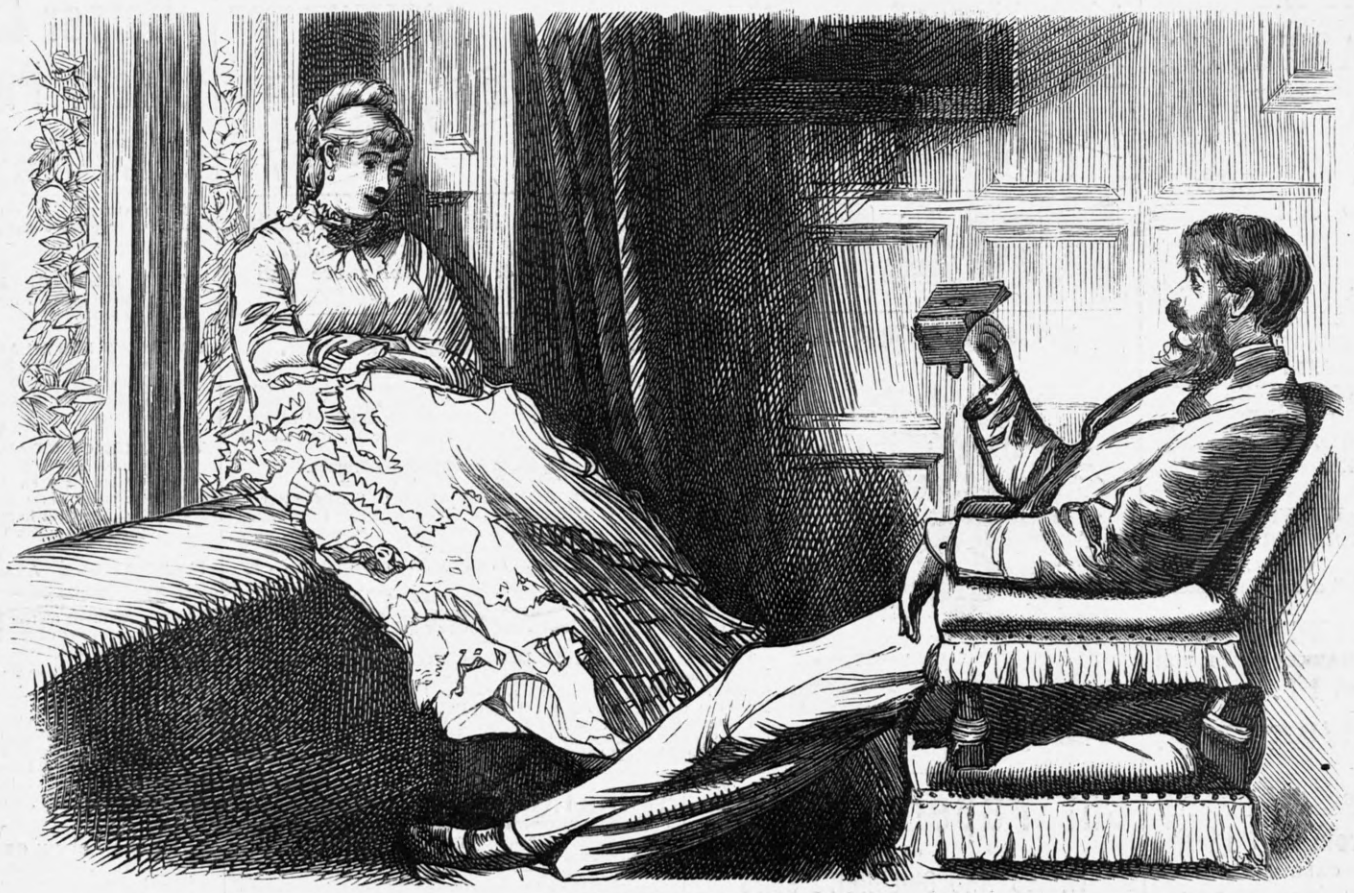
RABELAISIAN.—A correspondent writes to inquire the exact meaning of the expression "Pantagruelian Philosophy." The next time he has a very bad cold, and is put upon a diet consisting mainly of "a thin food, made by boiling groats or oatmeal in water," and bears his misfortune with patience and fortitude, he will understand the phrase in all its force, and be entitled to consider himself a "Pantagruelist."

There are so many thieves in New York that they propose to form a society to reform some of their number, and thus prevent their business from being ruined.

I clasped her tiny hand in mine; I vowed to shield her from the wind and from the world's cold storm. She set her beauteous eyes on me, and with her little lips she said, "An umbrella will do as well."

A PRICKLY PAIR—A couple who are always nagging.

"No man ever had a better wife than I had," said a returned Californian; "she was always kind to the poor, and to all her relations. She is now in the graveyard, and my judgment is, she is well prepared for the next world; and for the good feeling I had for her for over fifty-six years, I have erected a monument over her grave weighing seven tons, and twenty-one feet high. It is a splendid monument—cost me over six hundred dollars."



"A WOMAN O' BUSINESS."

HUSBAND (who has been to Europe, and left his wife some blank checks). "My dear Louisa, I find you have considerably Overdrawn at the Bank!"
WIFE. "Oh, Nonsense, Willy, how can that be? Why, I've two of those Blank Checks left yet!"

"REALLY MOST AWKWARD, YOU KNOW."

GOOD LITTLE GIRL (to Good Mamma). "Ma, dear, don't you hope it's a charity sermon again to-day?"

GOOD MAMMA. "Well—a—yes. Why?"

GOOD LITTLE GIRL. "Good people like to put money in the plate, don't they, ma?"

GOOD MAMMA. "I don't know—that is—yes, of course."

GOOD LITTLE GIRL. "Give me a dollar to put in, ma dear."

[Et cætera, et cætera, till they reach the church door, when Ma says "Hush!" and stops it.

What mental quality does a dress resemble?—Address.

The Legislature of a Western State, prior to final adjournment, recently passed a resolution thanking the chaplain for the brevity of his prayers.

The Tycoon of Japan knows how to start a newspaper. He does not offer premiums for subscribers, but having taken an interest in the publication of a newspaper at the Japanese capital, he has issued an order that all men of certain social and political standing shall take it or be beheaded.

"No Gunen Aloud Here," is a sign intended for the information of sportsmen down in Maine.

It is unkind to ridicule those items in the papers about centenarians. It is no easy thing to become a centenarian—several have failed.

How comfortable for a young wife to feel that her husband is a bountiful provider, and that she will never want for the necessaries of life. A newly married man was recently directed by his wife to order some yeast, and not having a very well defined idea of yeast himself, he told the baker to send up a couple of dollars' worth. At nine o'clock next morning three men might have been seen tugging and sweating up the front stairs of that man's house with a cask of yeast.

MOTTOES FOR THE MANY.

A LOVER—Ad admissum—About to be accepted.
A COBBLER—Ad finem spero—I hope to the last.
A DYER—Absque dedecore—Without stain.
A DRILL-SERGEANT—Adest ad visum—Present to the sight.
BROTHER JONATHAN—Ab fœdero cresco—I gain by treaty.
SEASICK CHILD—Agitatione purgatur—It is purified by motion.
THE CLAIMANT—Agnoscor eventu—I am known by the issue.
A PRIZE-FIGHTER—Arma parato fero—I carry arms in readiness.
A STOCK-BROKER—Disce pati—Learn to bear.
THE BABY—Dum cresco spero—While I grow I hope.
A POLICEMAN—Dum vigilo tutus—While I watch I'm safe.
COUNT CHAMBORD—Fari fac—Make him speak out.
THE WORKING-MAN—Ferendo et feriendo—By bearing and striking.

EPITAPH ON A LOCOMOTIVE.—Collisions four or five she bore; the signals were in vain; grown old and rusted, her boiler bu'sted, and smashed the excursion train.

A clergyman informed his people at the close of his sermon that he intended in a few days to go on a mission to the heathen. After the congregation was dismissed, a number of the members waited for their pastor, and, crowding around him, expressed their astonishment at the new turn in his affairs, asking him where he was going, and how long they would be deprived of his ministrations. He said to them, "My good friends, don't be alarmed—I'm not going out of town."

A while ago a farmer in the Highlands lost his wife, and out of love for her memory called his estate "Glenmary." A neighbor having met with the same affliction, and equally desirous of keeping before him the image of his dear departed, followed his example, and his farm is known by the name of "Glenbetsy."

The excuse of a young lady to her minister, who caught her napping, was, "Don't you think ladies had better be fast asleep than fast awake?"

What is invariably the beginning of love?—The letter "l."

An eccentric but popular preacher observed one Sunday in church a man sleeping whom he knew, and whose wife was sitting beside him. The doctor called out to the latter, "Go home, Betty, and bring John's night-cap."

The following strong figure of speech was used to illustrate the great size of America to a Pat who could not make up his mind about emigrating:

"Where did the baccy come from! why, from 'Meriky, where else? that sent us the finest petaty. Long life to it for both, says I!"

"What sort of a place is that, I wonder?"

"'Meriky! They tell me it's mighty sizable. I'm tould that you might roll England through it, an' it would hardly make a dint in the ground. There's a fresh-water ocean inside of it that you might dhrown Ireland in, and save Father Mathew a wonderful sight of throuble; an' as for Scotland, you might stick it in a corner of one of their forests, an' you'd never be able to find it, except it might be by the smell of the whisky!"

"You hev heern, gentlemen of the jury," said an eloquent advocate—"you hev heern the witness swar he saw the prisoner raise his gun; you hev heern him swar he saw the flash and heerd the report; you hev heern him swar he saw the dog fall dead; you hev heern him swar he dug the bullet out with his jackknife, and you hev seen the bullet produced in court: but whar, gentlemen, whar, I ask you, is the man who saw that bullet hit that dog?"

"Maria, have you given the gold-fish any fresh water?"

"No, Sir; what's the use? They haven't drunk up what's in there yet."

A young lady last week declined frosted cake, because she thought it might give her cold.

While witnessing a game of base-ball out West a boy was struck on the back of his head, the bawl coming out of his mouth.

What things increase the more they are contracted?—Debts.

SHAKSPEARE'S "SEVEN AGES OF MAN."—Mess-age, lugg-age, saus-age, ramp-age, marri-age, parent-age, and dot-age.

Never kick a man when he's down, unless you are sure he can't get up.

The young man who boasted that he could marry any girl he pleased, found that he couldn't please any.

A lot of minstrels went to a town not far away, and advertised to give a performance for "the benefit of the poor, tickets reduced to ten cents." The hall was crammed full. The next morning a committee for the poor called upon the treasurer of the concern for the amount said benefit had netted. The treasurer expressed astonishment at the demand.

"I thought," said the chairman of the committee, "you advertised this concert for the benefit of the poor!"

Replied the treasurer, "Didn't we put the tickets down to ten cents, so that the poor could all come?"

The committee vanished.

A PANACEA FOR A PANIC.

SEEDIE SKINNER (to Mr. Bullion, the banker). "System's all wrong, and my Remedy's a Law to make every body's Note legal tender."

THE REAL ESTATE OF WEDLOCK.

MISS SHODDY. "'Taint no use proposin' Marriage to me, Mr. Smithers. When a Gal's as rich 'n as pooty as I be, 'tain't likely she's going to take no Amerikin, when she kin go to Europe an' git a Principality, or at least a German Barony or a French County, for a Husband."

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 45.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

TIGHT-FITTING DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE, WITH FRENCH ROUND SKIRT—FRONT AND BACK—WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

[Cut Paper Patterns of the Tight-fitting Double-breasted Redingote, with French Round Skirt, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Hosted by Google

IN THE HAMMOCK.

A TAWNY net-work swinging
Strange bird of folded wing,
And happy robins singing
For one who will not sing.

A mist upon the mountain,
Which some sad naiad weaves,
And on the yellow fountain
A yellow rain of leaves.

And swallows, flying double,
Of softer lands in quest,
Float low in curious trouble
Above my tranquil nest.

Brown butterflies that hover
To sound of distant sea,
The breath of dying clover,
Are all for them—and me.

But these shall find the summer
Enough for life and love,
And leave for some glad comer
The nest they sing above.

While I—O bee and clover!
O bird of tireless wing!
Your mocking joys sweep over
Such birds as hammocks swing.

Tight-fitting Double-breasted Redingote, with French Round Skirt.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

See illustration on first page.

THIS comfortable and elegant dress is one of the most popular fall and winter suits in vogue. It may be made of any material, whether silk or woolen. The original is of very dark plum-colored diagonal cloth. The handsome double-breasted redingote is tight-fitting, and may be worn with or without a belt. The back is in the favorite Marguerite shape, which is much worn this season. The garment may be worn buttoned close to the throat, as seen in the illustration, or turned back to form revers. The redingote is edged with ball fringe. The French round skirt, cut after the new pattern described in the last number of the Bazar, clears the ground. It is trimmed with a wide flounce of the material headed with bias folds, with a tablier of lengthwise reversed pleats.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises two articles—tight-fitting double-breasted redingote and French round skirt.

DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE.—This pattern is in seven pieces—front, side back, back, sleeve, cuff, pocket, and collar. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting together. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, to take up the darts and cross basque seams on each side of the front, to place the buttons and make the button-holes, to turn down the collar, to place the pockets, to sew the buttons on the cuffs, to lay the pleats in the skirt, to tack the tapes for draping the skirt in the back, and the size and form of the under part of the sleeve. This garment is tight-fitting and double-breasted. Both sides are to be cut exactly alike. The right side of the front overlaps the left, and fastens to the neck with buttons and button-holes, or can be turned back in revers if preferred. The Marguerite back is cut with a middle seam, with extra fullness about four inches below the waist line, and is laid in three side pleats on each side of the middle on the under side. Three tapes, six inches long, are tacked at the waist line and at the three single holes in the skirt part in the back, forming a double panier. One deep pleat is laid on each side form seam, turning upward, according to the two single holes, which are placed evenly together. Three side pleats are laid in the back edge of the front, turning upward, before joining the seams. The notches show where to lay the pleats. Sew one tape on each side of the under-arm seam about twelve inches below the waist, and tie in the back under the skirt. Sew on the collar, placing the notches together, and turn down by the line of perforations, holding the collar toward you when sewing it on. Place the pocket on the skirt, bringing the perforations evenly together. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back part of the armhole, holding the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. The whole of the cuff is given; the front overlaps the back, and is held in place by three buttons. Place it on the sleeve as notched. Baste up the garment, and try on wrong side out; if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all others. The notches at the top and bottom show the exact middle of the front. In cutting be very particular in placing the notches at the top and bottom lengthwise on the thread of the goods.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 7½ yards.

FRENCH ROUND SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces (only half of the pattern is given)—half of front gore, two side gores, and back breadth. The front and side gores are sewed plainly to the belt, the back breadth is laid in three deep side pleats each side of the middle, turning toward the middle of the breadth. Put the pattern together by the notches, and pay no attention to the grain of the paper. Cut the front and back with the longest straight edge on the fold of the goods to avoid seams.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8 yards.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

☞ A Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains more reading matter than an average octavo volume. The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for November 1 was sent out gratuitously a beautifully illustrated

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing further installments of "THE PARISIANS," by LORD LYTTON, and "PHINEAS REDUX," by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, illustrated, and a rich variety of other literary and pictorial attractions.

Another illustrated EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for November 8.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the elegant Tight-fitting Double-breasted Redingote, with French Round Skirt, illustrated on the first page of the present Number, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by Mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 719.

☞ Our next Pattern-sheet Number, which will be a particularly brilliant one, will contain choice patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Ladies' Winter Bonnets; Ladies' and Children's Winter Street and House Dresses; Boys' and Girls' Night-Dresses, Chemises, Drawers, Shirts, etc.; Knitted and Crochet Overshoes, etc., etc.; with interesting literary and pictorial attractions.

NOVEMBER MARKETING.

BY PIERRE BLOT.

LIKE October, November is one of the most favored months of the year for a choice variety of food of every kind, as shown in the following list:

FISH.

Black and striped bass, black and blue fish, butter-fish, carp, cod, flounders, frost-fish, haddock, mullet, muskallonge, yellow and sea perch, pickerel, plaice, pollock, porgy, ray, scup, skate, smelt, sucker, sun-fish, lake trout, weak-fish.

SHELL-FISH.

Hard and soft shell clams, hard and soft shell crabs, lobster, mussels, oysters, periwinkles, scallops, terrapins.

MEAT.

Beef, mutton, lamb, pork, sucking pig, tame rabbits.

POULTRY.

Chickens, capons, Guinea-fowls, turkeys, ducks, ducklings, goslings, geese.

GAME.

Bobolink, blackbirds, yellow-legs, robins, high-holes, orioles, thrush, woodpecker, brand and wild goose, ducks (canvas-back, red-head, mallard, black, wood, widgeon, broad-bill, shell-drake, teal, pintail, and dipper), grouse, hare, meadow-lark, opossum, partridge, pheasant, prairie-chicken, pigeons and squabs, quails, rabbit, raccoon, snipe, squirrel, wild swan, wild turkey, buck and doe venison, woodchuck.

VEGETABLES.

Jerusalem artichokes, beets, Brussels sprouts, red and Savoy cabbages, cardoon, carrots, cauliflowers, table and turnip-rooted celery, chiccory, cucumbers, corn, endive, kohl-rabi, musk and water melons, okra, onions, potatoes, sweet-potatoes, pumpkins, squash, black radishes, sour-krout, turnips, parsnips, salsify, water-cress.

FOR PICKLING.

Cucumbers, small onions, mangoes, peppers, string-beans, tomatoes, tarragon.

FRUITS.

Apples, black-walnuts, cocoa-nuts, chestnuts, cranberries, new filberts, grapes, hickory-nuts, fresh peanuts, oranges, quinces, pears, bananas, peaches.

Epicures who are fond of small birds must not forget that the season for bobolinks, robins, and other birds of the kind ends with November.

Flounders and lobsters, although found in the markets at any time of the year, will be out of season after November; so will cucumbers, melons, and peaches.

Turkeys, wild as well as tame, are in their prime; we may say the same of almost all the feathered tribe, which have had the benefit of ripe grain and what harvesters leave while gathering the crops. Birds as well as quadrupeds are fatter from October till the hard frost or snow comes than at any other time of the year.

Boned Turkey.—All birds are boned in the same way, be it a turkey or a reed-bird; but the larger the bird the easier it is for persons having no experience in that line. We will therefore explain to our readers how to bone a turkey, assuring them that it is not so difficult as it may appear at first, and also that when they can bone a turkey easily they will be able to bone a quail or a smaller bird just as well, the anatomy of one being the same as that of the other. Birds to bone must be picked dry; the skin of scalded ones breaks too easily. Those sent to market for that purpose, be they turkeys or chickens, have been kept without food at least twenty-four hours before being killed, which is easily seen by their empty crop.

Proportions: A middling-sized turkey, two pounds of sausage-meat, two pounds of boiled ham, a smoked beef's tongue, or a fresh one boiled, or six fresh boiled sheep's tongues, one and a half pounds of fat salt pork, a quarter or half a pound of truffles, if handy, two pounds of shin of beef, a bay leaf, two cloves, a clove of garlic, four stalks of parsley, one of thyme, one carrot in slices, ten whole peppers, and salt.

Process: The bird is first thoroughly singed, but not drawn; then the neck is cut off about half-way between the body and the head; the legs are cut just above the joint nearest the feet; the wings are cut off above the second joint from the end. The skin is then split from the rump along the back up to the place where it is cut, or the middle of the neck. Then by means of a small but sharp-pointed knife the skin and flesh are detached from the carcass, by running the point of the knife between the bones and flesh, commencing on the back and going toward the breast-bone. You first come to the wing, which you detach from the carcass by running the knife through the joint, which is easily done; then you come to the leg, and after having run the knife around the joint, holding the bird fast on its side, twist the leg gently, so as to disjoint it; then run the knife through the joint, and continue until you reach the breast-bone. Turn the bird on the other side, and do the same thing with the other leg, wing, and flesh. Cut off the duct leading from the crop to the gizzard, also the gullet, both of which you remove together with the crop. You now hold the bird by the neck with one hand, using a towel to prevent it from sliding, and pull the meat off the breast-bone, being careful not to break the skin, and using the knife now and then to separate the flesh from the bone until the breast-bone is entirely uncovered. Then, to make the rest of the work more easy and sure, put the bird on its back on the table, the rump toward you; put a weight on the neck, or have it held fast; pull the skin and flesh toward you, using the point of the knife to make it come off more easily; run the knife between the end of the back-bone and the rump, so that the latter will come off with the skin; and when you come to the last—that is, when you have only the end of the guts to cut off—be careful, and instead of cutting off that gut, cut the skin around what is called the ring, which is immediately under the rump. By that process you have not touched any thing unclean, and you have the flesh and skin in one piece, and the carcass left whole in one piece too. Then spread the boned bird on the table, skin underneath, remove the bones of the legs and wings, taking hold of them by the broken joint, and scraping off the flesh all around. Take a coarse towel in your hand, and pull off the tendons at the lower end of the legs, after which you push legs and wings inside, so as not to leave any hole in the skin. Spread the bird again on the table as before, with the rump nearest to you; spread a layer of sausage-meat on it about a quarter of an inch thick; cut the fat salt pork, ham, and tongue in square strips about half an inch thick and three inches long; then cover the sausage-meat with a layer of those strips, alternating them; if truffles are used put a slice here and there, then cover the latter with another layer of sausage-meat, then another layer of strips, etc., until you have a bulk of them of the size of the carcass, so that when you bring the slit skin together it will fill it. Sew the slit with twine and a trussing needle, commencing near the rump, and turning the skin of the neck on the back, and sewing it under and with the sides, so that the end will be closed as well as the slit back. The opening under the rump is closed by placing on the inside of the bird a slice of salt pork a little larger than the opening itself. Place a strong towel before you across the table; put the bird on it so that the length of the bird will run on the width of the towel; have the end of the towel farthest from you fast to the table, or held by somebody; turn the end nearest to you over the bird, which you roll inside as tight as you can; then tie each end fast, in order to have the bird in as small a bulk as possible, though without spoiling or breaking the skin. Wind a strong string around the towel, to keep the bird in the shape of a big sausage; put it in an oblong kettle or pan with all the bones of the carcass, wings, and legs, all broken in pieces, together with two pounds of shin of beef. Season with the bay leaf, cloves, garlic, whole peppers, parsley, and thyme, tied in a linen rag; also the carrot in slices, and salt. Cover the bird with cold water, and take it out of the kettle, which you set on a good fire; as soon as it boils put the bird back in it, and boil it for three hours. When the bird is put in the kettle it sinks to the bottom, but when cooked it rises partly above the liquor.

The bird is then taken from the liquor, and the towel removed, after which it is enveloped as before in a towel, and placed on a dish while hot, the back or slit underneath; a piece of board, a bake-pan, or a dish is put over it, with a weight of some kind on, so as to flatten it on the dish, and it is left thus for eight or ten hours in a cool place. After that length of time the towel is taken off, the twine used to sew it is pulled off, a small slice is cut out of both ends, and the bird put back on the dish ready to serve. A boned bird is generally served with meat jelly, which is cut in pieces of different shapes, according to fancy, and placed on and around the bird. Place the piece of jelly on the table, slice it, and then cut the slices in pieces of a lozenge or three-cornered shape, which are arranged tastefully around the border of the dish; put the rest of the jelly on a coarse towel, chop it, and then place some of it all around the bird and on it also, to cover the bare places left between the cut pieces of jelly. You have then a fine, good, and most nutritious dish for either breakfast, lunch, or supper. It is sliced across, and a little jelly is served with every slice.

Any kind of bird is boned, cooked, and served in the same way.

To cook a middling-sized chicken takes about two hours; a quail takes a little over an hour. One pound of shin of beef is enough for a chicken, and fat salt pork, ham, tongue, and sausage-meat in proportion.

In warm weather the jelly melts; the bird is then served without jelly. To give the bird a brown appearance, rich gravy or essence of meat is spread all over with a little brush.

When the boned bird is decorated with jelly, as described above, it must be kept in a cold place until the time to sit at table has come, else the heat of the dining-room would cause the jelly to melt, and would spoil the looks of the dish, but not the quality.

Meat Jelly.—Proportions: Two quarts of beef broth, or the liquor in which the bird has been cooked, after being strained and the fat skimmed off, a quarter of a pound of gelatine, five eggs, the rind of a good-sized lemon, a tea-spoonful of whole peppers, a good table-spoonful of salt, half a gill of brandy, and a gill of sherry wine.

Process: After having mixed the whole well together by beating with two forks or an egg-beater, turn the mixture into a tin saucepan, put on the fire, and stir now and then until it boils. Keep it boiling rather slowly for about ten minutes, when, by taking a spoon to open a space on the top, the liquor will be found clear. Then turn the whole into a jelly-bag, suspended high enough to allow a mould or bowl to be put under it. When about one-third of the jelly has passed through, turn it back into the bag gently; repeat that process two or three times, or until the jelly comes out perfectly clear.

If desired of an amber color, some burned sugar is put in the jelly-bag. It is then allowed to cool, and when congealed is placed on ice to make it firmer. Jamaica rum may be used instead of brandy, and Madeira or port wine instead of sherry wine.

The process is the same for any boned bird decorated with jelly.

FALL FASHIONS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

IT may not be generally known that the world was never so beautiful as it is this year. In a late number of the Bazar it was suggested that there are colors which the eye can not yet perceive, and which it never will perceive without more exquisite powers—the result of fine and elaborate training. I wish the writer would look down into my swamp, and see if we have not already as many colors as there is any call for! Nature is infinite, not simply in colors but in shades. We speak of "grass green," as if every blade of grass had been plunged into one dye-pot. But in a single pasture stretching before my eyes, close-cropped by browsing cows, the ground is mottled and many-hued as a Persian carpet, yet never other than green. There are little dimples of deep verdure, and one hollow, bent above by an old apple-tree nearly blown down, but recovering itself at the last moment, and transfixed at an acute angle. Into that hollow all the summer rains settle and all the spring snows drift. On it the ice sparkles and shelters, and now its soft slope is a velvet sward, thick and fine and vivid, and wholly unlike the yellow-green of the upland and the bare, bronzed, faded verdancy of the bumps that one can hardly call hillocks. Close by is a field of cabbages, or turnips, or some such homely esculent; but there is no homeliness in its level sweep of pallid green, which is far removed from the hues of my pasture land. Then the brown lines of the railroad dart across the landscape, adding force and law to beauty, their unerring precision a pleasant foil to nature's wildness. Beyond, the fields too are turning brown, and the river lounges lazily by, and the long low woods skirt its banks and my swamp. Ah, the splendor of those trees! Every clump is a bouquet, selected and arranged as if with the view of bringing out the strength and glow of each: bright flaming scarlet and cypress green, wine-hued and perfect amber, warm crimsons, and yellows of the brightest and the softest—gradations and blendings of a marvelous delicacy and an endless variety.

Hosted by Google

Yet sometimes, for all the gold and scarlet, I think nothing is quite so lovely as brown. The swamp is bordered with ferns. The old stone walls, rough and tumbling, that mark the road are overcrept and overswept with blackberry vines and tansy and golden-rod, with sunflower and the purple endive, wild brake, and gowan, the dandelion of the fall—a tawny tangle; but the rich ferns prevail, lending their deep, soft russet, all mellow, yellow tints, to the afternoon sun, to be shot through and through with his golden fire. Then does Nature's true worshiper long for a brown silk gown to wear in these autumn days, and be in harmony with the earth—a brown silk, russet and lustrous and shimmering, gold in the sun, grave in the shade, pliant to Nature's moods, like the fern and the blackberry vine, that scorn to glow and glitter when their lord, the sun, goes down.

I saw a bird yesterday in an elegant steel-colored polonaise of two shades, with black trimmings. It was perfect in cut and combination; and if he would but have staid twittering on my apple-tree long enough for an artist to catch his style, I would have sent to the Bazar a fall fashion which should have bewildered even the belles of Broadway. There is nothing to be compared to the quiet elegance of birds. The fields and the trees are inexhaustibly ingenious, but their taste is hardly chastened enough for minute and accurate imitation. A maple-tree walking down street would be in danger of being followed by gamins; and even the soberer elm and the presently-to-be-crimsoned oak would run the risk of being called garish and gay. But the little birds hop up, dainty and delicate. Is it mode color your suits shall be? No gray is so soft, no nap so smooth, as theirs, and the brightness comes in little dashes—dots and tips and fringes, in sheen and quiver and evanescence—an effect rather than a vision.

But when I saw near Calistoga the flower which the old Spaniards named mariposa —butterfly—with its broad, apricot-tinted, wing-like petals, dashed with a maroon velvet as soft in tissue as the purple of the heart's-ease, I saw at once where Monsieur WORTH found the great first cause of Madame Nightingale's gown. No wonder he has made his name illustrious, if he has gone to the birds and the butterflies and the blossoms for his patterns! Why not follow him, though with unequal steps? Why puzzle over color complications, when a pansy in your garden will tell you what goes with what? Why pay to a foreigner untold heaps of money for his dictum, when a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter? We cry out against the ugliness of the rough earthern jars in which our plants are potted. Rough and ugly they are, but have we mended the matter when we store our slips in glazed vases, painted a bright and shining green, which kills all the color out of the plants? Nature puts all her brightness into leaf and blossom, and makes the boles of her trees as rough and brown as possible, dowered only with their rugged strength, which bears all the beauty aloft. Let us also be rough and rugged as to the bases of our flower-pots, for 'tis our nature too.

I will go down into my swamp and study. It is raining delightful showers, but I love the drip of the leaves and the saucy slap of wet boughs, and the artists say that gray days are the days for color. We have had a surfeit of sunshine for three weeks of hazy delight. Let us go out to welcome this delicious rain, and come home laden with leaves more ruddy than the rose petals of our last lost June, with golden boughs more lovely than that whose variegated gleam shone through the Sibylline grove into the eyes of pius Æneas.

"Oh, you can't get leaves!" cries Faint-heart. "They are so high up. You must have a man and a ladder." A man and a ladder! Bring hither a water-proof and a pair of rubber boots, and leave your ladders and men to their own destruction. Is not my swamp amply supplied with hassocks on purpose to step on? Are there no branches to cling to, that one must bring men and ladders? Nay, has not Nature herself leveled a tree for our climbing? There lies he, a prostrate monarch, but so strong that from the uptorn earth still clinging to his roots he extracts the juices of life, and still nurtures all his tender leaves, and still drinks for his autumn glory the mystic blood-red wine. Safe seated on his fallen trunk, safe housed among his supporting branches, what need of men or ladders? Here is the musical tinkle of the rain on the leaves, the soft rustle of the leaves in the wind. Here is a carpet which the Shah might strangle his ministers for, and a canopy which might task the fairies' wand. Here life gathers its forces for a final stand against wintry death, and here shall victory prevail, for in these hidden nooks green grow the rushes O through all the furious winter's rages.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE REDINGOTE AND ROUND SKIRT.

THE simple and stylish suit illustrated on our first page (of which a cut paper pattern will be furnished) consists of a tight-fitting double-breasted redingote, and a narrow French round skirt short enough to escape the ground. This makes a trim and tasteful costume, and the pattern will be found an excellent model for suits of vigogne, serge, de bège, cashmere, English diagonals, and the various soft wool goods that are donned with the first cool days, and worn, with some additional wraps, throughout the winter.

The long simply shaped redingote has the favorite Marguerite back with the four broad forms of the wide English back. The drapery is brought in below the waist and in the middle seam; the result is the appearance of the now stylish long waist, with the drapery accumulated at the back, and plainer sides. A belt with buckles back and front is worn usually, but if the figure is fine, round, and slopes well into the hips, the belt is dispensed with. The front of the redingote is excellent for cold weather, as it is double-breasted, and folded over closely by lapping the revers to the left; the revers, however, may be faced with silk, turned over like a gentleman's coat collar, and worn open at the throat over a vest or waist of silk or the dress material, or else over a white habit-shirt. The reader is reminded that this redingote, though called "tight-fitting," must not be fitted as snugly as those basques and dress waists that are lined with drilling and furnished with whalebones. It must fit smoothly, falling closely to the figure without a wrinkle; but as the body is merely lined with thin silk, or farmer's satin, or thick cambric, it must not be tight enough to draw in the seams or to get the garment out of shape. Ladies who have slender figures, and those who suffer from cold, line the redingote waist with flannel; but this gives thick seams, destroys the shapely curves, and makes a clumsy garment. It is far better to use a thin lining, and wear over a sleeved waistcoat, or sort of basque of chamois-skin or of soft dark flannel, or else of black silk lightly wadded and quilted. It would not be necessary to add that the skirt of the garment must not be lined, did we not frequently see the graceful drapery of soft wool fabrics destroyed by linings of paper-muslin or stiffer crinoline. The narrow silk collar in the illustration is turned down, but on many stylish garments it is worn standing and flaring; a ruff of the silk is also used occasionally, but is scarcely in keeping with the plainness of this over dress. The coat sleeves are very close-fitting; the cuff may be of silk or the material piped with silk, and the same is true of the side pockets. The buttons are moulds covered with silk, or else any of the fashionable dark metals or smoked pearl. The usual trimming around the edge is a bias band of the material two or three inches wide, piped on the upper edges with silk. Ball fringe or netted fringes of wool are used if more ornamentation is desired. Very little colored lace is worn this winter. The French round skirt is described elsewhere. It is only a few inches narrower than the ordinary walking skirt, but is shorter, and the side and front breadths are sewed plainly to the waist, massing the entire fullness on the back breadth.

Many new woolen suits made by this design have been visible on the cool autumn days, and they are the perfection of neat, simple, and economical attire. The entire suits are made of the various goods of very fair quality that are sold at the popular price of $1 a yard, or even as low as 75 cents; lower-priced goods are apt to be inferior, and mixtures of cotton and wool. Very dark black-blues, maroon, leaf brown, and invisible green are the choice colors, and good black is also found in these materials. The prediction that blue would be the popular color of the season is more than verified, for already blue suits have become "common" on the streets. Ladies make a mistake in selecting blue shades that are too light and bright; unless the blue is as dark as indigo—indeed, scarcely more than blue-black —it makes a commonplace costume. The long dark blue polonaise, fastened by silver or steel buttons, and worn over a black silk skirt, is a favorite costume for morning and afternoon walks, traveling, etc. Camel's-hair, water-proof cloth, or cashmere is selected for the over dress.

PLEATINGS AND FOLDS ON SKIRTS.

The universally worn side pleatings and bias folds for trimming dress skirts are arranged in various pretty fashions. The simplest plan is to put straight around the skirt two rows of side pleating, each six inches deep, placed far enough apart to prevent lapping, and each headed by a bias band, or rather a fold, of the dress material, or else silk lined with foundation muslin, and simply stitched on the upper edge by the sewing-machine. The pleats are cut across the cloth, and hemmed on the lower edge by hand. This trimming is as popular as the two gathered ten-inch flounces were on summer dresses. Another arrangement has a pleating an eighth of a yard deep around the edge of the skirt, then a group of three lapping folds, a second pleating, and three more folds. The upper group of folds has no upright pleating to head it, as was lately the fashion, but is merely stitched on. One of the most elegant black silk costumes seen on Fifth Avenue has the demi polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 43, Vol. VI., with the round skirt trimmed with three rows of side pleating, each eight inches deep, placed separately without heading, and merely stitched on an inch from the top, and also caught lower down by a thread on the wrong side, leaving the edge of the pleating to hang loosely like a gathered flounce. Other black silk dresses have alternate velvet and silk folds in groups with silk pleatings between, or else scantily gathered velvet flounces with silk pleatings on the edge. With such black silk skirts jet galloon, jet fringe, and embroidery in which jet appears are used on the basque and over-skirt or redingote. The close coat sleeve has a narrow pleating of silk falling over the wrist, with cuff above, or else three folds laid over in loops on the side, and each held by a button.

UPPER SKIRTS AND NEW DRAPERY.

Notwithstanding the popularity of redingotes and of fully trimmed skirts with basques, upper skirts are by no means banished, but will hold their own for yet another season. These are invariably long, and two designs meet with most favor. The first is composed of from two to four square-cornered breadths, open in front to disclose a tablier, or else lapped near the belt. These are usually very little trimmed, and are draped to form a pouf behind, or else two wings. The other is a long apron, often finished by a flounce, and rounded up the sides to disclose the flounces on the back breadths. These two styles, it will be seen, are the reverse of each other. A third fancy has a single wide breadth of silk falling on each side, showing something of both front and back trimming; the last has the front sides cut off shorter and squarely, while the back is very long, and may be caught together behind by sashes. In all such over-skirts it is necessary that the upper skirt breadths should be sewed into the belt of the lower skirt, and also that they be tacked low down on the under-skirt. This also does away with the ungraceful habit many ladies have of lifting up the over-skirt when seating themselves.

The pretty effect of new drapery is given by strings attached to the side seams, and tied so closely behind the person that the side seams almost touch each other. Polonaises, redingotes, and even the open-front over-skirts are provided with these strings; other strings then falling from the belt and buttoned below form the soft, easy, careless-looking pouf.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; A. T. STEWART & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

LEANDER K. LIPPINCOTT, Esq., of Philadelphia, who enjoys the double felicity of being a poet and the husband of "Grace Greenwood," has been appointed Recorder of the General Land-office at Washington.

—A statement comes to London by the way of India that Queen VICTORIA was requested to create the Duke of Edinburgh Prince of Hindostan, which would have gratified the St. Petersburg people. This was declined, and Russia must be content with the prospective succession of the Duke to the Grand Dukedom of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, a petty sovereignty which will come to him on the demise of his uncle. The population of this vast empire is 170,000, about the same as Westchester County, New York. Its chief city, Gotha, has 19,000 inhabitants, about the same as Yonkers. Its other city, Coburg, 11,000, about the same as Morrisania, and a little more than Mount Vernon. We might call him Duke of Mount Vernon, if that would do.

—DE QUINCEY evolved from the depths of his inner consciousness an orthographic feat that should be gratefully received by Americans, viz., a firm and comprehensive explanation of the origin of the word "humbug." He said: "At one time there was war between Germany and Austria, and consequently the wildest and most incredible stories concerning the victory or defeat of the German arms would be spread, entirely without truth. They were all traced to Hamburg; so, when any thing marvelous was announced, men would say, "Oh! that is a Hamburg," and finally, a "humbug."

—The Rev. Dr. KENNEDY, of Dingwall, Scotland, a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance, preached on Sunday, the 12th Oct., in the Gaelic language in the Thirty-fourth Street Presbyterian Church—the first time in this city that the Gospel has ever been preached in that language.

—Sir GARNET WOLSELEY, chief of the British forces sent against the Ashantees, has not a bad thing of it—$20,000 a year, besides his pay and allowances as a major-general while in command of the West Coast of Africa.

—Mrs. SARAH J. HALE may be said to stand at the head of American magazinism, and editing Godey's Lady's Book must be deemed a means of longevity. Mrs. HALE is now eighty-five years of age, and has been connected with the publication for forty-five years—first when it was issued in Boston in 1828, under the title of the Ladies' Magazine, and three years later, when it was united with Godey's Lady's Book, in Philadelphia. Since then she has had editorial supervision of its pages.

—Mr. HOHNE, the colored Secretary of State of South Carolina, having been admitted as a student in the South Carolina University, three of the principal professors—Messrs. TALLERY, GIBBERS, and LABORDE—arrived at the conclusion that their feelings had been hurt, sent in their resignations, and gracefully receded from the institution.

—M. CAPOUL should join the "Athletics." A few evenings since, in the opera of Faust, a delighted party in one of the very upper boxes sent whirling to the stage a bouquet. CAPOUL caught the flowers with his left with a deftness that showed either familiarity with our national game, or an aptitude that would make him one of the great fielders of the Western Hemisphere.

—Madame DE VALMONT, mother of the wife of the late GEORGE WILKINS KENDALL, was drowned recently while crossing the Guadaloupe River, Texas. Madame DE VALMONT came to New Orleans from Paris twenty years ago with Mrs. KENDALL, and went to live on Mr. KENDALL'S celebrated plantation in Texas.

—The tragedian SALVINI, like the tenor CAMPANINI, made his début in the ranks of the Italian patriots. When Rome was invaded by NAPOLEON, in 1849, he shouldered a musket, and fought with such bravery in the defense of the city that he was decorated therefor with a medal of honor by General AVEZZANA. He was subsequently imprisoned both at Geneva and at Florence, and on his release was banished from his native city, Milan. It is no wonder that he declaims so feelingly against tyranny in the Gladiator, a part which he is fitted for by nature, for a more ideal gladiator was never seen. He is about forty, tall, well made, and muscular, with dark hair and mustache, and a grave and earnest face. He is a master of the robust school, like FORREST, whom he somewhat resembles, and is an admirable tragedian.

—Mr. EDWARD CARRINGTON MARSHALL, of Virginia, only surviving child of the late Chief Justice MARSHALL, has received a first-class appointment in the Pension Bureau at Washington.

—Chief Justice CHASE was very dainty in one respect—his caligraphy. He wrote a very small, compact hand, very neat and legible, and wrote with great rapidity. His private correspondence was large, and his style a model of clearness and vigor.

—Queen VICTORIA is a practical woman in the way of kine. Recently she held a sale of fat cattle at Claremont Park, and gave the customary free and desiderated lunch to purchasers. Result: $6000 sales.

—The following incident from the pen of the celebrated ecclesiastical historian, Abbé ROULBACHER, contradicts the irreligious stories that have been circulated in reference to the death of the great NAPOLEON: "When near his end, after having received the sacrament, he said to General MONTHOLON, 'General, I am happy; I have fulfilled all my religious duties. I wish you at your death the same happiness. I had need of it. I am an Italian—a child of the rank of Corsica. The sound of the bell affects me; the sight of the priest gives me pleasure. I wished to make a mystery of all this, but that would not be right. I ought to, I will, render glory to God. I think He will not be pleased to restore me to health....There is nothing terrible in death; it has been the companion of my pillow during the past three weeks, and now it is on the point of seizing me forever. I should have been glad to have seen my wife and son again, but the will of God be done.' On the 3d of May he received the second time the holy viaticum, and after having said adieu to his generals, he pronounced these words, 'I am at peace with all mankind.' He then joined hands, saying, 'My God!' and expired on the 5th of May at six at night."

—Mr. ABIHU HIGGINS, of Fulton, feeling aggrieved at the irregular action of certain kine which skipped into his domain without invitation, took it upon himself to post up in his field the following announcement: "If any man's or woman's cows or oxen gits in these air oats, his or her head will be cut off, as the case may be. A man eye um, and pay mi taxes, but confoozilation to a man who lets his critters run loose said eye."

—Washington society is to have a flutter of delight the coming winter by some notable weddings—among them Mr. HAMILTON FISH, Jun., to a daughter of Senator FRELINGHUYSEN; Mr. W. O. CHARLTON, of the British legation, to Miss CAMPBELL; and Señor FRANQUELLO, of the Spanish legation, to Miss LILLIE THOMAS.

—Colonel FORNEY, in the tenth number of his new series of "Anecdotes of Public Men," lets us into a little of his early personal history. He says: "I claim to know a little about newspapers, for I was fairly reared in a printing-office, having served as 'devil,' apprentice, and journeyman; as compositor, copy-holder, proof-reader, pressman, reporter, and finally editor. I have worked with the buckskin balls, and pulled the old wooden Ramage; have made and pushed the glue roller; have worked off large editions on the Washington iron press, and have finally owned an eight-cylinder lightning Hoe, which, with its modern rivals, more than realizes the fiction of the Arabian genii. Harnessed in steam, with lightning couriers, they 'strike the loud earth breathless' with their thunder, and fill the very heavens with their millions of messengers. I have seen many a small sheet expand into a great blanket, and fold itself, and die; and I have watched the few firstlings of a penny paper till they came to thousands of households, like so many morning intelligences. What a school is a printing-office! What a short space in history is a generation, and yet what revolutions are crowded into it! The hours I spent at the case and the press were made delightful by the reading of the times. We had comparatively few newspapers, and so we read them through and through. There was no Philadelphia Ledger, but we regaled ourselves with JOSEPH R. CHANDLER'S 'Letters from my Arm-Chair,' in the United States Gazette; there was no New York Tribune, but we drew inspiration from the splendid typography and nervous Saxon of HORACE GREELEY'S Weekly New Yorker; there were no Atlantic and Harper, but we reveled in the pages of Waldie's Library," etc., etc.

Hosted by Google

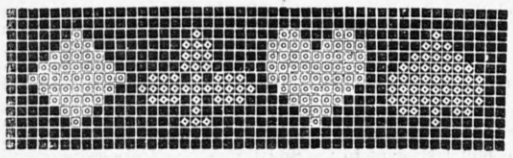

Fig. 2.—TAPESTRY DESIGN FOR PURSE, FIG. 1.
Description of Symbols: ◘ Black; ◙ Red Saddler's Silk.

Darned Tulle Tidy, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS tidy is very pretty and easily made. It is worked on white tulle with tatting cotton, No. 16. The tulle is first divided into six equal parts, which are marked with threads, and then darned, beginning from the middle, as shown by Fig. 2, and carrying the thread always through the corresponding row of holes back and forth. The ends of the thread are not fastened, but tied together. On the outer edge of the tidy fold the projecting material on the wrong side, knot in the fringe strands, and cut away the material close to the fringe strands.

Embroidered and Netted Purse, Figs. 1–5.

THE lower part (rim) of this purse is covered with an embroidery border, while the upper part is worked in netting. For the bottom cut a circular piece of thin pasteboard two inches in diameter, and cover it with red lustring on both sides. For the rim cut a straight strip of pasteboard seven inches and a quarter long and an inch wide, fasten the ends on each other half an inch wide, cover it with lustring also, and overseam it on the bottom. For the bag work with red saddler's silk on a netting mesh three-eighths of an inch in circumference a foundation of 44 st. (stitch), close these in a ring, and net 16 rounds with the same number of st., always going forward. Then divide the number of stitches into two equal parts, in order to form slits on both sides, and net first on one half and then on the other four rounds with white, four rounds with red, and three rounds with black silk, going back and forth, and then one round more with black silk on a steel mesh furnished with balls at the ends. Finish the sides of the slits with single crochet. Darn the netted foundation, as shown by Fig. 4, alternately with black and white silk in small round dots. In order that the dots shall be of equal size, always carry the working thread back to the point of the last dot from where it was commenced, and then to the middle of the new dot. Slip the ring on the bag, and fasten a crochet loop on the bag to prevent the ring from sliding down. Join the finished bag with the rim. For the cover of the rim work on a strip of perforated board of the requisite size the design figures of the border in cross stitch with red and black saddler's silk, as shown by Figs. 2 and 5; alternating with the same colors of silk work the edge of the border in cross stitch and button-hole stitch. Finally, work the filling as shown by Fig. 5 with white silk in diagonal Gobelin stitch, and fasten the border on the rim of the purse. Instead of the border Fig. 2, Fig. 3 may be used.

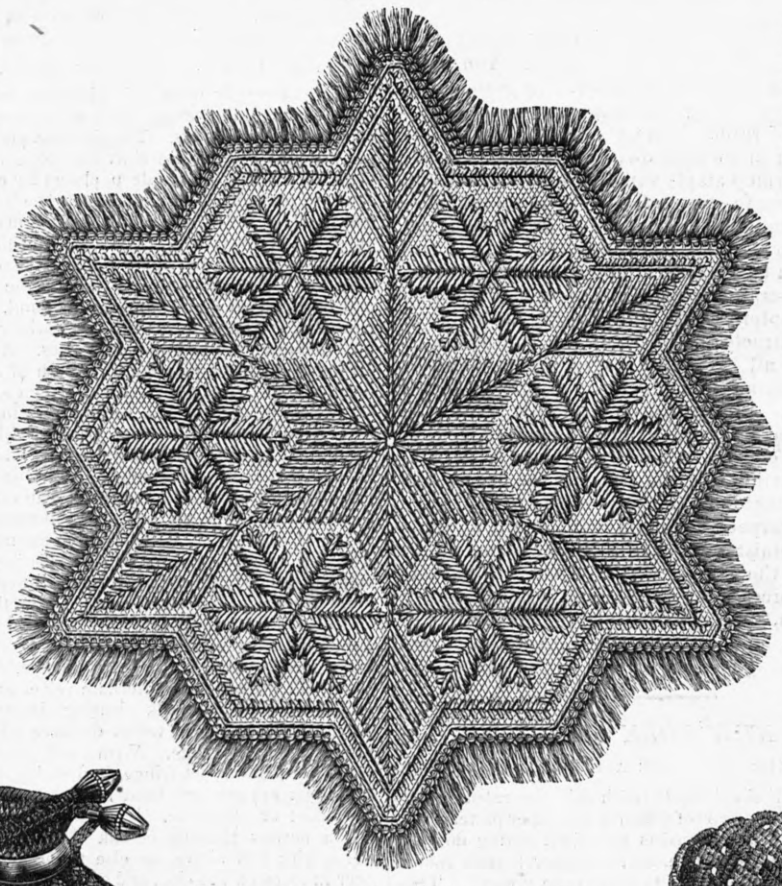

Fig. 1.—DARNED TULLE TIDY.—REDUCED SIZE.—[See Fig. 2.]

Fig. 1.—EMBROIDERED AND NETTED PURSE.—[See Figs. 2–5.]

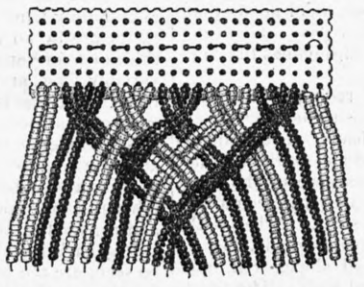

Fig. 2.—BRAID-WORK FOR NAPKIN-RING, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

Bead Napkin-Ring, Figs. 1–4.

THIS braid-work napkin-ring is made of gray steel beads and crystal beads plaited together. It is finished with a shield of perforated board, on which is worked a monogram with beads. To make the napkin-ring fasten on the shield of perforated board pieces of wire of the requisite length in the middle, so that both ends hang down even, as shown by Fig. 2. Then string on the beads, observing Fig. 2, and begin the braid-work; if in the course of the work one of the wires should become too short, fasten a new piece on the old piece, twisting the ends of both pieces together; finally, knot the end of each piece of wire on the last bead. After finishing the braid-work close it in a ring, fastening the ends of the beaded wires carefully on the other side of the perforated board. Work the embroidery on a separate piece of perforated board similar to the first. Now take another piece of perforated board of the same size, cover it with gray silk on both sides, and overseam it closely, with the embroidered piece, over the piece on which the wires are fastened. Edge the shield with large steel beads.

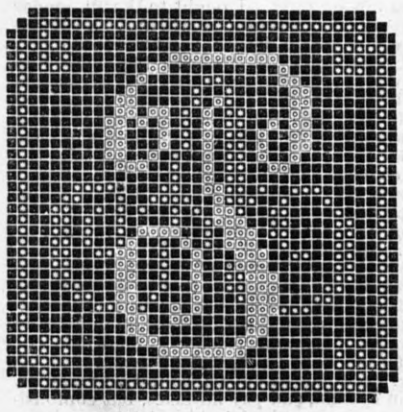

Fig. 3.—BEAD EMBROIDERY FOR NAPKIN-RING, FIG. 1.
Description of Symbols: ■ Blue Steel; ◘ White Steel; ◙ Crystal Beads.

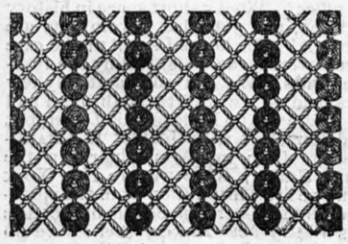

Fig. 4.—NETTING FOR PURSE, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

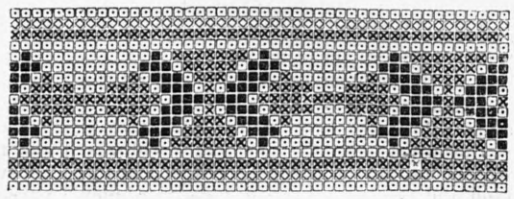

Fig. 3.—TAPESTRY PATTERN FOR PURSE, FIG. 1.
Description of Symbols: ■ Black; ◙ 1st (darkest), ◘ 2d, ◘ 3d (lightest), Fawn (the last silk).

Crochet Border for Curtains, Coverlets, Lambrequins, etc.

See illustration on page 709.

To work this border use fine or coarse crochet or knitting cotton, according to the purpose for which it is designed. It is worked crosswise, in rounds going back and forth, on a foundation of 45 st. (stitch) as follows: 1st round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on the next foundation st., 7 dc., (double crochet) on the third following st., 1 sc. on the third following st., 9 ch. (chain stitch), with these pass over 4 st., 1 sc. on the next st., 7 dc. on the third following st., 1 sc. on the third following st., 9 ch., with these pass over 4 st., 1 sc. on the next st., 7 dc. on the third following st., 1 sc. on the third following st., three times alternately 9 ch., with these pass over 4 st., 1 sc. on the next st. 2d round.—Turn the work; this is done at the beginning of each round. Always alternately 4 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of each open-work or close scallop in the preceding round, 4 ch., 1 sc. in the hollow of each scallop of the preceding round. All the rounds denoted by even numbers are worked in this manner, and are therefore not described further. 3d round.—11 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc. of the preceding round, 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., twice alternately 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., then three times alternately 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., then 9 ch., 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the first st. in the preceding round. 5th round.—7 dc. on the second following sc. of the preceding round, 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., three times alternately 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., then twice alternately 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc.; 9 ch., 1 stc. on the first st. in the preceding round. 7th round.—11 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc. of the preceding round, 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., three times alternately 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., then 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 stc. on the first st. in the preceding round. 9th round.—7 dc. on the second following sc., 1 sc. on the next sc. in the preceding round, 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., twice alternately 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., then 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., twice alternately 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 stc. on the first st. of the preceding round. 11th round.—11 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc. of the preceding round, 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., twice alternately 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., then 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 stc. on the first st. in the preceding round. 13th round.—7 dc. on the second following sc. of the preceding round, 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on

Fig. 1.—BEAD NAPKIN-RING. [See Figs. 2–4.]

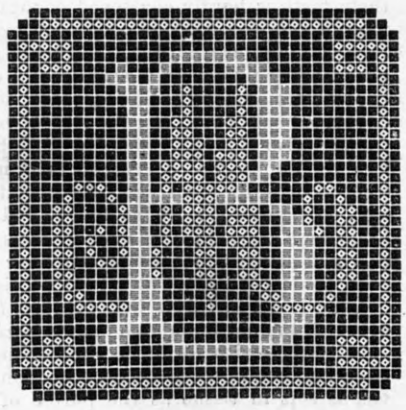

Fig. 4.—BEAD EMBROIDERY FOR NAPKIN-RING, FIG. 1.
Description of Symbols: ■ Blue Steel; ◘ White Steel; ◙ Crystal Beads.

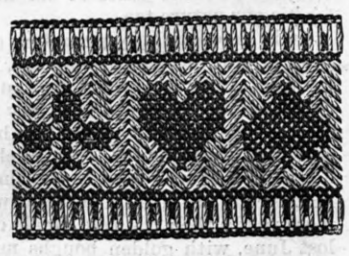

Fig. 5.—TAPESTRY BORDER FOR PURSE, FIG. 1.—FULL SIZE.

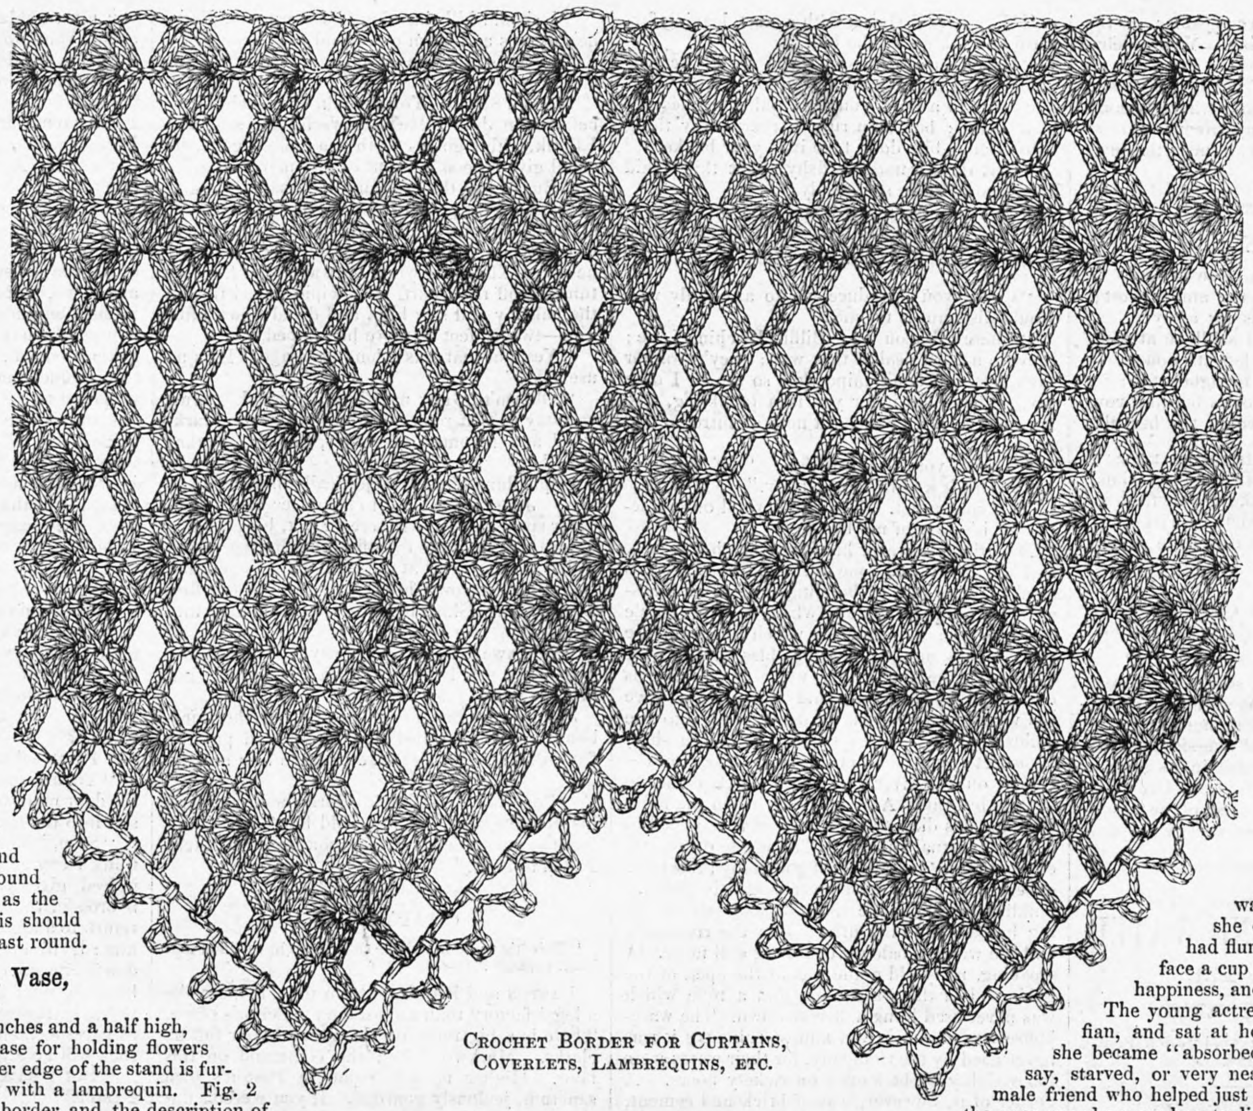
Fig. 2.—THIRD SECTION OF DARNED TULLE TIDY. HALF SIZE.—[See Fig. 1.]

Hosted by Google

the next sc., 9 ch., 1 stc. on the first st. of the preceding round. 15th round.—11 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 sc. on the second following sc., 7 dc. on the next sc., 1 sc. on the next sc., 9 ch., 1 stc. on the first st. in the preceding round. 17th, 19th, 21st, 23d, 25th, and 27th rounds.—Like the 13th, 11th, 9th, 7th, 5th, and 3d rounds (going backward); but at the end of each round work, instead of the 9 ch., only 4 ch. After working the 28th round in the manner of all rounds denoted by even numbers, repeat always the 1st–28th rounds. Having worked a portion of the border in the requisite length, border it on the under edge with one round as follows: Always alternately 1 sc. on the next last stc. of a pattern round of the border, 2 ch., 1 p. (picot, consisting of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), 2 ch. In the 15th round the last 4 ch. and in the 16th round the first 4 ch. together count as the last bar of the 15th round; this should be considered in working the last round.



CROCHET BORDER FOR CURTAINS, COVERLETS, LAMBREQUINS, ETC.

Flower Stand with Vase, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS stand, which is eight inches and a half high, is of French gilt. A crystal vase for holding flowers is set in the middle. The under edge of the stand is furnished with a bead border and with a lambrequin. Fig. 2 gives the design for the bead border and the description of symbols. For the lambrequin first take up 24 large white glass beads on double flower wire, to these beads fasten the grelots in the following manner: * Take up 5 small glass beads (string beads), 1 large bead, 1 grelot, and 1 large bead, carry the thread back through the grelot and the first 6 beads, pass through the following 2 beads strung on wire, and repeat 11 times from *. Next fasten the lambrequin on the stand, and then work the bead scallops which lie above the grelots. Fasten the thread to the wire between two beads, * take up 30 s. b., pass over 4 l. b., carry the thread from right to left through the last two, and repeat from *.

FIG. 1.—FLOWER STAND WITH VASE.—[See Fig. 2.]

Jewel Stand with Scent Bottle, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS stand is of French gilt, and is eight inches and a half high. A painted china saucer, designed to hold jewelry, is set at the bottom, and the top holds a cut glass scent bottle. The under edge of the stand is ornamented with a bead border, which is worked in the design shown by Fig. 2 with the colors given in the description of symbols. A border in petit point may be used instead of the bead border.

FIG. 1.—JEWEL STAND WITH SCENT BOTTLE.—[See Fig. 2.]

Section of Tulle and Batiste Tidy.

FOR this tidy cut of white tulle the requisite number of pieces an inch and seven-eighths square. Darn each of these pieces with white cotton as shown by the illustration, bind the edge with gray braid half an inch wide, button-hole stitched on with gray cotton. Then cut for each close square a piece of gray batiste an inch and a half square, ornament it, as shown by the illustration, with embroidery, which is worked with white cotton in point Russe, knotted stitch, and point de reprise. Bind the squares on the edge with white braid button-hole stitched on with white cotton, and border the squares with twisted gray cotton, forming loops at regular intervals, as shown by the illustration. Always overseam together alternately one close and one open-work square, and knot fringe strands into the edge of the tidy, observing the illustration.

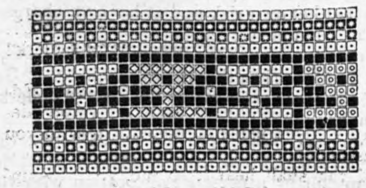


FIG. 2.—BEAD BORDER FOR FLOWER STAND, FIG. 1.

Description of Symbols: ▣ Chalk; ■ Black; ⊡ Crystal; ◫ Steel; □ Gold Beads.

SECTION OF TULLE AND BATISTE TIDY.

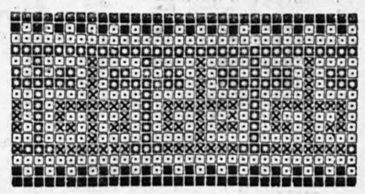

FIG. 2.—BEAD BORDER FOR JEWEL STAND, FIG. 1.

Description of Symbols: ⊠ Chalk; □ Steel; ■ Black; ⊡ Crystal Beads.

FRENCH DRAMATIC QUEENS.

THE line of dramatic queens in France had its Lady Jane Grey, its queen for an hour—one who was loved and admired during that time, and whose hard fate was deplored for full as long a period. About the year 1819–20 there appeared at the Odéon a Mlle. Charton. She made her début in a new piece, Lancastre, in which she acted Queen Elizabeth. Her youth and beauty, combined with extraordinary talent, took the public mind prisoner. Here was a young goddess who would shower delight when the maturer divinities had gone back to Olympus. The lithographed portrait of Mlle. Charton was in all the shops and was eagerly bought. Suddenly she ceased to act. A jealous lover had flung into that beautiful and happy face a cup of vitriol, and destroyed beauty, happiness, and partially the eyesight, forever. The young actress refused to prosecute the ruffian, and sat at home, suffering and helpless, till she became "absorbed in the population"—that is to say, starved, or very nearly so. She had one poor female friend who helped just to keep her alive. In this way the once proud young beauty literally went down life into old age and increase of anguish. She dragged through the horrible time of the horrible Commune, and then she died. Her body was carried to the common pauper grave at Montmartre, and one poor actor, who had occasionally given her what help he could, a M. Dupuis, followed her to that bourne.

Queens as they were, their advent to such royalty was impeded by every obstacle that could be thrown in their way. The "Society" of French actors has been long noted for its cruel illiberality and its mean jealousy, especially the "Society" that has been established since the Revolution—or, to speak correctly, during the revolution which began in 1789, and which is now in the eighty-fourth year of its progress. The poor and modest Duchesnois had immense difficulty in being allowed to appear at all. The other actors would not even speak to her. When she was "called" by an enthusiastic audience, no actor had the gallantry to offer a hand to lead her forward. A poor player named Florence at length did so, but on later occasions he was compelled to leave her to "go on" alone. When Mlle. Rachel, ill clad and haggard, besought a well-known sociétaire to aid her in obtaining permission to make her début on the stage of the Théâtre Français, he told her to get a basket and go and sell flowers. On the night of her triumph, when she did appear, and heaps of bouquets were flung at her feet, on her coming forward after the fall of the curtain, she flung them all into a basket, slung it from her shoulders, went to the actor who had advised her to go and vend flowers, and kneeling to him, asked him, half in smiles and half in tears, if he would not buy a nosegay!

Hosted by Google

It is said that Mlle. Mars was jealous of the promise of her sister, Georgina. Young débutantes are apt to think that the aged queens should abandon the parts of young princesses, and when the young débutantes have become old, they are amazed at the impertinence of newcomers who expect them to surrender the juvenile characters.

TOKENS.

I HEARD a blackbird at the close of day
Trill out its song against the amber west;
I said, "Oh, bird, my love is far away!
Tell her my thought, and I shall be at rest."
The mellow-throated singer left its bough,
And flew away amid the twilight's fall;
And as I thought of young love's burning vow,
I wondered if that bird would tell her all.

I plucked a red rose from its parent tree;
I threw it in the stream that flowed along,
And said, "Sweet rose, oh, take a smile from me
To where the blackbird speedeth with its song!"
I watched it take its way far down the stream,
With perfumed thoughts to her so young and fair,
And wondered oft if e'er its crimson gleam
Would mingle with her locks of golden hair.

* * * * * *

I dreamed I heard her voice, so low and sweet,
Sing those grand songs that all the spirit fill.
I knelt and lowly worshiped at her feet:
I woke and found my loved one singing still.
And then I knew the blackbird in its song
Had told her all the love my soul had sent;
And that the red rose had been borne along,
And found her ere its fragrance yet was spent.

(Continued from No. 43, page 679.)

THROUGH FIRE AND WATER.

A Tale of City Life.

BY FREDERICK TALBOT,

AUTHOR OF "THE WINNING HAZARD," "JACK PUGH'S LEGACY," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER III.—(Continued.)

THE dinner-bell rang, and Edward hadn't come. Just as the soup was being carried away he came in, hot and excited. Markwood was with him.

"Father, I've brought Mr. Markwood in to dinner. I knew you'd be glad to see him."

"Hum!" said the old man. "I suppose you were afraid to come in alone."

Markwood, however, soon made the old man's face relax, and the somewhat gloomy dinner-table grew cheerful with his stories. Every one but Pugh joined in the flood of talk; he sat severely and austerely by. Pugh was a great hand at stories himself, but as the point of them usually consisted in the diverse accentuation of a Welsh vowel, they were for the most part caviare to the multitude.

"Can your friend fight?" he whispered to Edward.

Edward nodded. "First-rate," he whispered, in reply.

"Confound it!" said Pugh, under his breath. "If he's good at that too, I don't know where I will have him."

"Pugh," said Fleetwood Hulse, as the men of the party proposed to adjourn for a smoke, "stay a few moments, will you, and help me to finish this bottle of port? I want your advice."

Pugh staid behind.

"Come, Pugh, fill your glass! Now, I want to talk to you about a little matter of business. You know my daughter's going to marry Jones—a very suitable match, we think it; good prospects, and all that."

"Yes, indeed, and a very good-hearted fellow he is, too; yes, by Jove!"

"No doubt, no doubt," said Fleetwood, waiving that aside as unimportant. "Well, in order to do honor to the occasion, and give my daughter a trousseau and all that befitting the position to which she was born—for I needn't tell you, Pugh, that the Fleetwood Hulses are a family with which it would be no degradation for princes to ally themselves; you understand me, Pugh; no brag, you know, but just a simple matter of fact."

"All right," said Pugh; "and a very good-hearted girl she is, too; yes, indeed."

"But, you see, my dear Pugh, all these things cost a lot of money—lot of money. Now, I have some money laid by with our Company, on call, as it were, on which they pay me interest, and I proposed to draw some of that out, three hundred pounds or so."

"Just so, quite right. I admire your prudence," said Pugh.

"But our managing director called me on one side, and said, 'Hulse, my boy,' said he—he's a Blackman of the Blackmans of Longshenstone, and knew me in better days, and so it's Jack and Harry with us still—'Fleetwood,' said he, 'our balances are devilish low just now'—these were his very words—'draw upon us at three months, and discount the bill in the City.' I couldn't do less than oblige them. Here's the bill."

Hulse drew a case from his pocket, and pulled out a small oblong piece of paper. Pugh examined it.

"Ah, I see, drawn by John Jones. That's our John." Hulse nodded without speaking. "Accepted by Edward Hulse, and indorsed by the Company. Well?"

"Well, I didn't send it up with the other bills to be discounted."

"Quite right too," said Pugh. "I should have looked curiously upon that bill."

"Why?" said Hulse, with a start, leaning forward and taking up the bill.

"Pig upon Bacon, don't you see? Accommodation bill. I should have thought the Company was in a hole, you see; quite erroneously in this case; but, as a rule, if there's any thing fishy about a bill, don't take it to your banker's."

"But there's nothing fishy about this," said Fleetwood Hulse, snappishly.

"Dear no, it's a very good bill—of the sort; only get it discounted outside if you want the money. You won't pay any more; perhaps not so much."

"Could you introduce me to any body who would discount it for me?"

"There's Bacon and Bilfil, Birchin Lane; they do a good deal in that way; they're rather high, but you don't mind that so much, I dare say. They'll do it for you in a twinkling, I've no doubt. I'll give you a note of introduction to them."

"Thank you," said Hulse. "Of course I don't want it known to any body."

"Of course not. You can depend on my secrecy; it's part of my business."

Meantime Edward, his future brother-in-law, and Markwood had gone to the old warehouse to smoke. The pile of buildings known as Ebbsfleet form a quadrangle of which the river is one of the sides; a warehouse which abuts on the river makes another side; stables and a wide entrance-gate the third; while the square is completed by the house and offices which face the warehouse, and whose doors open into the inclosed yard. When the big gates are shut, Ebbsfleet is cut off from the rest of the world—except on the river side, from which come no visitors but rats. And at nights, when the noise of traffic has died away, Ebbsfleet is wrapped in deep conventual stillness. The whole of the river frontage was occupied, of course, by the wharf, except where the warehouse abutted; for the building overhung the river, its foundations being based upon piles driven into the river-bed, and the wooden balcony overhung still more. A creaking, rusty old crane was in the apex of the gable end of the warehouse, and a rope which was never used hung half-way down. The warehouse was of wood, and almost ruinous; it was never used by the Company, for their wares were too weighty to be stored on rickety floors. A corner of it, however, was of brick and cement, very strongly built. And this one strong portion had given firmness and strength to the rest of the building, which leaned upon it for support. It was a darksome, drearisome place, that old warehouse, at night. When, knowing that no other living human soul was in the place, you heard a mad rush of hurrying feet on the floor over your head, though reason told you they were only the feet of rats, you still shivered and shuddered. When the creaking, rusty crane moaned dolefully in the passing wind—when you heard the plash, plash of the hurrying waters under your feet—when, in fact, all the noises of the night combined to make that dreary old warehouse alive with eerie sounds—it was a very darksome, drearisome place to be alone in.

"Ugh!" said John, who entered it for the first time; "what a vaulty kind of place, and what a vaulty kind of smell! It feels as though a murder had been done here."

"Nonsense," said Edward, who didn't like to hear his favorite bower run down. "Come out here into the balcony; you can see well enough, for the night is not dark, and the lamps of the steamers and the glow from the sky lighten it up."

But it was chilly on the balcony, and so Edward lit a stable lantern, and took them into a little room he had fitted up as a workshop, where the windows were not more than half broken, and where there was a bench he had made himself; which, but that it "carried" one of its legs, and would ruthlessly upset an incautious sitter the moment that he sat down, was a very favorable specimen of the carpenter's art. Of this bench Edward was justly proud.

"Come, Markwood, come, old fellow, we can be very jolly here. Light up! Sit down here; you'll find it very comfortable, only we must all sit down at once, or else it will tilt over. Now, all together!"

"Good heavens, Ned!" cried John Jones, springing forward and destroying the balance of the bench. "Listen! What's that?"

From the very top of the old warehouse there was a sound of a shuffling of feet and a clanking of chains; then, as they listened, the sound descended; stair by stair they heard the shuffling feet, the clanking chain; louder and louder grew the noise, nearer and nearer came the shuffling feet, till at last, as John, holding up the lantern, cowered into the farthest corner of the little room, he saw, far up in the black darkness of the long low room beyond, two shining flame balls.

"Ha, ha!" said Edward, laughing heartily. "It's old Scipio! My word, you were frightened, John. I forgot you hadn't been introduced to Scipio. Come here, old fellow!"

The two shining eyes approached, and presently, as he came within the scope of the rays of the lantern, a big rough-coated dog, whose muzzle and throat were white with age, whose massive jowl overhung his gaping jaws, who seemed as though he could scarcely drag one trembling limb after the other, shuffled slowly toward the light. A broken chain hung from his collar. He struck his head against the half-opened door and recoiled.

"Upon my word that's a very uncanny dog of yours, Ned!"

"He's blind, poor fellow. Here, come here Try again, Scipio!"

Scipio gave his great tail a sweep as he heard his master's voice; but when he entered the room he snuffled all about until he got scent of the strangers, when he put his mouth to the ground and growled ominously.

"I should kill that dog if I were you, Ned; he's useless and worn out," said the curate.

The dog seemed to understand what was said, and growled again.

"Quiet, Scipio! You shouldn't say such things before him, John. He's a powerful dog still, and I think, although his teeth are mostly gone, he could give a good account of any man living."

"But what's the good of him?" said Jones.

"What's the good of you, if it comes to that?" said Markwood. "As long as Ned has a roof to cover him, Scipio will be taken care of. Why, he saved Ned's life when he was a child. Ned tumbled off the wharf, and Scipio was sitting in the balcony and saw him, and dived down after him—twenty feet or more he jumped."

"Yes, but that was a long time ago. He's no use now!"

"Oh, isn't he any use?" said Edward. "Just you stay in that room for a minute, while Markwood and I come out. Now, Scipio! Guard him!"

Scipio flung himself majestically into the doorway. John Jones tried to step over him. Suddenly springing up, with crest erect, his jaws distended, his sightless eyes flashing fire, he roared rather than growled at the escaping prisoner, and would have thrown himself upon him, but that Edward seized him by the collar and held him down.

"Get away, John, get away. I never saw Scipio like this before. Down, Sir, down! Let him go, Scipio; let him go!"

John Jones fled precipitately from the warehouse, and didn't feel safe till he had put the front-door of Hulse's house between him and the dog.

"Poor old Scip!" said Markwood, caressing his massive head. "Poor old boy! you didn't like the parson, eh? Well, upon my word, Ned, I didn't either."

CHAPTER IV.

"This 'tis to be married! this 'tis to have linen and buck-baskets!"

PASTON and Brett's, in term time, is more like a legal factory than an ordinary solicitor's office. There is a big room on the ground-floor full of clerks. Markwood had the command on this floor. Higher up you came to Paston's own sanctum, jealously guarded. If you weren't uncommonly self-assertive, you would drift away here, if you came in search of Mr. Paston—that is, if you were not a swell at all, but only ordinary Brown or Jones. Mr. Paston had the theory that the most valuable thing in the world to him was his own time, and that any people worth seeing would find their way to him past any difficulties his men could throw in their way; so he rather encouraged his inaccessibility, and made dreadful war among his clerks if any worthless—in Mr. Paston's sense—client filtered through their sieve.

In vacation time, however, Paston and Brett's rests on its oars. Paston is probably at Rome or Florence. As for Brett, he is in Bedford Row still, no doubt, burrowing among the passages below the basement; but then nobody acknowledges Brett as any body. The managing clerk is putting his garden in order at Dalston. Markwood is paddling about at Kingston or Henley with his boys.

It is in the middle of the long vacation, about three months after Mr. Hulse's dinner-party, that a lady dressed in deep mourning and closely veiled drives up in a cab to Paston and Brett's. She dismisses the cabman, and timidly rings the bell at the outer door. Now, to ring the bell at No. 85 Bedford Row is somewhat equivalent to the pastime of the child—rendered memorable to us by the witticism of Sydney Smith—in stroking the shell of a tortoise. It doesn't produce the slightest effect in the internal economy of the office. The bell sounds lustily enough, but no one takes any notice of it. So this black figure stands forlornly conspicuous in the desert of Bedford Row, patiently awaiting the result of the summons; rings again more impetuously—still stands there waiting. This little obstacle worries and frets her; how is she to make the people hear in this dull old place? Just as she is putting her hand to the bell for the third time a young man pushes open the swing-door and issues forth. He sees a lady standing there; stops and recognizes her. Presently they are both swallowed up by the swing-doors. We will follow them into the house, up the stairs. They pass into Mr. Paston's comfortably furnished inner room, when the lady removes her veil, disclosing features regular and handsome, but colorless and cheerless, without the light of happy life upon them.

"My uncle is abroad, you tell me," she said, listlessly, leaning her head upon her hand, and mechanically smoothing the band of hair upon her forehead. "I am very sorry. I wanted his advice, and I know not where to go, to whom."

"Although," said the young man, whom we recognize as Edward Hulse, compressing his lips firmly, "it must be painful to both of us to renew an acquaintance broken off under such cruel circumstances, yet if I can help you in any way—"

"I know it," she said; "I know you will; but if our meeting be painful to you, how much the more must it be to me? You, at least, have nothing to reproach yourself with; you are contented, happy; but for me, miserable creature that I am! But after all, Edward," she went on, with more energy, "I have not injured you; you never really cared for me; you thought you did, but you were mistaken. I led you on to believe you were in love with me, but it was mere illusion. You have already consoled yourself, have you not? Confess."

Edward, somewhat embarrassed by the turn the conversation had taken, bit his lips and remained silent.

"And so," she went on, "as you have ceased to care for me, I can, without compunction, tell you my troubles and ask your advice, just as a client, you know, Edward. You don't know my husband, you don't know Bilfil, but you know that I married against the wishes of my uncle Tom—indeed of every body, except Uncle Gilbert. But I was young and foolish, and didn't know what I was about. A worse man in every sense does not exist. And yet he is flattered, courted by every body; while I— Hardly had we been married a month before he recommenced his old career. Haunter of all kinds of infamous places, he comes to his home reeking with the contagion of the coarse, evil natures with whom he associates. No, he is not personally unkind to me, he is only obnoxious. He is the guest at many good houses where the existence of his wife is not even acknowledged; he makes not the slightest effort to introduce me to the society of my equals. He proposed to me the other day to take me to some one of his vile haunts—some music-hall, I imagine. He tells me to my face that he made a mistake; that he thought I was the rich Miss Paston, the heiress to old Gilbert Paston, the miser; and that he regrets ever having met me. Now what can I do? where can I go? My whole nature, my very being, is sullied by contact with such a man. Where can I go? What can I do? Will the law protect me?"

"I'm afraid it won't," said Edward, gloomily.

"Can I make use of the little fortune that is mine to set myself up in some business where I can earn an honest living?"

Edward shook his head.

"If I leave him, can he compel me to return to him?"

"I fear—that is, I have no doubt—he can."

"Then," she said, rising and moving toward the door with tottering limbs, "I shall throw myself into the river."

"Stop," said Edward, interrupting her. "I think I can help you in another way. The law, indeed, gives you no help, but human sympathy is broader than law. I would not advise you to return to a man of the kind you describe. Leave him; let him remain ignorant of your fate. London is almost trackless; you are as safe from him here—except for the barest accident—as you would be thousands of miles away. I know some nice respectable people living near the Tower; they will give you shelter for a week or two."

"But I have no money, no clothes. Oh no, I can't."

"I will let you have some money, and as for clothes, well, you must go—home, and pack them up; enough for your present wants."

"But if he is there?"

"You must wait till he is gone."

"And perhaps he will stay—stay all night; he does sometimes; and if he did I should kill him. Edward, yes, I would kill him!"

"Hush, hush! We must manage it in this way: I will go with you in a cab, and will ask for your husband; if he is at home I will see him first, and try and arrange for terms of separation; you, meantime, remaining in the cab in an adjoining street. If he absolutely refuses any terms, and insists on your remaining with him, then, unless you are prepared to go back to him—"

"Oh no, no!" cried Margaret.

"Then you had better avail yourself of my plan; drive off without letting your husband see you, and take lodgings with the people I know, purchasing whatever you may immediately want. I will stand in the place of your uncle for the moment. No doubt he will repay me when he returns."

"I think that will be best," said Margaret.

They drove in a cab to the lodgings in Ebury Street which Mr. Bilfil had lately taken. Edward halted the cab in a street adjoining, and went by himself to the place. Mr. Bilfil was at home. Edward was shown into a shabbily furnished drawing-room, wherein sat Mr. Bilfil in a faded crimson easy-chair, smoking a very good cigar. Edward started, and turned first red and then pale. He was the fat straw-colored man he had seen on the boat with his Patty.

"Well," said Bilfil, surveying Edward critically, as he examined his card, held out at arms-length between his finger and thumb—"well, and pray what is your business?"

"I come from Paston and Brett's," said Edward; "and I have come, in fact, to speak—to mention, in fact—on behalf of your wife."

Bilfil blew a great cloud of smoke from his mouth and nostrils.

"Pray by whose authority?"

"By her authority."

"Mr. Hulse, by-the-way, are you related to the tile and chimney-pot man?"

"Mr. Fleetwood Hulse is my father."

"Ah, Mr. Edward Hulse, then allow me to remind you of the unfortunate fate that attends those who interfere in matrimonial squabbles. I shall receive no message of any kind from her, except a promise of unconditional submission. If she returns to me at once—now, this very evening—I will let by-gones be by-gones, and try to reconcile myself to my lot; otherwise my doors will be closed against her, and I shall put the matter in the hands of the detective police."

"Then you will come to no terms of separation?"

"Terms! Nonsense! Here is my home at her disposal; if she absents herself from it, let her do it at her own risk and at her own charges, as far as I am concerned."

"You are a brute, Mr. Bilfil!"

Mr. Bilfil rose in a threatening manner. "Get out of the room, you miserable lawyer's clerk! Do you hear?"

"You shall hear from me again," said Edward, retreating toward the door. "I won't demean myself by a personal altercation with you—at present."

"And you shall hear from me, young whipper-snapper?" cried Bilfil, as Edward went out.

"Hulse—Fleetwood Hulse—where have I seen his name lately? Ah, I remember; we did a bill for that gentleman. And that bill must be pretty nearly due. Ha! we must see to that. Really," said Bilfil to himself, "it will be a most fortunate occurrence if my Margaret does take herself off in this hasty way. It will save me no end of trouble and expense. The situation was becoming unendurable. To live with a wealthy prig, who will support you in becoming state and style, must be irksome enough; but a penniless prig—a prig whom you have to support and supply with all the appliances of feminine extravagance—oh, Bilfil, how could you have made such a stupid blunder! Thank your lucky stars, old fellow, if you get out of it so cheaply."

Hosted by Google

CHAPTER V.

A CITY SUNDAY.

"Fresshe is thy river, with his lusty strandis;
Blithe be thy chirches, well sownyng are thy belles."

IT is Sunday morning. The sun is really shining very brightly in Lower Bridge Street. Breakfast is laid, and Lucy has already finished hers, and is standing with her prayer-book in her hand, awaiting her mother, who is going to church with her, but who is not so impatient as her daughter, having lost her interest in young curates. The ting-tang of the bells calling the faithful to prayers sounds lazily through the windows, which are half opened, and which admit the fresh morning air; for even in Lower Bridge Street on a fine Sunday morning the air is fresh enough. The sparrows are twittering and hopping about in the yard outside, and picking up a grain here and there, to the indignation of the white Dorkings, who make sudden futile dashes at them when they come too near. Edward is late for breakfast this morning.

His couch has been haunted by regretful thoughts; he has misgivings that he has rather made a mess of it. With the best possible intentions, he has succeeded in making out a very suspicious case against himself. He—the former lover of Margaret Paston—had carried her off from her husband's home, had placed her in lodgings chosen by himself, had supplied her with money for her daily necessities. As a lawyer, he was bound to admit that there was a strong prima facie case against him. What would the governor say if he came to hear of it? what Patty? For Patty was away at Margate for a holiday; and although he had introduced Mrs. Bilfil to her father and mother as the niece of his employer—Paston—and a married lady, yet he could see that Robinson and his wife didn't like their lodger. When Patty came home there would be an explosion. The two young women would fight; there couldn't be a doubt about that. What a perplexed tangle of trouble he had got himself into, and all so innocently! He couldn't help falling in love with Patty; he couldn't help taking the part of his cousin and old flame, Margaret. He felt altogether unhinged and dispirited. He had made half a promise to go down and see Markwood at Henley, but he wouldn't do it; he hadn't the heart to go out. When his people had gone to church he would go down to breakfast, and have a long morning's sulk and smoke in the old warehouse.

When he came down, however, his father was still sitting brooding over the fire.

"You didn't go to church with them, then, governor?"

Fleetwood Hulse turned on his son a pair of blood-shot, haggard eyes.

"What should I go to church for?"

"Why, to get absolution for the week's misdoings—the week's! the quarter's rather: it's three months since you went to church, governor."

"And if it was three years, why should you make remarks about it?"

"Oh, if you take it in that way, governor, I assure you I didn't mean any thing. Rather crusty this morning," said Edward, sotto voce, helping himself to some dry toast. "Hollo! what's this?" he cried, seeing a letter addressed to him on the mantel-piece. "Letter from somebody—must have come by late delivery last night—wonder who it is?" He takes it up, turns it over and over, breaks the seal, and reads; his face expands. "Ha, ha! that's a good joke. Here's a letter, father—a letter from a fellow in Birchin Lane, reminding me that my acceptance—eh, see the joke—my acceptance for how much do you think, governor?—why, for three hundred pounds!—has been dishonored. I should think it had, eh? Ha, ha! Now I wonder who is the real Simon Pure, the real Ned Hulse, who ought to have this agreeable little reminder? Can't you imagine him, father, the real Edward Hulse, sitting at his breakfast, chipping his egg as I do, expecting such an agreeable little note as this? He's some scapegrace, depend upon it; some fellow who's been idle and dissolute, living upon money that didn't belong to him—eh, father, can't you fancy him? And perhaps he's been driven to this by having to make up some money for his employers he'd robbed them of, eh? And there he's wondering what will come next, shaking at every step that passes, quivering at every knock he hears upon the door. Oh, father, oughtn't we to be thankful that we haven't got that man's load upon our shoulders, that we can spend our time in rest and quietness, eh, father?"

Fleetwood turned round and glared at his son: there is no other word for it.

"What is it?" he said, sinking back into his old attitude. "I didn't hear what you were saying."

"I was talking about a fellow who's had a bill come back for three hundred pounds, and I was wondering what sort of a chap he was, and thinking what a funk he must be in, trembling at every step, at every knock—"

Rap-a-tap-a-tap-tap, bang, bang! went the knocker.

Old Hulse jumped to his feet as though he had been shot.

"Ned, don't let them come! Save me, Ned, save me!"

"What's the matter now? why, you're regularly upset, father!"

Here the curate entered, breathless.

"Where's Lucy?" he cried.

"Lucy's gone five minutes since, and the little bell is ringing as hard as it can. Look sharp, John. Don't you wish you could have a pipe, instead?"

Still Fleetwood Hulse cowered in his chair, furtively eying the two young men from under his shaggy white eyebrows.

"Just tell me what this means," cried John, throwing a letter on to the table. "It's some joke, I suppose; but I must say a very bad one. I'll bring Lucy home, and see you again about it. The fellow ought to be prosecuted. Shall I leave the letter with you? No, I'll put it in my pocket."

John ran out again, and Edward looked at his father with distended eyes.

"Why, that was the very ditto to the letter I've just had. Father, what can it mean?"

Old Hulse sat in his chair choking, vainly snatching at his neckcloth. Edward ran to him, tore away his collar and handkerchief, threw some cold water over his face. He revived.

"Ned, it's all true!" he gasped. "I did it!"

"Did what? what do you mean?"

"Put your name to it, and John's. Oh! oh!"

Edward struck his fists against his head, and rushed out into the yard. His poor old father had gone mad. He'd no other thought than that. His father was mad. He went out on the wharf by the river-side; the tide was running sullenly down, gradually unveiling the slimy mud flats. He couldn't get a breath of air there. Where should he go? Then he chanced to glance up at the windows of the house, and saw his father's white, haggard face looking out from his bedroom: he pulled the blind down with a bang. Edward rushed into the house, and up the stairs. "Father!" he shouted, "father!" He tried the door; it was locked. He flung himself against it heavily; the bolt gave way, and he found himself in his father's room. The old man stood by the window, holding his razor-case in his trembling hands.

"What's the meaning of this, Edward? Come, Sir, this is an outrage!"

"Come down, father; come down stairs. I want to talk to you. Here, you can't manage to strop those razors; give 'em to me; you know how nicely I can set them for you."

"So you can, Ned, so you can; you ought to have been a barber; you're thrown away in a gentlemanly profession. You never think what money you cost, Ned—money, ay, money, lots of money—to make you a gentleman; and you'd better have been a barber."

It was a very old grievance between Fleetwood and his son that the latter did not assume that bearing and attitude which was his ideal of the gentleman; that he was too humble-minded, too fond of mixing with humble people; that he forgot who the Hulses were, and brought about him a set of people whom it was degrading to associate with, begad. And now in his trouble the old man fell back on the familiar accusation.

All this while Edward's only trouble was about his father's state of mind; he thought that he was mad. He put the razors in his pocket, took the old man by the arm, and led him down to the sitting-room, all the time trying to soothe and humor him.

"And so you've been getting bills discounted, eh, father? and spent the money, eh? Ha, ha! that's good."

Fleetwood eyed his son sternly and savagely. "You fool," he said, "grinning there like a hyena: it's nothing to you, then, that your father is a disgraced and ruined man? And to think of the family, too! O Lord, it's too much!" He put his head upon his arms and groaned.

Then for the first time a knowledge of the truth flashed upon Edward. His father was not mad; he was only a criminal—only a forger. He got up and went toward the door. Then he caught the old man's eyes following him wistfully. He turned back and knelt down before him, and put his arms round his neck and kissed his grizzled face.

"Father, how could you do it? how could you?"

The old man's frame shook and quivered, and for a long time he tried in vain to speak.

"I was driven to it, Ned, driven to it. I owed them money—the Company. It would have been discovered. I should have lost my place. I should have taken it up on Monday. It was only due yesterday. I thought I should be in time."

"How would you have taken it up, father?"

If, indeed, the money were actually forth-coming, it might be possible the matter would go no farther.

"I should have borrowed it, Ned."

"From the Company?"

Fleetwood nodded.

"Have you taken—do you owe them any more?"

"A couple of hundred pounds, perhaps."

"And private debts?"

"No, not a penny. I never would run in debt, you know, Ned. I've always paid on the nail all my life. It was that ruined me, Ned; that principle I had. And I couldn't see your mother going without her little comforts, and you have cost me such a lot, Ned. I hoped to have made a gentleman of you, but I am lost altogether now. I shall end my days in a hulk. Well, it doesn't much matter."

Edward knelt by the table, his forehead pressed between his two hands, his reason quite overthrown.

"John will be coming in directly," he said at last. "What shall we say to him?"

"We will tell him it is a mistake; that this letter is intended for John Jones, a customer of the Company's."

Edward shook his head. "No use; it's sure to come out. Are there—are there any other names to this bill?"

"Only the Company's indorsement, and that I have a right to sign."

"Then you only wrote my name and John's?"

"Only those."

Come, after all, the matter was not hopeless. If only John could be induced to be silent as to the forgery, then he, Edward, might be able to raise the money in a few days. He would have to pay heavily for it, but that he couldn't help. He would insist on his father's retiring. The Company would give him a pension, and with the balance of his salary left after paying off the installments of the enormous incubus of debt his father's rescue would involve, they would be enabled to live together in some cheap house in some cheap neighborhood. There would be no marriage for him, no Patty—to that he must make up his mind at once; but absolute degradation and misery would be saved. If only John would consent!

But would John be thus tractable? and would he hold to his word with Lucy, or would he break that sweet sister's heart? They couldn't expect him to hold to his troth, but it would be very hard if he didn't. Then another thought flashed into his brain. There was Lucy's little portion—five hundred pounds—was that safe?

"Father, where's Lucy's money?"

Fleetwood shook his head, waved his hands, and groaned.

"What, is that gone too? Father, how could you?"

The thing seemed hopeless now; and yet, after all, he had only robbed his own children. Surely they could contrive that no punishment should fall upon him.

Edward thought for a few moments. "Is there any thing else, father," he said at last—"any thing else you have taken?"

"No, nothing."

"Then, after all, we may save you. If only John were tractable. Every thing depends upon him—every thing."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IT was a bright October afternoon when we entered the granite gateway of Mount Auburn Cemetery, which is situated, as is well known, on the Cambridge road, a few miles from Boston. We had more than once visited this consecrated ground when the spring flowers were just unfolding, and when summer foliage was green and fresh; but now it was clothed in autumn's richest hues. And as the soft sunshine fell upon myriads of leaves and blossoms—golden, scarlet, crimson, purple, and variegated in color—the scene was glorious. No sadness seemed to linger around a spot made so magnificently beautiful by nature and art. As we wandered about for a couple of hours we remembered that a month before we had strayed through the winding paths and avenues of Greenwood Cemetery with equal pleasure and interest. But in Mount Auburn, especially in the older portions, there seems to be a simplicity of style, and a variety in the laying out and ornamenting of lots, which are more especially noticeable than in Greenwood—features which are doubtless due, in part, to the natural conformation of the ground. "Consecration Dell" is a deep picturesque valley, while on one side rises an eminence one hundred and twenty-five feet above the level of the Charles River, and upon which a tower sixty feet high has been erected. From this tower can be obtained one of the finest prospects in the environs of Boston. In Mount Auburn Cemetery rest the remains of many distinguished persons. One of the earliest monuments was erected to the memory of Gaspar Spurzheim, the celebrated phrenologist; the bronze statue of Dr. Nathaniel Bowditch, a noted man of science, is conspicuous; and a tall marble column marks the inclosure where lie the remains of Abbott and Amos Lawrence. A beautiful granite obelisk is reared to the memory of Benjamin Franklin. The "Ossoli Memorial" bears a lengthy inscription, giving the strange history of "Margaret Fuller Ossoli. Born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, May 23, 1810. By birth a child of New England—by adoption, a citizen of Rome—by genius, belonging to the world....And of her husband, Giovanni Angelo, Marquis Ossoli. He gave up rank, station, and home for the Roman Republic, and for his wife and child. And of the child, Angelo Eugene Philip Ossoli, born in Rieti, Italy, September 5, 1848....They passed from this life together by shipwreck, July 19, 1850."....A beautiful marble temple marks the resting-place of Hon. Samuel Appleton; a plain sarcophagus bears the name of "Rufus Choate;" and near the tower are deposited the remains of Edward Everett. The poet N. P. Willis is buried in Mount Auburn; so also Jonas Chickering, the celebrated pianoforte maker; Jared Sparks, of literary fame; Josiah Quincy; and the eminent jurist, Joseph Story. A fine granite monument is to the "memory of Dr. J. E. Worcester, the eminent lexicographer." But time and space would fail to mention other well-known names. Nor have we alluded to many monuments conspicuous for beauty or elaborate workmanship. We will only add that in the chapel of the cemetery are fine marble statues of Joseph Story, John Winthrop, John Adams, and James Otis.

The first frost of the season at Memphis, Tennessee, is said by a local paper to have been hailed by the fever-stricken inhabitants with enthusiastic joy. Before sunrise hastily dressed men, women, and children rushed out-of-doors to breathe the precious air of the purifying frost, and to touch, with thankful hands, the cold messenger of health. Every where in the city doors and windows were opened, and houses and garments exposed to the disinfecting agency of the cold, pure air.

The autumn equinox scarce returns with more unvarying regularity than does the fair of the American Institute, which is now in progress for the forty-second time. It is held this year at the former skating rink on Third Avenue, between Sixty-third and Sixty-fourth streets, which has been purchased for the purpose by the Institute, in order to secure a permanent place for its annual exhibitions, which, by their display of useful industrial inventions and improvements, are of public interest to the country at large. The present exhibition presents numerous interesting features; among others, mammoth automatic looms that weave and shape corsets and under-garments in a truly astonishing manner; sewing-machines that stitch every thing, from muslin ruffles to gloves and boots, with the same exquisite finish, varying the thread from number 300 cotton to a waxed-end; ice-crushing and stone-crushing machines, which grind the hardest substance to powder; improved printing-presses; labor-saving household devices; American silks, parasols and umbrellas; jewelry, silver-ware; mammoth fruit and vegetables—in a word, a bewildering confusion of the richest and rarest in a thousand different departments. Exhibitions of this kind serve admirably to stimulate industry, and to make the public acquainted with the progress of the arts. The American Institute is now in its forty-sixth year, having been founded in 1828 by a few wealthy gentlemen of culture for the purpose of promoting improvements in the mechanic arts, and encouraging American industry. The first fair was held the same year at Masonic Temple, Broadway. It lasted three days, and was very successful. For many years afterward the exhibitions were held in Castle Garden. The offices of the Institute are in Cooper Union. We learn that it is the intention, when a suitable site can be obtained, in the Central Park or elsewhere, to erect an Industrial Palace, at a cost of $2,000,000, for the use of the Institute, that shall surpass any similar edifice in existence.

Many persons are seriously poisoned at this season of the year while gathering autumn leaves. There are, however, only a few plants in our woods which are dangerous to handle, though it should be remembered that some few individuals are peculiarly susceptible to poisonous influences, and are injured by plants that are not generally harmful. What is sometimes known as the "American ivy" should be avoided. It has three leaflets to a stem, and is early tinted with the most brilliant hues. The poisonous dogwood also is dangerous to handle. Its pinnate foliage is somewhat like the sumacs, but more shining, and assumes an intense scarlet.

In England unfaithful cashiers receive punishment. An employé of the New British Iron Company who "misappropriated" $7500 has been sentenced to five years' penal servitude.

Patient labor accomplishes vastly more important results than genius.

"What is your secret?" asked a lady of Turner, the painter.

He answered, "I have no secret, madam, but hard work."

Says Dr. Arnold, "The difference between one man and another is not so much in talent as in energy."

"Nothing," says Reynolds, "is denied well-directed labor, and nothing is to be obtained without it."

"Excellence in any department," says Johnson, "can now be attained by the labor of a lifetime, but is not to be purchased at a lesser price."

"There is but one method," says Sydney Smith, "and that is, hard labor."

A young man in Texas recently bought a fine orchard of two hundred apple-trees, and tapped every one of them in order to secure a supply of cider!

Some years ago, just as the Cunard steamer Scotia was leaving Liverpool, a fussy little gentleman rushed up to Commodore Judkins, who was then in command of the vessel, and asked him if he thought the Scotia would arrive in New York upon a certain day in time for him to catch the noon train for Philadelphia. The captain looked at him a moment in silence, and then, taking out his watch, replied, "I fear, Sir, we will be five minutes too late!"

At a recent meeting of the school committee of Chelsea, Massachusetts, it was suggested that there be in schools a delay of twenty-four hours before a teacher inflicted punishment for any offense—until passion had cooled. After much debate, however, it was decided to pass and issue an order to the teachers not to inflict punishment upon their pupils till they shall have consulted with the sub-committee of their respective schools.

Chicago has set a good example in establishing at one of her railway stations a free reading-room. The room is large and pleasant, and ornamented with pictures and flowers. It contains plenty of magazines and newspapers, and is supported by voluntary contributions. In one month over seven hundred waiting travelers found rest and pleasant occupation in this reading-room.

Who shall have the gold? Near Bavais, France, workmen have dug up vases containing gold pieces of the times of the Roman emperors. It is reported that more than ten millions of coins are concealed in that vicinity, and nearly a million have already been brought to light. The proprietor of the land claims the treasure, so does the state, and so do the workmen.

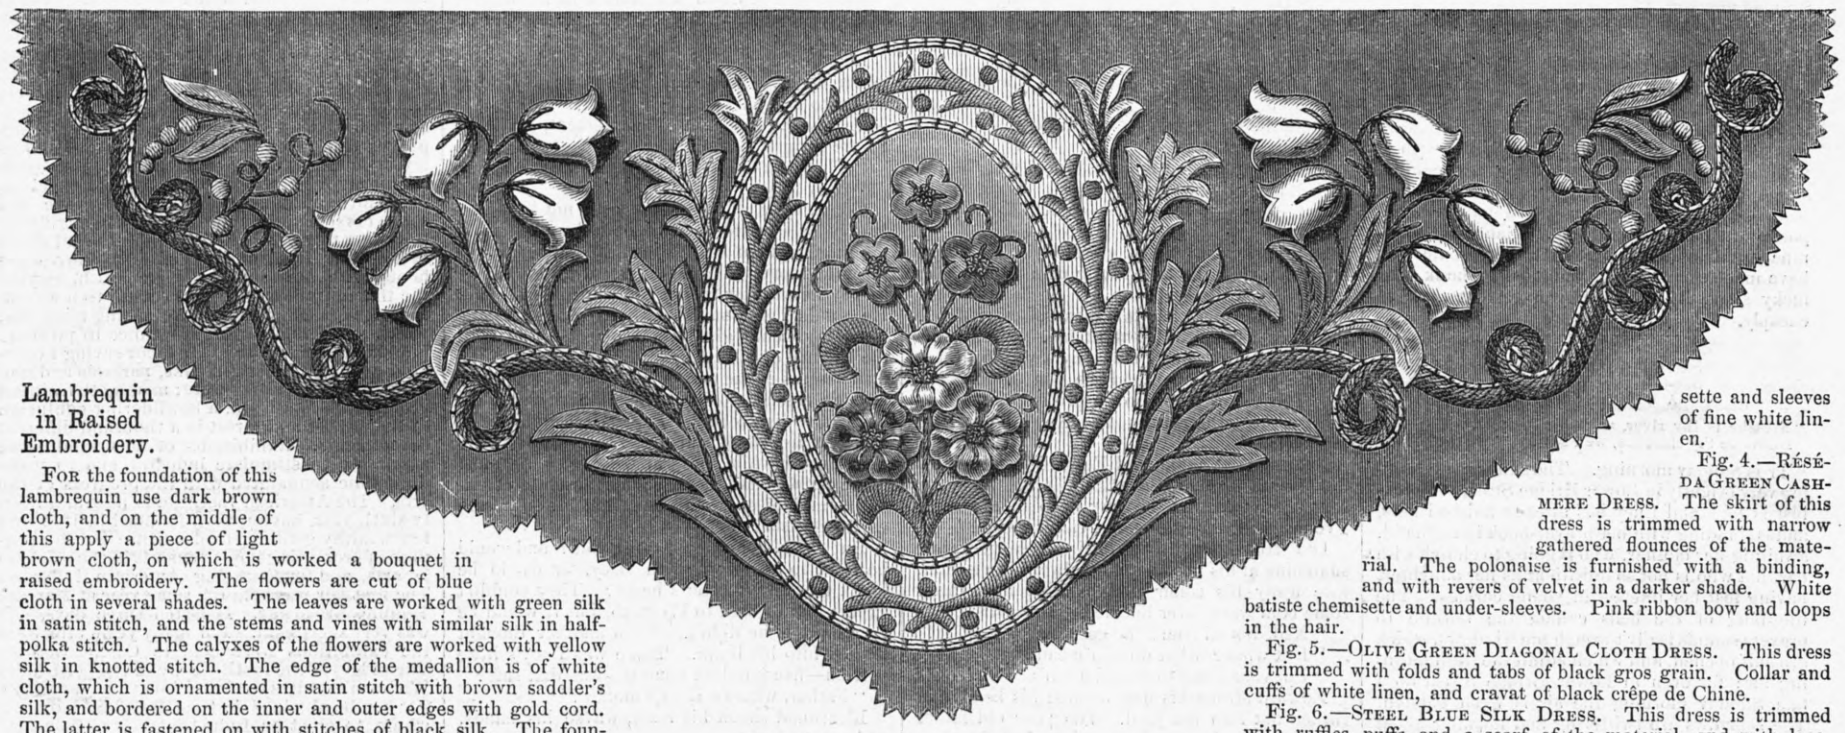
The old farmer who was dictating his will took an unusual view of things. He said, "I give and bequeath to my wife the sum of £100 a year. Is that writ down?"

"Yes," said the lawyer; "but she is not so old but that she may marry again. Won't you make any change in that case? Most people do."

"Ah! do they? Well, write again, and say if my wife marry again I give and bequeath to her the sum of £200 a year. That 'll do, won't it?"

"Why, that's just double the sum that she would have had if she had remained unmarried," said the lawyer: "it is generally the other way."

"Ay!" said the farmer, "but he that takes her will deserve it!"



LAMBREQUIN IN RAISED EMBROIDERY.

Lambrequin in Raised Embroidery.

FOR the foundation of this lambrequin use dark brown cloth, and on the middle of this apply a piece of light brown cloth, on which is worked a bouquet in raised embroidery. The flowers are cut of blue cloth in several shades. The leaves are worked with green silk in satin stitch, and the stems and vines with similar silk in half-polka stitch. The calyxes of the flowers are worked with yellow silk in knotted stitch. The edge of the medallion is of white cloth, which is ornamented in satin stitch with brown saddler's silk, and bordered on the inner and outer edges with gold cord. The latter is fastened on with stitches of black silk. The foundation of the lambrequin is ornamented, as shown by the illustration, with flowers of white cloth and with leaves of green cloth in several shades. The berries are worked in satin stitch with red silk, and the veins, stems, and vines are worked with green silk. Besides this stitch brown silk cord in two shades and gold cord on the lambrequin with black and brown silk as shown by the illustration. The colors can be varied of course to match the furniture of the room.

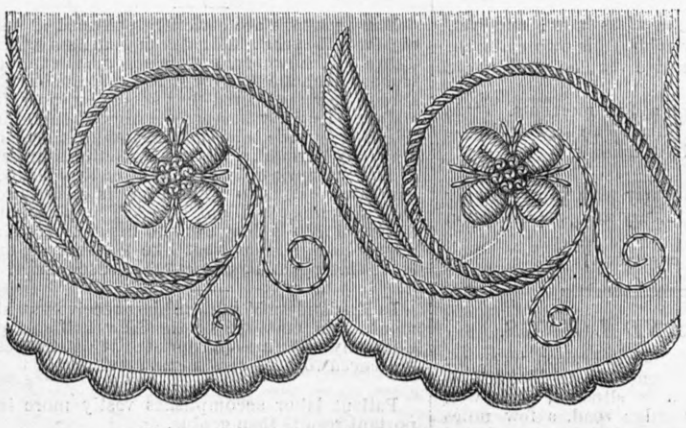


Fig. 1.—BORDER IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

Borders in White Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE borders are suitable for trimming children's dresses, linen, lingerie, etc. They are worked, according to the purpose for which they are designed, on linen, batiste, nansook, or Swiss muslin, with white cotton in satin and half-polka stitch. In working the border shown by Fig. 1, fasten on a piece of guipure cord with long stitches. The scallops on the outer edge are button-hole stitched, as shown by the illustration.

Ladies' Fall and Winter Dresses, Figs. 1-6.

Fig. 1.—GRAY CAMEL'S-HAIR DRESS WITH BLACK GROS GRAIN BASQUE. The skirt of this dress of gray camel's-hair is arranged in kilt pleats in front, and trimmed in the back with gathered ruffles of the material. Basque with vests of black gros grain, trimmed with ruches of the same. White Swiss muslin fraise and under-sleeves.

Fig. 2.—LEAF BROWN POPLIN DRESS. This dress is trimmed with rolls of darker gros grain and with silk fringe. White lace fraise and cuffs of fine linen.

Fig. 3.—GRAY AND VIOLET STRIPED SERGE DRESS. This dress is trimmed with folds and bows of violet velvet. Chemisette and sleeves of fine white linen.

Fig. 4.—RÉSÉDA GREEN CASHMERE DRESS. The skirt of this dress is trimmed with narrow gathered flounces of the material. The polonaise is furnished with a binding, and with revers of velvet in a darker shade. White batiste chemisette and under-sleeves. Pink ribbon bow and loops in the hair.

Fig. 5.—OLIVE GREEN DIAGONAL CLOTH DRESS. This dress is trimmed with folds and tabs of black gros grain. Collar and cuffs of white linen, and cravat of black crêpe de Chine.

Fig. 6.—STEEL BLUE SILK DRESS. This dress is trimmed with ruffles, puffs, and a scarf of the material, and with lace. White lace fraise.

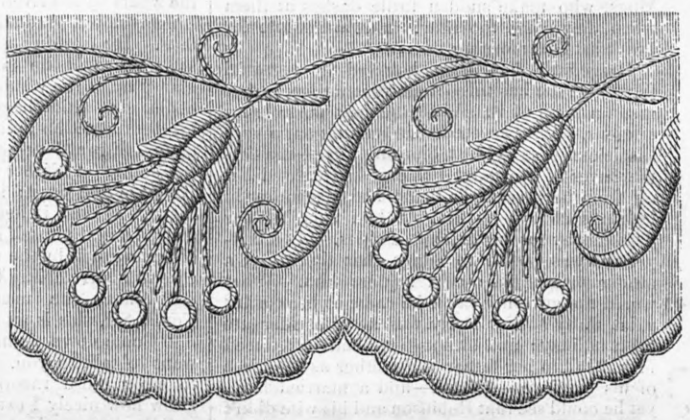

Fig. 2.—BORDER IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

CHIROGNOMONY.

CHIROGNOMONY helps us to judge of character by the form of the hand and the shape of the fingers. A French professor of this science divides hands into three sorts: the first sort have fingers with pointed tops; the second, square tops; the third, spade-shaped tops. (By "spade-shaped" is meant fingers

Fig. 1.—GRAY CAMEL'S-HAIR DRESS WITH BLACK GROS GRAIN BASQUE.

Fig. 2.—LEAF BROWN POPLIN DRESS.

Fig. 3.—GRAY AND VIOLET STRIPED SERGE DRESS.

Fig. 4.—RÉSÉDA GREEN CASHMERE DRESS.

Fig. 5.—OLIVE GREEN DIAGONAL CLOTH DRESS.

Fig. 6.—STEEL BLUE SILK DRESS.

FIGS. 1-6.—LADIES' FALL AND WINTER DRESSES.

Hosted by Google

that are thick at the end, having a little pad of flesh at each side of the nail.) The first type of finger belongs to characters possessed of rapid insight into things; to extra-sensitive people; to pious people, whose piety is of the contemplative kind; to the impulsive; and to all poets and artists in whom ideality is a prominent trait. The second type belongs to scientific people; to sensible, self-contained characters; to most of our professional men, who steer between the wholly practical course that they of the spade-shaped fingers take, and the too-visionary bent of the people with pointed fingers. The third type pertains to those whose instincts are material; to people who have a genius for commerce, and a high appreciation of every thing that tends to bodily ease and comfort; also to people of great activity. Each finger, no matter what the kind of hand, has one joint representing each of these types. Thus, the division of the finger which is nearest the palm stands for the body (and corresponds with the spade-shaped type), the middle division represents mind (the square-topped), the top, soul (the pointed). If the top joint of the finger be long, it denotes a character with much imagination, or ideality, and a leaning toward the theoretical rather than the practical. The middle part of the finger being large promises a logical, calculating mind—a common-sensed person. The remaining joint long and thick denotes a nature that clings more to the luxuries than to the refinements of life. Things will present themselves to such a nature under a lower aspect, and utility will be accounted before beauty.

"THE OLD SHEPHERD'S CHIEF MOURNER."

WE give herewith an engraving of the masterpiece of the distinguished artist, Sir Edwin Landseer, who recently died in England at the age of seventy-one. And, in view of his death, the reproduction of this picture has a singular appropriateness. If animals could put on mourning, surely all the dogs and horses in the land would clothe themselves in sackcloth and ashes on the loss of the faithful limner who knew so well how to read their hearts, and to depict the subtle emotions that are hid from vulgar eyes. The original of the fine picture, "The old Shepherd's Chief Mourner," is in the Sheepshanks collection at South Kensington. The best description of it is to be found in the eloquent words of Ruskin, with whom it is a prime favorite, and who says of it:

"Take, for instance, one of the most perfect poems or pictures (I use the words as synonymous) which modern times have seen—'The old Shepherd's Chief Mourner.' Here the exquisite execution of the glossy and crisp hair of the dog, the bright sharp touching of the green bough beside it, the clear painting of the wood of the coffin and the folds of the blanket, are language—language clear and expressive in the highest degree. But the close pressure of the dog's breast against the wood; the convulsive clinging of the paws, which has dragged the blanket off the trestle; the total powerlessness of the head, laid close and motionless upon its folds; the fixed and tearful fall of the eye in its utter hopelessness; the rigidity of repose, which marks that there has been no motion nor change in the trance of agony since the last blow was struck on the coffin-lid; the quietness and gloom of the chamber; the spectacles marking the place where the Bible was last closed, indicating how lonely has been the life, how unwatched the departure, of him who is now laid solitary in his sleep—these are all thoughts, thoughts by which the picture is separated at once from hundreds of equal merit as far as mere painting goes, by which it ranks as a work of high art, and stamps its author not as the neat imitator of the texture of a skin or the fold of a drapery, but as the man of mind."

"THE OLD SHEPHERD'S CHIEF MOURNER."

"GOOD-MORNING."

See Illustration on page 717.

UNDER all circumstances pigeons are very pretty, attractive creatures. The species comprises a greater variety of form and plumage than that of any other domestic bird. When, for example, we see the Jacobin, with the vulture-like ruff of feathers round its neck; the Nun, with her black head and white body; the Owl, with its short beak and round head; the Trumpeter, with its feathery legs; the Fan-tail, with its spreading tail; or the Pouter, with its head almost hidden in its puffed-out crop, it is difficult to believe that all these birds belong to the pigeon tribe. Again, the pigeon, as far as we are aware, is the only domestic bird which willingly attaches itself to the haunts of man without losing the qualities natural to its wild state. Ages of civilization have rendered the common fowl such a weighty creature in proportion to its wing-power that it can hardly make shift to flutter over a low wall. Not so the pigeon. They fully retain that valuable gift which enables them to get nearer to heaven (the material heaven, at all events) than their featherless biped masters. Watch a party of Tumblers, and observe how, led by their captain, they soar to an immense height in closely serried flight. Yet, in spite of this power, they are the most home-loving of creatures, and after careering all day under the measureless blue vault of sky, they come home to a poky little chamber in the cote (which is perhaps constructed out of a dilapidated beer-barrel) as cheerfully and contentedly as if they were steady city clerks going home to tea. But never does the pigeon look prettier than when he perches familiarly on the shoulders of beauty, and condescends to place his little beak between her rosy lips. The lady, too, shows to great advantage when surrounded by these feathered pets. The glance of her eye is softer, her smile sweeter, her attitude more graceful. So perhaps thinks some human admirer who watches her unseen, and, half jealous of her pets, wishes that he were a Blue Rock, on the same principle that love-smitten Romeo wished himself a glove on Juliet's hand.

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

LEAMINGTON, Warwickshire, is such a favorite resort of Americans in England that it will interest some who have heard of it from so many of their countrymen, and never seen it, to know a few particulars concerning the aspect of the town. It is an extremely pleasant spot to winter in, and from its beauty and convenience in every way fully justifies the preference you extend to it. The Americans have indeed had a great deal to do with the rapid growth of the town of late years, and its rising importance. Some forty years ago Leamington was merely a village; it is now a fashionable watering-place, and a large and wealthy market-town. Its position is extremely picturesque: it lies on both sides, but mainly on the north bank, of the Leam—whence its name—and occupies the bottom and slopes of a richly wooded valley. The mineral waters of Leamington first brought it into note, and for many years formed the only attraction of the place; they have, however, been long since completely superseded by more distant and inaccessible springs, and scarcely count for any thing in the present day with the numerous visitors who frequent the pretty town. Still it will be of interest perhaps to a few to learn that the springs are as abundant and as hygienic as when fickle Fashion smiled on them and sent her votaries to drink of their healing waters. The old well immortalized by Camden is still to be seen, with a neat pump over it, in perfect working order. New springs were discovered since this one first drew the grateful crowds around that historical pump in 1784. Various establishments were formed in the neighborhood of each as it sprang into notice and claimed the patronage of the medical magnates of its day. The Royal Spa is the principal of all the baths that at present exist in the town; it is admirably organized, with hot and cold, shower and vapor baths, and large pump-rooms. The town itself offers every accommodation in the way of fine dwelling-houses, handsome shops, hotels, and public buildings. It possesses a fine public library, with reading-rooms and an assembly-room overhead; a second assembly-room offers a convenient resource for those who love dancing, and who wish to give balls without the fatigue and annoyance of turning their own house out of the windows. There is a large and well-kept botanical garden, and a beautiful promenade called the Ranelagh Gardens; a museum, a picture-gallery, and a theatre; churches for every form of Christian worship, and a national school. Those who seek educational resources for their family will find them in abundance at Leamington, and at less expense than in London, whose proximity to the town is one of its many advantages. The distance is a good couple of hours by rail. Leamington used to be a favorite resort for persons who wanted to economize; but alas! thanks to you, this most desirable inducement can scarcely be said to exist there now. The Hotels are about as dear as any where else, and the houses very little less than Brighton or Torquay, from ten to sixteen guineas a week being now, on an average, the price of a good house in a fine situation. The vicinity of Rugby, one of the finest of English public schools, fixes many families at Leamington. Rugby was founded in 1567, and may be said to have created the town from which the school derives its name. It is situated at a distance of twelve or fourteen miles from Leamington, and is therefore very convenient for parents who wish to see their sons at school there. Within an easy distance from the town there are other places of note, and delightful spots for picnic excursions in the summer. Stratford-on-Avon, the birth-place of William Shakspeare, is not many miles from the town of Warwick, and the stream of pilgrims from all parts of England is incessantly ebbing to and fro along the banks of the sluggish little river above which rises the church where the great poet of mankind lies in his sequestered grave. The house in Henley Street where he was born has been purchased by national subscription, and is to be seen by visitors; the one where he spent his last years, and where he died, was pulled down by some improving Vandal of a landlord in 1759. Warwick Castle, which was one of the finest, if not, indeed, the very grandest specimen of the old feudal castles of England, was in a great portion destroyed by fire, you remember, about a year ago. The Earl of Warwick was so gracious in allowing strangers to visit his princely dwelling, and inspect its treasures of art, paintings, sculpture, armory—every thing that taste and wealth had accumulated within its walls for centuries—that the catastrophe was felt to be a public calamity by the townspeople, and indeed by the entire county, for the prospect of admission to see the marvels of Warwick Castle drew thousands of visitors yearly to all the surrounding districts; they determined, therefore, to rebuild it for its noble owner, whose fortune, large as it is, would have been unequal to so immense an undertaking. The work of restoration is rapidly progressing, and before long the majestic pile will be once more the glory of Warwickshire, and the delight of intelligent sight-seers and lovers of the beautiful. Let those Americans who winter at Leamington not neglect to see it. Close by they will find an old almshouse that will interest them in a different way. It was founded by the Earl of Leicester, Queen Elizabeth's favorite, and is called the Leicester Hospital. The endowment was so munificent that the master draws from it a salary of £400 a year, and the twenty "brethren," poor men who have known better days, receive £80 a year from the same fund. Leamington has the strong attraction for invalids of a mild climate in winter; it is sheltered, and, lying in a valley, escapes the biting winds of the higher towns, such as Nuneaton, which is nine miles north of the famous ribbon town, Coventry, and which, but for its cheapness as being out of the way of all nice things except ribbons, offers no advantage whatever to strangers. The expenses of living have increased within the last few years at Leamington in about the same proportion as the houses. Americans may yet stem the torrent in a great measure by holding out against the high prices they have inaugurated. Let them leave their extravagant habits behind them for a while, and adopt the more homely ones of the people around them. This advice applies specially to their dress, the magnificence of which very naturally persuades the English trades-people that they have money to throw away, and that it is only kind to help them to get rid of it.

COMET.

GEORGE ELIOT'S SAYINGS.

FROM THE "MILL ON THE FLOSS."

THE small old-fashioned book (Thomas à Kempis), for which you need only pay sixpence at a book-stall, works miracles to this day, turning bitter waters into sweetness: while expensive sermons and treatises, newly issued, leave all things as they were before. It was written down by a hand that waited for the heart's prompting; it is the chronicle of a solitary, hidden anguish, struggle, trust, and triumph—not written on velvet cushions to teach endurance to those who are treading with bleeding feet on the stones. And so it remains to all time a lasting record of human needs and human consolations: the voice of a brother who, ages ago, felt and suffered and renounced—in the cloister, perhaps, with serge gown and tonsured head, with much chanting and long fasts, and with a fashion of speech different from ours—but under the same silent far-off heavens, and with the same passionate desires, the same strivings, the same failures, the same weariness.

Until every good man is brave, we must expect to find many good women timid—too timid even to believe in the correctness of their own best promptings, when these would place them in a minority.

Ugly and deformed people have great need of unusual virtues, because they are likely to be extremely uncomfortable without them; but the theory that unusual virtues spring by a direct consequence out of personal disadvantages, as animals get thicker wool in severe climates, is perhaps a little overstrained. The temptations of beauty are much dwelt upon, but I fancy they only bear the same relation to those of ugliness as the temptation to excess at a feast where the delights are varied for eye and ear as well as palate bears to the temptations that assail the desperation of hunger. Does not the Hunger Tower stand as the type of the utmost trial to what is human in us?

Feeble limbs easily resign themselves to be tethered, and when we are subdued by sickness, it seems possible to us to fulfill pledges which the old vigor comes back and breaks.

The last act of baseness—the tasting of joys that were wrung from crushed hearts.

It is always chilling in friendly intercourse to say you have no opinion to give. And if you deliver an opinion at all, it is mere stupidity not to do it with an air of conviction and well-founded knowledge. You make it your own in uttering it, and naturally get fond of it.

I think I should have no other mortal wants if I could always have plenty of music. It seems to infuse strength into my limbs and ideas into my brain. Life seems to go on without effort when I am filled with music. At other times one is conscious of carrying a weight.

If we use common words on a great occasion, they are the more striking, because they are felt at once to have a particular meaning, like old banners or every-day clothes hung up in a sacred place.

I've never any pity for conceited people, because I think they carry their comfort about with them.

It always seemed to me a sort of clever stupidity only to have one sort of talent—almost like a carrier-pigeon.

Our life is determined for us; and it makes the mind very free when we give up wishing, and only think of bearing what is laid upon us, and doing what is given us to do.

The worst of all hobbies are those that people think they can get money at. They shoot their money down like corn out of a sack then.

The world isn't made of pen, ink, and paper; and if you're to get on in the world, young man, you must know what the world's made of.

SECOND-COUSIN SARAH.

BY F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Little Kate Kirby," "For Her Sake," "A Bridge of Glass," "Mattie: A Stray," "No Man's Friend," etc., etc.

Book the First.

REUBEN CULWICK.

CHAPTER VII.

JOHN JENNINGS.

MRS. SARAH EASTBELL, of St. Oswald's, was correct in her judgment. Hope Street, Camberwell, was not a fashionable quarter of the great metropolis. It is sufficient to indicate that populous thoroughfare as one of the turnings debouching from the Camberwell New Road—a street without pretension, a cross between a London street and a thoroughfare a little way out of town, and familiar to clerks with no spare cash to expend on omnibus or train, as a short-cut, providing one did not lose his way, to Walworth Road.

Certainly not fashionable, although the inhabitants had music with their meals—it being a street much frequented by organ men, who ground out Verdi in long lengths all day, and were rewarded by small donations from patrons who never failed them when work was plentiful. It was a street, also, wherein there was much dancing to the organ music; and where so many limp and smeary children came from in the long summer evenings, which were made hideous by multifarious screechings, was matter for grave wonderment. It was a street of one-story private houses principally, which had broken out here and there into shops, that had been erected over front gardens by speculative landlords, and had not always been successful ventures, judging by the aspect of the tenants or the goods which were dealt in. It was a street that the tallyman and the broker's man, the civil young man behind the loan-office counter and the uncivil old man from the county court, knew better than any street in the parish, and where the rate-collectors had more trouble in getting in their accounts than in any part of their weary and pertinacious rounds. It was an unequal street, too, and full of class distinctions. There were three or four two-story houses, with wider front gardens and less rickety palings, toward Camberwell, just as there were some smaller and dirtier hovels as the street narrowed toward the busy thoroughfare of Walworth, where there were two courts sacred to hard-working but disputatious Irish families, who brought their fire-irons into the streets on holidays and Sundays, and rapped each other's heads with them when religious or political differences required force of argument. It was a street that boasted of one large red-brick house even, that in days gone by—possibly when there was only a bridle-path from Lambeth to the pleasant little hamlet of Walworth—might have stood alone there, looking over miles of fields and hedge-rows, ending with the Sydenham hills. Now it was dedicated to festivity and to Bankruptcy Court decrees at alternate periods of the year. It had a garden of an acre, which by-gone speculators had hemmed round with mouldy little arbors; it had also an orchestra, a dancing platform, and a grass-plot on which fire-works were let off on gala nights, when the admission was sixpence, half of which amount might be taken out in drink. It was a place which the magistrates had striven to keep shut, and which had an ugly habit of evading magistrates, and of opening suddenly under mysterious licenses, or without any particular license worth alluding to. It copied in a feeble and flabby way the more respectable and pretentious gardens of the Royal Surrey or the extinct Vauxhall; but it was a bad place at the core, known to characters of all degrees of badness and all degrees of foolishness, where silly servant-girls and vicious shop-men giggled and danced and promenaded, and were the most respectable of the community.

Three doors from this select place of entertainment was Hope Lodge, one of the two-storied houses already mentioned, and here at the time of our narrative resided Mr. Reuben Culwick, short-hand writer, occasional special reporter to the Penny Trumpet, and a gentleman with a small connection among a certain class of tradesmen whose books were too many for their calculating powers, and invariably became obscure in details toward Saturday.

Reuben Culwick occupied the first floor of Hope Lodge, and under the bell-handle in the right-hand door-post was a tiny brass plate with his name engraved thereon, and "First Floor" in small Roman capitals written underneath, otherwise it might have been impossible, without very ample instructions for the purposes of identification, to discover the residence of our hero: for the gentleman who rented Hope Lodge, and to whom Reuben paid the modest sum of three shillings and sixpence weekly for the hire of apartments which the lodger had furnished after his own taste, had not hidden his light under a bushel, and had extinguished Reuben's claim to locality by extensive advertising over his house front. The name of "Jennings," in large white capitals on a crimson ground, was the sky line of the edifice, and another board, with a "Jennings" of somewhat more moderate proportions, had been fastened between the windows of the first and second floors, while "Jennings, Pyrotechnic Artist," in blue and yellow, by way of variety of coloring, was inscribed over a dingy shop-front, behind which were various fire-work cases, soiled and fly-spotted and time-worn, and many of them hollow shams, despite the air of explosive business about their blue touch-paper caps. On the door also had been painted "Jennings, Fire-work-maker to the Court," and over the door was a plaster coat of arms, significant of the royal patronage which the family legend asserted had been once vouchsafed to an extinct Jennings, who had been blown to atoms one Guy Fawkes season.

The present proprietor, who jested at ill luck at times, when questioned concerning this announcement, intimated with a chuckle that the court alluded to was one of the narrow thoroughfares at the other end of the street, which was liberal with its patronage when November nights came round.

Mr. Jennings was always waiting for November, although he drove a little business in colored fires for minor theatres at all times of the year, and had twice been pyrotechnist to the "Royal Saxe-Gotha Gardens," next door but two, where he had twice been nearly ruined by the defalcations of impecunious lessees, whom he had trusted with all his heart and all his powder.

On that May night of Reuben Culwick's return to London he was standing at his door smoking a long clay pipe, and waiting patiently for November, after his general rule. Trade was slack, and he had finished work and taken to fresh air, which he preferred receiving in his shirt sleeves when the weather was not too inclement for its reception. It was past eleven o'clock, and a dark, dull night for Mr. Jennings's vigils; but he clung pertinaciously to his door-post, like a man who thought November would slip by him in the dark if he did not keep his eyes open. But on that particular evening he was not waiting for November so intently as for his lodger, Reuben Culwick, who had said that he should be back that evening, and who was a man on whose word every body might rely. Being a man to be trusted, Mr. Jennings, fire-work-maker, sat up for his lodger, for the earliest glimpse of the "first-floor," whom he had missed exceedingly during the last fortnight. There were some ties of sympathy between landlord and tenant which accounted for this, and which will be more apparent presently, and hence Mr. Jennings held in high esteem Mr. Reuben Culwick, and the good feeling was reciprocated, despite Mr. Jennings possessing many faults, and being to all outward seeming scarcely a man to take to readily.

Standing on the threshold of his domicile, with the flickering light of the street lamp on his face and figure, he seemed a lank and weedy man enough, a man whom much tobacco had enervated, perhaps, and kept from standing straight at that hour, for he leaned at an extraordinary angle against the door-post, as though he had a hinge in him, which had given way and disturbed his grace of outline. Still it was repose and ease to Mr. Jennings, and he smoked placidly. He was very pale, one could see by the gas-light, a thin and much-lined, odd-looking young man of thirty, with dusty flaxen hair that wanted cutting, hanging straight as candles on his head. The gentleman's name in full was John Jennings, but the sportive custom of Hope Street had bestowed upon him the title of "Three-fingered Jack," for the irrelevant reason that he had blown away a thumb from his left hand, after the family fate, which had never left a Jennings sound and whole who had once taken to the sale of fire-works in Hope Street. The Jenningses, from the time of the grandfather of royal patronage, had always striven to supply the general public with a good article for its money, and sometimes they overdid it in strength and quality. Hope Lodge, in three generations, had been thrice blown up and twice burned down; hence Reuben Culwick got his apartments at a reasonable price, people of nervous temperaments objecting to lodge at Jennings's, over the surplus stock, after having once ascertained that bits of the family had been picked up as far as Camberwell Green and Walworth Gate occasionally.

Suddenly John Jennings, Fire-work-maker to the Court, was joined in his watch by a woman as thin as he was, and as pale, or else the gas opposite was bad for the complexion. She put her hands suddenly, and possibly heavily, on his shoulder, for Mr. Jennings winced and doubled up still more under the pressure.

"I wish you wouldn't, Lucy," Mr. Jennings said, remonstratively.

"Wish I would not what, John?" asked the new-comer on the scene.

"Take a person off his guard like that, and scare him."

"Have you grown a more nervous creature still, watching for what will never come again?" said the woman, with a strange asperity of tone.

"What will never come again?" repeated her brother, in dismay. "Do you mean that Mr. Culwick will not come back, then?"

"Yes."

"Bless my soul, how long have you been thinking of that?" said Mr. Jennings. "You didn't say so before—you hadn't such a thought an hour ago. What makes you get so foolish an idea into your head now?"

He laughed in an odd, hysterical fashion, like a woman, as his greater interest took him out of his languid position, and set him upright and staring at his sister.

"Well, I've been thinking it over—what he is, and what we are—and I'm sure that he will be glad to be rid of us altogether. He has only stopped here out of compliment all this while; but you can't see that so well as I can," she added, fretfully.

"I haven't tried to see it."

"You shut your eyes and trust to chance, John—you always did."

"I'll trust to Reuben Culwick," he said, leaning against the door-post again, and puffing slowly at his pipe. "He said that if he didn't write he would be back here on the second Tuesday in May, and back he'll come like clock-work, although, mind you—"

"Go on, John. What am I to mind?" asked his sister, gravely, as he paused.

"Although, mind you," he continued, "his coming back don't mean exactly that good luck to him which stopping away would, and I wish him good luck—always—anyhow. But then we should have heard from him. Isn't he as truthful as you are?"

"He may have missed a post," she answered, evasively—"have postponed telling us humble folk of the good fortune that has come to him. Good news will keep, you know."

"For a young woman who goes more regularly to chapel than any one of my acquaintances, you are uncommonly uncharitable, Lucy," said Mr. Jennings, meekly, and without any intention of satirizing the last speaker.

"It is not want of charity to speak the truth that is in one's mind," said his sister, in self-defense.

"I am not quite sure of that," replied John Jennings. "There are some truths that jar a little. When you told me yesterday that I was a poor muddler, it hurt my feelings, though I didn't show it."

"And though you will muddle on to the end of your life, poor John," she said, more kindly, even tenderly.

"Very likely. What am I to do?"

"Rouse yourself—read your Bible—pray," said the strange young woman, with an extraordinary energy asserting itself, which seemed to dismay her brother, who edged closer to the door-post, and looked away from her to another notice board erected in his front garden, where "Go to Jennings for your Fire-works" was legibly inscribed.

There was a long pause after this, broken at last by Mr. Jennings saying,

"You don't want him back, then, Lucy?"

"Not if he will be happier away."

"Prosperous, you mean?"

"Yes," was the reply.

"You would like him to forget us?"

"If it would do him any good, or if he wishes it."

"Ah, yes! Well, if he has gone, you've worried our best friend away, for you always would interfere and preach to him."

"He isn't our best friend."

"Yes, I know what you're going to say," said her brother, feebly, "of course; but I'm not speaking of that. And Reuben—by George, here he is! Hurrah!"

And Mr. Jennings, forgetting his apathy, ran down his front garden, and went, bare-headed and in his shirt sleeves, at full speed down Hope Street, leaving his sister in charge of the premises.

"That's like him," she said, in a pitying tone of voice. She took her place against the door-post, leaning there as wearily and listlessly as John Jennings had done, and looking in the direction in which he had vanished. She was short-sighted, and could not see the meeting between the two men; but when she was sure that they were coming on together—when a hearty laugh from Reuben Culwick, and a little spasmodic and thin echo of it from her narrow-chested brother, disturbed the stillness of the street—she quietly and undemonstratively backed from her post of observation into the dark passage behind her, and delayed her greeting with the man who she had prophesied would not return to Hope Lodge.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE WELCOME BACK.

THE meeting between Reuben Culwick and John Jennings was indicative of a considerable amount of good feeling, even of friendship, between two men whose characters, habits, and pursuits were wholly dissimilar. They had been absent a fortnight from each other, but John Jennings seized both hands of our hero, and shook them very heartily.

"I thought you would come back, Mr. Reuben," he said, with a certain amount of deference in his address, despite his friendliness of greeting—"I really did."

"Did I not say that I should be here to-night unless I wrote to the contrary?" asked Reuben.

"Yes; but so many things happen, and—"

"And Lucy said that I should not come back," said Reuben, shrewdly.

"Yes," confessed John Jennings.

"Ah! she knew better in her heart," said our hero, "only she does not look at life so cheerfully as she might do; but then she's not strong."

"No, she is not strong," said John Jennings, accepting the excuse which his lodger had put forward to account for his sister's distrust.

"Has she been well since I have been away?"

"Pretty well," responded John—"for her."

"And Tots—how's Tots?"

"Oh, she has been fretting after you in fine style."

"I have brought her a doll as big as you are."

And then the two men laughed, and it was the echo of this laugh which had scared Lucy Jennings into the back parlor, a poorly furnished, neatly kept apartment, where she waited patiently for their arrival, with her thin hands crossed upon her lap.

By the light of the candle on the table it was not difficult to perceive that Lucy Jennings had been a pretty woman once, before pain and anxiety and time—what three destroyers they are!—had taken the prettiness of youth out of her. She was not as old as her brother by two years, but she looked nearer eight-and-forty than eight-and-twenty at first glance. Only a careful study of her suggested to an observer that she was younger than her looks by almost a score of years.

Reuben Culwick and John Jennings came into the parlor together, and the latter, with a croak of triumph, exclaimed, "There, Lucy, who is right now?" as the former advanced to shake hands with her.

Lucy looked up into the face of the big-chested, healthful man, and smiled faintly in response to the cheery expression which she saw there.

"You have kept your word, then, Mr. Reuben," she said, placing her hand in his; and a very cold hand, with not much life-blood in it, it was that lay in his brown palm.

"But you didn't think that I should," he cried.

"No," was the fearless reply, as the thin lips closed together.

"Now what does she deserve, to face a man and a brother, and a first-floor lodger of long and honorable standing, with this odious greeting?" he said, turning to John Jennings.

"A good scolding, certainly," answered John to this appeal.

He had set aside his pipe, and was fumbling at the lock of a small cupboard by the fire-place as he replied.

"I think so," answered Reuben; "I think it shows a want of human feeling, an absence of all Christian charity; and Lucy Jennings is found guilty—sentenced—executed."

Reuben Culwick was in boisterous spirits, or he would have never committed the indiscretion of suddenly lifting up the prim Miss Jennings in his arms and kissing her. In all his life he had never kissed her before—never dreamed of taking such a liberty with his landlord's sister; but his high spirits carried him away, and lifted Lucy Jennings as high as the ceiling before he kissed her lightly, and placed her, as he might have done a child, in her chair again, where she glared at him in amazement, with eyes distended and her face not destitute of color now.

"You—have been drinking," she gasped forth, indignantly, "or you would have never done that."

"She thinks every body drinks," said John Jennings, pathetically, as he produced from his cupboard a half-filled bottle of Irish whisky and two glasses, which he placed with due care in the centre of the table.

"No, I haven't been drinking, Lucy," said Reuben, quietly; "but this is home, and I am glad to get back to it."

"Ah! I dare say you are," she added, with irony.

Reuben Culwick was used to her moods, but it struck even him that she was different in her manner that night.

"Don't you believe me?" he asked, leaning forward and regarding her with greater intentness.

She looked down at the faded hearth-rug at this direct appeal, and evaded his steady gaze toward her. "If you say so again I will believe it," she answered, after a moment's silence.

"I say that I am glad to get home—that this is home," he said, very firmly.

"I believe you, then," she answered, in a different tone; "but why are you glad to get back to a wretched place like this?"

"My mother died here. You and your brother were kind to her and me when we could not help ourselves, when we were very poor, and had even got into your debt. You were our only friends then. My first start in life, such as it was, began here, Lucy."

"It is unsuited for you now, and we are unsuited for you too."

"How humble we are!" cried Reuben; "and I am as poor as a church mouse still."

"You pretend to be."

"Skeptical still!" he cried. "John, what shall I do now?"

"Kiss her again," said John, as he struggled with a refractory cork, and twisted himself into hideous contortions in his efforts to extract it.

"No, I will not have any more of that foolery," said Miss Jennings, with intense acerbity pervading her plain speaking.

"I wouldn't if she objects," said John—"if she doesn't see the joke of it. I don't think any body has ever kissed her except Tots. She's not used to that kind of thing—she really isn't."

John said all this in good faith, but his sister looked the sharpest of daggers at him, as well she might, perhaps. John Jennings was duller than his sister by several degrees. If she had not been brighter than he, they would have both been in Camberwell work-house long ago.

Nothing seemed to distress or disturb the equanimity of Reuben Culwick. He was glad to get back, or he was one of the artfulest hypocrites in the county of Surrey. He understood these two better than they understood themselves, having taken the trouble to study and be interested in their eccentricities long ago.

"Well, you have sat up and kept a fire burning for a man who was not expected, and John is coming out with his whisky like a prince," said Reuben; "but you don't ask me how I have fared in the country, what adventures I have had, what work I have done, what luck I have encountered—not a word, upon my soul!"

"Don't say that," said Lucy Jennings, with a frown.

"I beg pardon—I had forgotten," said Reuben, deferentially.

"When you are tired—and you must feel tired after your long journey—you will find the supper laid in your own room," said Lucy.

"Thank you; and till then?"

"Till then we shall be glad to hear how you have got on in Worcester," she said, a womanly curiosity exhibiting itself at last. "We do not attempt to deny that we are interested in you, always interested in you, poor as we are."

"Yes, but don't begin about your poverty again, please; poverty may be a blessing in disguise, for what you and I and John know to the contrary," said Reuben. "The poorest and most afflicted woman was the happiest mortal whom I met in Worcestershire, and the richest and most prosperous man I found as miserable and mean as ever."

"Are you speaking of your father now?" asked Miss Jennings, anxiously.

"Yes—the gentleman whom you talked me into visiting, prodigal son fashion, but who didn't take me to his breast and weep over me, and order his fattest calf to be killed in my honor," cried Reuben, a little bitterly. "I was humble and contrite, but he was as hard as nails; and the whole experiment was a tremendous failure. Did I not say before I started that this would be the result?"

"Yes," said John, "you certainly said that. I am very sorry—I am awfully sorry. What a funny man he must be!"

"Extremely funny," said Reuben Culwick, dryly: "you would die of laughing at his humor."

"Do you regret that you have offered to sink a bitter quarrel," inquired Lucy Jennings, "and to make peace?"

"No."

"You are glad that you have been to Worcester, are you not, despite this miserable result?"

"Yes."

"Then the fault lies with him, as it did, before you went, with you. And, Mr. Reuben," she added, very earnestly, "you have one sin the less, I think."

"Amen to that."

Lucy Jennings regarded him keenly, as if a suspicion that he was ridiculing her earnestness had suggested itself; but Reuben Culwick was grave enough. It was not always easy to guess when this strong, self-reliant man was in jest or earnest, but she gave him credit for being impressed by her demeanor.

"And this mortal, suffering much, and yet so happy—who was she?" inquired Lucy.

"Ah! there's a lesson for you, Lucy," said John Jennings, as he mixed the whisky.

"Have I ever complained?" was the quick rejoinder.

"No, no; I don't say that you have," answered her brother, who was sorry that he had spoken; "you're very patient, and nobody expects you to be jolly."

"What kind of woman was she?" asked the sister, turning to Reuben.

"Old and blind, and in an almshouse," said Reuben—"my father's eldest sister."

"She is provided for, then—her eyes are closed against the world's wickedness, and she is spared many trials," said Lucy, somewhat sullenly, as if jealous of one more afflicted than herself, as invalids are sometimes.

"I have done a deal of work in the last fortnight," said Reuben—"written my special articles on the Agricultural Exhibition for the Trumpet, earned an extra five pounds" (he did not add that he had tucked it under the pillow of Aunt Sarah's bed), "had my change of air and scene at somebody else's cost, hunted up no end of relations, of whom I'll tell you more presently, and am back again, all the better for my new experience."

"Take some whisky," said John Jennings, pushing the glass across to him.

"Thank you," said Reuben.

"And here's good luck to all of us before the year's over," added Jennings, as he raised his glass in the hand which wanted a thumb to it. "Your health, Mr. Reuben; Lucy, yours."

Reuben said, "Thank you." Lucy Jennings watched her brother tilt down his potent liquid, but did not respond to his kind wishes by so much as a nod of gratitude toward him. Her observation elicited a faint protest from her brother when he had set down his glass.

"I wish you wouldn't stare at me quite so much," he said, mildly; "you make me feel uncomfortable at times."

"You'll take to drinking some day, if you are not careful," said Lucy, in a tone of solemn warning.

"May I not drink a glass of grog when my friend comes home?" he inquired, reproachfully.

"A glass does you harm, and costs money—and you have no money to spare."

"I shall have presently," he said, nodding his head sagaciously.—"Mr. Reuben, I have been keeping some good news back till you came home—for good news doesn't freshen up Lucy as it ought, I'm sorry to say."

"I don't remember to have had any good news in my life, except what is to be found there, and which you know so little about." She jerked her hand in the direction of a large old-fashioned Bible on a side-table as she spoke.

"Ahem!—yes—no; but I wish you wouldn't, Lucy, come down upon me on week-nights like this with Sunday conversation—when Mr. Reuben's at home, too," said her brother.

"Well, the good news, John?—and then 'to bed, to bed,'" said Reuben, a little impatiently.

"The Royal Saxe-Gotha Gardens will open early next month, and I'm appointed pyrotechnist," John Jennings cried, exultantly. "Fire-works every Monday and Saturday. I shall make a clear hundred and fifty pounds, my boy, before the year's out."

"Oh, indeed!" said Reuben Culwick, somewhat listlessly; "but didn't the Saxe-Gotha let you in last time?"

"And the time before too," added Miss Jennings.

"These are responsible people—first-rate lot, I hear," said Mr. Jennings, confidently.

"I am glad to hear it," said Reuben; "but you must let me see to the business contract between you this time. I'll draw you up a safe one, and save a lawyer's fee, John."

"Certainly, Mr. Reuben, when it's ready," said John Jennings. "I shall be only too happy; for you're a business man, with a keen head for contracts, which were never quite in my line—were they, Lucy?"

"Never," said Lucy, agreeing with her brother for the first time that evening.

"Although I'm too old a bird to be taken in again, for all that," added John, as he reached his pipe from the mantel-piece and refilled it. "Why, if they were to play me any tricks, I'd open an opposition gardens round about here somewhere, and ruin the lot of them. Hanged if I wouldn't!"

Lucy Jennings shrugged her shoulders at this last suggestion, and Reuben's mouth twitched at the corners.

"I wouldn't be in a hurry to do that, even if there were any opposition gardens to be discovered, John," said Reuben, gravely; "it's a rash experiment, and wants energy and capital."

"He never had either," added Lucy; "and as for the Saxe-Gotha, I wish it was burned down to-morrow."

"God bless me!" ejaculated Mr. Jennings, "you don't call that a charitable and Christian wish, surely?"

"I wish it was burned down to-morrow!" she repeated, fiercely; "it's an evil place—it's a—oh, Elizabeth, you naughty girl!"

"What, Tots!" cried Reuben, holding out his arms, into which there ran, with pattering bare feet, a pretty flaxen-haired child of three years old, whose long night-gown did not hinder her rush toward him in any great degree.

"Oh, me so glad you have come back, Reuben!" said the child, half laughing to begin with, and then wholly crying as a wind-up.

"She'll catch her death of cold!" cried Mr. Jennings.—"Tots, how could you come down like this? Why ain't you asleep?"

"You said—you said," sobbed the child, "that he was coming home to-night."

"Well, here I am, young one; don't cry about it," murmured the big man, as his arms folded the child to his breast, and his handsome brown beard hid her face from view, and tickled her terribly, for she struggled into a sitting position away from it, and rubbed her face and eyes energetically.

"Elizabeth," said Lucy, severely, "this is very wrong. Didn't you promise to go to sleep?"

"I touldn't," answered Elizabeth.

"Come with me," began her aunt again, when Tots let forth so tremendous a yell of opposition that even Lucy, a woman not easily put down, succumbed at once.

"Let her be," said Reuben Culwick, gruffly. Then there was a second pause, after which he whispered in the child's ear a few words which arrested her attention, and Tots sat up again.

"Where is it?" asked Tots.

"In my portmanteau at the railway station—coming home to-morrow, if Tots will go to bed now," answered our hero.

"And as big as dat?" said Tots, opening her arms to their fullest extent.

"Bigger."

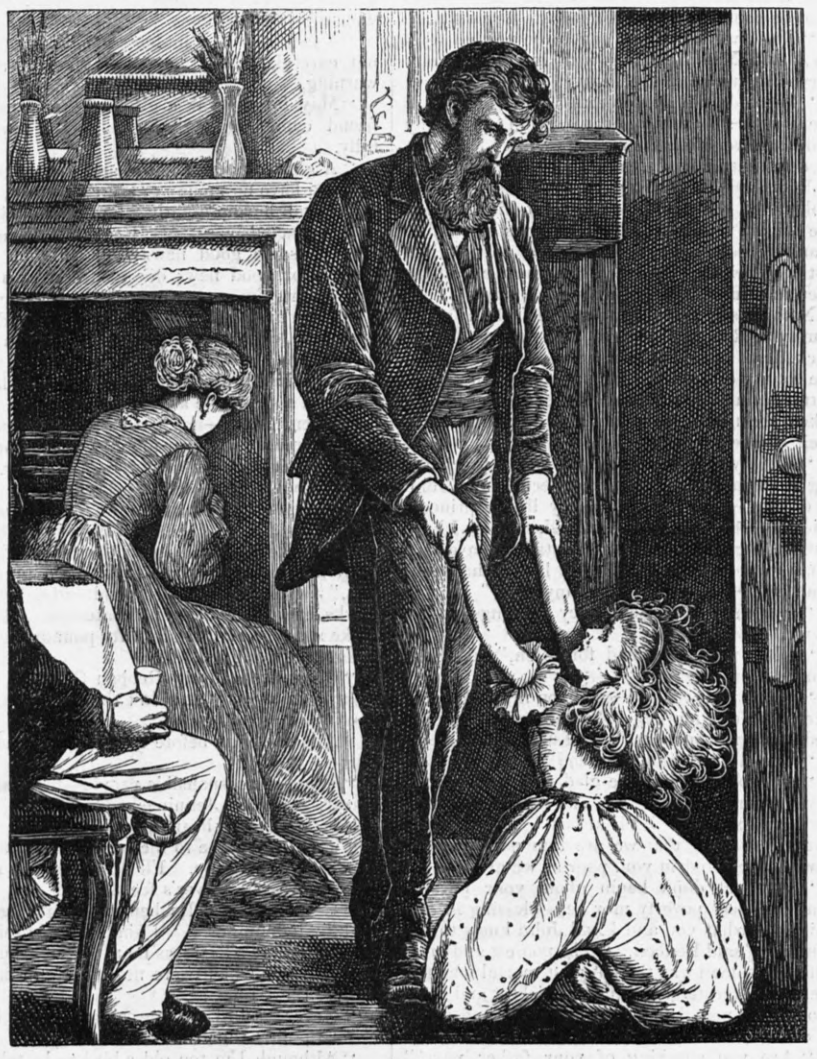
"Me go to bed," said Tots, with alacrity; "but," she added, "oo must carry me up tairs."

"Of course I will.—Good-night, Uncle Jennings; good-night, aunt; we're off, both of us," cried Reuben Culwick; and he was out of the room and striding up stairs with the child before there was time for Tots to change her mind in any way.

Brother and sister did not attempt to follow him. The brother sat and listened until the trampling feet in the room above announced that Reuben had deposited his charge in her crib, and retired to his own apartments. The thin woman with the worn face turned toward the fire, fast dying out, and passed a hand across her eyes as if by stealth.

"How fond he is of children!" said John

Digitized by Google



"'OH, ME SO GLAD YOU HAVE COME BACK, REUBEN!' SAID THE CHILD."

Jennings; "I think big men always are, Lucy. There was Topping—"

"Don't bother me about Topping," said Lucy, fretfully.

"Ahem!—no," he said, with his feeble little cough prefacing his remarks again; "not if you wish it, certainly. Still, it's odd."

"What's odd?"

"That Reuben's coming back should have put you out in this way."

"I prayed he might never come again."

"Why, we couldn't afford—"

"The man deserved better fortune than he can find here," she cried, "and so I didn't want him back. Besides, we don't agree."

"Well," said John, gravely, "you and I don't agree, for the matter of that, but still we're company for each other in our sulks."

"You never sulk as I do, when the evil in me gets the mastery," said his sister.

"Why, Lucy, though I say it, and though you're a bit hard at times, there isn't a better woman in Hope Street."

"I wonder if there's a worse," said the woman, very mournfully.

"You're not often like this—you're generally so patient and quiet."

"I try to be."

"Have you got any thing on your mind?"

"Nothing that I should tell you," was the uncivil reply.

"Will you have a drop of whisky now?"

"No, I won't."

John Jennings considered a moment, and then said, with an air of profound wisdom asserting itself, "I'm sorry Reuben has seen you in this tantrum, because I have often fancied that by-and-by you and he would get to like each other. He is a man who wants something to love—look at him and that child, for instance—and you're not a great deal too old, and he's not proud, and you're—"

He stopped as Lucy Jennings swung herself round, a perfect virago in her last and worst attack of passion. He had never seen Lucy show off in this way before. Had she been at the whisky on the sly?

"John, you're a fool!" she screamed; "you are the worst of fools to think like that, to talk like it. I marry him! He think of me! I tell you I hate you for saying this to-night!"

John Jennings gasped for his breath.

"My dear, I'm sorry if I have hurt your feelings. If you don't mind, I'll go to bed."

She did not answer, and John Jennings, after passing his malformed hand over his forehead in a bewildered manner, went to bed accordingly.

When she was sure that he was gone, the woman sank of a heap on the shabby hearth-rug, and buried her face in her arms, which she leaned upon the chair. It was a bitter grief, in which strange words escaped her.

"Why has he come back? Why couldn't he stop away for good?"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

EVENING TOILETTE.

THIS tasteful evening dress is of black Chambéry gauze with gold-colored stripes, made over black silk. The skirt has the new fan train (just introduced by Worth), with a triple pleat in the lower part of the back breadth. The stripes on the front breadths are arranged diagonally. The apron over-skirt is very long, and trimmed up the sides to the tournure. Round Josephine waist with square neck—a favorite style for new evening dresses. The trimming is the new appliqué embroidery of silk and chenille on tulle, and represents scarlet, yellow, and black roses. The flowers of the corsage and in the hair are artificial. Belt and long loops of scarlet ribbon. Heavy gold jewelry.

EVENING TOILETTE.

Hosted by Google

"GOOD-MORNING."—[SEE PAGE 714.]

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

AMELIA AND OTHERS.—For the benefit of numerous inquirers we will repeat the description of the stitch known as "point Russe," which was given in No. 24, Vol. I. This stitch is the most quickly and easily worked of all embroidery stitches, being simply the back stitch used in plain sewing, care being taken to put the needle through so as to make the stitches follow in the same direction, by which means the work preserves a neat appearance on the under side. Having selected a pattern, draw it either on tissue-paper or on the material. This stitch is usually worked in black silk, though any other color may be used. It shows a single thread on the right side. Different colors may be used in the same design, or, in work that requires shading, different numbers of black silk. This stitch is especially designed for embroidering on thin muslin. It makes a very pretty cover for toilette cushions and the like. Take two thicknesses of fine muslin, and work through both. Then cut away the under piece of muslin, excepting in the centre of the flowers, leaves, etc. This, laid over the colored silk or velvet of the cushion, lends the work the appearance of raised white flowers bordered with the delicate black stitches. This stitch may also be used for embroidering children's dresses, blouse waists, etc. It is most effective on the double thin muslin, as it thus presents the appearance of being much more elaborate than it really is. In working heavier material it may sometimes be necessary to put the needle through backward and forward instead of forming the entire stitch at once. When the design requires that the stitches be very short, they may also be done in this manner in order to prevent drawing the work. For marking or embroidering pocket-handkerchiefs a stitch called point dame is used. This is the same stitch—the ordinary back stitch used in sewing—except that greater care must be taken with the under side. In working always put the needle so that for every stitch on the upper side there may be a corresponding one on the under side. In working this the thread must be carefully fastened after finishing each separate part of the design. The under side will be different, but equally as neat and conspicuous as the upper side.

PAUPER.—The tar and oil should stay on overnight, and if it is made thin enough, will surely wash off next morning. Can't say how many applications are necessary, as the number differs in different cases. A dozen times at least.

MATRON.—The weak solution of ammonia which alone is proper to use on the hair will not injure but rather improve it. We hope you have not been putting pure ammonia on your head, as that certainly will spoil it. Do not pinch out the "grubs," as you call them, without touching the spots with strong camphor, to which ten drops of carbolic acid is added in each ounce.

ALICE MATHER.—Introduce people in an easy but respectful manner, saying, "Miss Smith, let me introduce Mr. Jones;" "Miss Smith, this is Mr. Jones," or simply naming the persons to each other.—See No. 21 of "Ugly Girl" papers, to come, for directions to improve the skin.

ZOE.—The color of the hair you send is beautiful as it is. The only improvement you can give is to brush it ten minutes every night and morning, and wash the scalp once a week. Wear it in waves and curls.

MEDICUS.—Equal parts of myrrh and pitch melted together are said by old authorities to remove spots from the nails. Of course if the spots go through the nail, nothing but medication for the blood will remove them.

BESSIE L.—Try a dressing of one ounce of glycerine, two ounces of rose-water, and thirty drops of carbolic acid for the disease of your hair. Your blood needs purifying. Use hot baths and coarse food.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HAIR!!!

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, corner Fourth Street,
Branch Store, 345 Sixth Avenue,
Between 21st & 22d Streets, begs leave to call the attention of the ladies to his complete and superb stock of Human Hair Goods for the Fall, comprising all the Latest Styles, manufactured of the best quality of French hair only, without any intermixing whatsoever, of his own importation and manufacture.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

RETAILED AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

☞ I can offer to the Public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors.
All goods WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches.....$1 and upward.
Finest Quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed,
18 inches long, 4 ounces weight.....$5 00
22 inches long, 4 ounces weight..... 6 00
26 inches long, 4 ounces weight..... 8 00
32 inches long, 4 ounces weight.....10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.
Long Single Curls, naturally Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.
Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free).
Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

RENEW —Either of Harper's, $4, and Phrenological, $3, for $6 a year; or, with Science of Health, $2, for $5 a year; all three, $7; by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

A. HARAUX'S STAMPING AND
Embroidering Establishment is at No. 90 FOURTH AVENUE, a few doors above A. T. Stewart & Co.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

GRANDEST SCHEME EVER KNOWN.

4th Grand Gift Concert

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE
PUBLIC LIBRARY OF KENTUCKY.

12,000 CASH GIFTS, $1,500,000.

$250,000 FOR $50.

The Fourth Grand Gift Concert, authorized by special act of the Legislature, for the benefit of the Public Library of Kentucky, will take place in Public Library Hall, at Louisville, Ky.,

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1873.

Only Sixty thousand tickets will be sold. The tickets are divided into ten coupons or parts.

At this Concert, which will be the grandest musical display ever witnessed in this country, the unprecedented sum of

$1,500,000

divided into 12,000 cash gifts, will be distributed by lot among the ticket-holders.

LIST OF GIFTS.

ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		$250,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		100,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		50,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		25,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		17,500
10 CASH GIFTS	$10,000 each	100,000
30 CASH GIFTS	5,000 each	150,000
50 CASH GIFTS	1,000 each	50,000
80 CASH GIFTS	500 each	40,000
100 CASH GIFTS	400 each	40,000
150 CASH GIFTS	300 each	45,000
250 CASH GIFTS	200 each	50,000
325 CASH GIFTS	100 each	32,500
11,000 CASH GIFTS	50 each	550,000
TOTAL, 12,000 GIFTS, ALL CASH, amounting to		$1,500,000

The distribution will be positive, whether all the tickets are sold or not, and the 12,000 gifts all paid in proportion to the tickets sold.

PRICE OF TICKETS:

Whole tickets, $50; Halves, $25; Tenths, or each coupon, $5; Eleven Whole Tickets for $500; 22¾ Tickets for $1,000; 113 Whole Tickets for $5,000; 227 Whole Tickets for $10,000. No discount on less than $500 worth of Tickets at a time.

The time for the drawing is near at hand, and persons intending to purchase tickets have no time to loose.

THOS. E. BRAMLETTE,
Agent Public Library Ky., and Manager Gift Concert,
Public Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

Or THOS. H. HAYS & CO.,
609 BROADWAY, New York.

THE BEST SHAPED CORSETS,

☞ The Newest Styles of Bustles,

With THE LATEST PARIS Novelties,

ARE TO BE FOUND AT
J. C. DEVIN'S,
Under Sturtevant House, 1192 BROADWAY.

A. SELIG,

(SUCCESSOR TO S. M. PEYSER),
No. 813 Broadway, New York,

Is daily receiving new importations of rich DRESS TRIMMINGS, such as beaded LACES, GIMPS, FRINGES, BUTTONS, and ORNAMENTS of the latest styles. Also a full assortment of BERLIN ZEPHYRS, Filling, Floss and Embroidery SILKS, CHENILLES, Worsted and Silk EMBROIDERIES of every description, as STRIPS for Chairs, SLIPPERS, Footrests, Towel-racks, Fire and Light SCREENS, LAMBREQUINS and CUSHIONS in GOBLIN and any other style of EMBROIDERY. GUIPURE and POINT LACE work and materials for making the same. Particular attention paid to orders.

Designing and Embroidering of every description done at the lowest possible prices.

PATENT Sewing-Silk Veil

In the above we have overcome the great difficulty, formerly experienced, of procuring a veil with a fringing of the exact shade. The fringes in our veil being woven at the same moment, and with the same material throughout, consisting of the best quality of sewing silk, a reliance may be placed upon their exactness of match, and of their durability, in every respect, the same wearing double the length of time over that of any other veil ever made. Sold in all Fancy, Millinery, and Dry-Goods Houses in the U. S.

Patentees and Sole Manufacturers,
MEYENBERG, PRALL, & CO.,
483 & 485 Broadway, N. Y.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

Sold by all Druggists.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON

Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 39 East 33d St., N. Y.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS, in any quantities. Send for Circular.
MME. L. CENDRIER, 636 Broadway, N. Y.

Union Adams & Co.

ARE OFFERING AT VERY LOW PRICES

HOSIERY AND GLOVES,

UNDERWEAR,

Shirts & Collars,

HANDKERCHIEFS,

SUSPENDERS,

ROBES JACKETS, &c.

637 BROADWAY.

BEAUTIFY THE SKIN

BY USING LAIRD'S
"Bloom of Youth."
This harmless & delightful toilet preparation will remove all discolorations and blemishes from the skin, leaving it SOFT, CLEAR, SMOOTH, and BEAUTIFUL.
SOLD AT ALL DRUGGISTS.

THREE PAIR Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, and Dress-Trimmings, together with a choice assortment of

FINE FURS

at less than manufacturers' prices. Send for Price-List of Furs, and all kinds of Millinery Goods and Dress Trimmings. All orders filled with care, and sent C. O. D., with the privilege of examination.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS.

AGENTS WANTED.
SEND FOR CATALOGUE.
Domestic Sewing-Machine Co., N. Y.

NEW GOODS JUST ARRIVED.

Miller & Grant,

No. 879 Broadway,
Are offering BLACK AND COLORED YAKS, French-Made WOOLEN FRINGES, PASSEMENTERIES in JET, STEEL, and BUGLE TRIMMINGS, &c., at ☞ Attractive Prices.
ORDERS FILLED WITH CARE.

BARTLETT'S HEMMERS

hem all goods, coarse or fine, any width, from 1-16 to 2 inches; hem elastic worsted, cut bias; hem over seams. Send for Circular.
W. H. MACLAUGHLIN,
360 Main St.,
Buffalo, N. Y.

ALUMINOUS AND ORNAMENTAL

BUILDING PAPER

Paper Carpeting and Oil Cloth.
Send for Samples and Price-List.
W. H. H. ROGERS & CO., 2 & 3 College Place, N. Y.
F. N. DAVIS & CO., Beloit, Wis.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN Dress Shields will absorb moisture and protect the Dress thoroughly. The Perforated Premium Buckskin Undergarments are recommended by all Physicians. Send for circulars. D. C. HALL & Co., 44 West Broadway, N.Y., Sole Agents and Manufacturers.

V. VIGOUROUX, 122 4th Ave., N.Y.
Stamping, Embroidering, Lingerie Establishment. Ladies' & Babies' Trousseau. Specialty of Initial Monograms for HANDKERCHIEFS, TABLE and BED CLOTHS. Wholesale Department, ☞ 69 EAST TWELFTH STREET. MACHINE AND PERFORATED PATTERNS.

DR. NOBLE'S GREAT DISCOVERY.—A certain cure for fever and ague, bilious fever, and chill fever. A tonic. Price $1 per bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 Sixth Ave. Sold every where. Agents wanted.

HENRY PROPACH, Dressmaker, 17 East 16th St., has received the last Fall and Winter Styles. All orders will be executed in the SHORTEST TIME.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MARIE GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

MME. BURLETON, 21 Clinton Place, near B'way, Eighth St., West. The latest style of Fall Bonnets and Round Hats; also, Mourning Bonnets.

WATERS' CONCERTO PARLOR ORGANS

are the most beautiful in style and perfect in tone ever made. The CONCERTO STOP is the best ever placed in any Organ. It is produced by a third set of reeds peculiarly voiced, the EFFECT of which is MOST CHARMING and SOUL STIRRING, while its IMITATION of the HUMAN VOICE is SUPERB. Terms liberal. A GREAT OFFER. HORACE WATERS & SON, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of 100 PIANOS and ORGANS of first-class makers, including WATERS', at extremely low prices for cash, or part cash, and balance in small monthly payments. New 7-Octave first-class PIANOS, all modern improvements, for $275 cash. Organs $55. $75. DOUBLE-REED ORGANS, $100; 4-STOP, $110; 8-STOP, $125, upwards. ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES MAILED for one stamp. A large discount to Ministers, Churches, Sunday-Schools, Temperance Societies, Lodges, etc. AGENTS WANTED.

BARRY'S
TRICOPHEROUS

Imparts vigor, gloss, luxuriance, and curl to the Hair, and is recommended as being a sovereign remedy for all
AILMENTS OF THE HEAD.
For Sale by all Druggists.

BAZAR Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, Cor. 4th St., N. Y.
The largest stock of Human Hair goods in the city. Wigs made to order by the best artists. A perfect fit guaranteed. The invisible wig a specialty. No. 1, round the head; No. 2, from forehead to nape of neck; No. 3, from ear to ear across crown; No. 4, from ear to ear across forehead. Goods sent C.O.D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

EVERYBODY LIKES a beautiful complexion, and a soft, smooth skin; both are obtained by using 'Wright's Alconated Glycerine Tablet of Solidified Glycerine,' fragrant, transparent, and incomparable as a Toilet Soap. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

Every baby must have it. IS THOROUGHLY WATER-PROOF, protects clothing, retains linen diaper, avoids pins, permits circulation of air. Recommended by physicians and all mothers whose children have worn them. Made in 4 sizes—1, smallest; 4 largest—exclusively by EUREKA DIAPER CO., 532 Broadway, N. Y. Sample mailed on receipt of $1. Sold also by Stewart, Claflin, Lord & Taylor, Arnold & Constable and first-class Infants Clothing, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA DIAPER; see they bear stamp of EUREKA PATENT DIAPER CO. Take no other. Agents wanted.

LAFONTAIN'S FRENCH COMPLEXION BEAUTIFIER removes TAN AND FRECKLES, BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, AND FLESHWORMS. Price $1 00 per Bottle. Wholesale Depot, 7 SIXTH AVENUE. Agents wanted.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.
U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

Hosted by Google

RETAIL.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Are continually adding to their

RETAIL STOCKS,

From recent importations of CHOICE FABRICS and purchases made for

CASH

AT LARGE REDUCTIONS IN PRICES,

AND HAVE OPENED

Elegant and Attractive Lines of SPECIALTIES in

DRESS GOODS,

as follows:

FRENCH & ENGLISH ALL-WOOL SATINES,
SILK AND WOOL EPINGLINES,
ALL-WOOL EMPRESS CLOTHS,
FRENCH PLAIDS,
SCOTCH TARLTANS,
FRENCH & DOMESTIC CAMEL'S-HAIR CLOTHS,
FRENCH MERINOS, and
CACHMERES in Positive Bargains.

Also, full lines of BLACK & COLORED Lyons Silk

VELVETS,

AT LARGELY REDUCED PRICES.

Their stocks of BLACK and COLORED

SILKS

Have been largely replenished at and under the UNUSUALLY LOW and Attractive Prices of last week.

Their Departments of

HOUSE FURNISHING AND REFITTING, viz.:

BLANKETS, COUNTERPANES, UPHOLSTERY GOODS, CARPETS, &c.,

As well as the Stocks for Personal Supplies, have been reassorted in all Seasonable and Attractive ARTICLES adapted to their special wants.

FRIENDS, CUSTOMERS, & STRANGERS

Will find this an exeellent opportunity for making purchases.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

BROADWAY, COR. 19TH ST., N. Y.

UPHOLSTERY DEPARTMENT.

CURTAIN MATERIALS,
FURNITURE COVERINGS,
LACE CURTAINS.

Special attention given to making up

CURTAINS, DRAPERIES,
LAMBREQUINS, SHADES, &c., &c.

CARPETS.

ENGLISH BODY BRUSSELS,
VELVETS, 3-PLY AND INGRAINS,

MOQUETTES,

SMYRNA, PERSIAN, AND HOLLAND CARPETS,

(Woven in one piece.)

AMERICAN AND ENGLISH OIL CLOTHS, &c., &c.

Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

STERN BROTHERS,

SIXTH AVE. & TWENTY-THIRD STREET,

inform their customers and the public that, owing to the present unsettled state of trade, we have purchased large quantities of goods for cash the past week, and are now offering

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS

IN BLACK AND COLORED TRIMMING VELVETS,

all the new and desirable colors, splendid quality, at $1 65, $1 75, $1 95 upward. ☞ CHEAPER THAN THEY HAVE BEEN SOLD IN YEARS.

A magnificent assortment of

PASSEMENTERIE TRIMMINGS, FRINGES, ORNAMENTS,
LOOPS, BUTTONS, &c.,

Our own importations.

REAL LACES,
REAL GUIPURE AND THREAD LACES,
BLACK AND COLORED YAK LACES,
ITALIAN & FRENCH BLONDE LACES,

At prices that speak for themselves.

☞ Samples of all the above lines of Goods sent freely upon application.

STERN BROTHERS,
367 SIXTH AVE., 367
110 WEST 23d ST., 110

FALL CATALOGUE

Send Stamp for the most complete Price-List of MILLINERY AND FANCY GOODS ever issued.

Fine Furs a Specialty.

☞ Goods shipped C.O.D., to any part of the country, with full ☜ power of examination before acceptance.

EHRICH & CO.,
287 & 289 8th AVE., Near 24th ST., New York.

WORKING CLASS Male or Female, $30 a week employment at home, day or evening; no capital; instructions & valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-c. return stamp, M. YOUNG & Co., 173 Greenwich St., N.Y.

FLOWERS.—WINDOW GARDENING.

Ladies, send stamp for Specimen Copy (free) of THE LADIES' FLORAL CABINET.—A beautiful new Home Paper, devoted to Flowers, Window Gardening, and Parlor Decorations. Exquisitely illustrated. Ladies will be delighted with it. Delightful home pictures of society. Amusements, with useful hints on housekeeping and Elegancies.

Price $1 50 per year, including 3 Choice Chromos.
" $1 25 " " " 1 " "

☞ GET UP A CLUB. AGENTS WANTED. Send for terms.

WINDOW GARDENING.—A New Book, superbly illustrated, devoted to Culture of Plants, Bulbs, and Flowers for in-doors, with handsome illustrations of Hanging Baskets, Ferneries, and Parlor Decorations. 250 Engravings. Price $1 50. Sent, postpaid, by mail. Book Stores have it.

EVERY WOMAN HER OWN FLOWER GARDENER.—By Daisy Eyebright. A charming New Book on Flowers and Out-Door Gardening for Ladies. Price 50c., or bound in cloth, $1 00. Sent by mail, postpaid.

THE LADIES' CABINET INITIAL NOTE-PAPER.—Rose or Violet Tinted; your own initial. Superb novelty. Handsome present. Highly perfumed. Attractive Chromo on each Box. Price 50c. a Box. 100 Papers at Club Rates. Send stamp for List.

Illustrated Prospectus and Premium List of all the above free on receipt of stamp. Address THE LADIES' FLORAL CABINET, OFFICE, 5 BEEKMAN STREET, NEW YORK. P. O. Box 2445.

For Marking Clothing.

Lottie Lane

A Stencil Plate, like cut, with brush and indelible ink, postpaid, for 50c. Umbrella Plate, with name and address, ready to attach, 25c. Circulars free. J. F. MARSH, S. E. cor. Second and Dock, Phila., Pa.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

Harper & Brothers' Latest Publications.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.

PIKE'S SUB-TROPICAL RAMBLES. Sub-Tropical Rambles in the Land of the Aphanapteryx. By NICOLAS PIKE, U. S. Consul, Port Louis, Mauritius. Profusely Illustrated from the Author's own Sketches; containing also Maps and valuable Meteorological Charts. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

II.

DAWSON'S EARTH AND MAN. The Story of the Earth and Man. By J. W. DAWSON, LL.D., F.R.S., F.G.S., Principal and Vice-Chancellor of McGill University, Montreal. With Twenty Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

III.

THE LAND OF MOAB. The Result of Travels and Discoveries on the East Side of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. By H. B. TRISTRAM, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Master of the Greatham Hospital, and Honorary Canon of Durham. With New Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. Cloth, $2 50.

IV.

NAST'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC FOR 1874. With 86 Original Illustrations by THOMAS NAST. Price 25 cents.

V.

FLAMMARION'S ATMOSPHERE. The Atmosphere. Translated from the French of CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Edited by JAMES GLAISHER, F.R.S., Superintendent of the Magnetical and Meteorological Department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. With 10 Chromo-Lithographs, and 86 Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

VI.

TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS. The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. (Uniform with Tyerman's "Life of John Wesley.")

THE NEW NOVELS OF THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

1.

THE NEW MAGDALEN. By WILKIE COLLINS. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. This is the first volume of Harper's Library Edition of Wilkie Collins's Novels. Other volumes will follow at short intervals.

2.

THE TWO WIDOWS. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Denis Donne," "Called to Account," "Played Out," "A Passion in Tatters," "The Dower House," "Maud Mohan," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

3.

MISS DOROTHY'S CHARGE. By FRANK LEE BENEDICT, Author of "My Daughter Elinor," "Miss Van Kortland," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

4.

STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "Birds of Prey," "Lovels of Arden," "To the Bitter End," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

SAMPLES FREE!!—The Saturday Evening Post, 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia, gives a beautiful Chromo or large Steel Engraving to every yearly subscriber! Samples free!

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments, or all the time, than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Boston, Mass.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and Carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. IV.

LADY'S WATTEAU WRAPPER..... " 42
GIRL'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK (for girl from 5 to 15 years old)..... " 44
GENTLEMAN'S SHORT DRESSING-GOWN AND SMOKING-CAP..... " 46
PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 48

Vol. V.

DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE, with Postilion Basque, Apron-front Over-skirt, and Under Skirt (for girl from 5 to 15 years old).... " 2
LADY'S SACQUE WRAPPER..... " 4
LADY'S LINGERIE (Dressing Sacque, Corset Cover, Night Sacque, Yoke Night Dress, Yoke Chemise, and Drawers)..... " 6
TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... " 20
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER.. " 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)..... " 25
LOOSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 29
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt..... " 39
PRINCESSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.. " 41
DOLMAN SACQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 41
DOUBLE TALMA, APRON-FRONT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT..... " 41
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 48
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)..... " 50

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)..... " 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT.... " 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 17
LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 23
GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT. " 24
BLOUSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 28
LADIES' AND MISSES' BATHING OR GYMNASTIC SUIT..... " 30
PLEATED WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 32
DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 32
ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT..... " 39
DEMI-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT, with Basque Back and Square Front..... " 43
TIGHT-FITTING DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE, with French Round Skirt..... " 45

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Book Canvassers Wanted.

THE Subscriber desires to call the attention of experienced and successful Book Agents to "M'CLINTOCK AND STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE." The Fifth Volume of this work is now published. This Cyclopædia is unlike any other now sold by subscription or otherwise. The other volumes will be published at about yearly intervals. Does not the sale of this work offer pecuniary advantages to Book Agents that can not be obtained on the sale of any other work now being sold by subscription? The inducements are liberal, and good Territory is yet to be had. For further particulars, inquire of or address

AVERY BILL,

Care Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Book Canvassers Wanted.

$125 A month to Lady Agents every where. Address ELLIS M'F'G CO., Waltham, Mass.

$10 to $20 per day. Agents wanted every where. Particulars free. A. H. BLAIR & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

$475 A MONTH and expenses to good Canvassers. Articles new and staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. LININGTON, Chicago.

$375 A MONTH to Male or Female Agents. NOVELTY COMPANY, Biddeford, Me.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR NOVEMBER, 1873.

CONTENTS:

THE SECRET OF THE STRAIT.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Entrance to Cartagena: Picturesque Gateway.—Map of the Isthmus of Darien.—House at Turbo.—India-Rubber Laborer.—Caoutchouc-Tree and Parasites.—Working through the Tropical Foliage.—A Street of Chipigana.—The Landing at Chipigana.—Tuyra River, near Santa Maria.—Alligator Island.—Pinogana.—The Mango-Tree, Pinogana.—Pacific Coast above Limon Bay.—Cave near Limon River.—Sea Carving, Cupica Bay.—Great Falls, Limon River.

THE MYSTERY OF THE JEWELS. By JANUARY SEARLE.

THE MOUNTAINS.—VIII. ILLUSTRATED BY PORTE CRAYON.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Roy's Family.—Domestic Life at Roy's.—The Mountaineer.—Ups and Downs.—The Tub Mill.—Fanceller's Youngest.—Roy and Johnson.—The Storm.—The Great Falls of the Blackwater.—The little Foot-Prints.—Ambition's Dreams.—Bill Grey.

HAUNTED. By ROSE TERRY.

A FEW FRENCH CELEBRITIES.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Victor Hugo.—Alexandre Dumas, Père.—Alexandre Dumas, Fils.—Jules Sandeau.—Paul de Kock.—Théophile Gautier.—Jules Janin.—Jules Michelet.—Octave Feuillet.—Arsène Houssaye.—Victorien Sardou.—Gustave Doré.—George Sand.

SONNET.

SOUTH-COAST SAUNTERINGS IN ENGLAND.—(Saunter VIII.)

ILLUSTRATION.—Corsecombe.—Thomas Hollis. Hollis's Owl.

TRANSITION.

A TALE OF TWO CITIZENS.

A LONE WOMAN IN IRELAND.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Doorway of the Joyce Mansion.—View on the Quay.—Convent Door on Lombard Street.—Flanigan.—The Piper.—The Geologists.—Interior of O'Flaherty's Castle.—The Historian of the Castle.—Mrs. Murphy.—Lake Glendalough and the Twelve Pins.—Departure for America.

THE LIVING LINK. By THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB," "THE AMERICAN BARON," ETC.

CHAPTER I. A Terrible Secret.
CHAPTER II. The Contents of the Manuscript.
CHAPTER III. The momentous Resolve.
CHAPTER IV. The Welcome Home.
CHAPTER V. The Strange Inmates of Dalton Hall.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—"He drew from his Breast a large Clasp-Knife."—"And this was Wiggins."

THE LAST OF THE THREE.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Sara Coleridge at the Age of twenty-seven.—Sara Coleridge, a later Portrait.

TWO PICNICS.

SONNET. By PAUL H. HAYNE.

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA.—I. THE SACRAMENTO VALLEY. By CHARLES NORDHOFF.

SONG.—THE QUESTION. By ALFRED H. LOUIS.

THE REPUBLICAN MOVEMENT IN EUROPE. By EMILIO CASTELAR.—(Eleventh Paper.)

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.

EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.

EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for November concludes the Forty-seventh Semi-Annual Volume. This Volume has been unusually rich and various, containing Four Hundred Illustrations.

In the November Number there are Sixty-six finely-executed Engravings. The leading illustrated article treats of the Isthmus of Darien—its natural history and capacities for an inter-oceanic canal. There is a beautiful sketch of Sara Coleridge, illustrated with two Portraits; an Irish sketch, entitled "A Lone Woman in Ireland," characteristically illustrated; a baker's dozen of French Celebrities, with Portraits; the eighth part of PORTE CRAYON'S Mountains, illustrated from the author's own drawings; and another South-Coast Saunter from MONCURE D. CONWAY, treating of Dorsetshire.

A serial story of thrilling interest, entitled "The Living Link," by the Author of "The Dodge Club," "The American Baron," etc., is commenced in this Number, with effective illustrations by W. L. SHEPARD. In the January Number will be commenced a new serial, "My Mother and I," a Love Story for Girls (beautifully illustrated), by the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."

EMILIO CASTELAR, who for two years has been a regular contributor to HARPER'S MAGAZINE, continues his brilliant series of papers on "The Republican Movement in Europe;" and CHARLES NORDHOFF recounts the wonderful resources of the Sacramento Valley.

There are two excellent Short Stories in this Number, and Poems by JANUARY SEARLE, ROSE TERRY, PAUL H. HAYNE, and ALFRED H. LOUIS.

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS resumes the "Easy Chair" in this Number; and the regular monthly summaries—Scientific, Literary, and Historical—are as comprehensive and interesting as usual.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00; postage payable by the Subscriber at the office where received.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

STRANGE that game should be so dear when the efforts of every sportsman are directed to "bring it down!"

HINTS FOR SPORTSMEN.

Always lay in a good stock of ammunition, as some birds take a deal of killing.

When you discover your bird, approach him gently on tiptoe, looking as pleasant as possible, and you will find the bird become most friendly, for then the poor thing knows very well you wouldn't hit it.

If there are two or more, always all fire at once, as the bird may get confused, and you then stand a better chance. (N.B.—Mix a little salt with your powder if you aim at the tail of the bird.)

Should you both happen to hit a bird (of course you would not, because it's very cowardly to hit any thing that isn't your own size), and any dispute arises, always tear the bird in half, which is by far the fairest way.

You will find clay soil very invigorating. By-the-way, always get a good thick coating on your boots: it looks business-like.

Of course, being game, you will find them very plucky and playful. Always encourage them.

Above all, never return empty-handed.

A Western paper says that the first duty of the Grangers is to extinguish every orator who begins his speech with "I have not the good fortune to be a farmer, but I have always felt the most profound interest in the truly noble and predominant pursuit of agriculture, and never was that interest greater than now."

THE TEETOTALER'S GROG—Animal spirits and water.

An oyster leads a placid life until he gets into a stew.

NEW BOOKS.

How to Dress on a Hundred Dollars a Year as a Lady. By a Lady.

In press, shortly to be published, uniform with the above, How to Dress on Nothing a Year as a Caffre. By a Caffre.

SHAMEFUL NEGLIGENCE.

YOUNG SPROUTS (in dismay). "I say; look here. Hang me if you haven't Shaved One Side of my Mustache off!"
BARBER. "I beg your pardon, Sir; but when I was a-taking off your Whisker I must have done it without noticing."
[Not that he could see, even now, that there was any mustache on the other side, but it wouldn't have done to say so, you know.

A correspondent wants to know who wrote the poem commencing "Our country's lyres are mute." We do not know, but that line suggests the thought that if our country's liars were also mute, it would be a consummation most devoutly to be wished.

A LABORING BARK—An Esquiman dog (in a sledge).

Another paper has felt itself called upon to correct an error of the types. It says, "For one of the worst of men, read one of the wisest."

A man who rode in the same railway carriage with a bridal couple fifty miles heard her call him "dear Charles" just five hundred and eighteen times.

A bridal procession was four hours passing a given point. The point was a breakfast-table.

The first postal card received in Aberdeen was marked private.

MARINE UNDERTAKERS—Sharks.

At what season did Eve eat the apple?—Early in the fall.

Lightning recently struck a telegraph pole, and ran along the wire into the office at Coatsville, Indiana, when the operator, seated at the instrument, excitedly telegraphed back, "Don't send so fast!"

SOMETHING LIKE AN APOLOGY.

The editor of a Western paper once gave a notice of a ball, and happened incidentally to mention that the dancing of Major Heeler's better half was like "the cavorting of a fly-bitten cow in a field of cucumbers." The fact that the editor had not been invited to the ball may somewhat detract from the value of the simile, while at the same time it accounts for his establishing the figure. The major, accompanied by his better half and a six-shooter, called on the editor to complain of the poetical nature of the image. On learning that the lady was the one he had described, the editor besought her to raise her veil. She did so, saying,

"Now, Sir, I expect you to apologize."

"Apologize! I should rather think I would," was the answer, as he seized his hat and rapidly left the room.

The astounded major rushed to the window: "Stop, you Sir! you have not apologized!"

"All right; I'm going to do it in a minute!"

"What do you mean?" shouted the major, accentuating the note of interrogation with a pistol-bullet.

The answer was wafted back from round the next corner—

"Can't you see I'm looking for that cow?"

A REAL CENTENARIAN—The aloe.

"A coffin-maker in our vicinity," says the Lawrence (Massachusetts) American, "was always noted for having an eye to business, and a short time ago, upon the death of a citizen, a friend went to old Crossbones, and asked him to go to the house and take dimensions for a coffin.

"'No need of it, no need of it,' remarked the undertaker; 'I's down there t'other day, and kinder eyed him over.'

"The same man last winter had a large stock of coffins on hand, and on being asked if they would all be needed that winter, he replied, with glistening eye,

"'I hope so, I hope so.'"

When is a baby not a baby?—When it's a tea-thing.

A Waterbury man has christened his daughter Glycerine. He says it will be easy to prefix "Nitro," if her temper resembles her mother's.

TURNING WATER INTO MILK, ORANGE COUNTY FASHION.

TURNING A MAN INTO A STONE JUG, POLICE FASHION.

HOW TO TAKE STARCH OUT OF A BOY.

AND FINALLY, HOW TO TURN YOUR MOTHER-IN-LAW INTO A LOT OF AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

STRINGENCY OF THE MONEY MARKET.

WAITER. "Stop a minute, Boss, you Forgot to Pay for your Dinner."
MR. PILGARLIC. "No, no, my Friend, I didn't Forget. Fact is, I've been from one end of Wall Street to the other, and can't raise a Cent."

BY THE SEA-SIDE.

By the sad sea-shore at eve I stand,
Holding on to my hat with one hand.

The sun has sunk 'neath the silvery sea;
The autumn breeze blows a cold to me.

Why do I linger so late alone?—
There's a charm for me in yon wave-washed stone.

Long years ago, when my life was young,
In the golden time that poets have sung,

Together we sat on that stone so wet—
How sharp it was I remember yet!

I asked her, "Lucy, you'll be my wife?
Darling, I love you far more than life."

And then she answered, "I am so vexed,
But I'm to be married, this month or next.

"I should have told you....Always a friend....
I'd no idea...." So on to the end.

Soon were you married, my love, my dear;
And soon your husband found out, I hear,

That you had a temper: and he—ah, well,
How much you try him no words can tell.

No wonder I love, by the sounding sea,
The place where Lucy said "No" to me.

TO HUNTING MEN.—Look well before you leap, and as well as you can after.

PUZZLE FOR FOREIGNERS STUDYING ENGLISH.—Ever take the orphans' part—never touch their portion.

"On one occasion," says a correspondent, "we were entering the tunnel of a railway. The lamps were not trimmed and burning, and when in the tunnel we were as much in the dark as an ignorant newsboy attempting to read a page of Sanscrit. In front of me was a young couple; and by their devoted attention to each other I concluded that they were not married, or if married, were wedded to somebody else than themselves. The gentleman was reading a newspaper; the lady was busy with a novel, and giving an occasional glance out of the window. As soon as the train entered the tunnel it was so dark that you could not see any thing. I heard a struggle. There seemed to be a dislocation of hair, accompanied by a shower of hair-pins. The gentleman's hat fell to the floor, and I heard his paper crush. You would have imagined that a whole flock of school-girls had met another flock of school-girls from whom they had been separated at least six months. By-and-by the train came out of the tunnel. The gentleman was reading his newspaper; the lady was reading her book; all was tranquillity. Will any body explain this extraordinary phenomenon? I am inclined to think it was connected with spiritualism and the dark séance business."

"ONE TOUCH OF NATURE MAKES THE WHOLE WORLD KIN."

A HEAVY SEA—STUDY OF A FRENCHMAN AND A GERMAN.

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 46.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

JAPANESE FANCY-WORK.

THE Japanese, although until latterly so little known and so inaccessible to civilized nations, have, notwithstanding, made great progress in some branches of art. Their manufactures are remarkable, their lacquer-ware unsurpassed for beauty and delicate finish; and although we may perhaps laugh at the grotesqueness of the decorations, the imperfect perspective, and general ugliness of design, yet the execution is worthy of any nation in the world. Others have endeavored to imitate the fine polish to be seen on these Japanese articles, but the best specimens fall short of theirs.

One peculiar feature of their manufactures is the use that is made of paper; for not only is it used for the ordinary purposes common to ourselves, but takes the place of textile fabrics, and is woven into cloth of various kinds, to be made into coats and dresses. It takes the place of leather, and by some unknown secret of their own they give it all the toughness and elasticity, as well as imperviousness to water, peculiar to the latter. All kinds of manufactured material is imitated in paper, from coarse cloth for men's clothing, hats, buttons, and shoes, down to Chinese crapes, with all the crimp and gloss of the original, and cambric pocket-handkerchiefs.

Japanese paper-work embraces also a kind of lace that is woven by hand into beautiful designs for screens, chair tidies, cushions, work-bags, mats, and a hundred other pretty things such as ladies like to make. We have seen one or two beautiful specimens of this work, which is as yet quite new in this country. The paper to be used for the purpose should be fine tissue-paper, cut into long strips a quarter of an inch wide, and may be either all white or of two colors. The next thing to be done is to twist each one of these slantwise, just as one would roll a lamp-lighter. When you have done a dozen or more, begin to twist two together the reverse way, forming a cable; but all the time you must keep the original twists well tightened, as they will have a constant tendency to untwist. They can be made of any required length by piecing on the twists as the work proceeds.

Having thus prepared the cable thread, it is to be formed or woven into a net-work by knots and double knots, very readily done by hand. Starting with any even number of these cables, you

Fig. 1.—BROWN CAMEL'S-HAIR DRESS.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 2.] For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 36-42.

Fig. 2.—BROWN CAMEL'S-HAIR DRESS.—BACK.—[See Fig. 1.] For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 36-42.

Fig. 3.—GRAY VIGOGNE DRESS.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 6.] For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—OLIVE GREEN POPLIN DRESS.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 5.] For description see Supplement.

Fig. 5.—OLIVE GREEN POPLIN DRESS.—BACK.—[See Fig. 4.] For description see Supplement.

Fig. 6.—GRAY VIGOGNE DRESS.—BACK.—[See Fig. 3.] For description see Supplement.

FIGS. 1–6.—LADIES' WINTER HOUSE DRESSES.

Hosted by Google

weave your pattern, taking four to form the knot, but must first fasten the ends to a strip of muslin in an embroidery frame, so as to keep them firm and in place. Next row. Take two threads from one knot and two from another to form an alternation, thus leaving an open square between. Or the threads may be plaited evenly but loosely for the space of an inch; then, by taking two from each plait above to form the one below, the same alternation will be produced, only the spaces will be longer than wide. Either one of these patterns looks well when evenly woven, and if colored paper be introduced in stripes, the effect is pleasantly varied.

The cords, tassels, etc., needed for finishing the specimens may all be manufactured from the same kind of paper.

Another way would be to form a regular network with a netting needle, or crochet it with a loose stitch.

One would naturally expect these things to be very frail and easily broken, but there is a marvelous amount of strength in these twisted threads, and even when wet they do not break very readily. The work is worth trying for its very novelty.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

☞ A Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains more reading matter than an average octavo volume. The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

NEW CHRISTMAS STORY.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS take pleasure in announcing that they will soon commence the publication of a new CHRISTMAS STORY, entitled

"GOLDEN GRAIN,"

by B. L. FARJEON, author of "Blade-o'-Grass," "Bread-and-Cheese and Kisses," "Joshua Marvel," "Griff," and other popular tales. "GOLDEN GRAIN" will be profusely and beautifully illustrated.

As a writer of short stories the author of "Blade-o'-Grass stands without a rival, and our readers have already begun to look for his Christmas Story as one of the most charming attractions of the Winter Holidays. We append the headings of the several chapters of "GOLDEN GRAIN," as a foretaste of the rare treat in store for its readers.

I.

THROUGH COUNTRY ROADS TO SOME GREEN, PLEASANT SPOT.

II.

THANK GOD FOR A GOOD BREAKFAST!

III.

THEY LISTENED WITH ALMOST BREATHLESS ATTENTION TO EVERY WORD THAT FELL FROM HER LIPS.

IV.

FOR MERCY'S SAKE, TELL ME! WHOSE VOICE WAS IT I HEARD JUST NOW?

V.

THEY WON'T WANT NO MORE MOTHERS BY-AND-BY, SIR.

VI.

FOR THESE, AND SUCH AS THESE.

VII.

THEY JUDGE THE LIFE OF AN INDIVIDUAL BY MEANS OF AN AGGREGATE.

VIII.

THIS 'ERE FREE AND 'LIGHTENED COUNTRY OF OURN'S CRAMMED FULL O' TEMPLES O' LIBERTY.

IX.

OPEN YOUR EYES, BABY! SPEAK TO ME! LOOK AT MOTHER, MY LIFE!

X.

NO, NO! BORN IN LOVE! IN LOVE!

XI.

ONCE UPON A TIME THERE LIVED ON AN ISLAND.

XII.

IN THE DIM TWILIGHT OF THAT HOLY DAY.

XIII.

HIS SOUL IS IN YOUR HANDS TO SAVE AND PURIFY.

XIV.

IT IS SUNRISE. A GOLDEN MIST IS RISING FROM THE WATERS.

XV.

FAIRHAVEN.

THE END.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for November 8 was sent out gratuitously a beautifully illustrated

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing a further installment of "PHINEAS REDUX," illustrated, and other literary and pictorial attractions.

Another illustrated EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT, containing a large variety of interesting reading matter, will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for November 15.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of a Single-breasted Basquine, with Short Pouf Walking Skirt; and a Double-breasted Plain Basque, with Apron-front and Square-back Over-Skirt and Long Walking Skirt, will be published with our next Number. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 735.

HUSBAND-SEEKING.

DURING a period, more or less long, of every woman's life the possession of a husband forms an essential element of her ideal bliss. Some become wives, and having full opportunity to make the comparison, can judge of the relative merits of the real and the fanciful. Though suspecting that the sober second thought of matrimony does not always reveal the blissful existence presumed by the fond anticipation of maiden hope, yet we are far from wishing to discourage those the fate of whom it may be to test the happiness of connubial life.

By every theoretical socialist, whether a reorganizer of society or constructor of a romance, marriage, or something like it, is deemed an essential element of the perfected plan or successful plot. In the reformed community the sexes are paired with the proverbial harmony of a couple of doves, and in the conventional novel Araminta is sure to find herself in the beloved arms of her proper Augustus at the end of the volume.

Real life, however, is a perpetual contradiction to the theories of the reformer and the fancies of the romancist. Matrimony is by no means the universal fate of woman. There are, and there always will be, as long as society is as now constituted, a great many left to "maiden meditation, fancy-free."

We must recognize the fact that there will remain, after all the giving in marriage, a large number of permanent spinsters—and may they live in perpetual juvenescence of health and feeling! The old maid, in the ordinary scornful sense of that term, is not a necessary product of civilization. The shrunk and angular form, the drawn, parchment-like face, the harsh and plaintive voice, the testy temper, the prudish disposition, the unsocial reserve, the feeble, hysterical condition of the nervous system, and useless life, are not necessary characteristics of the unmarried woman. There are enough examples of health, usefulness, amiability, and even of beauty among spinsters of an advanced age to prove that old maidishness is not an essential consequence of unmarried life. There are not only the many notable single women of the world—the Miss MARTINEAUS, the Lady BURDETT-COUTTSES, the FLORENCE NIGHTINGALES, and so many others—who have illustrated their unmarried lives by a constant activity of virtue and usefulness, but even the most limited private circle can supply its model of maiden excellence. Who does not know the good unmarried aunt, who, after soothing by her constancy of devotion and care the sufferings of the dying wife, and robbing even death of half its terrors by her assurance that the children shall have her protecting care, fulfills her promise so nobly that they feel the loss of a mother only in name? There are, we know, not a few women who may be truly said to be living in single blessedness, and this we mean to be taken in its widest and most earnest sense. There are, however, a great many, unfortunately, who, if they fail to obtain husbands, drag out their remnant of life a weariness to themselves and a scorn to others.

The prevailing practice of regarding matrimony as the chief aim of woman's life is the most common cause of the frequent perversion of the grace and other qualities which naturally belong to the feminine character.

The great defect of female education is the stress laid upon the showy, and the neglect of the useful. The apparent purpose is to render young women outwardly attractive, so that they may readily catch the eye of the prosperous men of our age, who are essentially governed in the choice of wives, as of their furniture and equipage, by their effectiveness for display. The demand is necessarily a limited one, and the supply disproportionately large. At the same time, every woman seems to think her chance of the rich and rare purchaser so sure that she only adapts her wares to his requirements. She thus foolishly narrows her market, and exposes herself to the imminent risk of being left with a stock of useless and fading charms. A more substantial education would not only fit women better for wives, but increase their chances of becoming such. A less wealthy but more numerous class of men, no longer as now startled and turned away by the useless and costly splendors of the belle, would, encouraged by the discreet reserve and prudent qualities of the solidly educated woman, approach boldly and offer themselves. Thus not only would disappointment be more rare, but its consequences less disastrous. The well-educated woman can always fall back upon the abundant resources her own cultivated mind naturally supplies. With her the comparative solitude of maiden life is but increased opportunity for culture, and lengthening years only enlarged experience of its pleasures and benefits. The superficially accomplished woman, on the other hand, who has been merely trained to the trickery of self-decoration, finds with the loss of her chance of catching a husband that her gewgaw adornments are useless, and with the sobriety of advanced age, ludicrous. Her life thus becomes objectless, and she a victim of ennui and morbid longings, which can neither be stifled nor gratified, and physicians know that these are among the most common causes of woman's mental misery and bodily suffering.

FALL VISITORS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

THE world is full of wasps. There are four crawling over the window-shade, half a dozen more sunning themselves on the glass, two or three creeping out of the curtain folds. In fact, you can not stir any thing without disturbing a wasp. Out-doors their buzz is incessant. The sunny south angle is alive with their fussing and fuming. Where they lodge no one can find out. This morning, behind a closed south blind, a colony of them was found hanging to the window-sash outside. They were gathered in a close cluster, as if they had clubbed together to keep warm, and perhaps they had, for they seem to be a slow, cold-blooded race. A fly is swift, active, continually busy. He moves as if he had an object in life, as if he had taken out a contract, and were paid by the job; but a wasp crawls around sluggishly, as if he were not going any where in particular, and did not much care whether he got there or not. So he stops midway, and tries to start up his torpid liver by a sun-bath; but midway is far from being the safe way for him. It is just there, reflective and immovable, that the newspaper or the wet towel comes slap down on him like a thousand avalanches; and it is only when the newspaper and wet towel have missed fire, have startled without stunning him, that he shows any agility in walking. With such incentives to exertion, I have seen a wasp in a hurry, tiptoeing frantically along, with wings upstretched, like BLONDIN on his tight rope; but ordinarily he comes as Lady Geraldine went to Mr. Bertram after he had half recovered from his dead faint,

"Ever, ever more the while in a slow silence."

Wasps have the credit or discredit of being an irritable race, stinging on the slightest provocation. That may be, but our wasps are evidently a better-bred species, as they have stung no one yet, though they have had every excuse for doing so. Wet cloths have been slung at them, death has menaced them at the brush end of the broom, scalding water has been the slightest of their provocations, the duster has restricted them to the dust-pan till the burning fiery furnace ingulfed them to a swift and, we trust, an almost painless departure from a terrified world, yet through it all they have never pushed one sting. But as the poor invalid, who was wofully disturbed by the cock crowing, remarked to chanticleer's owner, who affirmed that he never crowed more than half a dozen times of a morning, "You think of what I suffer when he crows; you do not count what I suffer from the feeling that he is going to crow!" as PRESCOTT, the historian, says of the reign of terror in the Netherlands under the Inquisition and PHILIP II., "the amount of suffering from such a persecution is not to be estimated merely by the number of those who have actually suffered death, when the fear of death hung like a naked sword over every man's head;" so the reason why wasps are a nuisance is not the amount of physical pain but mental discomfort that they cause you. As in monetary circles, they create a panic by destroying confidence. So while the busy, friendly flies we poison with sugared water, tenderly, as if we loved them, at the wasps, equally harmless, but with harmful possibilities, we go out as against a foe, with deadly weapons and fierce, relentless hostility.

The gravel-walk before the front-door has been honey-combed with holes, some of which on investigation proved to be three or four inches deep—as deep as the point of your sun-umbrella. A little winged beast, black and vermilion, with two curved sickles on his head, made the holes by vigorous digging. What was the name of the little horned beast, or what he was up to, I do not know, not being sufficiently well-read in natural history; but he spent a good deal of time in the hole, and seemed to be very busy when he was out of it. I watched them several days. Had they been but a single pair, I should have perhaps eclipsed THOREAU for waiting, and PLINY for discovering, but they came in hordes; they seemed determined to monopolize the walk. Every time you stepped out-of-doors the air was alive and angry with a swarm of spiteful, vicious, vermilion little vixens buzzing about your ears. So one sunny morning I sat on the door-step, and as soon as a fiery imp went down into his gallery I poked the gravel on him with my parasol, till every house within reach had caved in. The others somehow got wind of it, and they all went away. If they are an absolutely harmless tribe, I am sorry I did it, but no doubt there are plenty more, and they must learn to colonize on land that has not already been pre-empted.

Resting on a rock by the road-side one afternoon, we noticed a little fellow something like a beetle, but apparently not a beetle, digging away for dear life. He was making a hole, and he worked at it with a very comical energy. His slender little claws—antennæ, or whatever you call them—made the dirt fly, and when the heap was so large as to obstruct the entrance to his gallery, he leveled it with admirable swiftness and skill. Sometimes he went in head first and pawed, and sometimes he went in tail first and shoved. The size of the pebbles which he lugged out was surprising—one you could not get into a number seven thimble—and the persistence with which he tugged and toiled over his load was amazing. When the gallery was apparently finished he flew away. Soon a wriggling was observed in the grass two or three yards off, and there appeared our bonnie bug riding a big brown locust three or four times as long as himself. This locust proved, however, to be dead or very much demoralized. The bug was striding his neck, and dragging him along by main force. When within a foot and a half of the cavern the bug left the locust, ran forward and examined the hole, trotted back and forth several times between the two, evidently taking measurements with his eye, made the excavation a little deeper, dragged up the locust to his grave, tilted him over the edge, and shot him in head-foremost! As he did not at once wholly disappear, the bug leaped in himself, dragged him down, then climbed out, shoveled in the dirt upon him, leaped in after it, and trod it all down snug and close around every part, till, by a laborious process, the hole was completely and compactly filled, the heap of gravel leveled, and no sign left of the burial but a patch of fresh earth. If I could have staid a little longer, I suppose I should have seen him put up a head-stone with an epitaph, but I was obliged to go. It was as interesting a display of skill, persistence, and activity as one often witnesses; and I should very much like to know whether it was a foe that he was burying, or food that he was salting down for winter.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FUR SETS.

THE appearance of lethargy that belongs half the year to furriers' establishments is abandoned with the first cool days, and their costly stock is displayed for inspection. The fashionable set of furs for the coming winter will consist of a boa and muff. The boa is from a yard and a half to two yards long; seal-skin boas are made flat, while those of longer furs, such as fox, marten, and lynx, are round. Fur collars are little worn except by old ladies, invalids, and those who are exposed to long cold drives in the country. Muffs are of medium size, just large enough to hold the hands, and too small to be burdensome or clumsy-looking. To this set those who can afford it add a fur wrap, usually of seal-skin, which is sacque-shaped, and from twenty-five to thirty inches long.

RUSSIAN SABLE.

The most costly and desirable fur is the fine dark brown Russian sable. The supply of these valuable skins is said to grow less yearly. A set, consisting of muff and boa, costs from $1000 to

Hosted by Google

$1600; those at $1000 are very soft, dark, and fine. The boa is partly flattened, very lightly stuffed, and finished with two tips on each end. The muff may have tail tips also, or else bows of gros grain ribbon ornamented with soutache or passementerie and fringe. Lighter shades of Russian sable sold in sets cost from $200 to $750.

Desirable furs called sable-tail sets are very handsome in the dark shades, and far less expensive than those just mentioned, costing from $55 to $400. The lowest-priced sets resemble the better qualities of mink. Hudson Bay sable is made up in the way described for Russian sable; a set of this fur worth $350 is luxurious-looking, while those as low as $100 are very deep, rich, and warm. Old ladies are especially fond of this fur; hence it is shown made in collars as well as boas.

FISHER-TAIL SETS.

The fisher-tail sets introduced last season resemble dark sable in appearance, and are now ranked among choice furs. The back of this animal has brown shaded stripes, but the darker tips only are used to make the "tail" sets, which cost from $80 to $200. Such sets will probably be the favorite of the coming winter, as they are elegant, and considered stylish.

FOX FURS.

The fancy for dark long furs has brought fox furs into vogue, and these look especially handsome with the black and dark costumes now worn. Black fox, which is the first choice, is a soft dark fur, considered very dressy. A muff of darkest shades costs from $150 to $300; but boas worth the same amount are far lighter, as rolling the fur in a round boa discloses its light roots. The beautiful silver-fox fur is dark gray with the slightest tips of white. This is greatly in favor with young ladies, and is particularly appropriate for black velvet. The sets of muff and boa cost from $80 to $200. A slight band of this trimming is very stylish on velvet Dolmans or polonaises, and costs from $12 to $15 per yard. The Parisian fancy for arranging this trimming on long velvet polonaises is merely to put it around the neck and down each front, omitting a border around the lower edge of the polonaise. Sets of the less expensive blue fox are very pretty, and cost from $27 to $40. White fox sets, used for evening, cost $17.

SEAL-SKIN.

Seal-skin sacques will be the favorite wrap this winter, as they were last; they are liked because, though sufficiently dressy for most occasions, they are so plain and comfortable-looking that a lady is never overdressed in them. There is no economy in purchasing low-priced seal sacques, as all seal-skins are colored, and the cheaper grades are so badly dyed that the pelt becomes tender from acids used in the dye, and the garment will scarcely endure a season's wear. The new sacques are double-breasted, with a revers coat collar, are slightly shaped to the figure, and are longer than those of last year. They are considered especially elegant when bordered with unplucked otter, Russian sable, silver-fox, fisher-tail, and other rich furs; plucked otter, beaver, and black marten borders are also used. Bordered sacques, with muffs bordered to correspond, cost from $125 to $500. Plain sacques without trimming, but of shapely, stylish fit, and of the average length—from twenty-six to twenty-eight inches—cost from $90 upward. Seal sets of muff and boa are admired for plain dressing and also for ladies in mourning. The boa is long and flat, and costs from $8 to $20; and a muff to correspond is worth from $10 to $20.

BLACK MARTEN AND LYNX.

Among the dark furs that are now preferred black marten is most popularly used, and is most inexpensive, as sets cost from $15 to $24. This fur is also used for trimming plain velvet and cloth wraps, and costs from $2 to $4 a yard. Black lynx is a glossy soft black fur, very pretty to look at, and also very stylish, but is objectionable, as it cracks, and spoils the clothing with which it is worn. The finest colored lynx has brown ground; when entirely black it is almost sure to rub off. The sets of muff and boa are higher than last season, costing from $28 to $30. The black monkey furs, long and lustrous, are much used in England and by Canadians. Astrakhan and black Russian lamb furs are still worn by ladies in mourning, and by conservative women who think more of comfort than novelty. An Astrakhan sacque, muff, and boa can now be purchased for $60; a similar set of Russian lamb costs from $45 to $60. The first choice, however, in these Oriental furs is the smooth silken Persiani or baby-lamb. The three articles in this fur cost from $100 to $150.

MINK, ERMINE, ETC.

Mink has been crowded out of favor by the introduction of the various fancy furs, such as fox, seal, etc., but sets of it are prepared for the many who will still cling to it at various prices, ranging from $20 to $100. Ermine is no longer considered the most dressy fur, and is little used except in Dolmans, for evening cloaks, and in opera sacques. These wraps cost from $250 to $300. The sets once so stylish for visiting and theatre dress now cost only $30 for the best qualities. The pretty white grebe sets have also lost favor, and are reduced to $20 or $25 a set. Fine Arica chinchilla muffs and boas worn with velvet cloaks bordered with chinchilla are very rich and dressy, and will be more used than of late, as they closely resemble silver-fox furs; the boa and muff cost from $50 to $75; the trimmings from $7 to $15 a yard.

To sum up the matter of comfortable furs, setting sable aside as a luxury, the fisher-tail and black fox sets are generally preferred this season for stylish matrons, silver-fox for fashionable young ladies, while for ladies of moderate means, either young or old, the choice lies between seal and black marten.

CHILDREN'S FURS.

Seal furs will be preferred for children this winter. The set consists of a sacque, muff, and boa; the sacques cost from $50 to $75, muffs from $8 to $12, and boas are about the price of muffs. A turban to be worn with these sets costs from $7 to $10. There are also warm and durable sets of the curly gray krimmer and of gray Persiani at much lower prices. White cony sacques, muffs, and turbans are pretty for tiny little girls, and are very reasonable in price. The best and most durable cony fur sacques cost from $7 to $10, muffs are $1 50 only, and the turban is the same price.

SEAL-SKIN HATS.

Seal-skin hats are named in honor of the Marchioness of Lorne. The first called the Lorne is a regular Scotch cap without brim, the crown drooping behind, and finished by a gros grain bow; the tiny head of the seal ornaments the front. These are intended for young misses, school-girls, and children. They cost from $6 to $12. The Marchioness is the name given to a more English-looking hat, with Derby crown and rolled brim. A tuft of game feathers, dark green and scarlet, or else of golden pheasant feathers, ornaments the front. Price from $10 to $16. Instead of the Canadian hat, with wide, upturned band, worn by gentlemen last year, there is a new cap with a flaring brim that may be turned down in front as a visor, while the separate back brim will also afford protection from cold.

WINTER BONNETS.

As velvet bonnets appear on the street, it is evident that the Directoire shape is destined to favor. This is a broad, medium low crown, with upturned coronet, flaring more or less, as fancy dictates, and sloping downward behind. Illustrations of this bonnet are given in the present number. The black velvet Directoire bonnets are especially handsome. The crown and brim are smoothly covered, and a piping of soft silk edges the brim; a puff or twist, partly velvet, partly silk, is under the brim as face trimming; a ruche of ostrich feathers is placed on the coronet; three upright loops of velvet are on the left side of the brim, holding it close to the crown; two demi-plumes spring from the loop over the back, and an ornament of glittering cut steel is put in the loops. Black strings tie the bonnet under the chin, and, unless a single deep crimson rose is added behind, the bonnet is left entirely black. Ladies with blonde hair find these all-black bonnets especially becoming. Other bonnets with the Directoire coronet have soft cap crowns of silk, with the ornaments placed in front over the velvet coronet. This is prettily exemplified in a steel-colored bonnet to be worn with a suit of silk of the same color, trimmed with velvet. This bonnet has also a fluted velvet band turned up behind against the crown, and a single drooping rose. The feather ruches, or ostrich feather bands, as we have called them hitherto, are very stylish trimmings. Very little lace is used this season, and there is a fancy for using fine steel instead of jet on black bonnets. A single steel ornament is tasteful, but a profusion of small steel buckles and fringe in a bonnet is tawdry-looking. Some very elegant French bonnets copy the styles of the First Empire, and have a projecting scoop front, and a brim turned up on the left side. Flowers do not appear on all bonnets, but feathers seem to be considered essential. Felt round hats of fine quality are chosen in the dark shades of the suit with which they are worn, and trimmed with the silk or velvet of the dress garniture. For evening bonnets to wear at the opera or for afternoon receptions very light velvets are used, trimmed with feathers of the same shade and bright roses.

FANCY SILKS.

The handsomest fancy silks displayed this season have watered stripes three inches wide, and are used for trimmings as well as for entire dresses. They show two shades of a color, slate, myrtle, and other dark stylish colors. For evening dresses are alternate stripes of satin and moiré in pale rose, blue, and pearl. Prices range from $3 50 to $5 50 a yard.

For elegant polonaises to be worn over velvet skirts there are striped velvets, alternating inch-wide stripes of gros grain and velvet, or else satin and velvet. These are shown in black, brown, maroon, and other dark colors.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A novelty just introduced is English embroidered cashmere, all eyelet-holes and compasses, the open-work done with silk floss, and to be worn over black silk in tunics, sleeveless jackets, and, indeed, polonaises. It is shown in gray, brown, and black.

Sets of linked balls for collar and cuffs, in black, gray, blue, and red fancy compositions, and also in oxidized silver, cost $1 75.

The newest linen collars, high and flaring behind, with rounded fronts, are made with tiny chemisettes, and sold for 35 cents; fastened by balls and a chain, they cost $1. These are in the best style and well made. With embroidered edges, they cost from $1 25 to $2 50.

It is the fashion abroad for ladies when traveling to wear leather bags slung over the shoulders like a tourist's strap-sachel. Side pockets and pockets behind in redingotes are preferred here. Fanciful pockets made entirely of jet net-work and fringed are worn with black silk dresses.

Little girls wear Normandy caps of black velvet, trimmed with colored ribbons and Valenciennes lace. Later in the season Normandy caps of white cony-skin will be worn with the little fur sacque cloak to match. Larger girls wear felt hats with low crowns and turned-up brims, pointed and dented fancifully, bound with velvet, and ornamented with a wing or cock's plumes, and worn far back on the head above flowing wavy hair or else long braids.

For information received thanks are due, for furs, to C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS; for bonnets, to Madame FERRERO; and for dresses and dress materials, to Mrs. CONNELLY; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; and ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.

PERSONAL.

MR. MONCURE D. CONWAY writes to the Cincinnati Commercial that JOAQUIN MILLER has been invited by various members of the British aristocracy to visit them at their country mansions without success, and that he even declined to enter into a special arrangement planned by Mr. GLADSTONE to meet the Prince of Wales at dinner at his (the Prime Minister's) house. Mr. GLADSTONE has a great admiration for Mr. MILLER, and invited him to pass some weeks at Hawarden Castle, which was declined. The poet is quite intimate with Lord HOUGHTON, and goes often to Fryeton Hall. It is said there is not a country mansion or castle in England on whose table may not be found just now Songs of the Sierras and Life among the Modocs. Nothing suits the blasé English aristocracy better than dare-deviltry. The more plodding middle class people regard some of Mr. MILLER'S stories as mythical, and even "huge," but the aristocracy are not very critical, and rejoice in a man who has "seen life."

—Baron REUTER is reaping a golden harvest from our panic. Four or five times the usual number of messages have passed through his office, and a vast commercial correspondence has been carried on by wire. For ten days past the receipts of his office were from $15,000 to $25,000 per day.

—The title of the charming little volume of poems, Sounds from Secret Chambers, by Miss LAURA C. REDDEN, otherwise known as "Howard Glyndon," just published by J. R. OSGOOD & Co., has a pathetic meaning. Since her childhood Miss REDDEN has had the misfortune to be entirely deaf, and for a long time mute as well, though within the last few years she has learned to use her voice at the Clarke Institute, at Northampton, Massachusetts, and can now bear her share in a conversation with little difficulty, though, of course, her interlocutor must reduce his remarks to writing. It is hard to imagine how one whose ear perforce can not be attuned to music can produce such melodious verses as are found in this collection. Some of them first saw light, by-the-way, in the columns of the Bazar.

—When King VICTOR EMANUEL was at Berlin he excited some surprise by not touching a single dish at any of the royal banquets, nor even taking his napkin from his plate. The explanation has been given that the king is extremely frugal, takes but one meal a day, and that consisting of only three dishes, prepared by his own cook, just before his bed-time. Whenever his Majesty departs in the slightest from this extraordinary habit, he is completely overpowered by sleepiness, and is therefore obliged to be particularly careful at a foreign court or on any state occasion. He is also very moderate as regards wine.

—The Rev. Dr. JOSEPH PARKER, of London, one of the PAIXHAN guns at the Evangelical Alliance, sends to Dr. PRIME, of the Observer, a card of thanks for hospitalities received. He thinks, however, that our churches have "too much organ blowing and choir singing" to suit his taste.

—The Rev. Dr. JOSEPH T. DURYEA is making an authorized compilation of hymns to be used in the Presbyterian Church in the United States. It will contain one thousand hymns, and will be completed next year.

—Although LANDSEER was especially petted by the royal family of England, and by Prince ALBERT in particular, yet the latter is said to have been neither a genial companion nor generous patron, and with artists he was seen at his worst. In paying for works of art, he was not merely shabby, but penurious, and artists resented not so much the loss of the money which they would have obtained elsewhere as the insulting estimate of the value of their works. Several of the artists who painted pictures for the summer-house at Buckingham Palace returned the checks he sent to them. JOHN PHILIP, when at Osborne painting the "Marriage of the Princess Royal," found that he was expected to take his meals either in his painting-room or with the steward, and preferred to adjourn to a public-house near at hand, declaring that he would never accept another commission. Even if the Prince had been a more genial person, it was scarcely possible that LANDSEER and he should pull well together; and so it happened that after a time the painter's visits to court became less frequent, and then little more than formal. He felt the difference, and it wounded him terribly. There is a paragraph in the Court Circular, written by the Queen herself, in which she speaks of her high personal regard for LANDSEER, and her grief for his death.

—The Rev. Dr. IRENÆUS PRIME, who, as secretary of the Evangelical Alliance, did most of its detail work, says to those who have complained about its arrangements, that "if pained by any failure in the management to meet their wishes, they must forget their disappointment and vexation in the grandeur of the result."

—Mr. BRAND, Speaker of the House of Commons, is a relation of ours—that is to say, in a federal sort of way. Two years ago his nephew, Colonel LEOPOLD SEYMOUR, married Miss STURGIS, a daughter of Mr. RUSSELL STURGIS, the American partner of the BARINGS; and a son of Mr. STURGIS has more recently married a daughter of Mr. BRAND. The Speaker is heir-presumptive to his brother's barony of Dacre—one of those ancient titles which, devolving on female in default of male heirs, has passed, since its creation in the thirteenth century, through a number of families. The wife of Mr. Speaker is a lady of rare accomplishments and grace, and admirably fitted to be the helpmeet of a man in high position.

—Lord COWPER in a recent speech took occasion to observe of the members of the House of Lords, that "most of them are bores, and the remainder fools." CARLYLE once opened one of his lectures with a remark to the same effect: "Gentlemen and ladies, England is a country containing a population of twenty millions of people, mostly bores."

—Miss AGNES ETHEL was married a few days since to Mr. FRANCIS W. TRACY, of Buffalo. Mr. TRACY'S father, the late ALBERT H. TRACY, was one of the ablest men of his time. He was elected to Congress from the district comprising nearly all that portion of New York west of Geneva before he was of the requisite legal age, but attained that necessity before taking his seat in 1819. He was twice re-elected. Subsequently he served four years in the Senate of New York, and was one of the ablest men in that body, embracing at that time men of the highest eminence in the State. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS offered him a seat in the cabinet, which he declined. Mr. RALPH WALDO EMERSON regarded Mr. ALBERT H. TRACY as a man of the most remarkable conversational powers he had ever known.

—Mr. H. M. STANLEY, the gentleman who on behalf of the New York Herald did that enterprising journal the honor to discover Dr. LIVINGSTONE, has just sailed from Liverpool for the west coast of Africa as a correspondent for the London Times. He took with him a steam-launch.

—M. GOUNOD, whose Faust and other musications are the delight of modern times, is described as a not particularly intelligent, middle-aged man, with spectacles, blonde hair, and side whiskers.

—Miss CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN, in reply to Colonel FORNEY'S remark—"You are now alone in your great art; your fame has no competitor; where shall we find an equal to succeed you?"—said, "No, my good friend, nobody is indispensable. Madame JANAUSCHEK is my equal, and besides, she is younger, and so handsome!" It may be added, that Madame JANAUSCHEK is one of the richest women in her profession, and very generous with her money.

—It is not often that husband and wife are poets. But the Bishop of Derry and Mrs. ALEXANDER are exceptions, and they have contributed some exquisite verses, on the late Bishop of Winchester's death, to a new book of religious poetry, edited by Canon BAYNES, soon to be published.

—Gentlemen visiting Galesburg, Illinois, who require the services of a barber, can readily find in his "parlor, in the Opera-house block, Mr. A. A. FOLLOCK, Professor of Crinicultural Abscission and Craniological Tripsis," as he simply and tersely states it.

—Mr. MONCURE D. CONWAY expresses the opinion that Archbishop MANNING is at the present moment the most prominent figure in the Roman Catholic Church in Europe.

—The proprietors of the Metropolitan Hotel in this city, Messrs. BRESLIN, PURSELL, & Co., were very prompt in coming to the aid of the sufferers from yellow fever in Memphis, having telegraphed to the Mayor to draw on them for $500. There are many men of Memphis who have experienced, at the Metropolitan, the truth of SHENSTONE'S verse:

> "Whoe'er has traveled life's dull round,
> Where'er his footsteps may have been,
> May sigh to think he still has found
> His warmest welcome at an inn."

—Some two years ago an English nobleman visited the Free Library in Boston, and fell in love with the young lady in charge of its business department. He showed her his letters of introduction, and "popped." Before she answered she insisted upon taking him to her parents, poor but intelligent people, living in the country. They and he were satisfied; but the young lady said he should return to England, and if his parents consented, she would be his wife. In a couple of months he returned, in company with his sister, and they were married. Colonel FORNEY vouches for this on the authority of a good Philadelphian, formerly from New England.

—Sir SAMUEL and Lady BAKER have arrived in London, after their long and perilous wanderings in Africa. Great commercial results are anticipated from the projected railway to Khartoom, said to be the finest coffee-growing district in the world. Sir SAMUEL and Lady BAKER are greatly amused at the reputation which the latter has obtained for Amazonian qualities. The simple fact is, she braved danger and difficulty, just as Lady HARRIET AUCKLAND did during our Revolutionary war, in order to be with her husband in moments of trial, and to attend to him should he be struck down with illness.

—Mr. C. J. CLINCH, United States Consul at Bordeaux, is about to resign his position, to take the place of the late Mr. WARDEN in the Paris house of A. T. STEWART & Co. Mr. CLINCH is a relative of Mr. STEWART.

—The Rev. Dr. THATCHER THAYER, of Newport, Rhode Island, has been made happy by his congregation, who in accepting his resignation presented him with $16,000, and granted him a pension of $1000 a year during his life.

—Dr. WALTER BRISCOE, an American, for many years a resident of Paris, died recently in that city at the age of eighty, leaving a fortune of half a million. He was a witty, jocular man, and any time these twenty years might be seen between two and six P.M. sipping his claret in front of the Café Riche. Of him it might be said, as the old ballad said of Sir John:

> "His 'and was free, his means was easy;
> A finer, nobler gent than he
> Ne'er drove about the Shons-Eleesy,
> Or paced the Roo de Rivolee."

—Incidents quite unprecedented in the ritual way occurred at the closing hours of the Evangelical Alliance. At Dr. JOHN HALL'S Scotch Presbyterian church the communion service was administered by Episcopal Bishop CUMMINS, of Kentucky, assisted by Dr. ARNOT, of Edinburgh, and Dr. DORNER, of Berlin. The bishop remarked that in all his ministry he had never before communed with his Presbyterian brethren, but that this should not be the last time. At Dr. BOOTH'S Presbyterian church Rev. Dr. FREEMANTLE, of the Church of England, assisted the pastor in the administration of the communion. Both churches were crowded. These circumstances, taken in connection with the letter of the late Missionary Bishop of Zanzibar to the "Lord Bishop" of New York, in which he takes the Dean of Canterbury to task for his participation in Presbyterian communion during the Conference, indicates that something is about to happen, and that there is to be no end of worriting among those who are opposed to E. A's.

Hosted by Google

Crochet Night Net for Girl from 10 to 12 Years old.

THIS crochet net is closed by a ribbon run through the stitches of one of the outer rounds. Begin from the middle with twisted crochet cotton, No. 40, as follows: 1st round.—Seven times alternately 7 ch. (chain stitch), 1 sc. (single crochet) on the first of these; finally, 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the first ch. of this round. 2d round.—4 sl. on the next 4 st. (stitch) of the preceding round, * 7 ch., 4 dc. (double crochet) on the first 4 of these 7 ch., working off the upper veins, however, not separately but together, drawing the thread through once, 1 sc. on the middle of the next 7 ch.

NIGHT-SHIRT FOR BOY FROM 14 TO 16 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 57–63.

NIGHT-DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 14 TO 16 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 19ª, 19ᵇ–24.

the beginning of this round work 1 sl. more. 13th round.—Like the 7th round. 14th, 15th, and 16th rounds.—Like the 4th, 5th, and 6th rounds. 17th–23d rounds.—Like the 11th round. 24th round.—Like the 7th round. This completes the crown of the net. Border the net with a round of holes between two rounds of sc., and with an edging as follows: 1st round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round. 2d round.—4 ch., which count as first stc. (short treble crochet), 2 stc. on the next 2 st., then always alternately 3 ch., pass over 3 st. of the preceding round, 3 stc. on the next 3 st.; finally, 3 ch., 1 sl. on the fourth of the 4 ch. counting as first stc. in this round. 3d round.—1 sc. on each st. in the preceding round. 4th round.—3 ch.,

DRAWERS FOR GIRL FROM 14 TO 16 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

DRAWERS FOR GIRL FROM 14 TO 16 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 17 and 18.

CROCHET NIGHT NET FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.

NIGHT-CAP FOR GIRL FROM 12 TO 14 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 68 and 69.

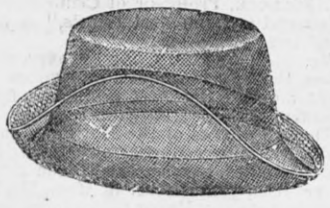

Fig. 1.—BONNET FRAME.

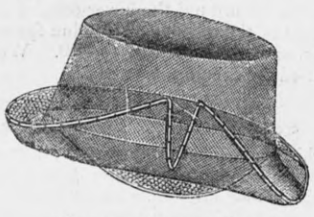

Fig. 2.—BONNET FRAME.

NIGHT SACQUE FOR GIRL FROM 14 TO 16 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 43–47.

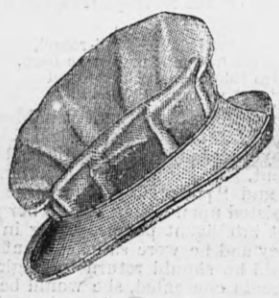

Fig. 5.—BONNET FRAME.

Fig. 3.—BONNET FRAME.

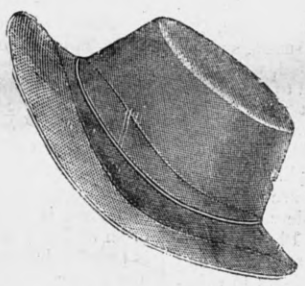

Fig. 4.—BONNET FRAME.

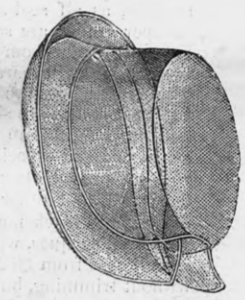

Fig. 6.—BONNET FRAME.

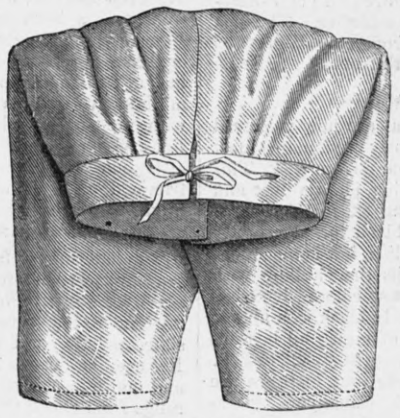
of the preceding round; repeat six times from . 3d round.—3 sl. on the next 3 st. of the preceding round, then always alternately 1 sc. on the extremity of the next point, 9 ch.; finally, 1 sl. on the first sc. of this round. 4th round.— 3 ch., which count as first dc., 1 dc. on the next sc. (here the first sc.) of the preceding round, 3 ch., 2 dc. on the same sc. on which already 1 dc. was worked, 9 ch.; repeat from *, but in the repetition, of course, 1 dc. is worked instead of the first 3 ch.; this will not be referred to again in the following rounds. Finally, work 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. 5th round.—2 sl. on

DRAWERS FOR GIRL FROM 2 TO 4 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 53 and 54.

the next 2 st. in the preceding round, * 3 ch., which count as first dc., 2 dc. on the next 3 ch. of the preceding round, 3 ch., 3 dc. on the same 3 ch. on which dc. have already been worked, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the next 2 ch. scallops of the 3d and 4th rounds above each other, 10 ch., 1 sc. on the same ch. scallops of the 3d and 4th rounds, so that the last 10 ch. form a loop, 5 ch.; repeat from *; finally, 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. in this round. 6th round.—3 sl. on the next 3 st. of the preceding round, * 3 ch., which count as first dc., 3 dc on the next 3 ch. of the preceding round, 5 ch., 4 dc. on the same 3 ch. on which dc. have already been worked, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. loop, 10 ch., 1 sc. on the same ch. loop, 5 ch.; repeat from *; finally, 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. in this round. 7th round.—5 sl. on the next 5

SHIRT FOR BOY FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 25–31.



UNDER-DRAWERS FOR BOY FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 55 and 56.

which count as first dc., then always alternately 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following st. in the preceding round; finally, 1 ch., 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. 5th round.—4 ch., the first 3 of which count as first dc., twice alternately 1 dc. on the second following st. of the preceding round, 1 ch., then 1 dc. on the second following st., * 10 ch., pass over 5 st. of the preceding round, 1 dc. on the following st., three times alternately 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following st.; repeat from *; finally, 10 ch., 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. in this round. 6th round.—2 sl. on the next 2 st. of the preceding round, 4 ch., the first 3 of which count as first dc., 1 dc. on

CHEMISE FOR GIRL FROM 13 TO 15 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 66 and 67.

st. in the preceding round, then always alternately 1 sc. on the middle of the next 5 ch. worked always between 4 dc. in the preceding round, 10 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. loop, 10 ch.; finally, 1 sl. on the first sc. of this round. 8th, 9th, and 10th rounds.—Like the 4th, 5th, and 6th rounds. 11th round.—4 sl. on the next 4 st. of the preceding round, * 3 ch., which count as first dc., 4 dc. on the next 5 ch., 5 ch., 5 dc. on the same 5 ch. on which dc. have already been worked, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the next ch. loop, 10 ch., 1 sc. on the same ch. loop on which the last sc. was worked, 5 ch.; repeat from *; finally, 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. in this round. 12th round.—Like the 11th round, but in

CHEMISE FOR GIRL FROM 14 TO 16 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 64 and 65.

Hosted by Google

the second following st., * on the next ch. scallop work three times alternately 3 dc., 1 p. (picot, consisting of 5 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of these), then 3 dc. on the same ch. scallop, 1 dc. on the second of the next 4 dc. separated always by 1 ch. in the preceding round, 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following st.; repeat from *; finally, work three times alternately 3 dc. on the last ch. scallop, 1 p., then 3 dc. on the same ch. scallop, and 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch. counting as first dc. in this round. Run linen tape through the round of holes.

Winter Hats and Bonnets, with Frames, Figs. 1-9; and Figs. 1-6, Page 724.

Figs. 1–6, page 724, show various fashionable frames for winter hats and bonnets.

Fig. 1.—BLACK VELVET RUBENS BONNET. The revers of this bonnet is trimmed with a binding and rolls of pink gros grain and with black lace. The bonnet is trimmed, besides, with loops and ends of black watered ribbon and pink gros grain ribbon, and with a spray of wild roses and blackberries. Strings of watered ribbon.

Fig. 1.—BLACK VELVET RUBENS BONNET.

Fig. 2.—DARK OLIVE GREEN FAILLE CHÂTELAINE BONNET. The revers of this bonnet is bound with light olive green faille. The trimming consists of loops and ends of light and dark material, black lace, and flowers. Tulle and lace strings.

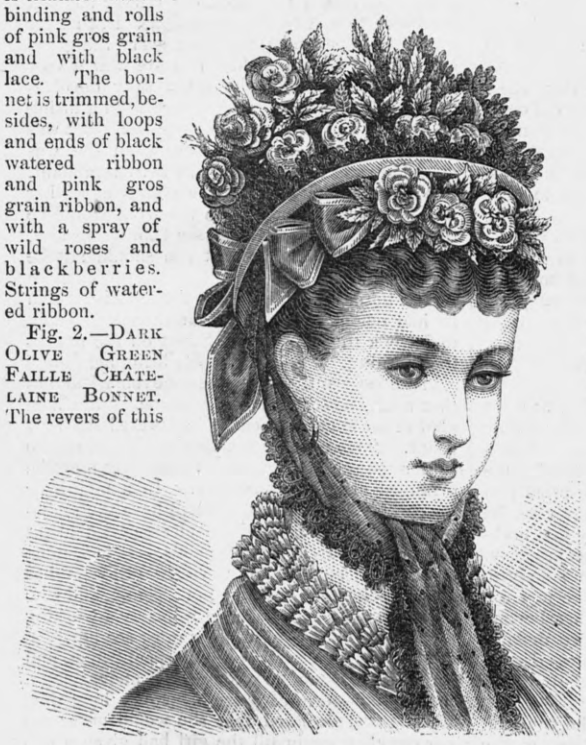


Fig. 2.—DARK OLIVE GREEN FAILLE CHÂTELAINE BONNET.

Fig. 3.—BLACK TULLE DIRECTOIRE BONNET. This bonnet is trimmed with pale blue gros grain, light and dark blue ostrich feathers, and sprays of roses. Black tulle and lace strings.

Fig. 4.—DARK BLUE VELVET MARIE ANTOINETTE HAT. The rim, which is turned up on the sides, is bound with light blue gros grain. The trimming consists of white lace, loops and ends of velvet bound with gros grain, a light blue ostrich feather, and a bead flower.

Fig. 5.—BROWN FAILLE RABAGAS BONNET. The rim is bound with velvet of the same color. The bonnet is trimmed, besides, with loops and ends of faille and velvet, with lace, a pale pink feather, and a spray of flowers. Tulle and lace strings.

Fig. 5.—BROWN FAILLE RABAGAS BONNET.

Fig. 6.—GRAY FAILLE SPANISH GYPSY BONNET. This bonnet is trimmed with ruches, loops and ends of gray faille, a heron feather, a black tulle scarf, and lace. Strings of gray gros grain ribbon.

Fig. 4.—DARK BLUE VELVET MARIE ANTOINETTE HAT.

Fig. 7.—OLIVE GREEN VELVET ROUND HAT.—The rim of this hat is turned up on one side, and trimmed with a binding and rolls of faille of the same color. The hat is trimmed, besides, with scarfs of tulle, with lace, and with loops and ends of gros grain ribbon. On the right side of the hat is a bunch of roses, ostrich feathers, and a bead aigrette.

Fig. 7.—OLIVE GREEN VELVET ROUND HAT.

Fig. 8.—VIOLET VELVET RABAGAS BONNET. The rim of this bonnet of violet velvet is bound with gros grain of the same color. The trimming consists of loops and ends of violet gros grain ribbon, an ostrich feather, and flowers. Strings of gros grain ribbon.

Fig. 8.—VIOLET VELVET RABAGAS BONNET.

Fig. 9.—BROWN VELVET DIRECTOIRE BONNET.—This bonnet is trimmed with loops and ends of the material, gros grain binding, ostrich feathers, and a spray of flowers.

Fig. 9.—BROWN VELVET DIRECTOIRE BONNET.

AN ANECDOTE OF RACHEL.

WHEN the brilliant dramatic talent that dazzled France during the first part of the nineteenth century began to be on the wane, and play-goers began to fear that all the thrones would be vacant, a curious scene used to occur nightly in summer-time in the Champs Élysées. Before the seated public, beneath the trees, an oldish woman used to appear, with a slip of carpet on her arm, a fiddle beneath it, and a tin cup hanging on her finger. She was closely followed by a slim, pale, dark, but fiery-eyed girl, whose thoughts seemed to be with some world far away. When the woman had spread the carpet, had placed the cup at one corner, and had scraped a few hideous notes on the fiddle, the pale dark-eyed girl advanced on the carpet and recited passages from Racine and Corneille. With her beautiful head raised, with slight, rare, but most graceful action, with voice and emphasis in exact accord with her words, that pale-faced, inspired girl enraptured her out-of-door audience. After a time she was seen no more, and it was concluded that her own inward fire had utterly consumed her, and she was forgotten. By-and-by there descended on the deserted temple of tragedy a new queen—nay, a goddess—bearing the name of Rachel. As the subdued and charmed public gazed and listened, and sent up their incense of praise and their shout of adulation, memories of the pale-faced girl who used to recite beneath the stars in the Champs Élysées came upon them. Some, however, could see no resemblance. Others denied the possibility of identity between the abject servant of the muse in the open air, and the glorious, though pale-faced, fiery-eyed queen of tragedy, occupying a throne which none could dispute with her. When half her brief, splendid, extravagant, and not blameless reign was over, Mlle. Rachel gave a "housewarming" on the occasion of opening her new and gorgeously furnished mansion in the Rue Troncin. During the evening the hostess disappeared, and the maître d'hôtel requested the crowded company in the great saloon so to arrange themselves as to leave space enough for Mlle. Rachel to appear at the upper end of the room, as she was about to favor the company with the recital of some passages from Racine and Corneille. Thereupon entered an old woman with strip of carpet, fiddle, and tin cup, followed by Mlle. Rachel in the shabbiest of frocks, pale, thoughtful, inspired, and with a sad smile that was not altogether out of tune with her pale meditations; and then, the carpet being spread, the fiddle scraped, and the cup deposited, Rachel trod the carpet as if it were the stage, and recited two or three passages from the masterpieces of the French masters in dramatic poetry, and moved her audience according to her will, in sympathy and delight. When the hurricane of applause had passed, and while a murmuring of enjoyment seemed as its softer echo, Rachel stooped, picked up the old tin cup, and going round with it to collect gratuities, said, "Anciennement, c'était pour maman; à présent, c'est pour les pauvres."

Fig. 3.—BLACK TULLE DIRECTOIRE BONNET.

Hosted by Google

THE OLD SORROW.

BY PAUL H. HAYNE.

THE old deep grief, forever new;
The old sad requiem, soft yet wild:
Heaven sheds her tenderest tears in dew
Above her fair but faded child.

Our child but yesterday: ah! now
The angels claim her chastened grace;
Their kiss of kinship on her brow,
Their solemn radiance on her face.

Who deems that such as she is lost?
Gone is she, but just gone before;
And o'er earth's foulness and its frost
She beckons to the sapphire door:

The door she softly holds ajar,
That we heaven's inmost heart may see,
And catch beyond the farthest star
Some gleam of immortality.

(Continued from No. 44, page 695.)

LADY ANNA.

BY ANTHONY TROLLOPE,

Author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," "Orley Farm," "The Eustace Diamonds," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE VERDICT.

ON the Wednesday the court reassembled in all its judicial glory. There was the same crowd, the same Lord Chief Justice, the same jury, and the same array of friendly lawyers. There had been a rumor that a third retinue of lawyers would appear on behalf of what was now generally called the Italian interest, and certain words which had fallen from the Solicitor-General on Monday had assured the world at large that the Italian interest would be represented. It was known that the Italian case had been confided to a firm of enterprising solicitors, named Mowbray and Mopus, perhaps more feared than respected, which was supposed to do a great amount of speculative business. But no one from the house of Messrs. Mowbray and Mopus was in court on the Wednesday morning; and no energetic barrister was ever enriched by a fee from them on behalf of the Italian widow. The speculation had been found to be too deep, the expenditure which would be required in advance too great, and the prospect of remuneration too remote even for Mowbray and Mopus. It appeared afterward that application had been made by those gentlemen for an assurance that expenses incurred on behalf of the Italian Countess should be paid out of the estate; but this had been refused. No guarantee to this effect could be given, at any rate till it should be seen whether the Italian lady had any show of justice on her side. It was now the general belief that if there was any truth at all in the Italian claim, it rested on the survivorship, at the time of the Cumberland marriage, of a wife who had long since died. As the proof of this would have given no penny to any one in Italy—would simply have shown that the Earl was the heir—Messrs. Mowbray and Mopus retired, and there was an end, forever and a day, of the Italian interest.

Though there was the same throng in the court as on the Monday, there did not seem to be the same hubbub on the opening of the day's proceedings. The barristers were less busy with their papers, the attorneys sat quite at their ease, and the Chief Justice, with an assistant judge, who was his bench-fellow, appeared for some minutes to be quite passive. Then the Solicitor-General arose and said that, with permission, he would occupy the court for only a few minutes. He had stated on Monday his belief that an application would be made to the court on behalf of other interests than those which had been represented when the court first met. It appeared that he had been wrong in that surmise. Of course he had no knowledge on the subject, but it did not appear that any learned gentleman was prepared to address the court for any third party. As he, on behalf of his client, had receded from the case, his lordship would probably say what, in his lordship's opinion, should now be the proceeding of the court. The Earl Lovel abandoned his plea, and perhaps the court would, in those circumstances, decide that its jurisdiction in the matter was over. Then the Lord Chief Justice, with his assistant judge, retired for a while, and all the assembled crowd appeared to be at liberty to discuss the matter just as every body pleased.

It was undoubtedly the opinion of the bar at large, and at that moment of the world in general, that the Solicitor-General had done badly for his client. The sum of money which was at stake was, they said, too large to be played with. As the advocate of the Earl, Sir William ought to have kept himself aloof from the Countess and her daughter. In lieu of regarding his client, he had taken upon himself to set things right in general, according to his idea of right. No doubt he was a clever man, and knew how to address a jury, but he was always thinking of himself, and bolstering up something of his own, instead of thinking of his case and bolstering up his client. And this conception of his character in general, and of his practice in this particular, became the stronger, as it was gradually believed that the living Italian Countess was certainly an impostor. There would have been little good in fighting against the English Countess on her behalf; but if they could only have proved that the other Italian woman, who was now dead, had been the real Countess when the Cumberland marriage was made, then what a grand thing it would have been for the Lovel family! Of those who held this opinion, the rector of Yoxham was the strongest, and the most envenomed against the Solicitor-General. During the whole of that Tuesday he went about declaring that the interests of the Lovel family had been sacrificed by their own counsel, and late in the afternoon he managed to get hold of Mr. Hardy. Could nothing be done? Mr. Hardy was of opinion that nothing could be done now; but in the course of the evening he did, at the rector's instance, manage to see Sir William, and to ask the question. "Could nothing be done?"

"Nothing more than we propose to do."

"Then the case is over," said Mr. Hardy. "I am assured that no one will stir on behalf of that Italian lady."

"If any one did stir, it would only be loss of time and money. My dear Hardy, I understand as well as any one what people are saying, and I know what must be the feeling of many of the Lovels. But I can only do my duty by my client to the best of my judgment. In the first place, you must remember that he has himself acknowledged the Countess."

"By our advice," said Mr. Hardy.

"You mean by mine. Exactly so—but with such conviction on his own part that he positively refuses to be a party to any suit which shall be based on the assumption that she is not Countess Lovel. Let an advocate be ever so obdurate, he can hardly carry on a case in opposition to his client's instructions. We are acting for Lord Lovel, and not for the Lovel family. And I feel assured of this, that were we to attempt to set up the plea that that other woman was alive when the marriage took place in Cumberland, you yourself would be ashamed of the evidence which it would become your duty to endeavor to foist upon the jury. We should certainly be beaten, and, in the ultimate settlement of the property, we should have to do with enemies instead of friends. The man was tried for bigamy and acquitted. Would any jury get over that, unless you had evidence to offer to them that was plain as a pikestaff, and absolutely incontrovertible?"

"Do you still think the girl will marry the Earl?"

"No; I do not. She seems to have a will of her own, and that will is bent the other way. But I do think that a settlement may be made of the property which shall be very much in the Earl's favor."

When on the following morning the Solicitor-General made his second speech, which did not occupy above a quarter of an hour, it became manifest that he did not intend to alter his course of proceedings, and while the judges were absent it was said by every body in the court that the Countess and Lady Anna had gained their suit.

"I consider it to be a most disgraceful course of proceeding on the part of Sir William Patterson," said the rector to a middle-aged legal functionary, who was managing clerk to Norton and Flick.

"We all think, Sir, that there was more fight in it," said the legal functionary.

"There was plenty of fight in it. I don't believe that any jury in England would willingly have taken such an amount of property from the head of the Lovel family. For the last twenty years—ever since I first heard of the pretended English marriage—every body has known that she was no more a countess than I am. I can't understand it; upon my word I can't. I have not had much to do with law, but I've always been brought up to think that an English barrister would be true to his client. I believe a case can be tried again if it can be shown that the lawyers have mismanaged it." The unfortunate rector, when he made this suggestion, no doubt forgot that the client in this case was in full agreement with the wicked advocate.

The judges were absent for about half an hour, and on their return the Chief Justice declared that his learned brother—the Sergeant, namely—had better proceed with the case on behalf of his clients. He went on to explain that as the right to the property in dispute, and indeed the immediate possession of that property, would be ruled by the decision of the jury, it was imperative that they should hear what the learned counsel for the so-called Countess and her daughter had to say, and what evidence they had to offer, as to the validity of her marriage. It was not to be supposed that he intended to throw any doubt on that marriage, but such would be the safer course. No doubt, in the ordinary course of succession, a widow and a daughter would inherit and divide among them in certain fixed proportions the personal property of a deceased but intestate husband and father, without the intervention of any jury to declare their rights. But in this case suspicion had been thrown and adverse statements had been made; and as his learned brother was, as a matter of course, provided with evidence to prove that which the plaintiff had come into the court with the professed intention of disproving, the case had better go on. Then he wrapped his robes around him and threw himself back in the attitude of a listener. Sergeant Bluestone, already on his legs, declared himself prepared and willing to proceed. No doubt the course as now directed was the proper course to be pursued. The Solicitor-General, rising gracefully and bowing to the court, gave his consent with complaisant patronage. "Your lordship, no doubt, is right." His words were whispered, and very probably not heard; but the smile, as coming from a Solicitor-General—from such a Solicitor-General as Sir William Patterson—was sufficient to put any judge at his ease.

Then Sergeant Bluestone made his statement, and the case was proceeded with after the fashion of such trials. It will not concern us to follow the further proceedings of the court with any close attention. The Solicitor-General went away, to some other business, and much of the interest seemed to drop. The marriage in Cumberland was proved; the trial for bigamy, with the acquittal of the Earl, was proved; the two opposed statements of the Earl, as to the death of his first wife, and afterward as to the fact that she was living, were proved. Sergeant Bluestone and Mr. Mainsail were very busy for two days, having every thing before them. Mr. Hardy, on behalf of the young lord, kept his seat, but he said not a word, not even asking a question of one of Sergeant Bluestone's witnesses. Twice the foreman of the jury interposed, expressing an opinion, on behalf of himself and his brethren, that the case need not be proceeded with further; but the judge ruled that it was for the interest of the Countess—he ceased to style her the so-called Countess—that her advocates should be allowed to complete their case. In the afternoon of the second day they did complete it, with great triumph and a fine flourish of forensic oratory as to the cruel persecution which their client had endured. The Solicitor-General came back into court in time to hear the judge's charge, which was very short. The jury were told that they had no alternative but to find a verdict for the defendants. It was explained to them that this was a plea to show that a certain marriage which had taken place in Cumberland in 181– was no real or valid marriage. Not only was that plea withdrawn, but evidence had been adduced proving that that marriage was valid. Such a marriage was, as a matter of course, prima facie valid, let what statements might be made to the contrary by those concerned or not concerned. In such case the burden of proof would rest entirely with the makers of such statement. No such proof had been here attempted, and the marriage must be declared a valid marriage. The jury had nothing to do with the disposition of the property, and it would be sufficient for them simply to find a verdict for the defendants. The jury did as they were bid, but, going somewhat beyond this, declared that they found the two defendants to be properly named the Countess Lovel, and Lady Anna Lovel. So ended the case of "Lovel v. Murray and Another."

The Countess, who had been in the court all day, was taken home to Keppel Street by the Sergeant in a glass-coach that had been hired to be in waiting for her. "And now, Lady Lovel," said Sergeant Bluestone, as he took his seat opposite to her, "I can congratulate your ladyship on the full restitution of your rights." She only shook her head. "The battle has been fought and won at last, and I will make free to say that I have never seen more admirable persistency than you have shown since first that bad man astounded your ears by his iniquity."

"It has been all to no purpose," she said.

"To no purpose, Lady Lovel! I may as well tell you now that it is expected that his Majesty will send to congratulate you on the restitution of your rights."

Again she shook her head. "Ah, Sergeant Bluestone; that will be but of little service."

"No further objection can now be made to the surrender of the whole property. There are some mining shares as to which there may be a question whether they are real or personal, but they amount to but little. A third of the remainder, which will, I imagine, exceed—"

"If it were ten times as much, Sergeant Bluestone, there would be no comfort in it. If it were ten times that, it would not at all help to heal my sorrow. I have sometimes thought that when one is marked for trouble, no ease can come."

"I don't think more of money than another man—" began the Sergeant.

"You do not understand."

"Nor yet of titles, though I feel for them, when they are worthily worn, the highest respect." As he so spoke the Sergeant lifted his hat from his brow. "But, upon my word, to have won such a case as this justifies triumph."

"I have won nothing—nothing—nothing!"

"You mean about Lady Anna?"

"Sergeant Bluestone, when first I was told that I was not that man's wife, I swore to myself that I would die sooner than accept any lower name; but when I found that I was a mother, then I swore that I would live till my child should bear the name that of right belonged to her."

"She does bear it now."

"What name does she propose to bear? I would sooner be poor, in beggary, still fighting, even without means to fight, for an empty title, still suffering, still conscious that all around me regarded me as an impostor, than conquer only to know that she, for whom all this has been done, has degraded her name and my own. If she does this thing, or if she has a mind so low, a spirit so mean, as to think of doing it, would it not be better for all the world that she should be the bastard child of a rich man's kept mistress than the acknowledged daughter of an earl, with a countess for her mother, and a princely fortune to support her rank? If she marries this man, I shall heartily wish that Lord Lovel had won the case. I care nothing for myself now. I have lost all that. The king's message will comfort me not at all. If she do this thing I shall only feel the evil we have done in taking the money from the Earl. I would sooner see her dead at my feet than know that she was that man's wife; ay, though I had stabbed her with my own hand!"

The Sergeant for the nonce could say nothing more to her. She had worked herself into such a passion that she would listen to no words but her own, and think of nothing but the wrong that was still being done to her. He put her down at the hall door in Keppel Street, saying, as he lifted his hat again, that Mrs. Bluestone should come and call upon her.

CHAPTER XXXII.

WILL YOU PROMISE?

THE news of the verdict was communicated the same evening to Lady Anna—as to whose name there could now no longer be any dispute. "I congratulate you, Lady Anna," said the Sergeant, holding her hand, "that every thing, as far as this trial is concerned, has gone just as we could wish."

"We owe it all to you," said the girl.

"Not at all. My work has been very easy. In fact, I have some feeling of regret that I have not been placed in a position that would enable me to earn my wages. The case was too good—so that a poor aspiring lawyer has not been able to add to his reputation. But as far as you are concerned, my dear, every thing has gone as you should wish. You are now a very wealthy heiress, and the great duty devolves upon you of disposing of your wealth in a fitting manner." Lady Anna understood well what was meant, and was silent. Even when she was alone, her success did not make her triumphant. She could anticipate that the efforts of all her friends to make her false to her word would be redoubled. Unless she could see Daniel Thwaite, it would be impossible that she should not be conquered.

The Sergeant told his wife the promise which he had made on her behalf, and she, of course, undertook to go to Keppel Street on the following morning. "You had better bring her here," said the Sergeant. Mrs. Bluestone remarked that that might be sooner said than done. "She'll be glad of an excuse to come," answered the Sergeant. "On such an occasion as this, of course they must see each other. Something must be arranged about the property. In a month or two, when she is of age, she will have the undisputed right to do what she pleases with about three hundred thousand pounds. It is a most remarkable position for a young girl who has never yet had the command of a penny, and who professes that she is engaged to marry a working tailor. Of course her mother must see her."

Mrs. Bluestone did call in Keppel Street, and sat with the Countess a long time, undergoing a perfect hail-storm of passion. For a long time Lady Lovel declared that she would never see her daughter again till the girl had given a solemn promise that she would not marry Daniel Thwaite. "Love her! Of course I love her. She is all that I have in the world. But of what good is my love to me, if she disgraces me? She has disgraced me already. When she could bring herself to tell her cousin that she was engaged to this man, we were already disgraced. When she once allowed the man to speak to her in that strain, without withering him with her scorn, she disgraced us both. For what have I done it all, if this is to be the end of it?" But at last she assented, and promised that she would come. No—it would not be necessary to send a carriage for her. The habits of her own life need not be at all altered because she was now a countess beyond dispute, and also wealthy. She would be content to live as she had ever lived. It had gone on too long for her to desire personal comfort—luxury for herself, or even social rank. The only pleasure that she had anticipated, the only triumph that she desired, was to be found in the splendor of her child. She would walk to Bedford Square, and then walk back to her lodgings in Keppel Street. She wanted no carriage.

Early on the following day there was heard the knock at the door which Lady Anna had been taught to expect. The coming visit had been discussed in all its bearings, and it had been settled that Mrs. Bluestone should be with the daughter when the mother arrived. It was thought that in this way the first severity of the Countess would be mitigated, and that the chance of some agreement between them might be increased. Both the Sergeant and Mrs. Bluestone now conceived that the young lady had a stronger will of her own than might have been expected from her looks, her language, and her manners. She had not as yet yielded an inch, though she would not argue the matter at all when she was told that it was her positive duty to abandon the tailor. She would sit quite silent; and if silence does give consent, she consented to this doctrine. Mrs. Bluestone, with a diligence which was equaled only by her good humor, insisted on the misery which must come upon her young friend should she quarrel with the Countess, and with all the Lovels—on the unfitness of the tailor, and the impossibility that such a marriage should make a lady happy—on the sacred duty which Lady Anna's rank imposed upon her to support her order, and on the general blessedness of a well-preserved and exclusive aristocracy. "I don't mean to say that nobly born people are a bit better than commoners," said Mrs. Bluestone. "Neither I nor my children have a drop of noble blood in our veins. It is not that. But God Almighty has chosen that there should be different ranks to carry out His purposes, and we have His word to tell us that we should all do our duties in that state of life to which it has pleased Him to call us." The excellent lady was somewhat among the clouds in her theology, and apt to mingle the different sources of religious instruction from which she was wont to draw lessons for her own and her children's guidance; but she meant to say that the proper state of life for an earl's daughter could not include an attachment to a tailor; and Lady Anna took it as it was meant. The nobly born young lady did not in heart deny the truth of the lesson—but she had learned another lesson, and she did not know how to make the two compatible. That other lesson taught her to believe that she ought to be true to her word—that she specially ought to be true to one who had ever been specially true to her. And latterly there had grown upon her a feeling less favorable to the Earl than that which he had inspired when she first saw him, and which he had increased when they were together at Yoxham. It is hard to say why the Earl had ceased to charm her, or by what acts or words he had lowered himself in her eyes. He was as handsome as ever, as much like a young Apollo, as gracious in his manner, and as gentle in his gait. And he had been constant to her. Perhaps it was that she had expected that one so godlike should have ceased to adore a woman who had degraded herself to the level of a tailor, and that, so conceiving, she had begun to think that his motives might be merely human, and perhaps sordid. He ought to have abstained and seen her no more after she had owned her own degradation. But she said nothing of all this to Mrs. Bluestone. She made no answer to the sermons preached to her. She certainly said no word tending to make that lady think that the sermons had been of any avail. "She looks as soft as butter," Mrs. Bluestone said that morning to her husband; "but she is obstinate as a pig all the time."

Hosted by Google

"I suppose her father was the same way before her," said the Sergeant, "and God knows her mother is obstinate enough."

When the Countess was shown into the room Lady Anna was trembling with fear and emotion. Lady Lovel, during the last few weeks, since her daughter had seen her, had changed the nature of her dress. Hitherto, for years past, she had worn a brown stuff gown, hardly ever varying even the shade of the sombre color, so that her daughter had perhaps never seen her otherwise clad. No woman that ever breathed was less subject to personal vanity than had been the so-called Countess who lived in the little cottage outside Keswick. Her own dress had been as nothing to her, and in the days of her close familiarity with old Thomas Thwaite she had rebuked her friend when he had besought her to attire herself in silk. "We'll go into Keswick and get Anna a new ribbon," she would say, "and that will be grandeur enough for her and me too." In this brown dress she had come up to London, and so she had been clothed when her daughter last saw her. But now she wore a new, full, black silk dress, which, plain as it was, befitted her rank and gave an increased authority to her commanding figure. Lady Anna trembled all the more, and her heart sank still lower within her, because her mother no longer wore the old brown gown. When the Countess entered the room she took no immediate notice of Mrs. Bluestone, but went up to her child and kissed her. "I am comforted, Anna, in seeing you once again," she said.

"Dear, dearest mamma!"

"You have heard, I suppose, that the trial has been decided in your favor?"

"In yours, mamma."

"We have explained it all to her, Lady Lovel, as well as we could. The Sergeant yesterday evening gave us a little history of what occurred. It seems to have been quite a triumph."

"It may become a triumph," said the Countess—"a triumph so complete and glorious that I shall desire nothing further in this world. It has been my work to win the prize; it is for her to wear it, if she will do so."

"I hope you will both live to enjoy it many years," said Mrs. Bluestone. "You will have much to say to each other, and I will leave you now. We shall have lunch, Lady Lovel, at half past one, and I hope that you will join us."

Then they were alone together. Lady Anna had not moved from her chair since she had embraced her mother, but the Countess had stood during the whole time that Mrs. Bluestone had been in the room. When the room door was closed they both remained silent for a few moments, and then the girl rushed across the room and threw herself on her knees at her mother's feet: "Oh, mamma, mamma, tell me that you love me. Oh, mamma, why have you not let me come to you? Oh, mamma, we never were parted before."

"My child never before was willfully disobedient to me."

"Oh, mamma—tell me that you love me."

"Love you! Yes, I love you. You do not doubt that, Anna. How could it be possible that you should doubt it after twenty years of a mother's care? You know I love you."

"I know that I love you, mamma, and that it kills me to be sent away from you. You will take me home with you now—will you not?"

"Home! You shall make your own home, and I will take you whither you will. I will be a servant to minister to every whim; all the world shall be a Paradise to you; you shall have every joy that wealth and love and sweet friends can procure for you, if you will obey me in one thing." Lady Anna, still crouching upon the ground, hid her face in her mother's dress, but she was silent. "It is not much that I ask after a life spent in winning for you all that has now been won. I only demand of you that you shall not disgrace yourself."

"Oh, mamma, I am not disgraced."

"Say that you will marry Lord Lovel, and all that shall be forgotten. It shall at any rate be forgiven, or remembered only as the folly of a child. Will you say that you will become Lord Lovel's wife?"

"Oh, mamma!"

"Answer me, Anna—will you say that you will receive Lord Lovel as your accepted lover? Get up, girl, and look me in the face. Of what use is it to grovel there, while your spirit is in rebellion? Will you do this? Will you save us all from destruction, misery, and disgrace? Will you remember who you are—what blood you have in your veins—what name it is that you bear? Stand up, and look me in the face, if you dare."

Lady Anna did stand up, and did look her mother in the face. "Mamma," she said, "we should understand each other better if we were living together as we ought to do."

"I will never live with you till you have promised obedience. Will you, at any rate, pledge to me your word that you will never become the wife of Daniel Thwaite?" Then she paused, and stood looking at the girl, perhaps for a minute. Lady Anna stood before her, with her eyes turned upon the ground. "Answer me the question that I have asked you. Will you promise me that you will never become the wife of Daniel Thwaite?"

"I have promised him that I would."

"What is that to me? Is your duty to him higher than your duty to me? Can you be bound by any promise to so great a crime as that would be? I will ask you the question once more, and I will be governed by your answer. If you will promise to discard this man, you shall return home with me, and shall then choose every thing for yourself. We will go abroad and travel if you wish it, and all things shall be prepared to give you pleasure. You shall have at once the full enjoyment of all that has been won for you; and as for your cousin, you shall not for a while be troubled even by his name. It is the dear wish of my heart that you should be the wife of Earl Lovel; but I have one wish dearer even than that—one to which that shall be altogether postponed. If you will save yourself, and me, and all your family from the terrible disgrace with which you have threatened us, I will not again mention your cousin's name to you till it shall please you to hear it. Anna, you knelt to me just now. Shall I kneel to you?"

"No, mamma, no—I should die."

"Then, my love, give me the promise that I have asked."

"Mamma, he has been so good to us."

"And we will be good to him—good to him in his degree. Of what avail to me will have been his goodness, if he is to rob me of the very treasure which his goodness helped to save? Is he to have all because he gave some aid? Is he to take from me my heart's blood because he bound up my arm when it was bruised? Because he helped me some steps on earth, is he to imprison me afterward in hell? Good! No, he is not good in wishing so to destroy us. He is bad, greedy, covetous, self-seeking, a very dog, and by the living God he shall die like a dog unless you will free me from his fangs. You have not answered me. Will you tell me that you will discard him as a suitor for your hand? If you will say so, he shall receive tenfold reward for his—goodness. Answer me, Anna—I claim an answer from you."

"Mamma!"

"Speak, if you have any thing to say. And remember the commandment, Honor thy—" But she broke down when she too remembered it, and bore in mind that the precept would have called upon her daughter to honor the memory of the deceased Earl. "But if you can not do it for love, you will never do it for duty."

"Mamma, I am sure of one thing."

"Of what are you sure?"

"That I ought to be allowed to see him before I give him up."

"You shall never be allowed to see him."

"Listen to me, mamma, for a moment. When he asked me to—love him we were equals."

"I deny it. You were never equals."

"We lived as such—except in this, that they had money for our wants, and we had none to repay them."

"Money can have nothing to do with it."

"Only that we took it. And then he was every thing to us. It seemed as though it would be impossible to refuse any thing that he asked. It was impossible to me. As to being noble, I am sure that he was noble. You always used to say that nobody else ever was so good as those two. Did you not say so, mamma?"

"If I praise my horse or my dog, do I say that they are of the same nature as myself?"

"But he is a man; quite as much a man as—as any man could be."

"You mean that you will not do as I bid you."

"Let me see him, mamma. Let me see him but once. If I might see him, perhaps I might do as you wish—about him. I can not say any thing more unless I may see him."

The Countess still stormed and still threatened, but she could not move her daughter. She also found that the child had inherited particles of the nature of her parents. But it was necessary that some arrangement should be made as to the future life both of Lady Anna and of herself. She might bury herself where she would, in the most desolate corner of the earth, but she could not leave Lady Anna in Bedford Square. In a few months Lady Anna might choose any residence she pleased for herself, and there could be no doubt whose house she would share, if she were not still kept in subjection. The two parted then in deep grief—the mother almost cursing her child in her anger, and Lady Anna overwhelmed with tears. "Will you not kiss me, mamma, before you go?"

"No, I will never kiss you again till you have shown me that you are my child."

But before she left the house the Countess was closeted for a while with Mrs. Bluestone, and, in spite of all that she had said, it was agreed between them that it would be better to permit an interview between the girl and Daniel Thwaite. "Let him say what he will," argued Mrs. Bluestone, "she will not be more headstrong than she is now. You will still be able to take her away with you to some foreign country."

"But he will treat her as though he were her lover," said the Countess, unable to conceal the infinite disgust with which the idea overwhelmed her.

"What does it matter, Lady Lovel? We have got to get a promise from her, somehow. Since she was much with him, she has seen people of another sort, and she will feel the difference. It may be that she wants to ask him to release her. At any rate she speaks as though she might be released by what he would say to her. Unless she thought it might be so herself, she would not make a conditional promise. I would let them meet."

"But where?"

"In Keppel Street."

"In my presence?"

"No, not that; but you will, of course, be in the house—so that she can not leave it with him. Let her come to you. It will be an excuse for her doing so, and then she can remain. If she does not give the promise, take her abroad, and teach her to forget it by degrees." So it was arranged, and on that evening Mrs. Bluestone told Lady Anna that she was to be allowed to meet Daniel Thwaite.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

KNEADING dough would scarcely seem to be a dignified employment for solid business men; but a peep into the Boston Commercial Exchange about the hour of noon reveals a goodly number of staid gentlemen manipulating little balls of flour and water with a zest that would put to shame many a kitchen Bridget. A similar sight may be witnessed, if one is fortunate enough to catch a glimpse at the proper time, in all large cities where the traffic in flour is extensive. Making "dough-balls" is not a curious pastime, though it would surely appear so were it not for the earnest look of business which rests upon the faces of the kneaders. This process is simply for the purpose of testing the quality of various kinds of flour, so that dealers who are purchasing may know for a certainty what quality they bring into the market. When dry the color and fineness of the particles may be tested; but any taint or unsoundness in the flour can be detected much more readily after it is mixed with water. If the grain has been damaged in any way before grinding, or has become damp afterward, the dough-making process reveals the imperfection. An expert, after considerable practice, is able to tell with great accuracy from what kind of wheat any flour is made. Every practical housekeeper knows that if flour works white and firm it is of excellent quality, and that much kneading makes it grow whiter, while no amount of working will bring the same result if the article is of poor quality. Large quantities of the best brands of flour are exported every year, yet the home consumption is enormous. Every grade finds its appropriate place, and very little that is absolutely bad finds its way into the market. Bakers use many grades, often mixing three or four different kinds in the same "batch" of dough. The superextra qualities meet a ready sale, while poor people can not afford to be particular about the color of their daily bread, but are content with whatever is wholesome. The business of testing flour is one of much importance to the merchant, and some practical understanding of it is of value to every one who ever has occasion to purchase a single barrel for household consumption.

About one hundred and sixty Modocs are now in charge of the United States authorities. There are five members of Captain Jack's family, three of Boston Charley's, eleven of Hooker Jim's, six of Curly-headed Doctor's, ten of Shacknasty Jim's, and so on through a long list of curious Indian names.

A young man and his wife, both neatly dressed and of refined appearance, recently applied for lodgings at a station-house in New Orleans. Their appearance led to inquiry, and it was ascertained that they had fled from the pestilence at Shreveport, where, before the fever appeared, they had earned a comfortable living, but had accumulated no money. On reaching New Orleans they could obtain no employment, and when they had disposed of a few little trinkets they were destitute and homeless. Some aid was given, and the young man obtained work soon after they had sought shelter in the station-house.

Correct spelling does not seem to be a prominent qualification in applicants for New Jersey primary schools. Recently a dozen or more of would-be teachers presented themselves for examination before the committee at Elizabeth. Twenty-five words in common use were given out to be spelled. No one spelled every word, two spelled nearly all, but the majority made a grand failure. "Mannagery," "numonia," "paralel," "nitch," "belleta," "crocha," "mischiefous," "croqua," are some of the specimen words as copied from the examination papers.

A remarkable violinist, upon whom nature never bestowed arms, recently arrived in this country from Europe. He was induced to visit this country by an enterprising manager, who disappeared as soon as the steamer arrived. The deluded musician has given a private performance. His playing is accomplished wholly with his feet and toes, by which he manipulates the bow and strings with wonderful delicacy.

The average number of railway tickets issued in Paris is about 30,000 daily, making an annual total of 10,950,000; and the number for the whole of France is estimated at 40,000,000. The companies sell the canceled tickets to the paper-makers, and realize a handsome sum from them.

The largest cat at the annual cat show, held at the Crystal Palace, London, weighed nineteen pounds. The felines were said to be "magnificent specimens."

How very cruel! The Boston and Albany Railroad recently retired six of its conductors, who were buying diamond pins and race-horses on a salary of $80 a month.

The famous old "haunted house" in Watertown, Massachusetts, is likely to lose its fame. It has been painted, papered, repaired, and generally renovated; so the ghosts can no longer find an abiding-place in it. No dreadful noises are heard there now; no strange creaking sounds; no mysterious footfalls; no wild shrieks. Paint and paper, hammer and nails, with perhaps a few boards to fill up cracks and crevices, have dispersed the unearthly visitors who were reported for a long time to infest the place. Human beings dwell now in the house without molestation.

"The Society for the Relief of the Sick and Destitute" in this city asks for assistance from the charitable. The statistics mentioned in connection with this request indicate sufficiently the necessity of relieving the wants of working people who are suddenly thrown out of employment, or who are prevented from working by sickness. There are in this city six hundred thousand persons living in tenement-houses, and an unprecedented percentage of these are now out of employment and utterly destitute. One hundred thousand of these persons are women who earn their living by the work of their hands, and of these sixty thousand are unmarried. Many thousands of these are shirt-makers, who, while they make a dozen shirts per day, on an average, receive but from fifty-five to eighty-five cents for their work. In "good times" this pittance enables them, by the strictest economy, to live. But when, by pressure of the times, work is withdrawn, or when sickness or unusually cold weather comes, they must inevitably suffer, or be driven to adopt unworthy ways of getting their daily bread, unless relief is given them.

One of the scamps who infest the parks and streets of New York, watching to cheat strangers, was detected lately by an ingenious device. A man accosted a stranger in the street, and calling him Mr. Benedict, of Rochester, claimed him as a customer. The gentleman replied, "You are mistaken; my name is Jackson," which was not his name at all. Later an accomplice addressed the same gentleman as "Jackson." This being proof of a conspiracy, the rascal was arrested. Similar impositions are often practiced on strangers.

In 1448 appeared Mother Shipton's Prophecy. Some things foretold in it have already come to pass, and the others may be fulfilled before 1881. The "poem" reads thus:

"Carriages without horses shall go,
And accidents fill the world with woe.
Around the world thoughts shall fly
In the twinkle of an eye.
Water shall yet more wonders do,
Now strange, but yet they shall be true.
The world upside down shall be,
And gold be found at the foot of a tree.
Through hills man shall ride,
And no horse or ass be at his side.
Under water man shall walk,
Shall ride, shall sleep, shall talk.
In the air men shall be seen,
In white, in black, in green.
Iron on the water shall float
As easy as a wooden boat.
Gold shall be found and shown
In worlds not now known.
England at last shall admit a Jew,
And fire and water shall wonders do.
The world to an end shall come
In eighteen hundred eighty-one."

We do not believe there is much human affection wasted upon the spider; nevertheless it is a very useful creature, and should not be despised. Its specific office is to prevent the dangerous multiplication of winged insects. Entrapping flies is its forte; and it has been remarked that "if spiders should strike, and for a single month in summer refuse to set their traps, we could hardly defend ourselves against armies of noxious insects that would take possession of our dwellings." Nevertheless there may be such a thing as too many spiders in the world—a possibility against which nature has provided. When spiders are thickest and busiest catching flies, a large, peculiar-looking fly appears upon the stage of action, and adroitly seizes the spiders wherever they are found. These spiders are stowed away in secret cells to be food for young flies. Thus there is compensation all around.

It is related of Sir Edwin Landseer that when once visiting Scotland he stopped at a little village which was plentifully supplied with dogs. Landseer, as was his custom, amused himself by making rapid sketches of such as pleased his fancy. The next day, as he resumed his journey, he was distressed to see dogs suspended in all directions from the trees, or drowning in the rivers with stones round their necks. He stopped a weeping urchin who was hurrying off with a pet pup in his arms, and learned, to his dismay, that he was supposed to be an excise officer who was taking notes of all the dogs he saw in order to prosecute the owners for unpaid taxes, so the people had hastened to dispose of their pets to escape taxation.

The thorough revision of the Encyclopædia Britannica is estimated to cost about £200,000.

We are just informed by a scientific genius that the planet Mars is not only inhabited and has plenty of water, but that the climate is fine, and that there is an abundance of coal and iron there. So if England will only have a little forethought, and build a railway thither before her own coal mines are exhausted, she can transport her supplies of coal from Mars.

The Court Journal states that Dr. Schumacher, from Valparaiso, a zealous naturalist and collector of objects of natural history, in his excursion through Peru was fortunate enough to obtain a very rare land shell of the snail kind, known by the name of the Bulimus labiatus. The only specimen previously known was stolen from the British Museum. He has ascertained where three specimens exist—one in possession of a Mr. Alleon, a second was found by Mr. Steere, who was making collections in Peru for a university in Michigan, and the third he has now with him, valuing it as high as £200. When in Lima he first recognized the shell in the collection of Mr. Alleon, and afterward saw the one in possession of Mr. Steere. He found out that both specimens came from Chachapoyas, in the Department of the Amazonas, in the valley between the Central and Western Cordilleras of Peru. Dr. Schumacher, while envying the possession of such a rare shell in the hands of the two gentlemen above named, had the good fortune to meet with a man who brings from Chachapoyas medicinal plants for sale, and who had also one of these bulimi with him. Dr. Schumacher secured it.

Hosted by Google

Fig. 1.—Black Gros Grain Dress, with Black Velvet Jacket.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-4.

Fig. 2.—Gray Mohair Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—Olive Green Faille Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—Gray Taffeta Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 5.—Brown Cashmere Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 6.—Dress for Girl from 2 to 3 Years old.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 5-11.

Fig. 7.—Violet Poplin Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 8.—Dress for Girl from 5 to 7 Years old.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 9.—Suit for Boy from 4 to 6 Years old.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 10.—Blue Camel's-hair Dress.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 11.—Olive Green Faille Dress, with Cashmere Basque.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 12-16.

Fig. 12.—Brown Serge Dress, with Cashmere Mantelet.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 13.—Dotted Silk Dress, with Barathea Mantelet.
For description see Supplement.

Figs. 1–13.—Ladies' and Children's Winter Street and House Suits.

Hosted by Google

AUTUMN LEAVES IN WAX.

WAX-FLOWERS can not be properly made without the personal instructions of one who understands the art; but the process of making autumn leaves in wax, together with the vines of English ivy and our American woodbine, can be so plainly described that a new beginner need not fear making such an effort. Moreover, the materials are inexpensive, and the work pleasing.

Wax in sheets can be purchased at most of our large fancy-work stores, and is much nicer both in color and pliability than a novice can make by melting white wax, coloring, and sheeting it. It is usually sold in packages, each containing a dozen sheets. Procure but a small quantity to begin with; then, as you advance in the art, if you are satisfied with your work, it will be easy to increase your supply of materials.

The principal colors of wax required for the making of autumn leaves are crimson, scarlet, yellow, and green. You may have, if you wish, more than one shade of each color. Procure also paints in powder—chrome-yellow, orange, dark and light greens, burnt umber, and carmine—a small portion of each. The carmine powder is expensive; however, a small quantity will color several leaves. The other paints are cheap.

When about to use these, rub down a little at a time, as you require it, getting it as fine as is possible. The carmine will not need this, and the umber also is well ground, but the chrome-yellow and some of the greens are apt to have lumps through the powder, and these scratch the surface of the wax. A plate and the flat blade of a knife will answer for the smoothing-down process.

The colors are rubbed on the wax with a stub brush. I prefer for this purpose the brushes I make by taking large-sized camel's-hair pencils and burning down the points over the flame of a candle till within a quarter or five-sixteenths of an inch from the quill. Scorch it so as to leave a nicely rounded end. This kind of brush will rub the powder evenly into the wax.

Now, having all the materials ready, proceed to work by laying on the table some firm white writing-paper; place your sheet of wax upon it, and press it smoothly down. Take for a pattern the leaf you desire to copy, lay it on the wax, and with a medium-sized needle, held in an upright position, cut the wax to the outline of the leaf that rests upon it, and if the edges are jagged, trim them neatly with a pair of scissors, first moistening the steel, or the wax will adhere to it. A little practice will show you how to cut the wax so smoothly with a needle that no after-trimming will be required. Now cut out a second leaf, having it exactly like the first, as two are needed, both being placed together, and the wire for a stem put between.

We will suppose you have taken as a copy a dark green maple leaf; part of one side is turned brown, while the other side has vivid crimson points. Of course, for such a one, you have used green wax. Lay on a small piece of paper one of the leaves you have cut out; dip a brush into some burnt umber, and rub it on where you want the brown color; then, with another brush, put on the carmine powder where a tint of crimson is required. The two colors can be blended into each other.

The next step is to give your leaf its veinings, which you will do by putting the under side of the natural leaf on the upper side of the wax one. Press it between your warm thumb and finger, and an imprint of the veins will be left on the soft surface of the wax.

Now, for a stem, put the wire along the centre of the leaf, up to its point; place the second leaf of wax against it, for a back, and press the two firmly together, the natural leaf being still held in place — the warmth of the fingers will cause them to join with readiness; mould between the fingers, to take off the flatness and give natural curves; remove the maple leaf, and, if you have been careful, the imitation will be satisfactory. A strip of wax must be put around the wire, and by twisting it firmly between the finger and thumb a round stem will be made.

Some leaves are a vivid scarlet; others, like many of the beech, are yellow. These only require to be cut out of wax of the necessary color, veined, put together, and moulded, without the addition of any paint. Then, again, some are yellow with a dash of green or brown, others with tints of brilliant orange, and all so diversified that they need to be examined in order to be properly imitated; but having made one, you will find it easy to copy others, and after a few such attempts will be ready to undertake something more difficult, as, for instance, this beautiful Virginia creeper—known also as American ivy and woodbine—over a yard in length, that lies before me, tinged with the frosts of autumnal nights, and of which a perfect copy, just completed, is fastened along the casing of a window in my parlor.

Select a branch of this plant and set it before you for a pattern. Take malleable wire only coarse enough to support the weight of the leaf, and prepare some stems by twisting wax around them. The scraps may be used for this purpose. It is well to have a pair of sharp-edged pinchers for cutting wire.

The leaves of the Virginia creeper are quinate, and each leaflet may have some different tint distinguishing it from others on the same leaf.

My vine has for its tip some tiny scarlet leaves; and having wax of the exact color, I cut them out of it, only one of the five leaflets requiring the addition of a little umber and the faintest tinge of yellow along the extreme edge; then I veined them, put them on very fine wire for stems, and, by twisting the wires together, made the leaflets into the proper shape for the leaf. This twisting must be done firmly and neatly, and then covered with wax; for if the leaf-stalk is made in a rough manner, it will detract from the appearance of the vine. A strong but malleable wire should be twisted in as a main stalk, around which each separate leaf should be twined, and this also must be neatly covered with wax.

Most of the upper leaves on my spray are scarlet, some having an occasional tinge of green, yellow, or brown. A few are crimson and yellow, with tints of brightest green along the edge. The lower and larger leaves on the branch are more subdued in color, many of them being of a dark, glossy green, with hints of crimson warming them up, and more than a hint of brown; indeed, one or two are entirely brown. The under part of some of these leaves requires to be mottled, using a powder made by mixing together a little carmine and umber.

Tendrils here and there along the entire length are made by covering fine wire with brown wax, and twining the wires around a coarse needle or a pencil, varying the sizes.

A branch of ivy can be copied even more readily than the woodbine I have described, as only the various shades of green wax are required, with a little umber for shading.

It is much easier for a person who understands such work to tell how it should be done than for a new beginner to follow out these instructions, but patience and perseverance in attending to the directions I have given can not but meet with a measure of success. Moreover, the work is so pretty: and as leaf after leaf is made a reward follows the effort, and encourages to new attempts; and practice in the art will bring proficiency.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Is it a Series?—Compliments in Court.—Landseer.—A desolated Frenchman.—Making Game of the Saxon.

FOUR weeks have now elapsed since the "great Thames murder," and the police are confessedly no nearer to the discovery of the perpetrator than they were at first; and in such cases "no nearer" means much farther. Dreadful as are the details of this crime, it has a very ridiculous side to it. A very dear friend—as she described herself—of the supposed victim (though she was not exactly a blood-relation, being only her landlady) identified the remains in a most gushing manner. "This is the hair I have so often parted, and this the bosom that I have seen agitated with so many woes!" But it was not either one or the other, for the supposed victim has turned up, well and hearty, and exceedingly indignant that she had not been allowed to leave home on her own private affairs without her name and address being put in all the newspapers, and the police calling at her lodgings three times a day. I have not been able to send you the interesting photo promised in my last, because the authorities will only show it to those who have, bona fide, lost a relative. It is, it seems, the usual custom to take photographs of all bodies found drowned, and in "the Thames division" of police alone there were last year no less than forty-three such which have not been identified by their friends. In those cases, however, there is no suspicion of foul play; it is the old, old story of those poor unfortunates,

> "Glad to death's mystery
> Swift to be hurled,
> Any where, any where,
> Out of the world."

But in the present case there can be no such solution. So inscrutable is the deed, and exhibiting so hideous a callousness in the doer, that it is gravely suggested as being the work of certain secret fugitives from Broadmoor—our government criminal lunatic asylum—who have been missing these three months; in which case we may look upon it as only being the first of a series. Would it be unmanly to express a hope that they will at least confine themselves to the female sex?

The Tichborne case was enlivened yesterday by a passage of arms between Dr. Kenealy and every body else. He first gave Mr. Hawkins the lie direct, whereupon Mr. Justice Mellor observed that though such language was intolerable, he was not surprised at it.

"Nor am I surprised at any thing you say of me, my lord," observed Kenealy.

"I am bound to say," said Mr. Justice Mellor, "that my feelings have been more severely tried in this case than they have ever been before during the whole of my experience."

"In that expression of feeling," added Mr. Justice Lush, "I entirely concur."

There was a murmur of assent from the jury-box; and presently one of the much-enduring twelve inquired whether more than half an hour spent over some question of an envelope (which had nothing in it) was not wasting time. Dr. Kenealy upon this protested vehemently that his client's interests were of infinitely more importance than the time of the jury.

No more compliments passed; but what every body was thinking in court was, What a pity it is no one can compound with Dr. Kenealy for those five pounds a day which it is said the Tichborne bond-holders pay him to prolong the case, and so conclude this monstrous farce!

So poor Sir Edwin Landseer is dead at last, and the dogs have lost their friend. It is impossible to overestimate the good-will toward the canine race which his pencil has engendered, and in some degree to his own cost; for the excellence of his genius in that line has undoubtedly caused his merits in other ways to be overlooked. Every one knows the story of his offering to paint a friend, who replied, "Is thy servant a dog, that this thing should be done unto him?" And it was typical of the general opinion; whereas in reality there are few painters that approach him as a general artist, quite independently of his dogs. His Highland landscapes were perfection, and if the lions in Trafalgar Square (his only efforts as a sculptor) are not like the lions of the desert, they are as like those of the Zoological Gardens (who sat for them) as four peas to four peas. Sir Edwin, like most great painters, exhibited his talent with the brush at a very early age. At thirteen he gained the silver medal from the Society of Arts, at sixteen he "exhibited" in the Royal Academy (the picture was called "The Dog Fight"), and at eighteen achieved a permanent popularity by his famous "Dogs of St. Bernard discovering a Traveler in the Snow." I believe that the fortune he has left behind him will be found to be larger than that accumulated by any painter except Turner.

Mrs. Arnold, of Fox Howe, Westmoreland, is also dead—the widow of him who, if to bring up youth in the paths of virtue is the most honorable of callings, was the noblest man of his time. He was, indeed, so far as the limits of his sphere permitted, both a great and a good man; nor were those limits small, since the boys whom he taught have (some of them) themselves become teachers of men, and done good work in the world, thanks to his early lessons. At the same time it must be confessed that the imitation of Arnold's system, without his genius to guide it, has produced in our public schools of late years a large crop of priggism and goody-goodyness. My Time, and what I have done with it, by Mr. Burnand, now appearing in Macmillan, and describing his own school-days, is quite refreshing, because it brings back the British school-boy as we old fogies remember him, not as a monitor dealing out moral reflections with every stroke of his cane, or as a small boy acknowledging the justice of his punishment with a philosophy beyond his years.

"Was he ten feet high?" asks one of Mr. Burnand's small boys of another.

"Yes," is the reply.

"Will you take your oath of it?"

"Yes."

"Will you take your dying oath?" (This used to be a very favorite form of interrogation.)

"Yes."

"Will you bet sixpence?"

"No."

The British school-boy was a humorist, though without knowing it. Similarly Frenchmen, to whom (though they have so much wit) humor is absolutely wanting, sometimes unconsciously tickle our very heart-strings. A Parisian, whom we will call X——, was waiting the other day for his friend Y—— at a café. Y—— was late, and when he did come, showed signs of profound grief.

"Alas! my friend," inquired X——, "what is the matter?"

"My wife is dead!"

The situation was embarrassing for X——, who sat down again to his coffee with a face of great concern and many expressions of condolence. Y——, however, paced the room, running his hands through his air, and bewailing his hard fate. "Désolé! désolé! désolé!" groaned he, like minute-guns; then, after a little, "Désolé! désolé! désolé!" a little quicker; then he began to hum it; eventually he adapted his "Désolé!" to the latest Parisian air, as though he were in the best of spirits. A nation of such people has surely something about them to be envied!

I have also just heard a characteristic story of our Irish friends. An Englishman took a "shooting" this year in Tipperary, for which he paid a large sum upon the understanding that he should have the sole right of sporting over the land. Snipe were advertised as especially numerous, and though he knew that Englishmen were not popular in that part of the country, he would have risked much for snipe. On the first day he went out he came to a river, on the other side of which (though that also was included in the property) half a dozen men were firing guns.

"Why, you rogue!" cried he to the gamekeeper, "it was expressly stipulated that no one should shoot game over this land but myself."

"That's true, Sir; and we have not deceived you."

"But the scoundrels over the water yonder?"

"Oh, they're not shooting at game at all, at all. They're shooting at you, your honor."

And so they were.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

USEFUL RECIPES.

CANNED PLUMS.—Sort over the fruit, rejecting those that are imperfect; to every pound of plums allow half the quantity of sugar, if they are very ripe or light-colored; moisten the sugar with water, and place over the fire in a preserving kettle, removing the scum as it rises, and when boiling add the fruit, setting on the back of the stove, where the plums will get heated through and juice commence to run before boiling. As soon as they boil up once, take from the stove and bottle immediately, keeping as whole as possible.

CANNED PEARS.—To obtain the Bartletts in perfection they should be placed between flannel to ripen, and when not quite mellow enough for eating they are ready for canning. Do not attempt more than one jar at a time, for in cooking sufficient for two or three at once one is sure to break the fruit and spoil its appearance. To every quart jar allow seven medium-sized pears, a scant pint of water, and a quarter of a pound of fruit sugar. Cut the fruit in two, remove the core, pare, and throw them in cold water to prevent discoloration. Put the sugar and water in a porcelain kettle, and put over the fire; when scum arises remove it, and as soon as the sirup boils hard, add the fruit; boil all over three minutes. If the jars are of glass, wet a cloth in cold water, fold several times, and put under to prevent breakage. Lay in a few pieces of fruit, then some juice, until the jar is full; run a spoon-handle down the side to allow all the air bubbles to escape, and seal tightly while all is hot. Keep in a cool, dark place. Sickel pears are canned in the same way, only their flavor is best when picked fresh from the tree, and not ripened in the house. If the Bartletts are hard, and can not be ripened in flannel, boil them a few minutes, until a straw will run through easily.

FRIED CANNED TOMATOES.—Procure fine ripe smooth specimens; cut in two, as in frying for table; put a small quantity of fresh, sweet lard in the pan; when hot put in the tomatoes, skin side down. When nearly done pack in the can, add a little hot water to the juice in the pan, fill the can as full as possible with it, and seal tight. On this depends the keeping of the tomatoes, for if there is the least air-hole, nothing spoils more quickly. When wanted for use, pour off the water and grease, lay in a plate, season, and cook until brown in a small quantity of melted butter. Add cream for gravy. By this method they can be had all winter, and are just as good as when fresh in the middle of summer.

CATSUP.—One peck of ripe tomatoes. Cut a slit in each one to allow the juice to escape, and put in a porcelain kettle over a slow fire, letting them boil until the pulp is dissolved; when cool enough, press through a colander; then, if it is desired free of seeds and very smooth, through a hair sieve. Return to the fire, and add half an ounce of salt, one ounce of mace, two table-spoonfuls of celery seed (either put in a bag, to be taken out when done cooking, or thrown in to be left); mix smoothly with a scant cupful of vinegar, one table-spoonful of black pepper, the same of powdered cloves, and seven of ground mustard, allowing it to boil five or six hours, stirring well and often the last two; remove the mace, and pour into a stone jar. Let it stand on the cellar floor, closely covered, twenty-four hours. Add a pint of strong vinegar, bottle, cork, and seal. Keep in a cool, dry place.

GINGER CAKE, PLAIN AND GOOD.—Into two quarts of flour rub well a tea-spoonful of soda, and, when well mixed, two tea-spoonfuls of cream of tartar; then either powdered cloves or ginger to taste cut fine. To one tea-cupful of butter, or lard and butter mixed, add two tea-cupfuls of molasses. If too stiff, add a little more molasses; if too soft, add flour until of the proper consistency to roll out. Cut in round cakes, and bake in a quick oven. Cloves and no ginger make a delightful cake.

GRAPE JELLY.—Pick the berries off the stems, and subject to a gentle heat until when mashed the juice will easily run; strain through a colander, then through a flannel jelly-bag. To every pint of juice allow a pound of fruit sugar, and to every quart a scant quarter of one of Cox's boxes of gelatine. When the juice is put to boil, add the gelatine, and warm the sugar in a tin basin, taking care it does not stick and burn. When the juice has boiled twenty minutes, run through a hair sieve, put back to boil, and add the sugar. Let it bubble once, and remove from the fire. The gelatine makes it firm, which it is almost impossible to do unless that or isinglass is used. If both dark and light jelly are desired, keep the light and dark varieties separate, and cook at different times.

STRAWBERRY TAPIOCA.—This makes a most delightful dessert. Soak overnight a large tea-cupful of tapioca in cold water; in the morning put half of it in a yellow-ware baking dish, or in the porcelain one of a silver pudding dish. Sprinkle sugar over the tapioca; then on this put a quart of berries, sugar, and the rest of the tapioca. Fill the dish with water, which should cover the tapioca about a quarter of an inch. Bake in a moderately hot oven until it looks clear. Eat cold with cream or custard. If not sweet enough, add more sugar at table, and in baking, if it seems too dry, more water is needed.

PEACH TAPIOCA.—Prepare the same quantity of tapioca, and on the first layer sprinkle more sugar than for strawberries. The peaches should be pared and quartered. Make three layers of tapioca and two of the fruit; use less water than the foregoing recipe calls for, and cook a little longer.

PINE-APPLE TAPIOCA.—Allow to one large cup of tapioca half a large pine-apple, or the whole of a small one. Pare and grate the fruit. A small quantity of tapioca in the bottom of the dish, then some of the grated fruit and sugar, mixing it more through and through than for strawberries or peaches. Add water, and bake.

SECOND-COUSIN SARAH.

BY F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Little Kate Kirby," "For Her Sake," "A Bridge of Glass," "Mattie: A Stray," "No Man's Friend," etc., etc.

Book the First.

REUBEN CULWICK.

CHAPTER IX.

"TOTS."

LONG before Reuben Culwick had made up his mind to rise the next morning tiny knuckles had rapped significantly and persistently at his bedroom door. Reuben did not answer, although he smiled in his half-sleep, and knew that Tots was astir, anxious to see him, to hear his voice, to know all about the big doll that he had told her last night was coming home with his luggage. At the fifth or sixth summons, and when a Dutch clock down stairs was striking eight, Reuben Culwick condescended to inform the young lady on the other side of the door that he should be in his room in ten minutes, and that he requested the favor of Tots's company to breakfast on that particular occasion, a piece of intelligence which took Tots with a tremendous plunge to the basement floor in search of Aunt Lucy, the only vestige of humankind to be discovered at that hour, John Jennings taking it easily till nine as a rule.

"Me to breffast with Uncle Roo," announced Tots, with as grave an air of importance as her excitement would allow.

"Who says so?" asked Lucy Jennings, suspicious of the truth of the statement.

"Uncle Roo says so."

"You've been bothering him—you've been knocking at his door, Elizabeth, after all that I told you," cried Lucy Jennings, sharply.

"On'y once or so," said the child, with a self-excusing tone; "he's ditting up fast, auntie."

Lucy Jennings indulged in a little lecture on the heinousness of the offense which Tots had committed, and then carried up stairs, and into the first-floor front, a high-backed infant's chair, into which Tots insisted upon being securely screwed immediately, and set close to the side of the chair which awaited the presence of its master. Lucy Jennings was still screwing when Reuben Culwick entered the room, and bade her good-morning.

Digitized by Google

"You're spoiling the child; you are letting her have her own way in every thing; you don't know how to manage children," remarked Miss Jennings.

"No, I suppose I don't," said Reuben; "but the child knows how to manage me, and that comes to the same thing."

"That's a poor answer," muttered Lucy.

"Befitting a poor sort of fellow. And this is a poor little waif to whom much happiness is never likely to come—eh, Lucy?"

"I don't know; I can't tell," answered Lucy.

"When she gets older and more curious, when the world's before her, and we can't help her in it much. Poor Tots!"

The big man sat down by the child's side, put his arm round her, and kissed her, and two little arms were flung impetuously round his neck, where they clung and clasped him.

"Oh, Tots is glad oo've come back, uncle!" she said, with a sigh of pleasure, as she released her hold at last.

"Really?"

"Really and tooney."

"And what would you have done if I hadn't come back, Tots?" he inquired; "if I had stopped at my dear papa's for ever and ever, as I warned you that I might?"

"I would have come after oo."

"No, you would have gone to school with lots of pretty little girls, and grown up good instead."

"I would have cried till oo come back to me."

"That wouldn't have been right, old lady," he said, patting the child's back.

Lucy Jennings regarded the pair critically, allowed her gaze to wander to the breakfast-table in order to see that all was as the lodger required, and then passed stiffly and angularly from the room — a woman who hardly understood the poetry of the situation upon which she closed the door.

And yet there was some poetry, possibly some sublimity, in the strong affection which bound man and child together. Ties of kindred there were none between them, any more than there were between Tots and the Jenningses down stairs. Tots was of the streets, and the warm heart of the stranger had plucked her from their desolateness some eighteen months since. He who could hardly afford to keep himself made a great struggle and a little sacrifice to keep her—to stand between her and the work-house, where the red hand of the policeman would have conducted her on the night Tots first appeared upon the stage of Reuben Culwick's life.

Tots, a ragged, unkempt, fair-haired, blue-eyed child, had been found on the steps of the Prince Regent public-house after twelve o'clock had struck, and the drinkers had been turned into the roadway. No one knew any thing about her, and she knew very little concerning herself. She said something about mother and father in an inarticulate fashion common to her eighteen months of existence, and she cried for mother for five minutes after the policeman had shaken her from sleep in the shadow of the public-house doorway, and a few loiterers had gathered round, and gazed vacantly at her, and failed to recognize her as any one's child with whom they were acquainted. It was a commonplace incident of poor neighborhoods, and such child life as this—there was nothing to marvel at; children were always being lost, and taken to the station-house to be claimed, and to the work-house when unclaimed. The only novelty about this affair was the interest of the man with the beard, the man who lodged at the fire-work shop, in the stray's forlorn condition. He had been striding to his home when the crowd arrested his attention, and when the child shrieked with fear at the policeman, as if her eighteen months had already taught her to dread the representative of law and order, he took her under his protection, and said that she should stay at the house in Hope Street, and be cared for till the morning. Tots clung to him as her friend already, and the policeman followed him to the next street, and booked the full particulars in his note-book, in case of inquiries at the station-house, where Reuben Culwick had an idea that he would take the child the next day.

But no inquiries were ever made concerning Tots, though Reuben advertised, and the police stations put up a bill on their blackboards along with their "Found Deads," "Burglaries," and "Murders," and Tots was never passed over to the parish. When Tots was scrubbed and combed by Lucy Jennings, she was a bright specimen of babyhood enough, and in twenty-four hours she had forgotten father and mother, and taken so desperately to Reuben Culwick that the strong man never found it in his heart to set her from his charity again. It was a wild idea, the Jenningses thought—a foolish undertaking, to say the best of it—but they came to terms with the lodger for the extra trouble involved by the care of the child while he thought what was best to be done, until thinking over it became less of a habit, and love became a stronger element in Tots's favor, and pleaded for her till the day of which we write.

For eighteen months had Reuben Culwick been the protector of Tots, and Tots had lived in a world of imaginary uncles and aunts, and there was never now a talk of her going away. Reuben had accepted an immense responsibility, and the weight of it had not oppressed him much. He had been a harder and sterner man before the child's affection for him had changed his character a little—hence Tots in her way had not been wholly an incumbrance to her preserver, but a blessing in disguise.

Sitting at the table watching her that day, with his life far clearer before him than it had been, he thought Tots would be like a daughter to him if he lived—and if she lived. She was not a strong child, but he hoped that she would live to grow up and call him "father"—for had she been his own daughter she could not have taken a greater hold on his heart. He should never marry—he should never be able to afford to marry any body—but he would be able to take care of Tots until some respectable young fellow gave her a home and a name, and he was left alone to fight out the rest of his battle.

What that battle was to be like, Reuben Culwick was hardly certain. He was sure of a few scars; he did not look forward to any great degree of glory. He was not a despondent man, our readers have already perceived for themselves, but he was scarcely sanguine as to his future for all that, and he had no ambitious dreams of becoming a rich man. Once he had thought that he was cut out for an author, that publishers would be running after him, and the critical press singing to his praise and glory; but he was almost certain, not quite, that he had found his level on the Penny Trumpet, and that a few pounds a week would be the maximum sum which his abilities, such as they were, might be able to procure him.

As for his prospects, for his chance of becoming his father's heir, they had faded completely away now. He was pretty certain that he had given up every hope of that, that he and his hard father could not possibly agree any more, even before he had made up his mind to sink his pride and independence, and seek Simon Culwick at Worcester.

After that meeting—which he had not conducted well, a strange young woman had taken the liberty of informing him—amen to all his day-dreams!

Tots and he were having breakfast together, and Tots was asking a hundred questions, after her usual habit, when the first post brought him in a bulky packet and two letters. Lucy Jennings brought them up stairs, and lingered in the room, glancing at the parcel and letters curiously.

Reuben had long ago discovered that his landlord's sister was an inquisitive woman—he was not quite certain that she was not a suspicious woman also, despite her chapel-going and district-visiting—and that spirit of contrariety which lurks in most manly bosoms induced him to say, "Thank you," and to place packet and letters unopened at his side.

Lucy made some little show of dusting the furniture with the corners of her apron, and then went reluctantly toward the door. Reuben had not made a dash at his letters after his usual fashion, and imparted the general nature of the contents to those who were handy to receive it; and the attendant, half servant, half friend, said at last,

"You are not curious about your correspondents to-day."

"I can guess all about them."

"I dare say you can," said Lucy, half disdainfully; "one's from a woman at Worcester."

"Ah—Worcester!" exclaimed Reuben, taken off his guard; "what's wrong now?"

"You did not expect a letter quite so soon, then?"

"Not I. Now, Lucy—if this should be a recall!"

"What a change to your life after this dreary street and us dreary people!"

Reuben looked at her intently as he broke the envelope of his letter. She was out of sorts still; he had not remarked it so much before, but she was certainly a disagreeable kind of old young woman, and particularly plain and thin. Hers was a hard life, keeping a house and a simple-minded brother in order, looking after a lodger and Tots, and not saving money after all her drudgery, but possibly getting into debt. A woman, too, to whom religion hardly brought the comfort or resignation that it should have done, and whom he would not attempt to tease, though he might object at times strongly to her manners. Poor old girl! what had she to make life bearable even? and why should he cross her tempers, and put her out for the day?

"She writes a good hand," said Reuben, regarding the envelope once more.

"Who?"

"The girl in gray silk."

"I don't know who the girl in gray silk is—I have never heard you speak of her before."

"No," said Reuben, "I suppose not. She was at my father's house yesterday morning, and I wondered who she was, and where the deuce she had dropped from. A pretty girl, too."

"Your father's second wife, perhaps."

"No—I don't think that. I'm sure not, for there was no wedding-ring, I recollect."

"You noticed her a great deal, it seems, Mr. Reuben."

"Yes, in my way. It's my habit to take stock of every thing—how could I be a reporter, special and otherwise, without? And she—Halloo!"

"You are asked to return," exclaimed Lucy; "your father's heart has softened toward you, and Heaven wills a happier time for you, as I said that it would."

"You are very kind—but this is from my second-cousin Sarah."

"Who's she?" exclaimed Lucy Jennings, sharply enough now.

"Ah! you don't know yet," remarked our hero. "Why, what a deal I have to tell you and John and Tots still!"

"So it seems," Lucy Jennings muttered to herself.

"You would like to know what this is about, perhaps, Lucy?" Reuben asked, somewhat dryly.

"Not I—if it's a secret."

"I never had a secret in my life."

"And it's no business of mine. What's the use of telling me or John any thing?" said Lucy, beginning to dust the books on a side-table near.

"Well, I'll tell Tots.—Tots," Reuben said, turning suddenly to the child, half buried in a large basin of sop, and hence very busy, very silent, and very much besmeared with bread-and-milk, "my second-cousin Sarah sends me her grandmother's love, and the old lady's thanks for a fourpenny-bit which I gave her, and the old lady's hope that she may live to spend it, and the old lady's wish that I may hear soon, very soon, of a nice situation for my second cousin, who adds, in pencil, 'Don't take any notice of this,' in an independent way that's peculiar to her habits. What an odd fish that girl is! She interests me."

"She is pretty too, I suppose?" said Lucy, with a twanging voice.

"Ahem!—I don't know—I dare say she might be, if highly got up for the occasion. By-the-way, you might, with your extensive chapel connection, hear of something for Sarah."

"I can't hear of any thing for myself," was the short answer.

"You!"

"I've tried more than once—when John has put me out with his absurdities—when I have despaired of him, or of ever doing him any good."

"But you hardly meant to leave him—that was a notion soon got over?"

"Well—yes—we'll say so, if you like."

"I should be glad to hear of something for this girl. She's a singular young woman, but one who might turn out well with a good soul to look after her. That poor old woman, Sarah the First," added Reuben, thoughtfully, "may pass away at any moment, and I should like to be handy with a home for her."

"Why?"

"Because without a home she'll drift, perhaps."

"From right, you mean?"

"Yes—it is possible."

"Is she so very weak, then?"

"Very weak. She can't carry a portmanteau properly."

Lucy Jennings regarded Reuben Culwick with amazement, but he had fallen into thought, or had grown tired of her want of sympathy, and passed into a jesting, aggravating vein, which she could brook least of all his moods. She went from the room, closed the door behind her, and then stood still. It was a habit of hers to pick up scraps of information thus—a bad habit, the result of insufficient training in her early youth, before her father blew himself to bits—and she knew that Reuben often talked strangely to Tots.

"There, she has not waited for the second letter—and that's very important to me, Tots."

Tots stared, and then dived into her sop again.

"This is a want-of-confidence letter, to balance the confidence expressed in Second-cousin Sarah's affectionate epistle, Tots. This tells me politely what a fool I am—what a vain and ambitious ass—what a driveling idiot—to expect sensible folk to waste money upon a fellow who writes for the Penny Trumpet."

Tots looked up at the word "trumpet;" it suggested another gift when the luggage came home. But Reuben was deep in his letter.

"Yes, Tots," he said, more in soliloquy than to his little golden-haired companion. "Messrs. Press and Co.'s compliments, and regret that the novel which Mr. C. did them the favor, etc., etc., etc., is not suitable, etc., etc., etc., to their particular style of publication, etc., etc., etc., and with thanks for the favor of a perusal, etc., etc., etc., beg to return the same, etc., etc., etc., and they are the ass's—the stupendous ass's!—most humble and obliged servants, Tots. That's the third time of asking and refusing, Reuben," he said, suddenly apostrophizing himself, "and you are uncommonly well used to this kind of thing, old boy; but still you bore the Worcester disappointment better than this one—eh? How's that—after all your experience—you duffer?"

There was a long silence, and when Lucy Jennings was tired of waiting outside the door she went down stairs and about her own business. Reuben Culwick, with the publisher's letter in his hands, sat and stared at the breakfast-cup, and was not aroused from his reverie to an active concern in minor matters until Tots, spoon and basin and chair, suddenly tilted over, and the prostrate young lady required much soothing after her calamity. He did all the consolation himself; he did not send for "Aunt Lucy."

CHAPTER X.

A PLACE FOR SARAH.

REUBEN CULWICK settled down in his old groove the following day; life went on with him steadily, and there was no shadow of discontent upon the path of his pursuing. His was an enviable nature that made the best of things, that quickly adapted itself to circumstances, or sank all personal grievances beyond the ken of the watchful eyes about him. He was a philosopher who submitted complacently to the unalterable, or he was a hypocrite who disguised his bitterness of feeling with consummate ability, Lucy Jennings considered. She could not believe in a man who should have been rich, whose father was one of the wealthiest men in the fat county of Worcestershire, settling down to a Camberwell back street, and professing to be satisfied with his position. She was a well-meaning, thoughtful young woman, but she did not give Reuben Culwick credit for so much self-abnegation as that. She liked the man, but she disbelieved in his philosophy, and had grave doubts of his virtues; she had many grave doubts on most matters, and was suspicious concerning every body's motives; and yet she was a religious woman in her way, and put herself out of that way to be of service at times. She was as hard to understand as most folk too, and she made no effort to place herself in a clearer light with those who set her down for an eminently disagreeable woman, which she was not exactly, though there were sour and sharp hours of which her brother and Tots were cognizant. Certainly she had not much faith in humanity, and Reuben's equable temperament aggravated her more than she could account for. What was it to her how Reuben Culwick took the ills of life, or why should it distract her to hear him laughing pleasantly, when he should have been crushed down by much mortification of spirit? He had nothing to be thankful for, she sometimes thought, but his health and strength, and yet he professed to be happy—he who did not go to chapel, and kept out of the way when the pastor came to tea at Hope Lodge.

He was of an easy disposition, apparently; his mother, who had died in that house, had said so constantly; and he had been constantly kind to his mother; but what a stubborn nature it must have been to hold aloof from the father so long, and what a proud man he must be, with all his forced humility! thought Lucy. No, she could not understand him—did not even give him credit for his unselfish devotion to Tots. He knew more about Tots, and where Tots came from, than most people, she fancied. She was not going to believe altogether in that story of Tots being found and adopted by him solely out of charity—she might as well believe every line of that rubbishing novel which he had written for gain and for fame, and which publishers were continually sending back with their respectful compliments, and they would much rather have nothing to do with it. He was a man with many good traits of character. She liked him, God knows, more than he would ever guess, more than she had ever liked a man, or should ever like one again—but she did not believe in him. Hers was a strangely dissatisfied and distrustful nature, and she could not set it aside for another. She did not even believe in herself, with or without good reason, as time may prove, perhaps; she was as suspicious of Lucy Jennings as of the community about her, which constituted Lucy Jennings's world; still, be it understood that she was a thoughtful, well-meaning, poverty-stricken mortal, who would turn up a trump card when every body playing the game of life with her thought that she was out of trumps—as happened, for instance, four weeks afterward. It was the middle of June then; Reuben walked in and out of Hope Lodge at uncertain hours, early and late, according to the Trumpet's claims upon his attention in town; the fire-work-maker was busy at last, and the Saxe-Gotha Gardens had opened for the season, and were doing tolerably badly.

Reuben one evening had come home early and taken Tots for a walk, Myatt's Fields way, where there were "British Queens" to be purchased for a reasonable price of the strawberry grower himself, in those days not very far removed from the present. Tots was fond of a walk with "Uncle Roo," and fond of strawberries during the progress of the journey, and this was one of the treats which the fine weather brought round, and to which Reuben was unselfish enough to devote his attention when his time would permit.

The big man with the beard, and the tiny child who clung to his hand and prattled all the way, were well-known figures over the open land that was still spared to suburban folk at Camberwell—father and daughter they were imagined to be by the strangers who met them by the way.

"As if any one would walk about as much with a strange child as Reuben does with her!" said Miss Jennings, almost disdainfully. A clever mind than her brother's was that of Lucy Jennings, and yet poor, dreamy, soft-headed John had gone at once at the truth to which the other had closed her eyes systematically. "He is a man who wants something to love," the fire-work-maker had said on the night of Reuben's return from Worcester; and Reuben Culwick loved little Tots, though he had never explained his feelings to any one, because she was as much alone in the world as himself, and wanted greater care.

Lucy Jennings met Reuben and Tots in Hope Street, returning from their walk.

"What a time you have been!" she said, peevishly. "Did you not say that you were coming home early this afternoon?"

"I don't remember."

"I wanted you to write a letter before the five-o'clock post went out—the country post."

"The country post? What for?" asked Reuben.

"I have found a situation for that girl."

"What girl? Sarah Eastbell?"

"Yes. Didn't you say, sneeringly and mockingly enough, certainly, that with my extensive chapel connection, I might hear of something for her?"

"I don't remember my sneering and mocking, Lucy."

"You said that it was likely she would drift away from right without a home, and thus it became my duty to try and do something—and I have been trying ever since."

"That's very kind of you."

"But my extensive chapel connection," she continued, with bitter emphasis, "is, after all, very poor, and fights hard for its bread—and dies fighting sometimes without it—and the chance to help any one does not come frequently."

"And it has come, then—at last?"

"For your second cousin—if she's not too proud."

"She is proud in her way, I fancy."

"You are all proud—horribly proud," said

Hosted by Google

"TOTS CLUNG TO HIM AS HER FRIEND ALREADY."

Lucy. "Yours is the pride that apes humility, but it's none the less objectionable."

"I will not argue the point with you," said Reuben, easily. "Granted that I am as proud as Lucifer, what are you going to do for my second-cousin Sarah?"

"The girl at the baker's where we deal is silly enough to get married the week after next. There will be wanted some one to take her place, to weigh the bread, and put the right money for it into the till afterward. I have answered for the honesty of this second cousin of yours."

"Thank you," said Reuben, thoughtfully. "I wish there had been less publicity about the berth, and less of the till."

"You can't trust her!"

"Yes, I can trust her, though I know so little about her. She has a good reference from her grandmother—she's evidently warm-hearted, affectionate, and honest—any one can take care of that poor old blind woman now—and here's an opening in life for one of my relations. It's not a swell berth," he added, thoughtfully; "but the Culwicks and the Eastbells are down on their luck, and Sarah's plaguy poor."

"You see that poverty's a plague, with all your talk, then!" cried Lucy, quickly.

"It's a nuisance at times," he added, dryly, "and no one objects to getting away from it, though it isn't so hard to put up with as rich people fancy."

"Will you write to your cousin at once?"

"No; I will write to my aunt—and Sarah will read it aloud to her," he answered. "And now, Lucy Jennings, thank you for remembering the girl."

"I don't want any thanks."

"Who knows but that I may hear of a situation for you one of these days—eh?"

"I'll take it—I'm tired enough of Hope Lodge," she said, as she abruptly left him to proceed homeward alone, taking sudden charge of Tots too, who was disposed to resist, until Reuben said that he had work to do, and she must go with Aunt Lucy.

Reuben Culwick wrote to Mrs. Eastbell that night, offering the situation to Sarah of which mention has been made, speaking of its advantages as well as he could, of the opening to an honest life, if not a brilliant opening, and intimating his wish that his second cousin would consider the matter, and let him know in due course.

When he had finished the letter he sat with his hands in his pockets staring at it for a while, and with a slight contraction of his forehead as he gazed.

"What a poor lot we are!" he said; "what indigence it all is!"

Lucy Jennings was right. He was hardly what he seemed. He had his spasms of dissatisfaction, though his common-sense quickly got over them. He had chosen his own lot, and he would not mourn at the result.

He posted his letter, and waited patiently four days for the reply, which he considered was lacking at least in promptitude—Lucy Jennings said, ingratitude.

The answer came at length, in a thick, sprawling, downhill hand, which the blind woman might have written herself, and which was certainly not Sarah Eastbell's. It was an ill-spelled and rambling epistle that we need not give word for word. It came hoping that Reuben was well, as it left the writer and Cousin Sarah at present, and it thanked him for his thought of that cousin, who was a good girl, and would not leave her grandmother under any consideration now. Sarah was very happy and contented where she was; but it might be as well for Reuben not to trouble any more about what Mrs. Eastbell had said concerning a situation for her granddaughter.

This epistle put Reuben Culwick out a little. It annoyed him more than he cared to confess; it even puzzled him. At variance as it was with the past anxiety of the old blind woman, and with the last letter to him, which had reached London almost as soon as himself, it was hardly the inconsistency of the whole affair which irritated and bewildered him so much, as the mystery which seemed to hang about his second cousin's life. Why had she not written? Why was there no expression of thanks from Sarah Eastbell for his thought of her? Why had the grandmother altered her mind in so sudden and abrupt a fashion—she who was very anxious concerning her grandchild's future when he had called at the almshouses of St. Oswald's? He would go for a long walk, and consider the matter attentively. When he wanted a good idea he always went from the fire-work-maker's in search of it; it seldom came to him in that stuffy front-room, but walking fast in the shade of the streets, or under the stars in the lonely road where the market-gardens and Myatt's Fields were, he generally contrived to overtake it. After all, he was an excitable fellow—"a fly-away man," Miss Jennings said, when he seemed disposed to dash too rapidly at conclusions—a fault that was somewhat prominent, considering what a philosopher he would like people to think that he was.

He started suddenly for his long walk, with Second-cousin Sarah's want of gratitude upon his mind. It was a gala night at the Saxe-Gotha, next door but two, and there was a heap of dirty boys and girls hanging about the front-doors, where a row of colored lamps indicated the places to pay before admittance was gained to the splendors beyond. He had to battle his way through this little mob before he could put his long limbs into fair marching order, and then he was off at a swinging pace befitting his size and stature toward the Camberwell New Road, and the street on the other side of the way leading to the open ground and the railway arches that were cropping up over it.

He walked so rapidly that in crossing the road he ran against a young woman, to whom he made an apology for his clumsiness, and who muttered back something in return, and then made so quick and sidelong a movement from him that his attention was directed toward her again.

Second-cousin Sarah!

Was it, or was it not? Was he dreaming? Had he got the girl so deeply impressed upon his mind that his thoughts had conjured up her fetch? Was it a figure born of his own fancies, or the shadow of a truth flitting by him in the dark street? No, it could not be—it was not likely—it was impossible!

Still he stood there looking after her—watching her proceed down Hope Street as though she knew the place by heart; and as she passed under the gas-lamp with her head very much bent forward, and a thin rag of a shawl drawn tightly round her, the black and white dress seemed even to the observant man in the background a familiar pattern, the alternate stripes of which he had last seen from the gateway of the almshouses. A striped dress of black and white was no particular novelty, but he swung himself round on his heels, and marched slowly after the receding figure—a man indisposed to believe in the coincidence, but determined to make sure that his fancies were based upon nothing more than a faint resemblance to his eccentric relative.

"Why am I troubling myself about this girl at all?" he said. "What am I to her? What is she to me? Even if that were the girl suddenly turning up in my own neighborhood, at a time when her grandmother would have me believe that she was down in Worcester, what—By George!" he exclaimed aloud, "it is she!"

The female in advance had suddenly paused on the pavement of Hope Street, injudiciously stopping beneath a second gas-lamp, and looking carefully and eagerly in the direction whence she had come, and as if to re-assure herself that no one was following at her heels.

The expression on her countenance was the anxious and perplexed look which he had seen once before, as surely as he had seen that face in Worcester. There was no doubt of it; and he increased his pace at once. The young woman beneath the lamp-light wavered for an instant, and then ran for it; and Reuben, not to be outdone this time, began to run after her.

After a second hasty glance over her shoulder, and an unceremonious scattering of the boys and girls before the entrance to the Saxe-Gotha Gardens, the woman pursued darted into the establishment itself, as if the sixpence for admission might constitute an insurmountable barrier between herself and him who followed her, or as if he would not believe in any one with whom he was acquainted entering such a place as that; but Reuben Culwick was in hot haste still, and gained upon her rapidly.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SILK PHOTOGRAPHS.

FROM the recent advances and discoveries in the photographic art, we may yet be able to do our decorating and ornamenting of silk by the use of sun-printing. If silk be thoroughly impregnated with the bichromate of potash, it will become extremely sensitive to the light. Then let any shapes or patterns cut out of tin be laid upon this, and the whole exposed to daylight, and the pattern will be at once transferred to it; and if the silk be white, or nearly so, the pattern will show distinctly a pale red, which is found to be quite permanent. If the silk itself be of a reddish tinge, then the pattern will be of a deeper and richer shade. In this way very handsome borders for curtains or designs for any silk articles might be printed. For instance, take fern leaves and arrange them to form wreaths or sprays upon the prepared silk; then lay panes of glass over them to keep them flat. Upon exposing them to the sun for a short time the shapes will become printed upon the groundwork of the original color, with varied shades of red or brownish-red. By this simple plan the richest original designs may be obtained.

THE ELIXIR OF DEATH.

Up in the turret chamber, whence a gleam
Shot through the lancet window on the night,
There was a sound of falling glass—a scream,
And silence, as when birds are heard in flight.

There, in the stony heights of Stolzenfels,
Its lord, a solitary student, dwelt,
And sought Hermetic lore, and chemic spells
Wrought from grim folios nightly overspelt.

From Geber and the greater Albert came
Visions of gold from baser metals won;
And Trismegistus fanned a steady flame
For quest of youth enduring with the sun.

And on this night—while from the lamp that swayed
By silver chains in flasks of many a hue
There gleamed a heart of light—my lord essayed
To test the great result of all he knew.

Alone—inspired by Paracelsus' page
With fatal hopes—he dared to breast the truth,
To raise the Elixir, and from lips of age
Quaff of the fountain of eternal youth.

The burning potion, coursing through each vein,
Begot an instant's bliss: a flood of light,
Music, and odors seethed within his brain;
Then utter darkness, as of sudden night.

"Life? Is it life," he cried, "in all its prime?
Youth? Is it youth renewed in mighty throes?
Ha, ha! have we defeated thee, Old Time?
Blunted thy scythe?—God, how the potion glows!

"So dark, too! And this numbness of the spine!
Can all be right? The adepts were at one,
And the old palimpsest in word and sign
Read clearly—what is this that I have done?

"It is not Life, but Death! What hands are these?
My Miramel's? my daughter's? Ah, too late!
I thought to dower thee beyond argosies
Of Ind, and see thee throned in regal state.

"The volume at my feet, couldst thou construe
The characters, would show thee all; but I—
My child, my fair one, all is lost, and you
Are beggared—yet one kiss before I die."

A weeping face, set in a cloud of light,
Bent over icy lips whence sound had fled;
A cry of anguish rose upon the night—
The wizard lord of Stolzenfels was dead.

THE ELIXIR OF DEATH.

Hosted by Google

Knitted and Crochet Overshoe and Sandal, Figs. 1–3.

THESE overshoes are worn over thin shoes to protect the feet from the cold. They are worked with blue and white tapestry worsted and twelvefold white worsted and steel knitting-needles in loop stitch. The loops on the wrong side simulate a fur lining. To make the overshoe shown by Fig. 1, the pattern of which is given by Figs. 34 and 35, Supplement, begin on the front edge of the front with a foundation of 16 st. (stitch) with blue worsted. Then work, going back and forth, first with blue worsted two rounds all knit plain, in doing which always widen on the outer edge of the knitted part according to the pattern Fig. 35. 3d round.—With blue worsted 2 k. (knit plain); now lay on a twelvefold thread of white worsted, * wind this thread underneath, and on the needle of the right hand form a loop seven-eighths of an inch long, carry the thread back over the needle, winding it on the needle, and at the same time holding the loop with the thumb of the left hand, and draw the last st. worked off previously with blue worsted over the two threads on the needle; the arrow-head on Fig. 3, which shows a full-sized section of the knitting and the manner of execution, indicates how to insert the needle in the stitch. Then work with blue worsted 2 k., carry the white thread over these 2 st., and repeat from *. Cut off the white worsted strand at the end of the round. 4th round.—With blue worsted. All st. on the needle worked off with blue worsted in the preceding round are knit plain, and all the st. formed of double white worsted threads in the preceding round are slipped. 5th and 6th rounds.—With blue worsted. All knit plain, working off the double st. in the 5th round always as 1 st. Now repeat always the 3d–6th rounds. The heel is worked on both sides to the middle of the back in connection with the front, having first chained off the middle st. of the front. After finishing the heel, sew the edge stitches in the middle of the back together from the wrong side. The sole, of which Fig. 34, Supplement, gives the pattern, is worked in a similar manner. Begin also from the front edge with a foundation of 14 st., and narrow and widen on the outer edge in the requisite manner. Having bordered the front, the heel, and the sole each with a round of single crochet with blue worsted, sew the parts together from the wrong side according to the corresponding figures, gathering the front and heel slightly. Then take up the edge st. on the slope of the shoe on needles, and knit with white knitting wool ten rounds all plain, and then chain off the st. On the front of the shoe set a bow of blue satin ribbon, as shown by the illustration.

The sandal overshoe shown by Fig. 2 is worked from Figs. 32 and 33, Supplement, in the same design, and similar to the overshoe Fig. 1. The trimming consists of a binding worked in loop stitch with white worsted, simulating fur, and of a bow of blue satin ribbon set on the front of the sandal. The binding is worked in the following manner: On a foundation of the requisite length knit one round all plain. In the second round the loops are formed. To do this pass the needle of the right hand through the next st. as if going to knit off plain, then wind the working thread twice on the needle of the right hand as if going to work off the st., and at the same time on a mesh an inch and a quarter in circumference, which is laid on from the under side, again throw the thread over, and then work off the st. Like this st. are worked all the remaining st. 3d round.—All knit plain, in doing which always work off the treble st. as 1 st. Repeat the second and third rounds twice, cast off, and sew the binding on the slope of the front and on the free part of the sole. Set on the bow as shown by the illustration.

Edging for Dresses, Wrappings, etc.

FOR this edging first transfer the design to linen, and on this baste a piece of black silk gimp, following the lines of the design, and fasten the gimp with several stitches where the curves meet. Then stretch the threads with black silk as shown by the illustration, cover them with thread windings, and with similar silk work the wheels and star-shaped figures in point de reprise.

SUIT FOR BOY FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 48–52.

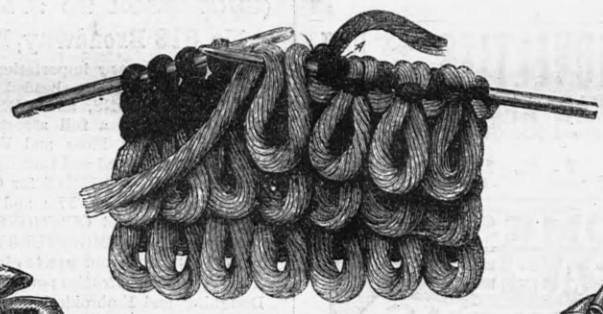

Fig. 3.—CROCHET STITCH FOR OVERSHOE AND SANDAL, FIGS. 1 AND 2.

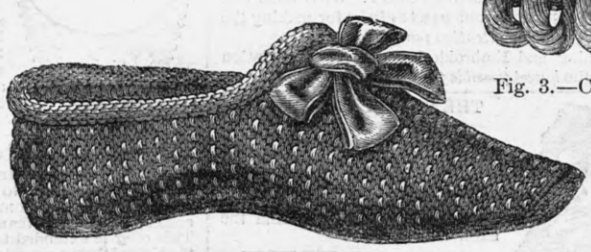

Fig. 1.—KNITTED AND CROCHET OVERSHOE.—[See Fig. 3.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 34 and 35.

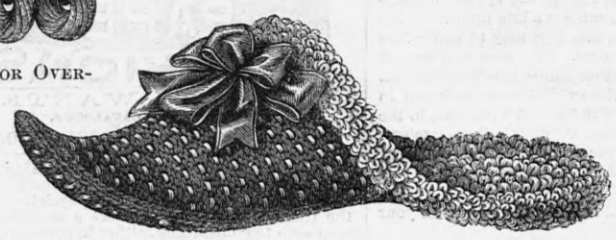

Fig. 2.—KNITTED AND CROCHET SANDAL.—[See Fig. 3.]
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 32 and 33.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

I PERSIST in repeating what I have said before—there is no decided change in fashions, nor will there be while our government remains in its present uncertain state. An incalculable quantity of beautiful fabrics of all kinds, both handsome and costly, and pretty and cheap, has been manufactured in all the great industrial towns of France; colors have been invented and combined by chemical art in a hitherto unheard-of fashion; fringes of fur, and of soft wool woven in trellis, and embroideries of every kind, have been prepared; but all these are used precisely as they were last winter, and, in fact, for several winters past.

For simple toilettes the model style is the double skirt, worn with a basque-waist, buttoned on the side, for slender figures, and trimmed with two rows of buttons; or else a hunting jacket, with vest, revers, and cuffs of velvet or some other fabric of a different color or shade. Metal buttons are most generally worn with these suits, either oxidized silver or gilt.

Dresses made of woolen fabrics will be usually trimmed with fur fringe. The skirt will be either of the material of the rest of the suit or of velveteen; in the latter case the skirt will be plain, and the woolen over-skirt will be edged with fur fringe; or else velvet will be used for trimming, either ribbon or cut in strips. A great impetus has been given of late to the manufacture of velvet in this country. Unwilling any longer to use the German cotton-back velvets, France has applied herself to their fabrication, and the Roubaix velvets are handsomer to-day and no more expensive than the velvets of Germany. They are cut in bands of different widths, and employed to trim the woolen suits just described. Fur fringes will be used most of all for trimming suits made entirely of velveteen; these are rather heavy, but nevertheless are in vogue.

As a model of a more dressy toilette, I will mention the demi-trained skirt without polonaise or pouf, entirely covered with trimming, that of the front breadth being different from that of the back, which is generally composed of flounces, while the front breadth, or tablier, is trimmed either horizontally or perpendicularly with puffs, ruches, and flat folds.

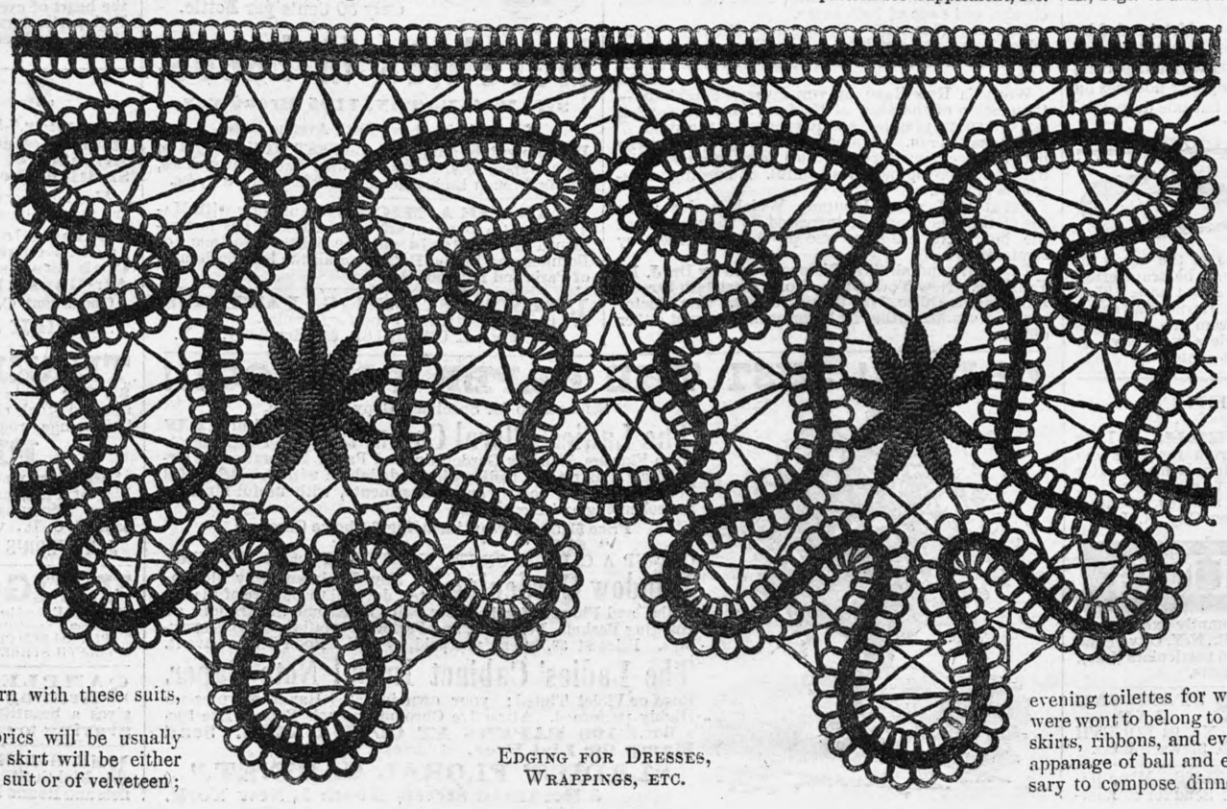
My readers may be interested in the description of a dress that is now being made by Worth for one of the leaders of fashion in Paris. The skirt is double the width of all other skirts, past, present, and future. It is arranged at regular intervals in large box-pleats, not merely in front, but all the way around. This skirt is made of white satin, and has no other trimming. With it will be worn an over dress of café-au-lait velvet almost as long as the skirt, open in front, in the princesse shape. The waist is open en carré, or square. The whole dress is trimmed with a band of black curled feathers. On each front of this over dress (opening over the white satin skirt) are set little tufts of black feathers, arranged so as to look like large buttons. For the hair is a little cap of black feathers, with a rose in the centre. This is a dinner toilette, designed for reunions at a château in the month of November.

Both for trimmings and dresses velvet in all its varieties will be much worn during the coming winter. We will enumerate the different kinds of this material, so beautiful that no other can be compared with it. First, velveteen, or English velvet, all cotton, both back and face; second, Roubaix velvet, with cotton back and silk face; third, Lyons cotton-back velvet, with less cotton and more silk than the Roubaix velvet; fourth, St. Étienne velvet, lighter with silk, but with cotton back; and fifth, Lyons silk velvet, of marvelous fineness, all of silk, and of the highest price that the fabric can attain. Besides plain velvets there are silk stuffs with velvet figures, which are used for polonaises or tunics, to be worn over the velvet skirts of the same or a darker shade; for, on two important points, the fashion of the winter will continue the same: when the over-skirt or polonaise is not precisely like the skirt, it must be of a lighter color—the reverse is not permissible; the skirt must always be plain; if any one wishes to wear a figured fabric, it must be as an over-skirt or polonaise. For this purpose there are manufactured woolen stuffs with brocaded stripes, the tints of which do honor to the French colorists, so marvelous is their blending of the different hues, from the darkest to the lightest. There is likewise manufactured in wool and silk a fabric attempted last summer in linen; this is the Djemilch, with broad stripes, entirely composed of small tufts which have been cut with the scissors during the fabrication of the material. Polonaises and over-skirts of this fabric are very effective.

Bonnets are higher than ever; the news is not pleasant, but it is impossible either to pass it over in silence or to extenuate it. Just now all the ladies look as though they were returning from the spring with a pitcher on their head. This fashion is unbecoming to almost every one; it neither protects the head nor forms a framework for the face; in fact, it is perfectly incomprehensible. Nevertheless it exists, and we must make the best of it. The hair is still worn very high, and in ample quantity; sometimes a huge pin with a ball at each end holds it in place on the crown of the head, while a few curly locks escape from it. We see again this autumn many very long scarfs of white or light gauze, which are twisted around the bonnet and the neck, then fall over the face in the guise of a veil, and hang very low in the back.

We must not forget to mention one of the principal characteristics of the fashion, which is too original not to be noticed—namely, the blending of different colors formerly reserved for dress occasions, but which are now worn in the street, even for walking attire. But for this one must be a good colorist, and possessed of correct taste, otherwise the result is shocking. I will cite a few models of this combination. Dress of pinkish-brown velveteen, not very dark, trimmed with a wide flounce, arranged in large pleats with spaces between; high waist and close sleeves; sleeveless polonaise of bluish-gray cloth, without trimming, buttoned all the way to the throat; belt of velveteen like the skirt, confined by an enormous steel buckle. From this belt fall two ribbons of the same material, one from the buckle in the middle of the front, and the other from the middle of the belt in the back, which is furnished with a large bow without ends; these two ribbons are passed through a second steel buckle, which is sewed on the left side of the polonaise. In like manner are combined dead leaf brown bound with pale green, gris cendre with bleu moyen, brown and écru, and gray and brown.

As we have borrowed from evening toilettes for walking attire all the details which were wont to belong to full dress, such as draperies, double skirts, ribbons, and even flowers, formerly the exclusive appanage of ball and evening dresses, it becomes necessary to compose dinner, tea, and even simple evening



EDGING FOR DRESSES, WRAPPINGS, ETC.

Hosted by Google

costumes of transparent tissues, such as can not be worn in the street—for instance, silk gauze and even woolen grenadine! Stuffs of this kind are found, brocaded on transparent ground, of all colors and all prices, from the richest silk gauzes downward. Crêpe de Chine preserves all its popularity. Houses which have for their customers the richest and most elegant women of Paris, to keep this favorite material from being common have it covered with embroidery of beads or silk. I have seen some remarkable specimens of this kind of embroidery that were ordered by Worth, among others a large polonaise of white crêpe de Chine embroidered all over with brown beads, which assuredly will not become common. Another was embroidered with white beads, another with garnet beads, another with écru beads, and so on. An opera wrap of pink crêpe de Chine was embroidered with black beads. There is the same wealth of embroidery on sashes. Black silk gauze is embroidered with black or gold yellow beads, and white gauze with white beads for dinner and evening dresses.

Bonnets trimmed with fur are in preparation. Others are wholly of fur, resembling the Persian hats, and ornamented in front with an aigrette set on like that of the Shah of Persia.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CONSTANT READER.—Your letter betrays an equal lack of courtesy and observation. If you read the Bazar as constantly as you pretend to do, you would know that plait is synonymous with braid, and pleat with fold. Au reste, we commend to you a careful study of the art of polite letter-writing.

K. K.—Your inquiry came too late to be answered in time for Halloween.

INQUIRER.—We regret that we can give you no information beyond that contained in the article in question.

ANOTHER INQUIRER.—Defaced postage stamps are absolutely worthless. Some time since a stupid hoax set hundreds of good people to work at collecting them in the faith that they would receive an indefinite reward for a million.

MRS. L. H. B.—You can order the perfumes mentioned at any drug store.

MRS. G. W. L.—You failed to send your name, hence we can not send you the English walking jacket pattern. The pockets, collar, cuffs, etc., are made of velvet or repped silk, not of the material of the sacque.

CLARA E. S.—Trim the alpaca suit with bias piped bands of the same. We can not write about trimmings on the pattern.

SARAH E. H.—Make a double-breasted jockey basque to your alpaca; trim it simply with a piped band of the same, and use blue steel buttons to brighten it. Get myrtle green cloth, navy blue flannel, and small plaids for kilt suits for your boy of three. He does not need knickerbockers, but a warm flannel skirt and long crimson or blue woolen stockings.

NOVELTY.—A black cashmere sacque is suitable with any dress. See prices of yak braid and curled fringe in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 41, Vol. VI. Oxidized jewelry is fast losing favor, and we advise a cut steel buckle and arrow instead. However, you can get an oxidized buckle for $2 or $3, and an arrow for the same price. Hats are set quite back on the head. Read about low coiffures in the New York Fashions of Bazar No. 41, Vol. VI. Buttons on redingotes are smaller than those worn last season.

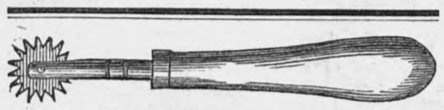
A. E.—The fouragère cords connecting ornaments on waists will be worn again. Why not use your lace curtains straight, like shades, as that is one of the favorite styles at present?

A. T.—The artist to whom reference was made was Mr. Church.—We learned the fact concerning which you inquire in conversation with East Indian merchants. We presume shades or tints are implied rather than whole colors, though the eye is so imperfect as an optical instrument (see a late number of the Popular Science Monthly) that it is easy to conjecture possibilities outside its range. The eyes that do not recognize the colors, however, could hardly miss them. Further illustration of the subject may be found in the works of Professors Tyndall and Youmans, in the opening portion and notes of Field's Chromatology, and in the first book of the Rev. H. R. Haweis's very charming treatise on Music and Morals, published by Harper & Brothers.

J. B. M.—Fringe would not be out of place on your over-skirt.

DESDEMONA.—If you don't know who Desdemona was, read Shakspeare until you find out.—Put jet galloon and fringe on your silk basque and over-skirt; put flounces on the lower skirt.

A. B. C.—Put bias flounces on your skirt, headed by a bias silk band. Trim the double-breasted basque and over-skirt like pattern sent you with a bias band of green silk. Have three or five lapping flounces on the back breadths, while the front has one deep kilt-pleated flounce.



COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

DEAFNESS AND CATARRH.—A Lady who had suffered for years from Deafness and Catarrh was cured by a simple Indian Remedy. Her sympathy and gratitude prompt her to send the recipe, free of charge, to any one similarly afflicted. Address MRS. M. CLARA LEGGETT, Jersey City, N. J.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free).
Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

A. HARAUX'S STAMPING AND Embroidering Establishment is at No. 90 FOURTH AVENUE, a few doors above A. T. Stewart & Co.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS
502-504 Broadway,
Offer for the Season their entire Stock of
Ladies' Furs,
including a Very Extensive and Elegant Assortment of
Seal-Skin Furs,
in all Styles and Qualities, at greatly
Reduced Prices.
502-504 Broadway.

HAIR!!!
L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, corner Fourth Street,
Branch Store, 345 Sixth Avenue,
Between 21st & 22d Streets, begs leave to call the attention of the ladies to his complete and superb stock of Human Hair Goods for the Fall, comprising all the Latest Styles, manufactured of the best quality of French hair only, without any intermixing whatsoever, of his own importation and manufacture.
The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.
RETAILED AT WHOLESALE PRICES.
I can offer to the Public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors.
All goods WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.
PRICE-LIST.
Short Hair Switches.....$1 and upward.
Finest Quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed,
18 inches long, 4 ounces weight.....$5 00
22 inches long, 4 ounces weight..... 6 00
26 inches long, 4 ounces weight..... 8 00
32 inches long, 4 ounces weight.....10 00
Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.
Long Single Curls, naturally Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.
Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

PARIS NOVELTIES JUST RECEIVED.
The Elegant "PANSY" Corset, the GRACEFUL Corset, NEW BUSTLES, Embroidered Underwear, Undressed Kid Gloves, Fine Fans, and Gift Goods.
J. C. DEVIN,
Under Sturtevant House, 1192 Broadway.

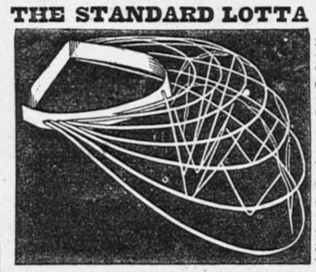
"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS.
AGENTS WANTED.
SEND FOR CATALOGUE.
Domestic Sewing-Machine Co., N. Y.

Skin Diseases a Specialty.
DR. J. M. VANDYKE, Graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, is the only regular physician that makes the treatment of Skin Diseases a specialty. Those who wish to consult him, either in person or by letter, will find him to be first-class in his specialty.
Skin Diseases and their Symptoms.
ACNE, (PIMPLES, BLACKHEADS).—Symptoms—Hard, small pimples with black points; affect the forehead, cheeks, and nose of both sexes.
ECZEMA, (TETTER).—Symptoms—Blisters form, which burst and dry into a yellowish or dark crust, may be in the form of scales; affects all parts of the body.
WOMEN'S RED RASH OF THE FACE.—Symptoms—Congestion of the skin of the face, with red patches and red spots, pimples, and roughness of the skin.
BARBER'S ITCH.—Symptoms—First, a red, itchy patch is seen, mattery pustules form, become quite hard, and shaving becomes painful. A burning sensation is present.
PRURIGO, (INTENSE ITCHING), Which begins when the clothing is removed; increased by the warmth of the bed. No eruption except that produced by scratching.
The above and all Skin Diseases cured by Dr. J. M. VanDyke. New York Office, No. 6 West 16th Street; Philadelphia Office, 1126 Walnut Street. The Doctor can be consulted either by letter or in person at either office.

REDUCED.
Union Adams & Co.
ARE OFFERING AT VERY LOW PRICES
HOSIERY AND GLOVES,
UNDERWEAR,
Shirts & Collars,
HANDKERCHIEFS,
SUSPENDERS,
ROBES, JACKETS, &c.
637 BROADWAY.

THE STANDARD LOTTA BUSTLE.


A diploma has been awarded by the American Institute to A. W. Thomas, Patentee & Manufacturer for the lightest, strongest, most durable, comfortable, elastic, and cheapest Bustle in the market. The wearer can sit in any position whatever without bending or injuring it in the slightest degree, it closing entirely up on sitting, and returning with precision to its original shape on arising. The heaviest dress will not cause it to diminish its size, or change its perfect form (as is generally the fault). No ladies' wardrobe complete without the Standard Lotta Bustle. For sale every where. Ask for Nos. 10, 11, 15, 18, 22, &c., comprising the various sizes and styles. Patentee and Wholesale Manufacturer, 91 White St., N.Y.; & 801 Race St., Phila.
ASK YOUR STOREKEEPER FOR IT.

A. SELIG,
(SUCCESSOR TO S. M. PEYSER),
No. 813 Broadway, New York,
Is daily receiving new importations of rich DRESS TRIMMINGS, such as beaded LACES, GIMPS, FRINGES, BUTTONS, and ORNAMENTS of the latest styles. Also a full assortment of BERLIN ZEPHYRS, Filling, Floss and Embroidery SILKS, CHENILLES, Worsted and Silk EMBROIDERIES of every description, as STRIPS for Chairs, SLIPPERS, Footrests, Towel-racks, Fire and Light SCREENS, LAMBREQUINS and CUSHIONS in GOBLIN and any other style of EMBROIDERY. GUIPURE and POINT LACE work and materials for making the same. Particular attention paid to orders.
Designing and Embroidering of every description done at the lowest possible prices.

THE SECRET OF BEAUTY.
BARRY'S
Pearl Cream
Removes every blemish from the skin, and keeps it
SMOOTH AND VELVETY.
Sold by all druggists, and at the depot, 26 Liberty St., New York.
Only 50 Cents per Bottle.

Novelties in Laces.
SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,
Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MADAME GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS, in any quantities. Send for Circular.
MME. L. CENDRIER, 636 Broadway, N. Y.

LADIES! JUST THE PAPER FOR YOU!!!
Send stamp for Specimen Copy Free.

The Ladies' Floral Cabinet. A beautiful NEW Home Paper, devoted to Flowers, Window Gardening, and Parlor Decorations. Exquisitely illustrated. Ladies will be delighted with it. Delightful home pictures of society and Amusements, with useful hints on housekeeping and Elegancies.
Price $1 50 per year, including 3 Choice Chromos.
" $1 25 " " " 1 " "
GET UP A CLUB. AGENTS WANTED. Premium List Free.
Window Gardening. A New Book, superbly illustrated, devoted to Culture of Plants, Bulbs, and Flowers for in-doors, with handsome illustrations of Hanging Baskets, Ferneries, and Parlor Decorations. 250 Engravings. Price $1 50. Sent, postpaid, by mail. Book Stores have it.
The Ladies' Cabinet Initial Note-Paper. Rose or Violet Tinted; your own initial. Handsome present. Highly perfumed. Attractive Chromo on each Box. Price 50c. a Box. 100 PAPERS AT CLUB RATES. Send Stamp for List Free. Address
"LADIES' FLORAL CABINET,"
5 Beekman Street, Room 5, New York.

GRANDEST SCHEME EVER KNOWN.
4th Grand Gift Concert
FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE
PUBLIC LIBRARY OF KENTUCKY.
12,000 CASH GIFTS, $1,500,000.
$250,000 FOR $50.
The Fourth Grand Gift Concert, authorized by special act of the Legislature, for the benefit of the Public Library of Kentucky, will take place in Public Library Hall, at Louisville, Ky.,
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1873.
Only Sixty thousand tickets will be sold. The tickets are divided into ten coupons or parts.
At this Concert, which will be the grandest musical display ever witnessed in this country, the unprecedented sum of $1,500,000
divided into 12,000 cash gifts, will be distributed by lot among the ticket-holders.
LIST OF GIFTS.

ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		$250,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		100,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		50,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		25,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		17,500
10 CASH GIFTS	$10,000 each	100,000
30 CASH GIFTS	5,000 each	150,000
50 CASH GIFTS	1,000 each	50,000
80 CASH GIFTS	500 each	40,000
100 CASH GIFTS	400 each	40,000
150 CASH GIFTS	300 each	45,000
250 CASH GIFTS	200 each	50,000
325 CASH GIFTS	100 each	32,500
11,000 CASH GIFTS	50 each	550,000
TOTAL, 12,000 GIFTS, ALL CASH, amounting to		$1,500,000

The distribution will be positive, whether all the tickets are sold or not, and the 12,000 gifts all paid in proportion to the tickets sold.
PRICE OF TICKETS:
Whole tickets, $50; Halves, $25; Tenths, or each coupon, $5; Eleven Whole Tickets for $500; 22½ Tickets for $1,000; 113 Whole Tickets for $5,000; 227 Whole Tickets for $10,000. No discount on less than $500 worth of Tickets at a time.
The time for the drawing is near at hand, and persons intending to purchase tickets have no time to loose.
THOS. E. BRAMLETTE,
Agent Public Library Ky., and Manager Gift Concert, Public Library Building, Louisville, Ky.
Or THOS. H. HAYS & CO.,
609 BROADWAY, New York.

BEAUTIFY THE SKIN
BY USING LAIRD'S
"Bloom of Youth."

This harmless & delightful toilet preparation will remove all discolorations and blemishes from the skin, leaving it SOFT, CLEAR, SMOOTH, and BEAUTIFUL.
SOLD AT ALL DRUGGISTS.

ALUMINOUS AND ORNAMENTAL
BUILDING PAPER
Paper Carpeting and Oil Cloth.
Send for Samples and Price-List.
W. H. H. ROGERS & CO., 2 & 3 College Place, N. Y. F. N. DAVIS & CO., Beloit, Wis.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN Dress Shields will absorb moisture and protect the Dress thoroughly. The Perforated Premium Buckskin Undergarments are recommended by all Physicians. Send for circulars. D. C. HALL & Co., 44 West Broadway, N.Y., Sole Agents and Manufacturers.

Important to Ladies.—Through the extreme liberality of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York, we are enabled to place in the hands of Twenty Thousand (20,000) Women the means by which they can support themselves and make a comfortable living. This offer is extended to every industrious woman in the United States, especially to those who support themselves by the needle. The magnitude of this offer, the liberality shown in its distribution, and the amount of good already accomplished, will inspire confidence in the heart of every woman who reads this. Notice.—Full particulars will be sent on receipt of postage stamp. Address JAMES M'CALL & CO., 543 Broadway, New York.

REVOLVERS.

Governor, 7-Shot, Weight 6 oz., Calibre .22/100,		$6 00
Blue Jacket, 7-Shot	" "	7 00
Allen's No. 30, 7-Shot	" "	9 00
Smith & Wesson, 7-Shot	" "	11 00

Also, all other styles of Revolvers, made in every style and finish. Guns, Fishing-Tackle, and Sporting Goods.

Boxing-Gloves	from $3 00	to $6 50	per Set.
Indian Clubs	" 1 50	" 5 00	" Pair.
Club Skates	" 3 00	" 9 00	" "
Air-Guns & Pistols	3 00	" 25 00	each.

Goods sent C. O. D. Send for Circular.
T. B. FISH & CO., 132 Nassau St., N. Y.

THREE PAIR Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, and Dress-Trimmings, together with a choice assortment of
FINE FURS
at less than manufacturers' prices. Send for Price-List of Furs, and all kinds of Millinery Goods and Dress Trimmings. All orders filled with care, and sent C. O. D., with the privilege of examination.
J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

V. VIGOUROUX, 122 4th Ave., N.Y.
Stamping, Embroidering, Lingerie Establishment. Ladies' & Babies' Trousseau. Specialty of Initial Monograms for HANDKERCHIEFS, TABLE and BED CLOTHS. Wholesale Department, 69 EAST TWELFTH STREET. MACHINE AND PERFORATED PATTERNS.

SAMPLES FREE!!—The Saturday Evening Post, 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia, gives a beautiful Chromo or large Steel Engraving to every yearly subscriber! Samples free!

MME. BURLETON, 21 Clinton Place, near B'way, Eighth St., West. The latest style of Fall Bonnets and Round Hats; also, Mourning Bonnets.

Hosted by Google

A. T. STEWART & CO.

Have made LARGE REDUCTIONS in prices of
REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS.

☞ Paris, Berlin, and New York Ready-made Silk, Poplin, Mohair, and Cachmere

SUITS AND WALKING DRESSES.

Elegant Velvet, Cloth, Cashmere Polonaise, Cloaks, &c.

PARIS AND NEW YORK MADE
HATS, BONNETS, AND MILLINERY
ARTICLES, FROM VIROT AND OTHERS.

LACES AND EMBROIDERIES in Every Variety.

A LARGE invoice of FANCY SILKS, $1 PER YARD, value $1 75.

BLACK AND COLORED SILKS,
In all qualities, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

BROADWAY, 4th Ave., 9th & 10th Sts.

FANCY AND STAPLE DRY GOODS
AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,

BROADWAY, COR. 19TH ST., N. Y.,
Are offering the finest selection of the above goods to be found in the city, viz.:

FALL AND WINTER DRESS GOODS.

SILKS.
VELVETS.
LACES.
EMBROIDERIES.
INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS.
FALL AND WINTER GARMENTS.
MISSES' WORSTED & POPLIN SUITS & SACQUES.
LADIES' CASHMERE & SILK MORNING DRESSES.
SILK AND SATIN QUILTED SKIRTS.
FURS AND FUR TRIMMINGS.
MOURNING DRESS GOODS.
GENTLEMEN'S & YOUTHS' FURNISHING GOODS.
HOSIERY AND UNDERWEAR.
CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, AND COATINGS.
GLOVES AND GAUNTLETS.
WHITE GOODS.
BLANKETS AND FLANNELS.

CARPETS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

ENGLISH BODY BRUSSELS.
VELVETS.
3-PLY AND INGRAINS.
MOQUETTES.
SMYRNA.
PERSIAN & HOLLAND CARPETS (woven in 1 piece).
AMERICAN AND ENGLISH OIL-CLOTHS, &c., &c.

Upholstery Department.

CURTAIN MATERIALS.
FURNITURE COVERINGS.
LACE CURTAINS.
SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO MAKING UP CURTAINS.
DRAPERIES.
LAMBREQUINS.
SHADES, &c.

Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

EHRICH & CO.,

287 & 289 8th AVE., Near 24th ST., New York.
Send Stamp for our

FALL CATALOGUE

The most complete Price-List of MILLINERY AND FANCY GOODS ever issued.

Furs Our Own Manufacture.

☞ Goods shipped C.O.D., to any part of the country, with full power of examination before acceptance.

Great Reductions

In French Embroideries, Ribbons, Dress Trimmings, Oxidized Goods, &c., &c., &c.

Miller & Grant,

No. 879 Broadway.

$20 SAVED!

To meet the urgent demand of the times the FLORENCE SEWING-MACHINE CO. have determined to

REDUCE PRICES,

and will hereafter sell their $65 Machine for $45, and other styles in proportion.

THE FLORENCE

is the ONLY Sewing-Machine that feeds the work backward and forward, or to right and left, as the purchaser may prefer. It has been greatly IMPROVED AND SIMPLIFIED, and is far better than any other machine in the market.

IT IS NOW THE CHEAPEST.

FLORENCE, Mass, Nov. 1, '73. AGENTS WANTED.

HENRY PROPACH, Dressmaker, 17 East 16th St., has received the last Fall and Winter Styles. All orders will be executed in the SHORTEST TIME.

A NEW PERFUME FOR THE HANDKERCHIEF.

CASHMERE BOUQUET

A DELICATE SOAP FOR THE TOILET.

MADE BY
COLGATE & COMPANY,
NEW YORK.

KNABE

Grand, Square, and Upright Pianos,
NEW YORK BRANCH HOUSE, No. 112 5th AVE.
WM. KNABE & CO., Baltimore and New York.

L. SHAW,
364 Bowery,
cor. 4th St., N. Y.
The largest stock of Human Hair goods in the city. Wigs made to order by the best artists. A perfect fit guaranteed. The invisible wig a specialty. No. 1, round the head; No. 2, from forehead to nape of neck; No. 3, from ear to ear across crown; No. 4, from ear to ear across forehead. Goods sent C.O.D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P.O. Order, free of charge.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.
Trade Mark. Patented.

Sold by all Druggists.

EVERYBODY LIKES a beautiful complexion, and a soft, smooth skin; both are obtained by using 'Wright's Alconated Glycerine Tablet of Solidified Glycerine,' fragrant, transparent, and incomparable as a Toilet Soap. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS

IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced. The bust measure is taken for Ladies by passing a tape around the body under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest; and for Children, straight around the body under the arms.

The following Patterns are now ready:

Vol. V.

TALMA, with Pointed Hood, Postilion Waist, Over-skirt, and Walking Skirt..... No. 20
LADY'S POSTILION-BASQUE WRAPPER.. " 23
ALBERT VICTOR SAILOR SUIT (for boy from 4 to 12 years old)..... " 25
GENTLEMAN'S LINGERIE (French Yoke Shirt, Night Shirt, Drawers, and Long Dressing Gown)..... " 37
HIGHLAND SUIT (for boy from 2 to 5 years old) " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, Shirt Waist, and Knickerbockers (for boy from 5 to 10 years old)..... " 39
BASQUE, with Grecian Cape, Open-front Over-skirt, and Full Trained Skirt..... " 39
DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET, WORTH OVER-SKIRT, and WALKING SKIRT.... " 43
LOUIS QUINZE VEST BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 46
DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 46
FULL DRESS TOILETTE (Low-Necked Basque with Grecian Bertha, Trained Over-skirt, and Round Skirt)..... " 50

Vol. VI.

DOLMAN VEST-POLONAISE STREET SUIT " 7
TIGHT BASQUE, with Apron-front Over-skirt and Walking Skirt..... " 11
GIRL'S WARDROBE, Sacque, Sailor Blouse and Skirt, Basque fastened behind, Over-skirt, Low-Necked Over Dress, and Bretelle Apron (for girl from 2 to 13 years old)..... " 13
SLEEVELESS JACKET WALKING SUIT.... " 15
CHATELAINE REDINGOTE WALKING SUIT..... " 17
LOOSE FRONT DOUBLE-BREASTED POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 23
GABRIELLE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT. " 24
BLOUSE POLONAISE WALKING SUIT..... " 28
LADIES' AND MISSES' BATHING OR GYMNASTIC SUIT..... " 30
PLEATED WAIST WALKING SUIT..... " 32
DOUBLE-BREASTED JOCKEY BASQUE WALKING SUIT..... " 32
ENGLISH WALKING JACKET SUIT..... " 39
DEMI-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT, with Basque Back and Square Front..... " 43
TIGHT-FITTING DOUBLE-BREASTED REDINGOTE, with French Round Skirt..... " 45
SINGLE-BREASTED BASQUINE, with Short Pouf Walking Skirt..... " 47
DOUBLE-BREASTED PLAIN BASQUE, with Apron Front and Square Back Over-skirt and Long Walking Skirt..... " 47

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS. Nine Patterns will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit, and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

$475 A MONTH and expenses to good Canvassers. Articles new and staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. LINNGTON, Chicago.

BAZAR
Cut Paper Patterns.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue showing the leading Berlin, Paris, London, and New York fashions. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, for ladies, misses, and children. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a description of a valuable premium offered to every subscriber for Harper's Bazar. We confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premium offered to each and every subscriber for the Bazar has no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

Important to Ladies.—On receipt of 25c. you will receive by return post a copy of the Bazar Dressmaker, a book just published, containing over five hundred (500) fashion-plates, representing the leading Paris, Berlin, London, and New York fashions. Each garment is minutely described, with directions for cutting, making, and trimming at the least possible expense. The garments represented are for ladies, misses, boys, and little children. The polonaises and over-skirts for ladies and misses are without exception the most stylish garments that have ever appeared in this country. The Bazar Dressmaker is intended as a reference book for dressmakers and others. If a lady is at a loss to know how to cut or make a dress for herself or her children, she is sure to see something in this book to please her. A life-sized paper pattern of any of the 500 garments represented will be sent by post at a mere nominal price. The patterns are graded to fit any size.

Address JAMES M'CALL & CO.,
543 Broadway, New York.

For Marking Clothing.

Lottie Lane

A Stencil Plate, like cut, with brush and indelible ink, postpaid, for 50c. Umbrella Plate, with name and address, ready to attach, 35c. Circulars free. J. F. MARSH, S. E. cor. Second and Dock, Phila., Pa.

The New Florence

Is the only Sewing-Machine that feeds the work backward and forward, or to the right and left, as the purchaser may prefer. It has been greatly IMPROVED & SIMPLIFIED, and is far better than any other machine now in the market. ☞ FLORENCE SEWING-MACHINE COMPANY, Florence, Mass.

CLARKE'S NEW METHOD PIANO-FORTE.

HAS NEVER BEEN EQUALED.
Teaches practical piano playing and theoretical music thoroughly.
Clarke's New Method for the PIANO-FORTE carries the pupil by easy gradations to the highest practical results.
Sent by Mail, Price $3.75
LEE & WALKER, Philadelphia.

RUNNING FERN.—I can now supply all persons with this Beautiful Decorative Vine. ☞ 100 pieces pressed, $5 00; 100 pieces, not pressed, $2 50. Address, A. A. WILLIAMS, Hartford, Conn.

CHRISTMAS BELLS Sent Free On receipt of stamp. An Illustrated Journal of amusements, novelties, and gifts, curious, rare, and useful. Address ADAMS & CO., Publishers, Boston, Mass.

WORKING CLASS Male or Female, $30 a week employment at home, day or evening; no capital; instructions & valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-c. return stamp, M. YOUNG & Co., 173 Greenwich St., N. Y.

$375 A MONTH to Male or Female Agents. NOVELTY COMPANY, Biddeford, Me.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00; postage payable by the Subscriber at the office where received.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage on the Magazine, within the United States, is 24 cents a year; on the Weekly and Bazar, 20 cents a year, payable at the office where received. Subscribers in Canada must send 24 cents for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions may commence at any time. When no date is specified, it is understood that the subscription for the Magazine begins with the current Volume; for the Weekly or Bazar, with the Number next after the date of the order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Harper & Brothers' Latest Publications.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ HARPER'S CATALOGUE mailed free on receipt of Six Cents in postage stamps.

I.
PIKE'S SUB-TROPICAL RAMBLES. Sub-Tropical Rambles in the Land of the Aphanapteryx. By NICOLAS PIKE, U. S. Consul, Port Louis, Mauritius. Profusely Illustrated from the Author's own Sketches; containing also Maps and valuable Meteorological Charts. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

II.
DAWSON'S EARTH AND MAN. The Story of the Earth and Man. By J. W. DAWSON, LL.D., F.R.S., F.G.S., Principal and Vice-Chancellor of McGill University, Montreal. With Twenty Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

III.
THE LAND OF MOAB. The Result of Travels and Discoveries on the East Side of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. By H. B. TRISTRAM, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., Master of the Greatham Hospital, and Honorary Canon of Durham. With New Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. Cloth, $2 50.

IV.
NAST'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANAC FOR 1874. With 86 Original Illustrations by THOMAS NAST. Price 25 cents.

V.
FLAMMARION'S ATMOSPHERE. The Atmosphere. Translated from the French of CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Edited by JAMES GLAISHER, F.R.S., Superintendent of the Magnetical and Meteorological Department of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. With 10 Chromo-Lithographs, and 86 Woodcuts. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00.

VI.
TYERMAN'S OXFORD METHODISTS. The Oxford Methodists: Memoirs of the Rev. Messrs. Clayton, Ingham, Gambold, Hervey, and Broughton, with Biographical Notices of others. By the Rev. L. TYERMAN, Author of "Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley," &c. With Steel Portraits. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. (Uniform with Tyerman's "Life of John Wesley.")

VII.
THE BAZAR BOOK OF HEALTH. The Dwelling, the Nursery, the Bedroom, the Dining-Room, the Parlor, the Library, the Kitchen, the Sick-Room. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. (Uniform in style and price with the "Bazar Book of Decorum.")

VIII.
CASTELAR'S OLD ROME AND NEW ITALY. Old Rome and New Italy. By EMILIO CASTELAR. Translated by Mrs. ARTHUR ARNOLD. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

IX.
LIFE OF ALFRED COOKMAN. The Life of the Rev. Alfred Cookman. By H. B. RIDGAWAY, D.D. With Portrait on Steel. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

X.
I GO A-FISHING. By W. C. PRIME, Author of "Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia," "Tent Life in the Holy Land," "Later Years," "The Old House by the River," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

XI.
ANECDOTES OF PUBLIC MEN. By JOHN W. FORNEY. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

THE NEW NOVELS
OF
THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

1.
THE NEW MAGDALEN. By WILKIE COLLINS. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. This is the first volume of Harper's Library Edition of Wilkie Collins's Novels. Other volumes will follow at short intervals.

2.
THE TWO WIDOWS. By ANNIE THOMAS, Author of "Denis Donne," "Called to Account," "Played Out," "A Passion in Tatters," "The Dower House," "Maud Mohan," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

3.
MISS DOROTHY'S CHARGE. By FRANK LEE BENEDICT, Author of "My Daughter Elinor," "Miss Van Kortland," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

4.
STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "Birds of Prey," "Lovels of Arden," "To the Bitter End," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

5.
A SIMPLETON: A Story of the Day. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Put Yourself in His Place," "Never Too Late to Mend," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Book Canvassers Wanted.

THE Subscriber desires to call the attention of experienced and successful Book Agents to "M'CLINTOCK AND STRONG'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE." The Fifth Volume of this work is now published. This Cyclopædia is unlike any other now sold by subscription or otherwise. The other volumes will be published at about yearly intervals. Does not the sale of this work offer pecuniary advantages to Book Agents that can not be obtained on the sale of any other work now being sold by subscription? The inducements are liberal, and good Territory is yet to be had. For further particulars, inquire of or address

AVERY BILL,
Care Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Book Canvassers Wanted.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments, or all the time, than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

$10 to $20 per day. Agents wanted every where. Particulars free. A. H. BLAIR & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and Carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

$125 A month to Lady Agents every where. Address ELLIS M'F'G Co., Waltham, Mass.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

THERE can be no doubt that the moon is inhabited, and by a race of people who make calls and leave cards, and give dinner-parties, and go out to dances and evening receptions, just as we do in this gay planet. Shakspeare settled the question long ago, when (in Antony and Cleopatra) he referred to "the visiting moon."

What is the difference between an old hat on a stick and money with a spendthrift?—One scares crows, the other grows scarce.

ALL ROUND.

INTELLIGENT YOUTH TO ARTIST. "I should think it be 'ard, Sir, to do that 'ere."

ARTIST. "Yes."

I. Y. "Yer bean't got Willis's farm in the picter, though, Sir."

ARTIST. "Oh! where's that?"

I. Y. "There it be, Sir, just behind yer."

Those peoples of Europe who talk broken Latin go by the name of the Latin races. Would it not be more correct to call them the Dog-Latin races?

A FEW SIMPLE THOUGHTS AND EXPRESSIONS ON THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.—The Anathemas are there, and the miraculous Thing is there. Whence it cometh? Whither it goeth? These are questions. When the age of Miracles lay faded into the distance as an incredible tradition, and even the age of Conventionalities was now old; and Man's Existence had for long generations rested on mere formulas which were grown hollow by the course of time; and it seemed as if no Reality any longer existed, but only Phantasms of realities, and God's Universe were the work of the Tailor and Upholsterer mainly, and men wore buckram masks that went about becking and grimacing there—on a sudden the Earth yawns asunder, and amid Tartarean smoke, and glare of fierce brightness, uses Sansculottism, many-headed, fire-breathing, and asks, What think ye of me?—THOMAS CARLYLE.

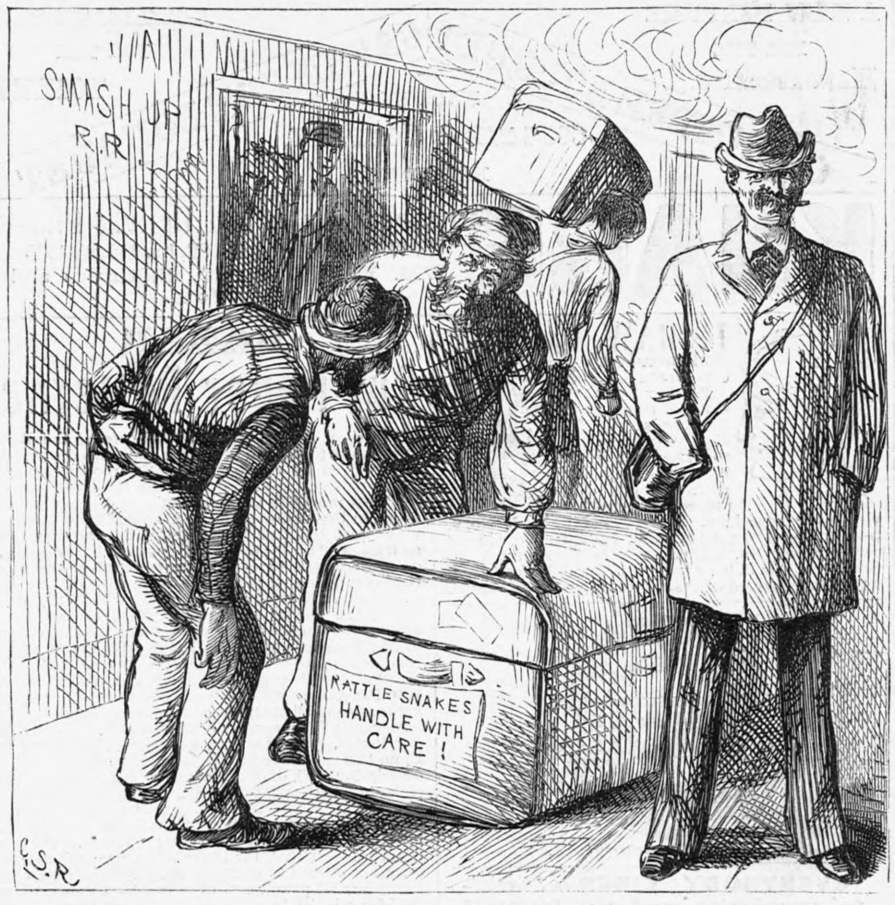
Nature abhors a vacuum. Is this the reason that with light-headed people all liquors go to the head?

A correspondent says: "Speaking about Bradlaugh, his name is giving us more uneasiness than Froude's did. Governed by the rules that settle English pronunciation, Bradlaugh, according to l-a-u-g-h, is Bradlaff; according to p-l-o-u-g-h, is Bradlow; according to e-n-o-u-g-h, is Bradluff; according to t-h-o-u-g-h, is Bradlo. I shouldn't know what to call him if I was playing poker with him, and held four aces and a king. But as the situation isn't likely to turn up this deal, I won't worry myself about it."

Professor Sedgwick was geologizing in a quarry near a high-road in England, dressed in a rough suit for the purpose, and striking vigorous blows with his hammer upon the rock, when a traveling carriage coming up stopped at the place, and a gentleman within beckoned to the professor to come up to the door, as he wanted to know the way to the residence of a nobleman in that locality. Professor Sedgwick having answered this and various other questions put to him very readily, the gentleman, pleased with what he deemed the intelligence and civility of the quarryman, offered him a shilling, which was received with thanks. The carriage drove on, taking its occupant to the nobleman's house, where he was an invited guest. Soon after Professor Sedgwick followed him, for he was staying there at that time himself. At dinner they happened to be seated near each other, and soon fell into conversation. After a while the gentleman, looking earnestly at Professor Sedgwick, observed,

"I think I must have had the pleasure of seeing you before, and that not very long ago?"

"Oh yes!" was the reply; "you saw me this morning, and gave me a shilling for answering a whole string of questions, and I was much obliged to you for it."



"DOING" THE BAGGAGE-SMASHERS.

TO OUR RAILWAY "MANAGERS."

Break, break, break
Your passengers' bones, for ye
Care not what 'plaints they utter:
Ye've got the monopoly!

'Tis bad for the driver and mate,
When the goods train gets in the way;
'Tis bad when the mail is late,
But no one is to blame, ye say!

So the doomed express goes on
To destruction under the hill;
For want of the touch of a points-man's hand,
Or the sound of a whistle that's still.

Breaks, breaks, breaks
Must be quickly improved, and ye
Will find that the trust ye've abused is dead,
And never revived 'twill be!

The dressing-gown is the most lasting of all garments—it is seldom worn out.

The advent of a wild-cat broke up a wedding in Missouri the other evening. The cat wanted to introduce a new claws in the marriage ceremony.

A HAPPY THOUGHT FOR TRAVELERS.—Railway officials, possibly, may not be strict grammarians, but there is little doubt that most of them are now well versed in Accidence.

Chemists say no matter is ever lost. Printers deny it.

We can not say that the following obituary notice appeared in the Philadelphia Ledger, but we have seen funeral tributes that were quite as touching in the columns of that paper:

"Died on the 17th, Henry Wilkins Glynn, aged three days and seven hours, after a long and painful illness, which he bore with Christian fortitude. The funeral will take place at the residence of his afflicted parents, 320 Broad Street, this afternoon, at three o'clock.

"No more his pa will candy bring
Unto his darling boy.
He loud aloft will praises sing,
Expressive of his joy.

"With little angels he will stay,
His rattle spring with pride,
And bless the day, when far away,
He laid him down and died.

"Gone to meet his grandmother."

AN IRISH VOCALIST.

At St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, there was an old vicar choral who loved his dinner, "not wisely, but too well." He had bought a fine quarter of mutton, and intended to have it for his Sunday's repast, after the fatigue of chanting the morning service, but forgot to tell his wife in what manner he wished it to be cooked. The good lady, however, was equal to the emergency. In the middle of the Te Deum a small boy was observed to creep up the aisle till he came near the choir, where his father was singing, and in a piping treble mingled with the chorus thus:

"My mother's got a quarter of mutton, and she don't know what to do-o-oo wi' it."

The father responded:

"Let her boil the leg, and roast the loin, and make a dumpling of the su-u-u-et." Omnes. "Amen."

POLITICAL ECONOMY.

MADGE. "What are you looking so sorry about Arthur?"

ARTHUR. "Multiplication."

MADGE. "Oh, I know all about multiplication!"

ARTHUR. "Do you? What's twice ten, then?"

MADGE. "Oh, twenty-one, of course!"

ARTHUR. "No, it's not. It's only twenty."

MADGE. "Ah, but every thing's riz, you know!"

We have societies for the protection of every thing worth protecting, with the one important exception of human life. As a mere suggestion, we would ask whether some philanthropist might not institute a society to prevent—

1. Silly children playing in a public road thronged with vehicles.
2. Stupid donkeys looking with lighted candles for leakage in gas-pipes.
3. Foolish acrobats dancing on tight-ropes or swinging on trapezes at giddy heights.
4. Reckless men traveling by railway unaccompanied by one director or two bishops as guarantees against accident.
5. Hard-working ballet-girls pursuing their vocations in dresses which a single spark will wreathe in flames in a single moment.

We offer this suggestion without the faintest hope of its being carried into effect, yet legislation and philanthropy have been wasted on more insignificant matters.

A maniac writes to ask if a sailor is like sage and onions because he's often dressed in duck.

MICHAELMAS "GEESE."

Those who are taken in by puffing advertisements.

Those who demand encores at concerts and other musical entertainments.

Those who take a railway journey without insuring their lives.

Those who eat and drink what they know will disagree with them.

Those who wear a high black hat when they have the chance of being comfortable in a low white one.

Those who drink green teas.

Those who paint—themselves.

Those who persist in giving fees and gratuities at theatres where they are strictly forbidden.

Those who encourage street beggars, street minstrels, street mountebanks, and street organists.

Those who fancy that with a little care they can live as cheaply at the sea-side as at home.

Those who imagine that clothes, meat, and other luxuries will ever again be reasonable in price.

Those who wear thin boots in wet weather.

Those who enter into conversation with strangers in the streets of New York.

Those who lend umbrellas.

Those who look to see how a novel is going to end before they are half-way through the first volume.

Those who propose without feeling sure that they will be accepted.

Those who believe that they shall live to see New York properly governed, and the streets kept clean in winter.

A LETTER TO THE "OULD COUNTHRY"—FROM BRIDGET TO PAT.

"Micky M'Carty is Rising in the World, slowly, but surely—

Ould Mr. Fogarty has been called to the Bar—

As for us, we are living on Fifth Avenue, near the Cinthral Park—

And Dinny Mullins is admitted to some of the First Houses in the City.

Sister Norah is staying at one of the Big Hotels—

And little Tim Murphy is in a Broker's Office."

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 47.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

LADIES' WINTER SUITS (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERNS).—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Fig. 1.—SINGLE-BREASTED BASQUINE, WITH SHORT POUF WALKING SKIRT.

Fig. 2.—DOUBLE-BREASTED PLAIN BASQUE, WITH APRON-FRONT AND SQUARE-BACK OVER-SKIRT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT.

[Cut Paper Patterns of the Single-breasted Basquine, with Short Pouf Walking Skirt; and the Double-breasted Plain Basque, with Apron-front and Square-back Over-Skirt and Long Walking Skirt, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents each.]

Hosted by Google

Single and Double Breasted Plain Basque Suits, Figs. 1 and 2.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERNS.

See illustration on first page.

THE two cut paper patterns of single and double breasted plain basque suits which we publish this week will be found very useful for winter street and house dresses. The first illustration shows a long basque, or basquine, worn with a single skirt, which is draped in a pouf. An over-skirt may be added by those who are not yet ready to abandon this favorite garment. The original is of dark gray diagonal cloth. The skirt is trimmed with a side pleating and puffing, and the basquine with a fold of the material. The basquine is extremely graceful, and fits as smoothly as armor.

The second suit illustrated has a close-fitting double-breasted basque, trimmed with passementerie and folds. The over-skirt, which is remarkably graceful, and one of the most stylish that has appeared this season, is draped in a pouf, and trimmed likewise with folds and a passementerie ornament in the back. The long walking skirt is also trimmed with twelve flat folds of the material. The original is of black silk. The suit may be made equally well of any material, and is particularly adapted to serge, vigogne, or camel's-hair, with velvet, braid, or other flat trimmings.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN OF SINGLE-BREASTED BASQUINE, WITH SHORT POUF WALKING SKIRT.

THIS suit comprises two garments—single-breasted basquine and short pouf walking skirt.

SINGLE-BREASTED BASQUINE.—This pattern is in seven pieces—front, side back, back, collar, pocket, sleeve, and cuff. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting together. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, to take up the cross basque seams, the darts, the size and form of the under part of the sleeve, and where to place the pocket. The front is fitted on each side by two darts extending to the bottom of the garment, and a cross basque seam at the waist line. The back is adjusted by a middle seam, left open from the notch down, and side forms. The neck is heart-shaped, and is finished with a collar. The front closes to the waist with buttons and button-holes. The coat sleeve is sewed plain in the armhole, and has a deep cuff, with three buttons on the outer edge. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back part of the armhole, and hold the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. Sew the cuff on the sleeve, and the collar on the neck, according to the notches, holding the collar toward you. The notches at the top and bottom of the front show where to turn back the hem. Baste all the seams, and try on wrong side out; if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for a medium-sized lady, 3½ yards.

SHORT POUF WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, two side gores, and back breadth. Cut the front gore and back breadth with the longest straight edges laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut two pieces each of the pattern given for the side gores. Put the pattern together by the notches, and pay no attention to the grain of the paper. This skirt is puffed in the back by three tapes twelve inches long, which are sewed on the belt, then the end of each tape is tacked at the single holes in the skirt. Place one tape in the middle of the belt, and the other two about four inches each side of the middle one. The bottom of the skirt is trimmed with a side-pleated flounce twelve inches deep.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8½ yards. Extra for flounce, 5½ yards.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN OF DOUBLE-BREASTED PLAIN BASQUE, WITH APRON-FRONT AND SQUARE-BACK OVER-SKIRT AND LONG WALKING SKIRT.

THIS suit comprises three garments—double-breasted plain basque, apron-front and square-back puffed over-skirt, and long walking skirt.

BASQUE.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, side forms, back, sleeve, and cuff. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting together. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, the darts and the cross basque seams, and the size and form of the under part of the sleeve. The front is cut double-breasted, both sides being cut exactly alike. The right side overlaps the left, and is fastened with hooks and loops. The neck is cut heart-shaped, and is worn with a deep box-pleated ruff. The front has two darts on each side and a cross basque seam; the darts extend to the bottom of the garment. The back is adjusted to the figure by a centre back and side forms. Each seam is left open below the waist line, and trimmed around to correspond with the slashes on each side of the front. The sleeve is coat-shaped, and has a deep wide cuff at the wrist. Place the longest seam of the sleeve to the notch in the back of the armhole, and hold the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the shoulder and under arm seams, and a quarter of an inch for all others. Baste up, and try on wrong side out; if alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 3 yards.

APRON-FRONT AND SQUARE-BACK OVER-SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, side gore, side breadth, and back breadth. Only half the pattern is given. Cut the front gore and back breadth with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut two pieces each of the patterns given for the side gore and side breadth. The apron front has a gore at each side. The lower edge is rounded from the middle in front to the back edge of each side gore before it is sewed to the belt. The side gore is laid in a side pleat, turning toward the back. The back of the skirt is deeper than the front, and is square across the lower edge. A deep side pleat is laid on the front part of the side breadth at the top according to the notches, turned toward the back, placing the front notch on the second one. The back edge of the apron front overlaps the side breadth after the pleat is laid, placing the two single holes in the top of the side gore over the corresponding ones on each side of the pleat on the side breadth at the top. The rest of the back is laid in gathers. Cut a tape fourteen inches long, and sew to the middle of the belt in the back, and tack the hole nearest the top in the middle breadth on the tape about six inches from the lower end. Tack the end of the tape to the lower hole in the skirt to form the pouf. A quarter of an inch is allowed for all seams.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 4¾ yards.

LONG WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, two side gores, and straight breadth for the back. Cut the front and back with the longest straight edges laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Put the pattern together by the notches, paying no attention to the grain of the paper.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8 yards.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

NEW CHRISTMAS STORY.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS take pleasure in announcing that they will soon commence the publication of a new CHRISTMAS STORY, entitled

"GOLDEN GRAIN,"

by B. L. FARJEON, *author of "Blade-o'-Grass," "Bread-and-Cheese and Kisses," "Joshua Marvel," "Griff," and other popular tales. "GOLDEN GRAIN" will be profusely and beautifully illustrated.*

*As a writer of short stories the author of "Blade-o'-Grass stands without a rival, and our readers have already begun to look for his Christmas Story as one of the most charming attractions of the Winter Holidays. We append the headings of the several chapters of "GOLDEN GRAIN," as a foretaste of the rare treat in store for its readers.*

I.

THROUGH COUNTRY ROADS TO SOME GREEN, PLEASANT SPOT.

II.

THANK GOD FOR A GOOD BREAKFAST!

III.

THEY LISTENED WITH ALMOST BREATHLESS ATTENTION TO EVERY WORD THAT FELL FROM HER LIPS.

IV.

FOR MERCY'S SAKE, TELL ME! WHOSE VOICE WAS IT I HEARD JUST NOW?

V.

THEY WON'T WANT NO MORE MOTHERS BY-AND-BY, SIR.

VI.

FOR THESE AND SUCH AS THESE

VII.

THEY JUDGE THE LIFE OF AN INDIVIDUAL BY MEANS OF AN AGGREGATE.

VIII.

THIS 'ERE FREE AND 'LIGHTENED COUNTRY OF OURN'S CRAMMED FULL O' TEMPLES O' LIBERTY.

IX.

OPEN YOUR EYES, BABY! SPEAK TO ME! LOOK AT MOTHER, MY LIFE!

X.

NO, NO! BORN IN LOVE! IN LOVE!

XI.

ONCE UPON A TIME THERE LIVED ON AN ISLAND.

XII.

IN THE DIM TWILIGHT OF THAT HOLY DAY.

XIII.

HIS SOUL IS IN YOUR HANDS TO SAVE AND PURIFY.

XIV.

IT IS SUNRISE. A GOLDEN MIST IS RISING FROM THE WATERS.

XV.

FAIRHAVEN.

THE END.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1873.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for November 15 was sent out gratuitously a finely illustrated

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing further installments of "PHINEAS REDUX" and "THE PARISIANS," and two intensely interesting illustrated stories.

Another illustrated EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for November 22.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the Single-breasted Basquine, with Short Pouf Walking Skirt; and the Double-breasted Plain Basque, with Apron-front and Square-back Over-Skirt and Long Walking Skirt, illustrated on the first page of the present Number, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by Mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 751.

THE GENTLER SEX.

THE gentler sex, as the days of chivalry dubbed it, days which are notably no more—the gentler sex seems to be somewhat at a discount just at present, since so many people of more or less distinction are busy in the discovery and classification of its failings, writers on both sides of the water having lately taken occasion to draw the picture of all womankind not only without a flattering touch, nor even after CROMWELL'S fashion, but as one paints the picture of an inferior who aspires to be a rival. Mr. RUSKIN, following his line of leaders, lends lustre to the attack, and Mr. HAMERTON comes up with reinforcement, both of them being writers on art, and perhaps thinking that as the modern woman is nothing but a work of art, she comes plainly within their province.

But whatever the chief thinkers of the other sex have had to say about women in a derogatory way—and that has been so much and of such sort that one is led to wonder how such superior beings as the writers could possibly have been born of women—whatever they may have said, it has been reserved to Mr. HAMERTON to emphatically and distinctly categorize their short-comings, and declare that women do not of themselves undertake intellectual labor, nor persevere in it when undertaken, except—to put it in plain terms—for the sake of pleasing some man; that they are resigned to ignorance; that they have an absence of intellectual initiative and of scientific curiosity; that there are, in short, but "three or four women in England, and as many more on the Continent, who have lived intellectually in harness for many years, and who unaffectedly delight in strenuous intellectual labor," and that even such women have to be encouraged by masculine influence, and are exceptions to the prevalent rule of nature.

Now, in all humility, we submit that as men—not because they are men, but because they are human beings, descendants of barbarians, not yet clarified of all barbarism, and with the habit of keeping the weaker in subjection still clinging to them—we submit that as men have always been the masters of the situation, and have kept the opposite sex in a state of subordination, objects either of use or luxury, and always of possession, that the question of the intellectual power of women has had no such trial as to make it expedient, not to say decent, to pronounce such a judgment. It is a case of condemnation without jury or plea, and the law pretends to give even a woman a fair trial before sentence is pronounced.

From the beginning of the world man has needed no Divine fiat to declare that woman should be in subjection to himself. Being the stronger animal, he placed her in subjection, as he did the ox and the horse and his weaker or less wary neighbor. Made of clay, and with much of the imperfection of the original composition still remaining, it is not to be expected that he will be altogether purified of the mould for generations to come, and of course a transcendent magnanimity is something not to be attained by a bound, any more than other supernal virtues, but only by a gradual growth. We speak of civilized and semi-civilized races with a heedless self-complacency; but in fact the most advanced people on earth, with all the appliances of science and luxury, should not yet be termed wholly civilized. Man has already made a great advance in virtue—so great that we have a right confidently to look forward to larger achievements: he has abandoned the right to tie his enemy to the heels of four stallions and tread him to death in the market-place, as he used to do half a dozen centuries since; he no longer, under any pretense, roasts his enemy to death on a gridiron; he no longer claims the undoubted right, because he has the undoubted power, to enter an unprotected land and tear families apart in order to further his own interests, either in the sale of slaves thus made, or in the provision of service for his own household; he has surrendered also, with pretty general consent, the right to ravage the sea, as he has ravaged the land, and make every merchantman his prey; and he has grown to look with scorn and reprobation, and even wonder, upon the practice of household slavery. That he still maintains a feudal system which is the remnant of a larger sort of slavery under another name is a matter of government that time will probably make right, while the piratical deeds for which three hundred years ago such a man as Sir FRANCIS DRAKE was honored and rewarded, would to-day stretch a rope round his neck with a short shrift. Other rights there are still claimed for him, upon which it is not our purpose here to enter, but which doubtless he will some day see to be preposterous and monstrous as the rest.

And thus, if it has taken eighteen hundred years and more to bring about such results, and there are yet equally important, even if less conspicuous ones to attain, we must wait without impatience, welcome each step as it is made, and not expect too much at once. And thus by-and-by, with the rest, may come the fair trial of woman. When the time of that trial comes we shall not shrink from the test.

Since the first recorded time woman has been an underling. That she was the weaker being in the beginning did not give her the sentimental advantage which is sometimes claimed for her: for chivalry is not inherent in the other sex; it is an outgrowth of Christian principles, the apotheosis of unselfishness. The savage husband saw only the question of physical superiority and inferiority; that things should be equal and yet differ was an idea too subtile and refined for his appreciation. She could not perform his feats of strength, that was apparent: it did not enter his mind, if he had one, to ask if he could perform hers—if he could endure the throes and agonies set down for her portion, and rise elastic from them as well as before, or if her vast and wonderful nervous strength were not as valuable as his muscular strength. She was his thrall, not his equal. He made no demands upon her other than animal: she bore his young, she boiled his pot, when he had invented a pot—of course he invented it, for the animal that has no call made upon its intelligence will produce no fruits of intelligence except phenomenally. For his part, he secured her from the rapine of his foes—not for her sake, but for his own—and he kept her at home in seclusion and in service. And meanwhile, to every deep there being a deeper deep, the slave's wife was the slave of the slave!

And it is just here that we take issue with Mr. HAMERTON and the whole tribe of such critics upon the sex. We maintain that up to the present day, saving exceptional cases, woman is still held and regarded by man as in the beginning. It is not a hundred years since cooking and sewing were thought all that it was requisite for the average woman to know, the two things by which she could serve her master. It is not fifty years since the woman who knew any thing but a smattering of French and Italian, and the accompanying superficial accomplishments, by which her master's amusement was secured, was looked upon with suspicion. It is not thirty years since the day of emancipation came, and her first high school was opened. And she has had to fight every inch of the way since. Under such circumstances, it is the height of folly, and of a spirit both ignorant and base, to attempt to draw a comparison between women and those who have been free for centuries to cultivate intelligence and follow a bent. Womankind is a part of mankind, and though it is axiomatic that a part is not greater than the whole, yet it is equally so that the whole is not complete without all its parts. If you dwarf one member of your body, if you wither a finger or fail to develop an arm, you fall short of perfection. Mankind in the mass is not exempt from the conditions of mankind in the individual, and so long as woman is dwarfed or withered he falls below his proper standard. Greek civilization, with all its art and beauty, fell as much as any thing from its total oblivion of woman—total, save for the few phenomenal ASPASIAS who, nevertheless, had to win the senses before they could win any thing else. And since Gothic races, so to speak, obtained the precedence, it is not impossible to believe that the reverence given to women among the rude Northern tribes, though a mere superstitious reverence in itself, begot a noble race of women that bred noble sons. But Greek civilization, where a decent woman could not walk the streets unveiled for the indecent sights, did fail, and the Gothic still goes on from march to march. And so let our critics possess their souls in peace: the end is not yet. Woman has been partially freed, but her education is yet to come, the education that man has always had, before a proper comparison can be instituted between her and the one who has never been in subjection. Man has some progress yet to make in morals, in health, in physics; woman is proverbially swift. Once unfettered, she may overtake him as he goes, and we do not entertain a doubt that by the time he has attained the topmost height of science and art, by the time there is nothing more for him to achieve, here, at any rate, woman will be ready to accompany him, an equal, on his flight among the stars!

Hosted by Google

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

DOUBLE-BREASTED PLAIN BASQUE SUIT.

ONE of the illustrations on our first page, of which a cut paper pattern is published, is a very stylish costume, consisting of a double-breasted plain basque, an apron over-skirt, with square back breadths caught up in a puff, and a long walking skirt without flounces. Each part of this suit is noticeable for its stylish simplicity. The basque is of the plainest shape, without postilion pleats, revers, or ruffles, depending alone on its shapely fit for its beauty. For trimming, rows of camel's-hair braid are sewed around this basque, if made of woolen fabrics; bands of bias silk are stitched on silks or velvet. The apron of the over-skirt is rounded, and trimmed up to the belt on each side; the long square-cornered back widths are caught up in a stylish pouf, and may be worn independent of the apron—a style in favor with fleshy ladies. The lower skirt drags slightly for carriage use, but may be shortened to walking length by rings and a tape placed near the top.

SINGLE-BREASTED BASQUINE SUIT.

A cut paper pattern is also published of the single-breasted basquine suit illustrated on the first page of the present number. This is one of the most graceful models yet given of a costume without an over-skirt. The fashion of having the front and sides of the skirt perfectly plain is well presented here; the skirt breadths are shaped to produce this appearance, and the effect is completed by tying tapes behind the person to draw back the fullness and to shape the pouf. This skirt is often trimmed to the edge of the basquine with pleating and puffs, and in many cases the front breadths are trimmed differently from the back. The long round basquine displays a fine figure to advantage, and will serve as a corsage for short suits, and also for trained house dresses that dispense with over-skirts. It simply outlines the figure, without postilion pleats or other ornament than its stylish round revers collar. The sleeves are of excellent shape, being quite tight-fitting, with a deep mousquetaire cuff. Black silk dresses made in this way, with jet galloon and buttons on the basque, and various trimmings on the skirt, are very handsome, and are particularly becoming to stout ladies. The double-breasted basque is commended to slight figures, though both these models are used indiscriminately.

VELVET BONNETS.

At the latest winter opening of bonnets those of black velvet outnumber colored ones. The object of desire apparently is a simple compact bonnet, covering the top of the head, and displaying the back and front of the coiffure without cumbersome drapery of any kind, whether lace, feathers, or ribbon. The Directoire bonnet, with its flaring Rabagas brim, meets these requirements, and finds favor with ladies of taste and fashion. Those of black velvet are all black unless brightened by a smoked pearl slide or a diamond-steel ornament. Long ostrich plumes are difficult to dispose on these bonnets, spoil their compact look, and are far less effective than one of medium length, or else two closely curled demi-long plumes. The very dark velvet bonnets, such as navy blue, are trimmed with vines of jet that appear to be embroidery. A scarf of black dotted net with Chantilly ends is then passed around this blue velvet bonnet, and a jet dagger is stuck in the left side. Few black velvet bonnets have light silk linings, though occasionally facings of blue or rose-color brighten the black hats of very young ladies; these are always accompanied by light feathers. A double puff of soft light silk made very full is the favorite face trimming for Directoire bonnets. A reception bonnet of dark blue velvet has two pale blue puffs under the upturned brim, a dark blue silk scarf is wound around the crown and tied behind with one erect and one hanging loop, a tea-rose with brown leaves is on the left of the front, and from beneath this rose two demi-long plumes curl over the crown: price $50.

Round hats and bonnets are so much alike that one description answers for both; the only difference is that round hats have no face trimming. They have usually upturned brims, though not as wide and flaring as Directoire brims, and more capriciously shaped, being narrow on the right side and pointed higher on the left. There is also a fancy for drawing the scarf that surrounds the crown over the left side of the brim, and concealing it under the back of the hat; this has a pretty effect when surmounted by upright loops, two short plumes, or else long ones, and a drooping red rose. Young ladies have a fashion at present of wearing the short Josephine curls drooping from the top of the coiffure behind, hence there is no pendent drapery on the hat, or these would be hidden. These curls are light and scant, instead of the heavy Grecian curls once worn.

INDIA SHAWLS.

This is a good season to buy India shawls, as they are lower than at any time since the war. This is also an economical purchase in the long-run, as these are the only wraps that do not go out of fashion, and the lady who owns an India shawl need not buy another wrap during her lifetime, and will besides have a valuable heir-loom to leave behind her. We say these India Cashmeres do not change in fashion, yet something of the leading color is usually found in them; for instance, last year olive, sage, and the sombre greens were seen in the finest shawls, and now merchants say that ladies want the all-prevalent blue in new shawls, and are having it introduced into their old ones. Autumn leaf designs, showing both the shape and dark hues of the fading leaves, are sought after this season. Very little white is shown in new shawls, and this in curved leaves in corners rather than in the continuous rivers so conspicuous in shawls of inferior quality. The finest shawls are of the darkest Oriental hues, as softly tinted as if made of velvet. These begin at $600, and range upward to $3000. The reversible bordered shawls are also desirable. These have a black centre on one side and crimson on the other, with the border arranged in different designs at the corners; the red side is for spring, the black for winter, or they may be used to suit different dresses, or indeed different persons, the black side serving for mamma, and the red for her married daughter, making a family shawl. The choice specimens cost $300 or $350. The Decca shawls cost from $50 to $150. These are real Cashmere, and the embroidery is hand-made, but they are of one single piece, embroidered, instead of being wrought like lace with a bobbin, and of myriads of tiny bits artistically put together. The white-bordered antique India shawls are also much admired. Long double shawls are chosen to wear with trained carriage costumes, but the soft, pliable, clinging square shawl is far more graceful with short dresses, and quite heavy enough for comfort and warmth. Long striped India shawls, called here Boston shawls, because the hearts of Massachusetts women delight in them, are excellent for traveling and carriage shawls. They cost from $45 to $100.

Striped shawls in the bright Roman colors, softened by stripes of black, brown, or indigo blue, are still sold for general wear and traveling. The Anglo-Indian shawl, in thick soft diagonals of dark colors with white blocks, is very desirable, and costs $19. The scarf shape, folded in half—that is, in the middle, with the fringed ends turned over at the top—is the favorite mode of wearing striped shawls. The fancy for jet is reviving the beaded and embroidered Thibet shawls once in favor for matrons and old ladies. These are handsomely fringed, or else bordered with beaded yak lace or guipure. Gray long shawls are chosen for traveling wraps, and there is also a new shawl that claims to be waterproof. For the house are light zephyr wool shawls, machine-made, in pretty crimson and bright scarlet hues, sold for $1 each.

EVENING DRESS.

Some of the handsomest evening dresses exhibited during the past week have low round Josephine waists, with the neck cut high enough to cover the shoulder-tips, and worn with a wide belt and broad flat sash. One for a youthful blonde is of pink silk, with pipings and facings of pale Sèvres blue. The skirt is elaborately trimmed with a horizontal tablier and flounced back breadths; the over-skirt, simply piped with blue, is open in front, and draped in a pouf; the belt is a fold of blue silk with pink on each side, and the wide long sash, also blue down the middle, is without loops, but simply folded over at the belt to hang in two flat streamers. Wide lace is gathered around the neck, and a pleating of soft tulle falls from the short sleeves. A similar dress is of apricot-colored silk, with white satin facings and a sash of black velvet; the back breadth is made up of a succession of puffs.

NEW COLLARETTES, ETC.

A novelty just introduced is a Marie Antoinette collar of black velvet, on which a vine of some small flowers, such as white jasmine, is laid. A crêpe lisse pleating edges the collar and forms a ruff, while a colored bow fastens it. Price $7 50. Another ornamental collarette to wear with black dresses is vest shape, with revers, and is made of black silk, wrought with jet and edged with lace: price $30. The same design is also carried out in colored China crape; for instance, blue with white revers, or else black and white together: price $11. Others still more dressy have the upper part made of Valenciennes, while the lower only is of China crape.

White tulle ruffs with black chenille dots on the edge are very stylish, and cost $1 75 a yard. Colored chenille dots are also new in white tulle pleatings.

RUSSIA LEATHER.

The new color in Russia leather is navy blue. The useful belt and bag of darkest blue lisse leather, with pretty mounting of old silver, cost from $6 to $8. Smooth black and red Russia bags are also shown at similar prices; black bags with cut steel mountings are very stylish.

NECK-TIES.

New neck-ties of colored China crape have squares of antique lace set in the pointed ends. Another novelty is large scarfs of polka-dotted silk or Chinese crape with Valenciennes insertions let in, and lace on the edge. Exquisite Valenciennes bows of most fanciful and irregular designs—not set and stiff, but artistic and careless—are shown, to be worn at the throat: price $7 50. A brooch of coral or else the tiny button-hole bouquet or a single rose should be worn with these. Blue and pink crape bows with Valenciennes lace edges are $2 50. For morning wear there are white lawn neck-ties with colored crape facing or hems on the points to match handkerchiefs now used with colored hems: price 75 cents.

Hem-stitched handkerchiefs have double hems of the same or of different widths: price 85 cents. Very sheer linen lawn pocket-handkerchiefs have embroidered initials in a corner, and cost from $1 50 to $2 50.

For information received thanks are due Miss PAGE; Miss GEDNEY; and Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, and Co.; A. T. STEWART & Co.; MILLER & GRANT; and SHAW & EATON.

PERSONAL.

"GEORGE SAND" lives now almost exclusively at her small house in Tours, having sold her splendid country-seat at Berri to two wealthy Englishmen. She is the happy grandmother of an interesting family of thirteen. Her house is very plainly furnished, but it is every where full of books. As soon as lights are brought in in the evening she begins to write, and continues until eleven or twelve, performing an amazing amount of work. She has often been known to finish one of her twenty-page articles for the Revue des Deux Mondes at one sitting. For such an article she receives $600, and the publisher is glad to get them every fortnight at that. She also receives $8000 a year from her copyrights. Her son, "Maurice Sand," is one of the best feuilletonistes in Paris. He is married to an American lady from Boston, named GASTON, and speaks and writes English fluently.

—A French writer describes a young lady as a creature that ceases to kiss gentlemen at twelve and begins again at twenty.

—Professor MAX MÜLLER says that there exists a far more diffused culture and interest about science and literature in England, especially among women, than even in learned and scientific Germany, the reason being that the English enjoy a perennial supply of "science made easy" in popular lectures and readable periodicals.

—The DE BROGLIE family has always been a fortunate and famous one in the affairs of France, never incurring any of the penalties which have deprived other great families of wealth and place. The present duke is not yet an old man, but he has nevertheless sat in the French Academy with his own father, and has a son whose literary eminence at the age of twenty-four is a sure indication that he will also receive a fauteuil among the forty immortals at no distant day. The present duke has besides held all the great posts of diplomatic honor. When quite a young man he was LOUIS PHILIPPE'S Minister of the Interior; after his overthrow he became vice-president of the republican Assembly, escaped imprisonment during the coup d'état, and was even courted, but without success, by LOUIS NAPOLEON. During THIERS'S rule, after the war, he was embassador at the court of St. James, and in that capacity contributed powerfully toward the negotiation of the great national loan. Now he is Prime Minister of France. His present (second) wife is twenty years younger than he, and he married her because she saved his life in the waters of Trouville. Although of humble birth, she moves with charming ease in aristocratic circles. He has six children, the eldest of whom is literary critic of the Revue des Deux Mondes.

—If the truth could be ascertained, probably most of the dear old fellows who purport to have attained the age of one hundred years would be found to be from five to ten below par. On the 23d of October, however, there did die, in Le Roy, Jefferson County, a genuine centenarian, and more too. His name was ROBERT SIXBURY, and he had lived to be one hundred and ten years and seven months old. He was known in John Brown's Tract as a mighty hunter, having slain over 2200 deer. His funeral was attended by several of his children aged between eighty and ninety.

—Colonel R. B. RHETT, Jun., editor of the New Orleans Picayune, who shot somebody—a judge, or some person of that sort—a few months ago, in what duelists call the perfectly regular way, has resigned his position. So has Captain DILL, his assistant. The Board of Managers adopted a resolution declaring that "the pressure of the times compels a more co-operative system;" so the colonel and the captain were disbanded.

—Mr. MAURICE STRAKOSCH has discovered another of those wonderful musical geniuses who somehow happen to be discovered at the moment when most needed. The new warbler is Mlle. BELOCCA, a Russian by birth, a small brunette, with wonderful eyes. In voice, dramatic force, fervor, and sympathy she is said to possess all the requirements for an artiste of the highest class.

—In Rhode Island, before the year 1800 came in, dresses were dresses, and a silk dress was something that agitated the feminine heart of the "Plantations." A lady of Providence, ninety years old, remembers that a short time before the year 1800 WALTER ALLEN, of Union Village, was married to LUCY BUFFUM. The bride wore a silk dress entirely of her own make. She tended the silk-worms, reeled the silk from the cocoons, spun it, dyed it, wove it, and made the dress. It was a heavy ribbed dark brown silk. Pieces of it are carefully treasured by members of the family, and it was said to have been the first silk manufactured in this country.

—Judge BOURNE, who died at Kennebunk, Maine, on the 24th of September, aged seventy-six, was the father of ELIZABETH BOURNE, who lost her life by exposure, while bewildered on Mount Washington, on the night of September 13, 1855.

—An English paper relates the following curious incident: "It is now eleven years since a live bee got into the ear of Mr. REED, the baker of the Woburn work-house. A few days since, when his ear was syringed, extraordinary to relate, forth came a bee in as perfect a state as when alive, even to the wings, the wax of the ear having preserved it from decay."

—VON BULOW, the eminentest of German pianists, will next spring show to the American people his manner of whacking that popular instrument.

—The Dean of Canterbury, who is said to be the best Syriac scholar in England, discovered a few days since in the college library at New Haven a Syriac manuscript of great value to him, which he had never seen before, and no copy of which exists in England.

—The Rev. Dr. ANROT, of Belgium, one of the most prominent speakers at the recent E. A. held in this city, said that it was a great mistake to call him a foreigner, as he was a half-way American, having visited New York twenty-nine years ago and three years ago [laughter], and the only thing he wanted was a good pavement for the streets, and they had it. [Laughter.] The result of the so-called substratum of character was that they were all very much alike. The American, however, was a little more like wine, sparkling and going off in the effervescence of good-fellowship. [Laughter.] He would draw no invidious comparison of countries, but would repeat what was said by the witty Scotchman who was sent by Queen MARY with a message to the Prime Minister of England: "Your mistress is the most beautiful woman in England, but mine is the most beautiful woman in Scotland." [Laughter and applause.]

—The Rev. JOHN FRANKLIN SPAULDING, recently elected Episcopal Missionary Bishop of Colorado, Wyoming, and New Mexico, is a native of Maine, and forty-two years of age. For ten years past he has been rector of St. Paul's Church, Erie, Pennsylvania. He has been a very successful pastor, having during that period organized four churches in the vicinity, besides engaging in all missionary enterprises within his reach. He is said to possess peculiar qualifications for his new position.

—Mr. DONN PIATT, of the Washington Capital, is now deliberately treading over Europe, taking stock of the monarchs and monarchies of that region, throwing in occasional observations on the manners and customs of distinguished people of this republic traveling abroad. He says that while one of our eminent public men, a Senator, was at Nuremberg, the conversation turned between him and the American consul on the bills of hotel-keepers, which were reasonable enough, compared with charges at Washington. "But there is one thing that puzzles me: wherever I go, if but for one night, I am charged with a buggy. Now the charge is low enough, if I ever had the buggy, but I haven't seen a buggy since I left the States." Our consul was bothered. He asked at last to look at the bill, and found the learned Senator had mistaken the French word "bougie" (a candle) for the honest American one, "buggy."

—In TYERMAN'S Oxford Methodists we find the following obituary notice of the last survivor of the WESLEY family. It is quoted from the Gentleman's Magazine for 1791:

"1791, July 12, in the City Road, in her eighty-fourth year, Mrs. MARTHA HALL, widow of the Rev. Mr. H., and last surviving sister of the Rev. JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY. She was equally distinguished by piety, understanding, and sweetness of temper. Her sympathy for the wretched, and her bounty, even to the worthless, will eternize her memory in better worlds than this."

Her remains are interred in the same vault as those of her brother JOHN, in the burial-ground of his chapel, City Road, London.

—The French papers have a most diverting account of the shopping experiences of a lady, lately deceased, named ANNA DESLIONS. One day at the Hôtel des Ventes she took a fancy to a landscape by CARAT, which, as she happened to be in funds, she bought for 22,000 francs. Her friends told her the picture was not worth the money, and though not exactly of that opinion herself, she was frightened into selling it for 16,000 francs, with which she bought a diamond bracelet. Thereupon her acquaintance said she had been robbed, and that many of the supposed gems were but paste. That evening the bracelet was exchanged for a pair of ear-rings, at a loss of 3000 francs. When returning from the jeweler's she saw a miniature chalet in the window of a toy-shop, and was forthwith overcome by a violent desire to take a trip to Switzerland. Eight days later the ear-rings followed the bracelet, and with the 11,500 francs resulting from their sale she purchased a chalet at Interlachen. A clock played the quadrille from Orphée. "Vive Paris!" the lady cried; "there is no place like Paris!" The chalet was sold for 5000 francs, with which she purchased some bronzes, supposed to be antique, but worth some 300 francs—a price they fetched when sold at the Hôtel des Ventes fifteen months after.

—SYDNEY SMITH'S love of London could not be overestimated. The old marquis, who never approached London without the ejaculation, "Those blessed lamps!" was far outstripped by his eloquent fancy. The parallelogram between Hyde Park and Regent Street, Oxford Street and Piccadilly, within which he dwelt, contained, in his belief, more wisdom, wit, and wealth than all the rest of the inhabited globe. It was to him a magazine and repository of what was deepest and most real in human life. "If a messenger from heaven," he used to say, "were on a sudden to annihilate the love of power, the love of wealth, the love of esteem, in the hearts of men, the streets of London would be as empty and silent at noon as they are now in the middle of the night." His nature demanded for its satisfaction the fresh interests of every hour; he defined the country "a place with only one post a day." The little expectations and trivial disappointments, the notes and the responses, the news and the contradictions, the gossip and the refutation, were to him sources of infinite amusement; and the immense social popularity which made his presence at a dinner-table a household event was satisfactory to his pleasure-loving and pleasure-giving temperament, even if it sometimes annoyed him in its indiscriminating exigency. The very diversity, and, it may be, the frequent inferiority, of the company in which he found himself were not distasteful to him; for while his cheerfulness made his own portion of the entertainment its own satisfaction, he had acquired the habit of direction and mastery in almost every society where he found himself. He would allow, what, indeed, he could not prevent, the brilliant monologue of Mr. MACAULAY, and was content to avenge himself with the pleasantry that "he not only overflowed with learning, but stood in the slop."

Hosted by Google

Mignardise and Crochet Edging for Lingerie, etc.

THIS edging is worked with mignardise and twisted crochet cotton, No. 50, in the following manner: 1st round.—* 1 sc. (single crochet) on the next loop, 3 p. (picot, consisting of 5 chain stitches and 1 sc. on the first of these), 1 sc. on the same loop on which the first sc. was worked, twice alternately 2 ch. (chain stitch), 1 sc. on the next loop, then three times alternately 18 ch., 1 sc. on the same loop on which the last sc. was worked, then 2 ch., 1 sc. on the next loop, 2 ch.; repeat from *. 2d round.—Always alternately 1 sc. on the next ch. loop in the preceding round, 1 ch., 1 p., 1 ch. 3d round.—On the other side of the mignardise always alternately 1 double crochet on the next loop, 1 ch.

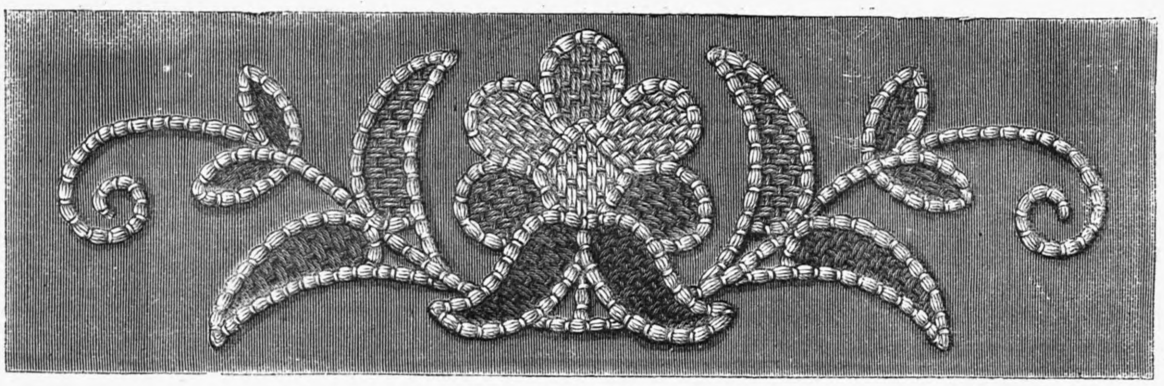

Fig. 2.—DESIGN FOR SLIPPER.—HEEL.—RUSSIAN EMBROIDERY.—[See Fig. 1.]

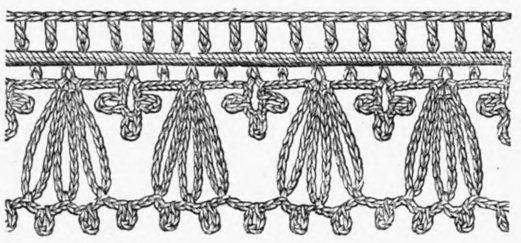
Jewel Tray with Bead Embroidery, Figs. 1-3.

THIS pretty jewel tray is made of a bronze stand four inches high, on which is set a painted porcelain saucer, designed to hold jewelry. The stand is ornamented with a border worked on fine canvas with beads, as shown by the illustration. Fig. 2 gives the design for the border and the description of symbols. Instead of this border, the one shown by Fig. 3 may be used. For the latter paste a strip of brown cloth, pinked as shown by the illustration, on a strip of fawn-colored faille, and ornament the cloth strip with point Russe embroidery in saddler's silk of the same color. The border is also embroidered in knot stitch with the same silk.

Fig. 1.—JEWEL TRAY WITH BEAD EMBROIDERY.—[See Figs. 2 and 3.]



MIGNARDISE AND CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

ASH-RECEIVER WITH CROCHET BORDER.

Ash-Receiver with Crochet Border.

THIS ash-receiver consists of a bronze stand, into which is set a saucer of cut crystal. The stand is four inches and a half high, and is ornamented on the under edge with a border, which is worked entirely in sc. (single crochet) with brown saddler's silk and gold thread. For this border make a foundation of 182 st. (stitch) with brown silk, close these in a ring, and work, always going forward, the 1st round.—1 sc. on each foundation st. 2d round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round. 3d round.—Lay on a gold thread, * crochet with brown silk 9 sc. on the next 9 st. in the preceding round, and on the gold thread at the same time, and work off the last brown st. with the gold thread, then work with the gold thread 4 sc. on the following 4 st., at the same time surrounding the silk thread; work off the last gold st. with the silk, and work 1 brown st. on the next st.; repeat twelve times from *. This repetition from * takes place to the 11th round, and will not be referred to further. In the following rounds, before changing the silk and gold threads, always work off the last st. of the silk with the gold thread, and the last st. of the gold thread with the silk also, as in the third round; the thread which is not used is surrounded in working the next st. 4th round.—* 8 st. brown on the next 8 st., 6 st. gold on the following 6 st. 5th round.—* 8 st. brown on the next 8 st., 2 st. gold, 2 st. brown, 2 st. gold on the following 6 st. 6th round.—* 2 st. brown, 2 st. gold on the next 4 st., 4 st. brown on the following 4 st., 2 st. gold, 2 st. brown, 2 st. gold on the next 6 st. 7th round.—* 1 st. brown, 1 st. gold on the next 2 st., 2 st. brown on the following 2 st., 1 st. gold on the next st., 2 st. brown, 2 st. gold, 2 st. brown on the following 6 st., 3 st. gold on the next 3 st. 8th round.—* 1 st. brown, 1 st. gold, 1 st. brown on the next 3 st., 2 st. gold, 2 st. brown, 2 st. gold on the following 6 st., 1 st. brown on the next st., 3 st. gold on the following 3 st., 1 st. brown on the next st. 9th round.—* 1 st. brown on the next st., 2 st. gold on the following 2 st., 3 st. brown on the next 3 st., 2 st. gold on the following 2 st., 1 st. brown on the next st., 3 st. gold on the following 3 st., 2 st. brown on the next 2 st. 10th round.—* 2 st. brown on the next 2 st., 9 st. gold on the following 9 st., 3 st. brown on the next 3 st. 11th round.—* 3 st. brown on the next 3 st., 6 st. gold on the following 6 st., 5 st. brown on the next 5 st. 12th and 13th rounds.—With brown silk work 1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round. Fasten the border on the ash-receiver, and edge it with gold cord on both sides.

Tapestry Border for Chairs, Portières, etc.

THIS design is worked on medium-sized canvas with zephyr worsted and filling silk in cross stitch. It is suitable for ornamenting chairs, portières, etc. When set together with strips of velvet, this border may be used for covering sofa-pillows. The colors may be varied to match the furniture of the room.

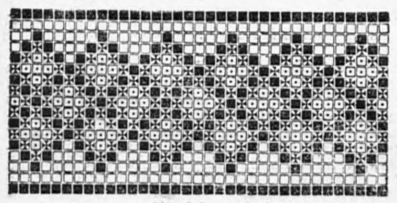


Fig. 2.—TAPESTRY BORDER FOR JEWEL TRAY, FIG. 1.

Description of Symbols: ■ Black; □ Crystal; ⊞ Gold; ⊡ Chalk Beads.

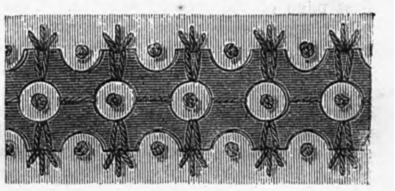

Fig. 3.—BORDER FOR JEWEL TRAY. POINT RUSSE AND APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.

Design for Slipper.—Russian Embroidery.—Figs. 1 and 2.

THE foundation of this slipper, which is designed for morning wear, is made of gray cloth, which is ornamented with Russian embroidery worked with silk of various colors. The flowers are worked with red and fawn-colored silk in several shades, and the leaves with green saddler's silk in two shades. The edges and veins are worked with yellow filling silk. First transfer the design to the foundation, and inside of the design figures, going back and forth in a horizontal direction, stretch threads, which are darned in a vertical direction with a double thread of saddler's silk. Edge the figures with a strand of maize filling silk six threads thick, as shown by the illustration.

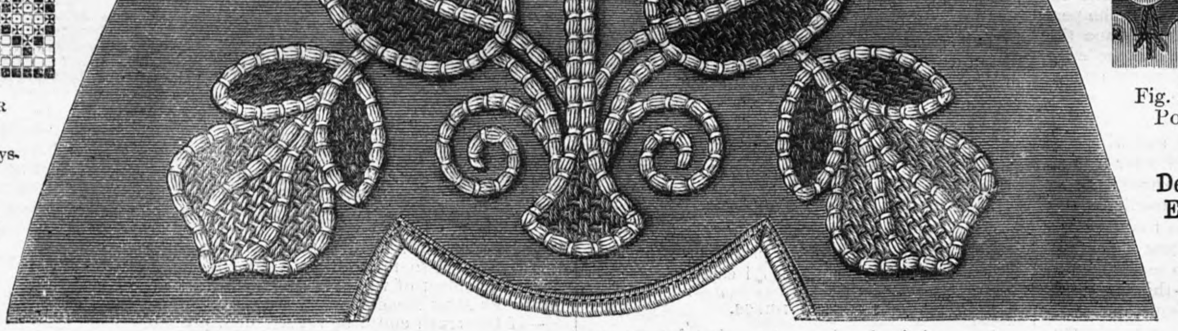

Fig. 1.—DESIGN FOR SLIPPER.—FRONT.—RUSSIAN EMBROIDERY.—[See Fig. 2.]

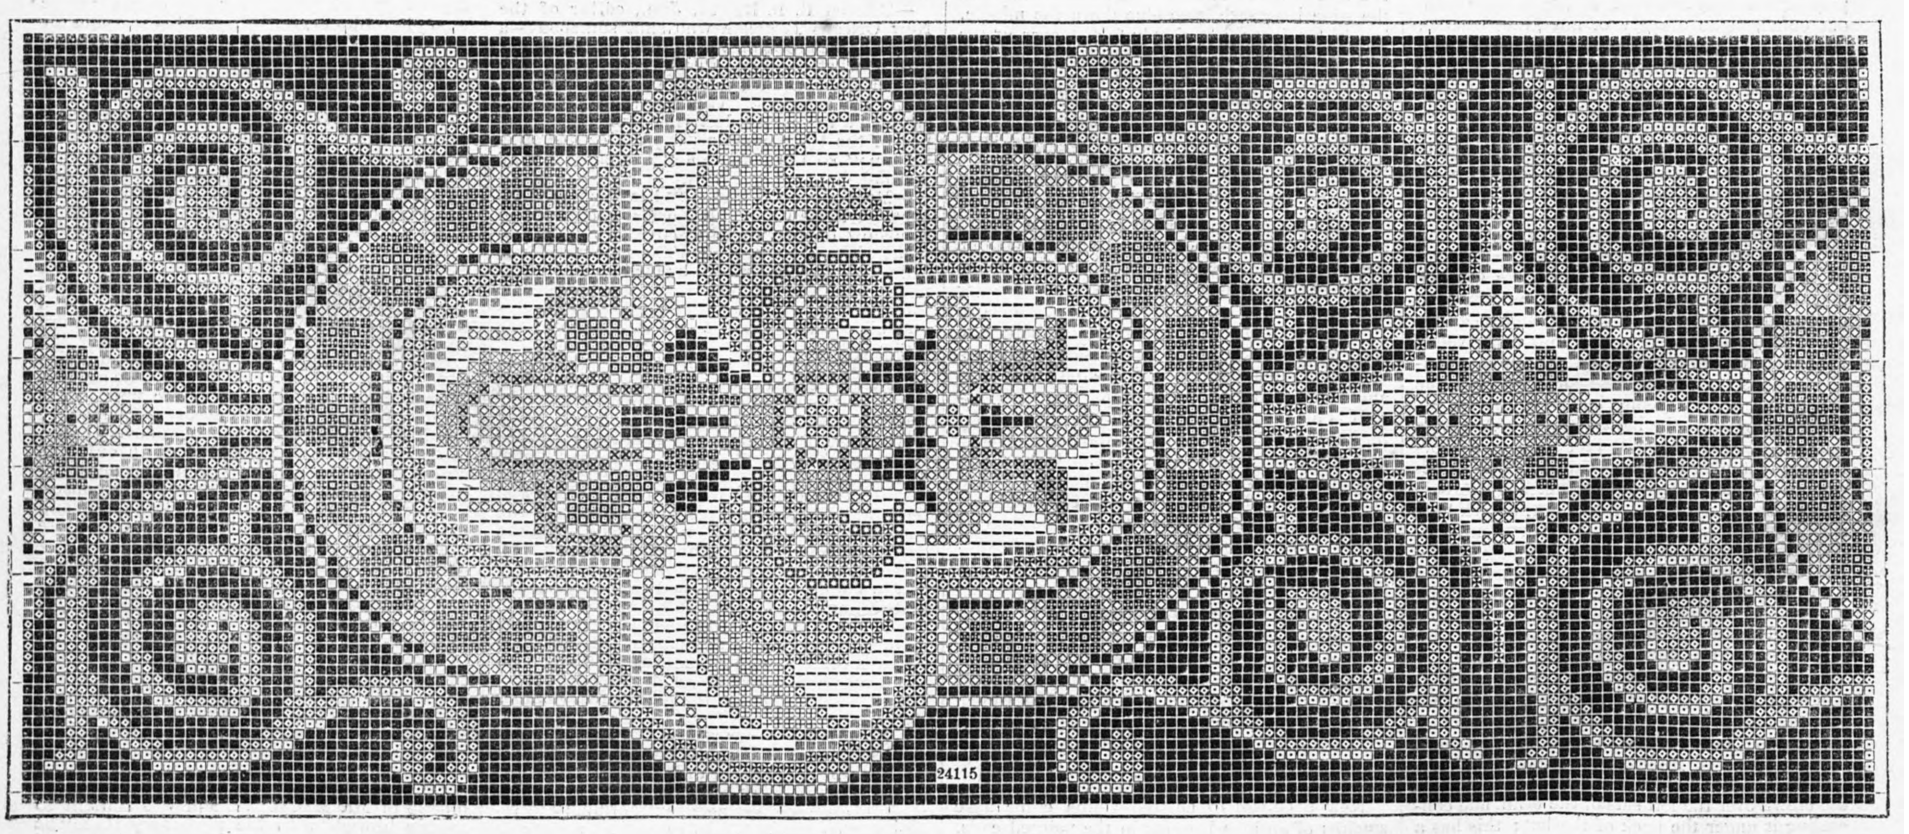

TAPESTRY BORDER FOR CHAIRS, PORTIÈRES, ETC.

Description of Symbols: ■ Maroon; ⊡ Red; ⊠ Black; ⊡ Blue; ⊠ 1st (darkest), ⊠ 2d, Blue-Green; ⊡ 1st (darkest), ⊠ 2d, ⊡ 3d, ⊞ 4th, ⊡ 5th (lightest), Fawn; □ Light Gray; ▬ White; □ Maize (the last silk).

Hosted by Google

FAIR BUT FLEETING.

I saw a little bird that was singing on a tree,
And said, "You sing so sweetly, will you come and sing for me?"
But he spread his dusky plumage, and he sped across the sea,
For the ditty that he warbled was never sung for me.

I saw the dainty blossom of a white and fragile flower,
And I said, "Come bloom for me in the centre of my bower!"
But a white hand, bright as sunshine, came and plucked it from the stem;
And I trow that it was culled to grace a princely diadem.

I met a kindred heart, and that heart to me said "Come!"
And mine went out to meet it, but was lost in sudden gloom.
Whither wander all these fair things? To some land beyond Time's sea?
Is there nothing glad and lasting in this shadow-world for me?

THE LOVERS OF TANGLE ISLAND.

I CAN not say when I first began to feel the change that had come over me. I had liked my work; was earnest in my wish to improve; knew that I was improving. Gradually I became listless; could not fix my attention on any thing; found myself idling away my time, looking at nothing, thinking of nothing, with a dull heavy head, and body ill at ease. I had better state at once that I was not in love. The most trivial thing—a carriage passing in the street, a fly buzzing on the window-pane—was sufficient to distract my attention. I was specially attracted by other people's conversation, which was curious, because if there was one sort of sneak that I had despised more than another, it was an eavesdropper. One day I heard a firm voice say, in the inner office (I was an attorney's clerk), "It matters nothing, Sir. The place is mine; and if I choose to let it run wild, that is my business. If you will not prosecute these people, I must employ some one who will."

Simple words enough. "These people" had evidently been trespassing; and our senior partner (as kind-hearted a man as ever stepped) had suggested that, as "the place"—wherever it was—was uncultivated, they had done no positive harm. And yet all that night that firm voice rang in my ears; and the idea that I was to be prosecuted took possession of me. I was going to be hanged for trespass! I knew that this was an absurdity, but still I was going to be hanged. No; it was not a nightmare. I was wide awake. I could not sleep. My bed turned round with me, slowly at first, making a ring of phosphorescent matter in the air as it swung. My head ached frightfully. I burned all over. The walls of my room vanished, and I was whirling along in space—always on my road to be hanged for trespass. Then I sank—sank—sank slowly; and as I sank, the pain and the burning passed away. I was on an island shaded by great willows, whose silver bark shone in the sunshine, and whose quivering leaves made dreamy music overhead. Violets and primroses bloomed around on the grass, made more deliciously green and cool to my aching eyes by feathery ferns which nestled in every little hollow. But, oh, the wash of the water, as the river swept along beside me! The placid calm of the deep pool that curdled at my feet! The soft slow waving of the reeds! No words can paint the delight I felt. No pain, no horrid whirling, no fear. Nothing but rest: deep, cool, green rest, with the murmur of the leaves and the ripple of the stream for a lullaby.

I had brain-fever, from overwork, they said. It had been creeping over me for some time, and at last struck me down. For days I had raved about some crime I had committed. For weeks my life was in danger. Just before I sank, weak and tortured, on that blessed little isle, I fancied I heard some voice say, "Thank God!" I had awakened from a natural sleep, and it was my dear sister's voice.

When our poor mother died I was a strong boy of ten; and Mary was "the baby," often left in my charge while our father, a hard-working barrister, attended to his business. Before she was fourteen our position was reversed. I was a hopeless cripple, and she my nurse, my friend, my comforter, my second mother. I have heard that cripples are envious of health and beauty in others. For myself, I can only say that if I were to describe Mary, you would think that I was a lover painting my mistress. Well, she is my only love, my ideal, and concentration of all that is beautiful and winning in woman—my patient, tender sister. She floats, rather than walks, about the house, and the very air that surrounds her is charged with peace. There is music in her voice, hope in her soft brown eyes, and pain sinks deadened under the touch of her gentle hand.

My father was a learned and a laborious, but, in worldly matters, a careless man. Mary and I had little more to live on than we could earn. I got thirty shillings a week in the office of Messrs. Bradley and Tirr, and she gave lessons in drawing and music. Mr. Bradley was very kind. Though it was nearly three months before I could return to my duty, he never filled up my place; and the parents of Mary's pupils were just as considerate to her during the time when she could not leave my bedside. It was all done for her sake—every one loved her.

We often talked about my sensations during that frightful illness, especially about that imaginary isle on which my fever-tossed mind had been flung, and where I had found such exquisite peace and repose. We called it Tangle Island, and made quite a little romance out of it.

One Saturday afternoon, when I was nominally well, but wofully weak and spent, Sam Payne, one of my brother clerks, and a very good fellow in his way, came, and proposed to give us a row on the river. It would freshen me up a bit, he said. So off we set—Mary and I and Sam, he rowing, she steering, and I stowed away as comfortably as they could manage in the stern-sheets. It did freshen me up, and pleasant it was at first, but there was no support for my poor back, and I got tired. Mary, who reads me like a book, found this out, and proposed that Sam should land us where there were some willow-trees and a nice grassy bank, upon which I could rest, while Sam went on to a mill about a mile and a half lower down, where he had to transact some business for his father.

I was right glad to lie down, and Mary made me as snug as snug with the shawls and pillow she had brought.

"Oh, Charley," she cried, when she had done, "look about you! Would not this do for Tangle Island?"

I had been in pain in the boat; I was easy on the bank. I was steeped in pleasant green shade. There were violets and ferns and primroses around. There was a musical ripple of flowing water, a dreamy waving of reeds, a glint of sunshine upon a golden shallow, in which minnows flashed and darted—just as in my dream. I don't mean to say that the spots were identical. What I had seen in fancy was all much larger, and I felt that I myself had no size or weight, and floated rather than reposed. But the associations were the same—above all, that of relief from suffering; so that in a little time I blended the one into the other, and made them identical.

"It would indeed, dear," I replied, "if it were an island at all."

"I think it is," she said; "I think a branch of the river runs on the other side. Let me go and see; I will be back in a moment."

She went, and returned with a bunch of forget-me-nots in her hand.

"It is an island, Sir, and just as pretty and wild as the one you described," she said, as she resumed her seat by my side. "I must take a sketch of it, and when you are a little more rested, you shall go to the other side, and judge for yourself."

She took her sketch—she was so quick and happy with her pencil—and supported by her dear arm I crawled to the other bank, where we found as nice a nook as that we had left.

"Now is it your island?" asked Mary.

"Yes, dear," I said, "it is my island."

"The deuce it is!" growled a harsh voice behind us. "I thought it was mine."

We turned, and saw a man—a hard-featured man—of about thirty-five years of age, in a common brown shooting-dress, and a straw hat, standing on a hillock in our rear. We were both so innocent of doing any harm that after a momentary motion of surprise we took no notice of the interruption, and Mary went on putting some touches to her sketch.

"What are you doing here?" demanded the stranger, in a gruffer tone than before.

"My brother is an invalid, Sir," Mary replied, moving a little nearer to me. "A friend took us out for a row; but he could not endure the fatigue of sitting up in the boat, so we landed here."

"On my property."

"We did not think it was the property of any one in particular. It looks wild enough."

"The old idle excuse for trespass," he cried, passionately; and then I knew him. He was the man whose voice I had heard in Mr. Bradley's office—the man who had insisted upon trespassers being prosecuted. "What is it to you," he continued, "how I may please to keep my land?"

"We have been here but a short time, and we will go directly the boat comes back," said Mary.

I said something too at this point, and at others; but all that is worth repeating passed between him and Mary. So I will not tell you what I said.

"Do you know who I am?" he asked, after a pause.

I think he was rather taken aback at my sister's coolness. It takes a good deal to convince a woman she is in the wrong, especially when she is acting for one she loves.

"Indeed I do not," she replied; "and I—"

"Well, go on," he said.

"Excuse me. I was going to say something which I prefer to leave unsaid."

"Why?"

"In the first place because it would have been rude, and in the next because—"

"You are checking yourself again."

"Do you really want to know my second reason?"

"Out with it."

"Well, it is no use trying to punish a fish by throwing water on it."

"Meaning that I am so rude myself that I could not feel an insult?" he observed, with a grim smile.

"You can draw your own conclusions," she replied, carelessly; "but excuse my remarking that all this agitates my poor brother, who is only just out of his bed from brain-fever. We are sorry we came. We will go as soon as we can. Will not that satisfy you?"

"What is his brain-fever to me?"

"It might be something to you to know that this quiet place has brought a sufferer release from pain," she said, quite earnestly; but I saw her lip tremble.

"Vastly fine!" he sneered. "See to what such ideas lead. You march into my house, you eat my dinner, drink my wine, unasked, unwelcomed; and when I venture to expostulate, you say, 'Oh, we have conferred a favor upon you. We were tired, hungry, thirsty. We are better now. Won't you thank us for what we have done?'"

"There is no similarity in the cases," said Mary, flushing up. "We have consumed nothing that is yours. This land, these trees, this grass and its wild flowers, may be your property; but the charm they have, the feelings they invoke, belong only to the minds that appreciate them, to the hearts they touch. The charm is inexhaustible, the feelings ever new. They will be the same when we have gone. We have spoiled nothing, taken nothing, that is yours."

"You have," he answered; and as he spoke a strange change came over him. The hard lines of his face seemed to melt away, and his voice became almost gentle. "You have. You have robbed me of my solitude. Can you not imagine a fever here, and here"—he touched his forehead and his breast—"which what you have named can assuage, and which any presence that breaks the charm sets raging?"

For the first time during the discussion Mary looked frightened. She rose quickly, and asked, "May I take my brother to land in your boat?"

"And who is to bring it back again for me?"

"I will."

"Then how are you to join him?"

"It is not more than knee-deep at that point. I can wade across. It would be death to him to get wet, or we would both go that way. Let me have your boat."

"That channel is not so shallow as you think. There is a place in the middle where the water would be up to your waist."

"No matter."

"And the current is strong."

"No matter. I would do any thing to get away."

"From me?"

"From this place. Oh, Sir, let me have the boat! I can manage it, and will bring it back in ten minutes."

"No," he said, after looking straight into her eager face for a moment or two, "you shall not have the boat. What is that you've dropped?"

It was her sketching-block. He picked it up.

"Another robbery! You draw well, young lady."

"Well or ill, it is my business."

"Do you mean that you sell your sketches?"

"I sell the drawings I make from them."

"Good again! So my island, which I prize for its loneliness, is to be made public property? A picture of it hung up in a gaudy frame, in some cheese-monger's parlor, to suggest a good spot for picnics?"

"I can easily dispel that fear," said Mary, taking out her knife and proceeding to cut the sketch off the block.

"You are going to tear it up?"

"I am."

"Nothing of the sort; I claim it."

And before she had the least idea what he was about, he snatched the now separated paper from her hand. I was furious. Ah me, what it is to be a cripple! I said some angry words, backing up Mary's indignant demand for the restoration of the sketch, but he took no notice of me.

"Give me this," he said to her, "and we will cry quits about the trespassing."

"On that condition, and if you will let me have the boat."

"You shall not have the boat."

"Then you shall not have the sketch."

"You want two things for one. You are a sharp bargainer."

"One is asked in your own interest. Our presence here is offensive to you. I do but ask the means of relieving you of it."

"Suppose you were drowned wading across, what would people say of me?"

"I don't think you care much what people say of you."

"Isn't that rather rude?"

"Is it polite to snatch things out of a lady's hand?"

"What is this you have written under it?" he asked, examining the sketch, and taking no notice of her last retort. "Tangle Island! Why Tangle Island?"

"It would not interest you to know."

"Tell me why, and you shall have the boat."

There was something so droll in this bargaining that Mary could not help smiling. He smiled too. Then between us—for after a little time he condescended to listen to me—we told him about my illness, my dream, and its realization. We had got about half through, when he sat down on the grass beside us. And as I told him that I did not often, even when well, get a glimpse of green leaves, and what a feast of healing and peace I had enjoyed in that quiet spot, he took my hand and said, "Poor fellow!" quite kindly.

"Tangle Island!" he repeated, when all was told; "Tangle Island! A good name—a better one than you think. There are more things connected with it in a tangle than its creepers and shrubs; more things growing rank than its weeds. Tangle Island! Tell me, would you like to see it overrun by a herd of vulgar picnickers, scattering about greasy scraps of newspaper and empty bitter-beer bottles, and trampling down its flowers playing kiss-in-the-ring?"

Somehow we did not answer, and he went on: "If you were at war with yourself, and every thing around you, soured, dispirited, unhinged, would you not like to have such a place, where you could come sometimes alone and think?—think perhaps of times when— Did I say you might have the boat?"

ON TANGLE ISLAND.

"Oh, Sir, do believe me when I say how sorry we are that we came!"

"Look here," he replied, "let us make another bargain. Finish that sketch for me in colors—I buying it of you, of course—and you shall come here whenever you like. I won't disturb you."

"You are very kind; but—"

"I'll have no buts," he interrupted. "I like you to come—there!"

"My good Sir," Mary replied, with one of her dear merry laughs, "one does not have all one likes."

"You're right," he said, with a little of his old grimness, "one does not."

"Besides," she went on, "remember your own words about asking two things for one. If I sell you the drawing, I have earned no right to come here."

"Give it me, then."

"It shall be yours. Call for it in a week at Mr. Brownlow's, the stationer's, at Hillford."

"You live at Hillford?"

"We do."

"Why mayn't I call for it at your house?"

"You can if you like. Ours is the last cottage on the London road, just before you come to the turnpike."

"You have not told me your name."

"Waterton."

"Your godfathers and godmothers gave you another?"

"For the use of my family and intimates only," said Mary, a little stiffly.

"Good. Now I must introduce myself. I am John Tilsley, of the Grange, Marden—the man who prosecutes trespassers, and gets bullied in the newspapers for wanting to enjoy his own."

"Now may we take your boat?" asked Mary.

"There is no necessity," he replied. "Do you think that I would have allowed you to carry out that mad idea? Your friend was in sight when I seemed to agree. You will find him now on the other side."

And sure enough at that moment we heard Sam shouting for us, and both started up to join him.

"Are you going without saying 'Good-by?'" asked the lord of Tangle Island.

"Good-by, Mr. Tilsley," said Mary.

"Good-by, Miss Waterton, until this day week."

And so we left him.

We found Sam looking very hot and tired.

"I've rowed like blazes," he said; "for they told me at the mill that this island belongs to old Tilsley, and he'd have prosecuted you like a shot if he'd caught you."

I don't know why we did not admit that he had caught us, but neither of us did.

Early in the next week—I think it was on Tuesday — Mrs. Brownlow (of the Library) dropped in to tea, as she often did, and brought us good news. All Mary's drawings deposited with her for sale had been disposed of. Hitherto we considered the sale of one in a fortnight as highly satisfactory, and here were five bought and paid for at one delightful swoop! The fortunate purchaser, as described by Mrs. Brownlow, was "a party in black, looked like a clergyman." Then we began to talk about things in general, and I asked her if she knew Mr. Tilsley of Marden.

"Know him!" she said. "Lord bless you, my dear, we've played together times and often as children. My mother was housekeeper at the Grange; and no one knows more about John Tilsley than I do. He was only a second son then, and grew up wild, they said. Leastwise there was trouble between him and the squire when he came back from Oxford, about money-matters and that. And he wouldn't go into the Church, as his father wanted him to; and he made bad worse by falling in love with Miss Allen, daughter of the vicar of King's Upton—him as was before Mr. Starcross. 'Are you not content with having beggared yourself, you fool!' the squire roared, when Mr. Allen came over and told him about it—'but you must try and drag this girl into the gutter with you?' My mother heard him say so; and she heard Master John's reply. 'You shall not speak to me in that way again, Sir,' he said. And he was right. The squire never spoke to him again any way; for the next morning Master John was gone. But before he went (as we found out afterward) he made his brother swear that he would help him with Fanny Allen—receive letters for her, keep up her heart about him, and all that. Master Will was very fond of his brother; stood up for him to their father many a time, and got him out of lots of scrapes. Will swore he would do all he asked, and off went John to Australia, trusting him. Well, if you'll believe me, that sneak of a Will went and made love to Fanny on his own account, and married her! And there was John working away, making a fortune, and writing her long letters every month (which were never delivered), telling her how he was getting on, and that he would soon be back to make her his wife.

"My dears, when those two brothers met again, it was awful—awful. They well-nigh killed each other. Indeed, people did say that Master Will—he was the squire then, for the old man died soon after John left—never did quite get over it. He died too within the year, and so John got the property. But, Lord! it's no use to him. He's regularly broken down and soured. There wasn't a merrier, more open-handed lad in the county than John Tilsley; and when I hear people talking about his stinginess, and his prosecutions for trespass, and that, I says, 'You go through what he has, and see if you like it.'"

"Badly as his brother behaved, it must be an awful reflection for him that he was the cause of his death," said Mary, with a shudder.

"He'd nothing to do with his death—that was all gossip. Will died of rheumatic fever. John has no call to reproach himself for any thing he's done."

"And what became of the widow?" asked Mary.

"The less we say about her, my dear, the better," Mrs. Brownlow replied. "Jilting one man and marrying another for his money was not the worst thing she did by a long way."

I asked her if Mr. Tilsley was married.

"Gracious, no!" she said. "Why, he hates the very sight of a woman, poor fellow!"

Mr. Tilsley came on Saturday for his picture of Tangle Island, and found fault with it.

"What do you mean," he growled, "by putting in that boat with a crimson cushion? It wasn't in the sketch."

Mary explained that amidst so much green she required a bit of contrasting color to lighten it up.

"I don't care," he persisted. "I won't have it. It is not true. I want the place as it was that day. This thing is not like my boat, or your boat, or any other boat that ever floated. Besides, it gives the idea that some one is there. I hate any one to be there. I want the place as I like it—desolate."

Mary agreed to paint out the offensive incident, and set about doing so, as he desired. I don't think she wanted him to come again. When it was done he gave another growl, and said,

"You're right. It does want color."

"You have had your own way, Sir," she replied. "I shall not alter it again."

"Will you do me another one of the other side?"

"I would rather not."

"Why?"

"I am not accustomed to be dictated to as to what I put in my drawings. I do my best. If that is not good enough, they can be left alone."

"I won't dictate. You shall anchor Noah's ark there if you like."

"With a portrait of the Bear enjoying the scene," she added, with a malicious smile.

For a moment he looked puzzled, and then catching her eyes, which were full of fun, burst out into a laugh.

"Thank you for that," he said. "It's the first laugh I have had for many a day. Yes, by all means put in the Bear. I suppose you will dress him in a brown shooting-jacket and a straw hat?"

Well, to make my story short, Mary agreed to paint him the companion picture, and he called so many times while it was in progress that good Mrs. Brownlow took me aside and warned me that people were talking about us. So when the picture was done I gave him a hint that he was not to call again. I appealed to him as a gentleman, so far removed from our humble sphere as to be inadmissible as an ordinary visitor, not to compromise my sister; and when he hesitated, I told him roundly that I would not let him do so. He made no reply. He only uttered a horrid curse, and strode away.

The next thing we heard of him was that he had shut up the Grange and gone abroad.

Two years passed. Mr. Bradley gave me my indentures, and dear Mary had made herself famous. Her pictures hung on the line at every water-color exhibition, generally with a ticket on them. We were prosperous and happy. We had a boat of our own now (with crimson cushions, if you please), and a man to row it, vice poor Sam Payne, to whom my sister had felt herself obliged to say "No." Mr. Tilsley had left word with his steward that we were to go to Tangle Island as much as we pleased. Often we went, and often talked of the "Bear;" but Mary would not make any more drawings of the place. Once, when I proposed we should take a cold dinner there and spend the day, she replied, quite sharply, that I ought to be ashamed of myself for not respecting his feelings—referring, of course, to Bruin's denunciation of picnickers. I could not quite understand this, as Mary was hard upon him in many respects, when we were speculating what had become of him and what he was doing. I suppose that some time in every boy's life he has considered persons of the Giaour, Werner, and "Stranger" stamp as heroes. Mary only thought them "great big sulkies," and had "no patience" with John Tilsley as a great big sulky too.

She would make no more sketches of Tangle Island; but drew from it an inexhaustible supply of studies—grasses, ferns, wild flowers, water-weeds, and what not—for her drawings. She dried and pressed these when they had served this purpose, and we had a fine collection of the flora of our favorite retreat.

We were sitting on that same bank where we were first caught trespassing, and again I began to wonder about Bruin.

"What can it possibly matter to us, dear," she said, "where he is sulking?"

"Don't call it sulking, Mary," I replied; "think of all he has been made to suffer."

"That's no reason why he should curse and swear at people, make himself disagreeable, and be ungentlemanly."

"Ungentlemanly?"

"Yes, ungentlemanly. How did he behave to you?"

I sat and considered a while, and then I said,

"Mary dear, I sometimes think that he was so savage that day, because he liked to come to our house."

"Much we had to attract Mr. Tilsley of the Grange!"

"I felt almost sure there was an attraction there for him," I persisted.

"Meaning me?—you dear old goose!" she answered, laughingly, but blushing crimson.

"Precisely," I replied.

She kissed me, and said I was a dreamer of dreams, and would never make a lawyer.

"Upon my word," I said, "I think it is a pity you were not the man of the family. You are so unromantic—out of your pictures."

"Don't be so sure of that," she answered: "I romance a good deal about poor Bruin. He has been badly treated, and there must be much that is good in him. He would not have given up the whole tenor of his life, gone out to Australia without a sixpence, and made a fortune for the girl he loved, if there were not. Do you remember what he said about his mind having run rank and tangled like this island? That idea, and his love for the solitude of the spot, show that his sorrows have not brutalized him, as some think, but have given his nature a twist which might yet be undone. I confess I should rather envy the woman who could untangle his thoughts, and let the sunshine in upon them—not for his sake, you know," she added, quickly; "don't fancy that for a moment. I should envy her for curing him of a mental disease, just as I should envy another who had nursed some poor child through a fever, that's all. And now, having relieved our minds on this subject, let us forget Bruin, as he has forgotten us."

"Agreed!" said a voice behind us.

We looked round, and there he stood—in his brown shooting-jacket and straw hat—just as we had first seen him, but with a very different expression on his face.

"Agreed!" he said; "you shall forget Bruin" (a shadow of his old grimness came over him as he spoke the word) "as he has forgotten you. Have the good folks of Hillford done talking yet?"

"They have had no cause lately," I answered.

"They shall have plenty soon. I am going to be married."

"Married!" we both exclaimed.

"Yes, married. Why not? There is a hand which, with a few magic touches, has taken all the tangle out of my mind. Do you" (this to Mary) "envy its owner?"

"You have been listening! Oh, how unfair!" Mary cried.

"Why not say 'ungentlemanly?'"

"It was ungentlemanly."

"Granted. But you have not answered my question."

"And I don't mean to answer it."

"I made a long struggle against those magic touches," he went on; "felt my powers of resistance growing weaker and weaker, and hated myself for it; but somehow, when I had quite given way, I was contented. Don't you think that the woman who has done this—for a woman it is—ought to be just a little proud of her work? Don't you think that she has incurred a little responsibility?"

"I don't see that," Mary said.

"No? What would you think of any one who picked a half-drowned cur out of a pond, restored it to life, and then flung it back to perish?"

"It is getting late, and we most go," Mary said, as she rose.

"If it were midnight, you should not go till you have answered all my questions."

"Mr. Tilsley, this is—this is—"

"Ungentlemanly? Perhaps it is; but when one is as much in earnest as I am, one can not stop to be polite. Do you envy the woman who has let sunshine into my mind?"

"You overheard me say so," she replied, half crying with vexation. "Why make me repeat a foolish thing?"

"Oh, it was foolish, eh?"

"Very foolish."

"It was not," he said, in a deep, low voice, which trembled with emotion. "This, and what else you said of me, prove that of all the men and women I have known since—since I was made into a wild beast, you alone understand me. Mary Waterton, yours is the touch which has untangled my mind; yours the hand which has let sunshine into my life. You have half saved me from the bitter, bitter waters in which all that was good in me was drowning. Have you the heart to throw me back, Mary? It is not what I heard to-day that makes me speak thus. I came back to do so. But what I have heard gives me more hope than I have dared to entertain for two long miserable years. Here, on Tangle Island—"

I don't know what more he said. I thought it high time for me to execute a strategic movement, which I did in good order. I don't think either of them missed me. I staid away for full half an hour (they said it was ten minutes). I was not even called back then, but really it was getting quite dark; so I rejoined them, and found—well, that my sister Mary was queen of Tangle Island.

In a few months she became mistress of the Grange, which soon won the reputation of being one of the pleasantest houses in England. Its master started a pack of fox-hounds, and was captain of the county eleven. There wasn't a more popular jolly fellow about than John Tilsley. There was no change in my Mary—there could not be—for the better. Poor or rich, she was the same unaffected, straight-minded, honest-hearted woman. When the children are very good they are taken to play on Tangle Island; about which I lately overheard the following conversation:

JOHN. "Pooh, pooh, my dear! Let them picnic there if they like. Why shouldn't the poor people enjoy themselves?"

MARY. "They may enjoy themselves wherever else they please, but they shall not scatter greasy paper and bitter-beer bottles on Tangle Island. Dear John, that little isle is holy ground to me. It brought me the great happiness of my life. It is but a wee, wee spot. Do let us keep it sacred for ourselves and our children."

And she had her way.

MY HEART'S A CARRIER-DOVE TO-NIGHT.

BY PAUL H. HAYNE.

(PERSIAN.)

My heart's a carrier-dove to-night;
From out my breast I set it free,
To wing a swift, unerring flight,
O Sweet, to thee!

Doth some rare prescience stir thy sleep,
Some mystic dream, begot of love?
Rise, tender Heart; nor waiting keep
My carrier-dove.

Lo! at thy window-sill his flight
Is stayed; he's weary, give him rest;
Thou know'st where lieth by day and night
His fragrant nest.

Ope the soul's casement, take him home
With fond caress and gracious word;
Joy, peace, serene content, will come
With that fair bird.

(Continued from No. 45, page 711.)

THROUGH FIRE AND WATER.

A Tale of City Life.

BY FREDERICK TALBOT,

AUTHOR OF "THE WINNING HAZARD," "JACK PUGH'S LEGACY," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VI.

"Thou art said to have a stubborn soul,
That apprehends no further than this world,
And squar'st thy life according."

IT would not be fair to Bilfil to accept his wife's view of his character without making some allowance for her prejudices. He was a man to whom life appeared as a series of experiments. These it behooved him to make with care and skill, but he held it unwise to risk very much on the success of any one of them. He was profoundly penetrated by the conviction that if he did not himself turn to the best account the particular modicum of life that was his, no other force or power would interfere in his behalf, and he had thus set himself to realize the utmost amount of enjoyment he had capacity for. The passions and desires of life he regarded as a good huntsman might his hounds, to be restrained, indeed, and disciplined for the better fulfillment of their work, but as affording by their efficiency and success the chief reward of their master, the very reason of his existence.

His marriage he regarded as an experiment that had failed. He had intended that it should establish him more firmly in ease and prosperity. The event had tended entirely the other way. Had Margaret, indeed, been content to fall into the course of life that suited him, to have become an elastic and useful companion and assistant, he might have proved himself not wanting in the essentials of good comradeship. But he had no mind to abandon his whole course of life, to give up his companions and his pleasures. No; the life of a decorous Paterfamilias was unendurable to him. He hadn't sufficient patience either, or power of dissimulation, to conceal his feelings of disappointment and disgust at the result of his schemes; and Margaret, who would have done much from devotion, but was too impulsive to take a calm and prudent view of her position, had been driven to madness by the discovery of the real state of her husband's affections.

Bilfil's chief object now was to avoid scandal. He was quite content that his wife should leave him. Why continue an experiment which had shown itself to be fruitless? But he wished above all things to avoid public gossip. Had Margaret gone to her uncle Thomas's house in Russell Square, he would have been content that she should stay there, and he would have agreed to make some allowance for her support. But that she should try to live independently, perhaps dragging his own name into the scandal which would be pretty sure to follow her—and above all, that this young Hulse, this half-cousin and old admirer of Margaret's, should come between them—these things enraged him beyond measure.

Happily, by extraordinary accident, a weapon lay ready to his hand by whose means he could dispose effectually of this impertinent young fellow.

Bilfil had many resources and means of making money. Besides his share in the Daily Mentor, which, however, was not a lucrative investment, and in which he actually was merely the nominee of the great financial firm which had taken him up, he had a considerable interest in the discount establishment in Birchin Lane. The capital, however, of this establishment was not contributed by Bilfil. The great money firm of Grindrod and Gordon had set him up in this business also. If you were a City man, and the promoter of a great company which was to make the fortunes of its subscribers, and incidentally to set afloat your own, you would know that it was useless to attempt to get the great firm to finance your undertaking unless you first secured the assistance of Bilfil. Then your course was easy enough. With Bilfil's arm through yours, you would pass through the crowded counting-house, full of clerks and big books and nervous waiting clients, and into the inner sanctuary of the great firm, where, surrounded by ground-glass partitions, seated at school-house-looking desks, the great chieftains of the monetary world were maturing their important transactions. Bilfil would whisper into Mr. Grindrod's ear: the great man would survey you critically with scrutinizing eyes. A memorandum would be hastily scrawled; Bilfil would lead you forth again a made man. The great New Nebraska Dock and Warehouse Company, Limited, was now a living force; its shares were at a premium; its promotion-money was safe. Above all, Bilfil was the richer by a tithe of the money the great firm had advanced—an advance which would gather bulk in discount, commission, and interest, till it assumed quite a portentous figure among the assets of Grindrod and Gordon. Such were, then, the golden rewards of the chase in the happy hunting-grounds of the great City.

But Bilfil knew very well that this could not last forever. He knew more of what was going on in the world of commerce than the men for whom he worked. For some time he had felt misgivings that the golden period, during which money had fallen into the very mouths of the bold and unscrupulous, was quietly coming to an end. He had therefore gladly accepted a commission from his great patrons to proceed to America to investigate the affairs of a railway company to which they had made large advances. He had also arranged with the proprietors and editor of the Daily Mentor to furnish them with a weekly letter on the social aspects and commercial prospects of the Western States. Now this employment suited him remarkably well. When the inevitable crash came on he would be away; he would be gathering together a connection which might enable him to build up an enduring edifice for himself out of the ruins of his friends' houses. It gave him an opportunity, too, to realize; to transfer his liabilities to the great firm; to pocket his share of the profits already made.

"Don't trouble yourself about your little discounting business," said Mr. Gordon to him; "hand that over to us; we will take all current bills at their market value, and give you a quittance. Our purposes have been answered; you have opened out to us opportunities we should have been unable to avail ourselves of but for you. As for the good-will of the business, leave that in our hands; you will have no reason to repent your confidence." And indeed, when Bilfil received a check for five thousand pounds from the magnificent firm, he felt that in trusting to their good intentions he had truly acted with wisdom. His trust, however, did not go so far as to permit him to leave the money in their hands. The check was duly cashed, and the proceeds were paid over into Bilfil's own banking account. Then he began to breathe freely, and to think more seriously of his voyage, and of winding up his affairs.

Of all the bills, good, bad, and indifferent, which had matured, ripened, or rotted in his office cases he retained only one; all the rest he had handed over to Grindrod and Gordon. This one bill was that accepted by John Jones and Edward Hulse, and indorsed by the Drain-pipe Company. He had long ago spotted that bill; suspected that there was something fishy about it; and yet he had come to look upon it with affection. For with that bill, if it were not duly met—and Bilfil suspected that it would not be met—he had a weapon in his hands available against the abettors of his wife, and against the only man whose influence with her he feared, her old boy-lover, Edward Hulse. Now the bill was due this very Saturday: had it been met? Bilfil took a cab and went down into the City to see.

The bill, of course, had been passed to his bankers, and they had presented it at the bank where it was payable. Banking hours were just over as Bilfil reached the door of the United Bank. He was sufficiently acquainted with the manager, however, to obtain admittance at the private door. The clerks were still at work under the green-shaded gas lamps making up their balances.

"That bill," said Pugh; "um—ah—yes; no, indeed, it hasn't been met; we had a slip from Prodgers's to say it was coming back. The notary will bring it up to-night, about eight o'clock, I dare say. You shall have it on Monday morning."

"I'd rather have it to-night," said Bilfil, "and I'll set my lawyer to work at it."

"Oh, if you like," said Pugh; "if you think it's worth while. It's sure to be taken up on Monday, too. It's a very good bill of the sort."

"I'll have it to-night," said Bilfil. "I'll give 'em notice of dishonor to-night."

When Bilfil had arranged with his lawyer to proceed upon the bill instanter, he went down to Margate to spend the ensuing day there. Patty was there, he knew, and he meant to employ his Sunday profitably. He was very much in love with Patty; and now that his wife was out of the way, arrangements might be practicable which before seemed difficult. Ah, if he could only secure Patty as a companion in his American trip, what a tolerable thing life would be!

CHAPTER VII.

"I did not take my leave of him, but had Most pretty things to say."

UP to eight o'clock on Sunday evening nothing more was seen or heard of the Reverend John Jones. He hadn't been able to go home with Lucy, having been called away to see his father, who had come to town the night before. But he was coming in the evening, after church.

The day dragged on wearily enough. Old Hulse sat motionless by the fire, his handkerchief over his head; he would not stir either to eat or drink; he didn't want any thing; let them take their meals without him. Lucy and her mother, though distressed, were not surprised. He had such fits periodically, fits of sullenness and gloom. To his son, however, who knew the cause, his father's continuous depression was a melancholy sign. It involved keeping a constant watch upon him; for that his father was on the look-out for an opportunity to put an end to his existence, Edward didn't doubt. Here, however, he could call his mother and his sister to help him. He told them this much: that he believed his father's head had been turned by pecuniary embarrassments; that he might at any moment attempt something desperate. He entreated them to watch him narrowly, to follow all his movements, to take every thing out of his way. At the same time he made his mother pack a small portmanteau full of absolute necessaries. This he took himself by a cab, in the first instance, to Charing Cross, and after that he carried the portmanteau in his hand, watching carefully to see if he were followed, over Hungerford Bridge to the Southwestern Terminus, and left it in the cloak-room. If the worst came to the worst, and John refused to keep silence, he would take his father off to Southampton before a search could be made for him, and then he would go with him by the next steamer to America. There he could manage to support his father, no doubt. His mother and sister must follow. He had about ten pounds in his possession; that sum would suffice for the railway fare to Southampton and steerage passage to America: for provisions and comforts for the voyage they must trust to Providence. But, after all, there would, he trusted, be no need for such a step. John, if held harmless, would never needlessly bring disgrace upon the father of his sweetheart. And if John were stanch, who could hurt his father? The money he had appropriated belonging to the Company must be restored; but they could hardly prosecute the old man criminally for taking it. He was rather an agent than a servant of the Company; was paid by commission, and was authorized to sign on behalf of the Company. Edward didn't know much about criminal law, but he didn't think they could prosecute for embezzlement. At all events, the directors were kindly old-world people, who had known his father in his better days, and who would hardly deal harshly if the money were refunded. All depended upon John; and Edward nervously speculated and debated to and fro in various aspects, according to his various moods, as to what kind of action would be taken by John Jones.

Turning these things over in his mind as he walked homeward from his twilight expedition, the whole outside world seemed like a dream or vision to him. All his soul was inclosed within that narrow space bounded on one side by the river, on the other by the quiet street—that little oasis of life among all the Sabbath stillness of the City—that home which had been once to him such a haven of refuge, but which now seemed as a creek of sad desolation.

As he plunged into one of the narrow darksome lanes which led down to Lower Bridge Street, and caught the familiar whiff of river smells, his heart sank within him. He couldn't go through with this thing; he hadn't the nerve, the power. Surely it could be put off, delayed; he must have this night for thought, for the marshaling of facts, for the arrangement of his plans. Surely he must have thus much respite! Then, as he came into the quiet, deserted street, he saw before him, looming in the rising mists of the river, a stalwart broad-shouldered man. He swung along with easy gait, humming to himself snatches of melodies, which might be airs of psalms, perhaps, but which had a suspicious go and gayety about them nevertheless. There was not a soul in the street but he, and as he reached the door, the little postern let into the great gates of the wharf, he turned round on his heel and stopped short. He was John Jones, the lover of Lucy. He didn't see Edward, however; he was immersed in thought. Seemingly doubtful whether he would enter or not, he put his hand to the door and took it away again, half opened and then closed the door, but finally making up his mind, he passed through; then the door closed behind him. At this Edward took up his resolve all in a moment, by instinct as it were: he would terminate this killing suspense, he would know the best or the worst.

Perhaps it was the sight of Edward's face, which looked white and ghastly by the light of the one dim lamp which twinkled over the house door, perhaps it was some forecast of the future that moved him, but as Edward touched Jones on the arm—he stood waiting on the door-step, having just rung the bell—he started violently and shuddered.

"Hallo!" he said, turning round on Edward. "What's up?"

"Come with me into the warehouse for a minute, I've something important to tell you. Oh, don't be afraid of Scipio; he is shut up. Poor old dog, he gets so restless on Sundays when he hears the bells going. I used always to take him out—up the river—on Sundays, before he went blind, and now, poor dog, the same fit comes on him sometimes, and he'll stagger away to the Old Swan Pier when he hears the bells chiming over the river; and he barks and howls too, when he can't get out; so I shut him up in the up-stairs rooms."

Thus Edward ran on, nervously talking while he struck a light and lit a candle in his little workshop. At first the candle would only give out a small blue flame, the wick having been burned off close; by-and-by it flamed up. Each looked into the other's face, and read therein a purpose strange and sinister.

Lucy Hulse had heard the ring at the bell, had known by the pull of it that her lover was there. She would have run down stairs to let him in, but she was reading to her mother one of the psalms for the evening, and she only paused for a moment, and looked wistfully at her mother, who was absorbed in some kind of mental abstraction. She wondered how long that sluggish girl down stairs would be before she went to the door. Hours seemed to have passed between the sound of that quick, energetic ring and the slow tramp of the servant on the staircase. The door was opened, but was shut again at once. Lucy listened intently, repeating mechanically the concluding verses of the psalm. Then, as her mother reverently bowed her head at the conclusion, Lucy ran out of the room on to the landing, but no one was coming up the stairs—and yet she had a feeling as though her lover were close at hand.

"Jane!" she cried down the well of the stairs—"Jane, there was a ring."

"So I thought, miss, but there was nobody there."

Lucy returned into the room disappointed; yet surely he would be here presently. Then she went down stairs, opened the door, and looked out into the night.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE present war between England and the most powerful tribe of the Gold Coast, in Western Africa, naturally excites new interest in a wild race described in our early school-books as warlike, ferocious, and possessing a love for shedding human blood. Ashantee is an extensive kingdom of Upper Guinea, comprising an area of 60,000 square miles, with a population of about 3,500,000. The kingdom is an inland one; for along the coast are several Dutch settlements, which have been recently transferred to the English government, consequently the Ashantees can carry on their commerce with the coast only by passing through these settlements, which at first gave rise to many sanguinary conflicts, and finally proved the immediate cause of the present war. There were also other secondary causes: the Ashantees invaded the English provinces with hostile designs; missionaries have been captured by them, and subjected to various hardships and indignities; and King Koffee Calcalli resented the transfer of certain Dutch settlements to England, believing that they belonged to him. Warlike and cruel as the Ashantees are, they exhibit much skill in various industrial arts. They excel in the manufacture of cotton cloth, and in the brilliancy of their dyes; some of their weapons show superior workmanship; and in the making of gold articles there is often exhibited a combination of skill, taste, and dextrous manipulation that is remarkable. Ashantee abounds in gold, which is distributed all over the soil, and is sometimes found in large pieces. The metal is used profusely for personal ornaments, but the natives resent all attempts of foreigners to work their mineral treasures. The capital of Ashantee is Coomassie, which is said to be really a fine city, containing many handsome buildings. The royal palace is a huge stone edifice, divided into spacious rooms. The king himself is comparatively a young man, being about thirty-six, and exhibits real executive ability. His army, by report, now numbers 90,000 men in the field, and the king appears in person with them. The English propose to construct a railway for convenience in carrying on the war in this country, where there is a lack of all means of transportation—men being the sole burden-bearers.

Improvements of various kinds have been made in the Executive Mansion at Washington, and the approaches thereto have been beautified by skillful hands. The park immediately in front has been laid out in walks and garden plots, and is to be planted with choice flowers. The interior of the building also will soon present a handsome appearance. The East Room has been greatly changed by the art of the fresco-painter and the upholsterer. The work is not yet entirely completed, but probably will be done before Congress meets.

Recently a physician of Dutchess County, New York, poisoned himself accidentally by taking a large dose of aconite from a bottle which stood on a table by his bedside. He took it during the night, supposing the bottle to contain other medicine. He soon discovered his mistake, and called his family, telling them he could not live. Remedies were administered, but in vain. He died. There is certainly great want of proper care in the putting up, keeping, and using of poisonous articles. Accidents are constantly occurring in households because dangerous substances are not properly labeled, or are left where children or thoughtless or ignorant adults can get them. The suggestion which has been made that bottles containing poisons should be made in some peculiar manner, so as to attract attention on being touched, would prevent many mistakes, and is worthy the consideration of druggists.

Winter in Minnesota may be very delightful; but doesn't it begin rather early? Snow fell there to the depth of five inches about the 24th of October.

The goose that laid golden eggs is an old story, but the following tale is new: A short time ago five geese owned by a man living at Mormon Island, California, died from an unknown disease, and on examining the gizzard of one, grain gold sufficient to make a five-dollar piece was found. The remaining four each contained almost the same amount of the precious stuff. The gold was probably picked up by the fowls near some claims where the miners had been sluicing, and it is presumed that the quicksilver attached to it caused their death.

Experiments of an important nature are being made in regard to the cure of leprosy, hitherto regarded as an incurable disease. The Madras surgeon in medical charge of the penal settlement at Port Blair believes that he has made a valuable discovery, namely, that leprosy can be cured by the oil of the gurjun-tree. It is reported that every leper in the settlement is fast being cured. The oil of the gurjun balsam, or wood-oil, has long been used all over India by the natives for skin diseases and sores. In the event of its turning out that leprosy is curable, the discovery will not only be valuable as regards those afflicted with that disease, but it will stimulate the medical profession to further exertions to discover the antidote to other diseases of a like nature hitherto considered incurable. This oil seems to be beneficial to all descriptions of sores and ulcers, and also has other valuable properties.

A proposition has been made to erect a huge hotel in Philadelphia for the accommodation of visitors during the season of the Centennial Exposition. The idea will doubtless assume a practical and extensive shape.

According to the Gazzetta d' Italia, the financial crisis in America caused great excitement at the Vatican. It is well known that not only private property of the prelates, but some public money, has been deposited in our banks by Cardinal Antonelli.

The Woolwich Arsenal is constantly receiving illuminating shells and smoke-balls, to be used in the Ashantee war. The smoke-balls are mere shells full of a composition the burning of which creates a thick smoke and powerful odor, and have proved powerful agencies when thrown into the midst of troops.

A great deal has been said and written, pro and con, concerning the healthfulness of keeping growing plants in sleeping apartments. The common idea is that the air is contaminated by the exhalation of carbonic acid during the night. President Kedzie, of the Michigan Agricultural College, has been experimenting with a view to ascertain the truth. In the college greenhouse more than six thousand plants are growing. After doors and windows had been closed for more than twelve hours the president analyzed air gathered in the morning, and afterward air taken in the afternoon. The night air contained more carbonic acid than the day air, to be sure; but of five specimens gathered in the morning the average amount of carbonic acid was 3.94 parts in 10,000 of air, while the out-door air contains four parts in 10,000. It will thus be seen that the air in the greenhouse was better than "pure country air."

"Do as much good as you can, but make little noise about it," was one of Dr. Nélaton's last injunctions to his son. And this principle he carried out in his own life. His son Charles, who is now about twenty-three years old, had not selected a profession when the war broke out in 1870. Dr. Nélaton, being at the head of the surgical service of the International Society for Succoring the Wounded, made him attend every day at the Palais de l'Industrie and at the Grand Hôtel, and taught him to dress wounds. The young man is now following the footsteps of his father in the medical profession. "Never allow yourself to be hurried," was what Dr. Nélaton repeatedly said to his pupils; "there is always time if you do not hurry." When he was at work nothing ever disturbed his equanimity. His sang-froid was wonderful; on this depended a great deal of his success as an operator.

Boston is really getting to be a big city. Its former area is nearly doubled by the recent annexations, and it may now claim to be territorially one of the largest cities in the country. The population now amounts to about 300,000. More additions are threatened.

A certain Swedish woman in Aroostook County, Maine, may be criticised as having stepped out of her "sphere." But in time of emergency she did the work that came to her hand to be done, and did it well, and we fancy a woman who does this is worthy of all commendation. Her husband was sick and unable to work, so with her own hands she manufactured a bunch of shingles weighing over sixty-three pounds. She did all the work alone—felled the tree, sawed, split, shaved, and bunched the shingles, and carried them on her back three and a half miles, and sold them at a country store for flour for the support of her family. Madame Ochestraue, the maker, lives in New Sweden.

A well-worn newspaper, bearing the date January 6, 1800, lies on our table. It bears the unpretending name of J. Russell's Gazette, and was printed in Quaker Lane, Boston. It is a curiosity in its way. The paper is heavily marked with black lines, and contains a detailed account of the funeral honors paid to George Washington in various cities. A proclamation from John Adams, dated Philadelphia, December 24, 1799, recommends that "the people of the United States wear crape on the left arm, as mourning, for thirty days." To the Carrier's New-Year's Address, which is printed in this Gazette, is appended a postscript, which closed with the following lines:

"O'er all Columbia's States, the tear-swoll'n eye,
The heart-felt anguish, and the bursting sigh
In sympathetic grief the tidings spread,
The first of men—Great Washington—is dead!
Much would the Muse of Elegy inspire,
But drowned with tears is all her sacred fire;
Yet Heaven is kind, and consolation gives—
Tho' Washington is dead, our Adams lives!"

The advertisements in this old newspaper give an idea of various matters in the year 1800. For example:

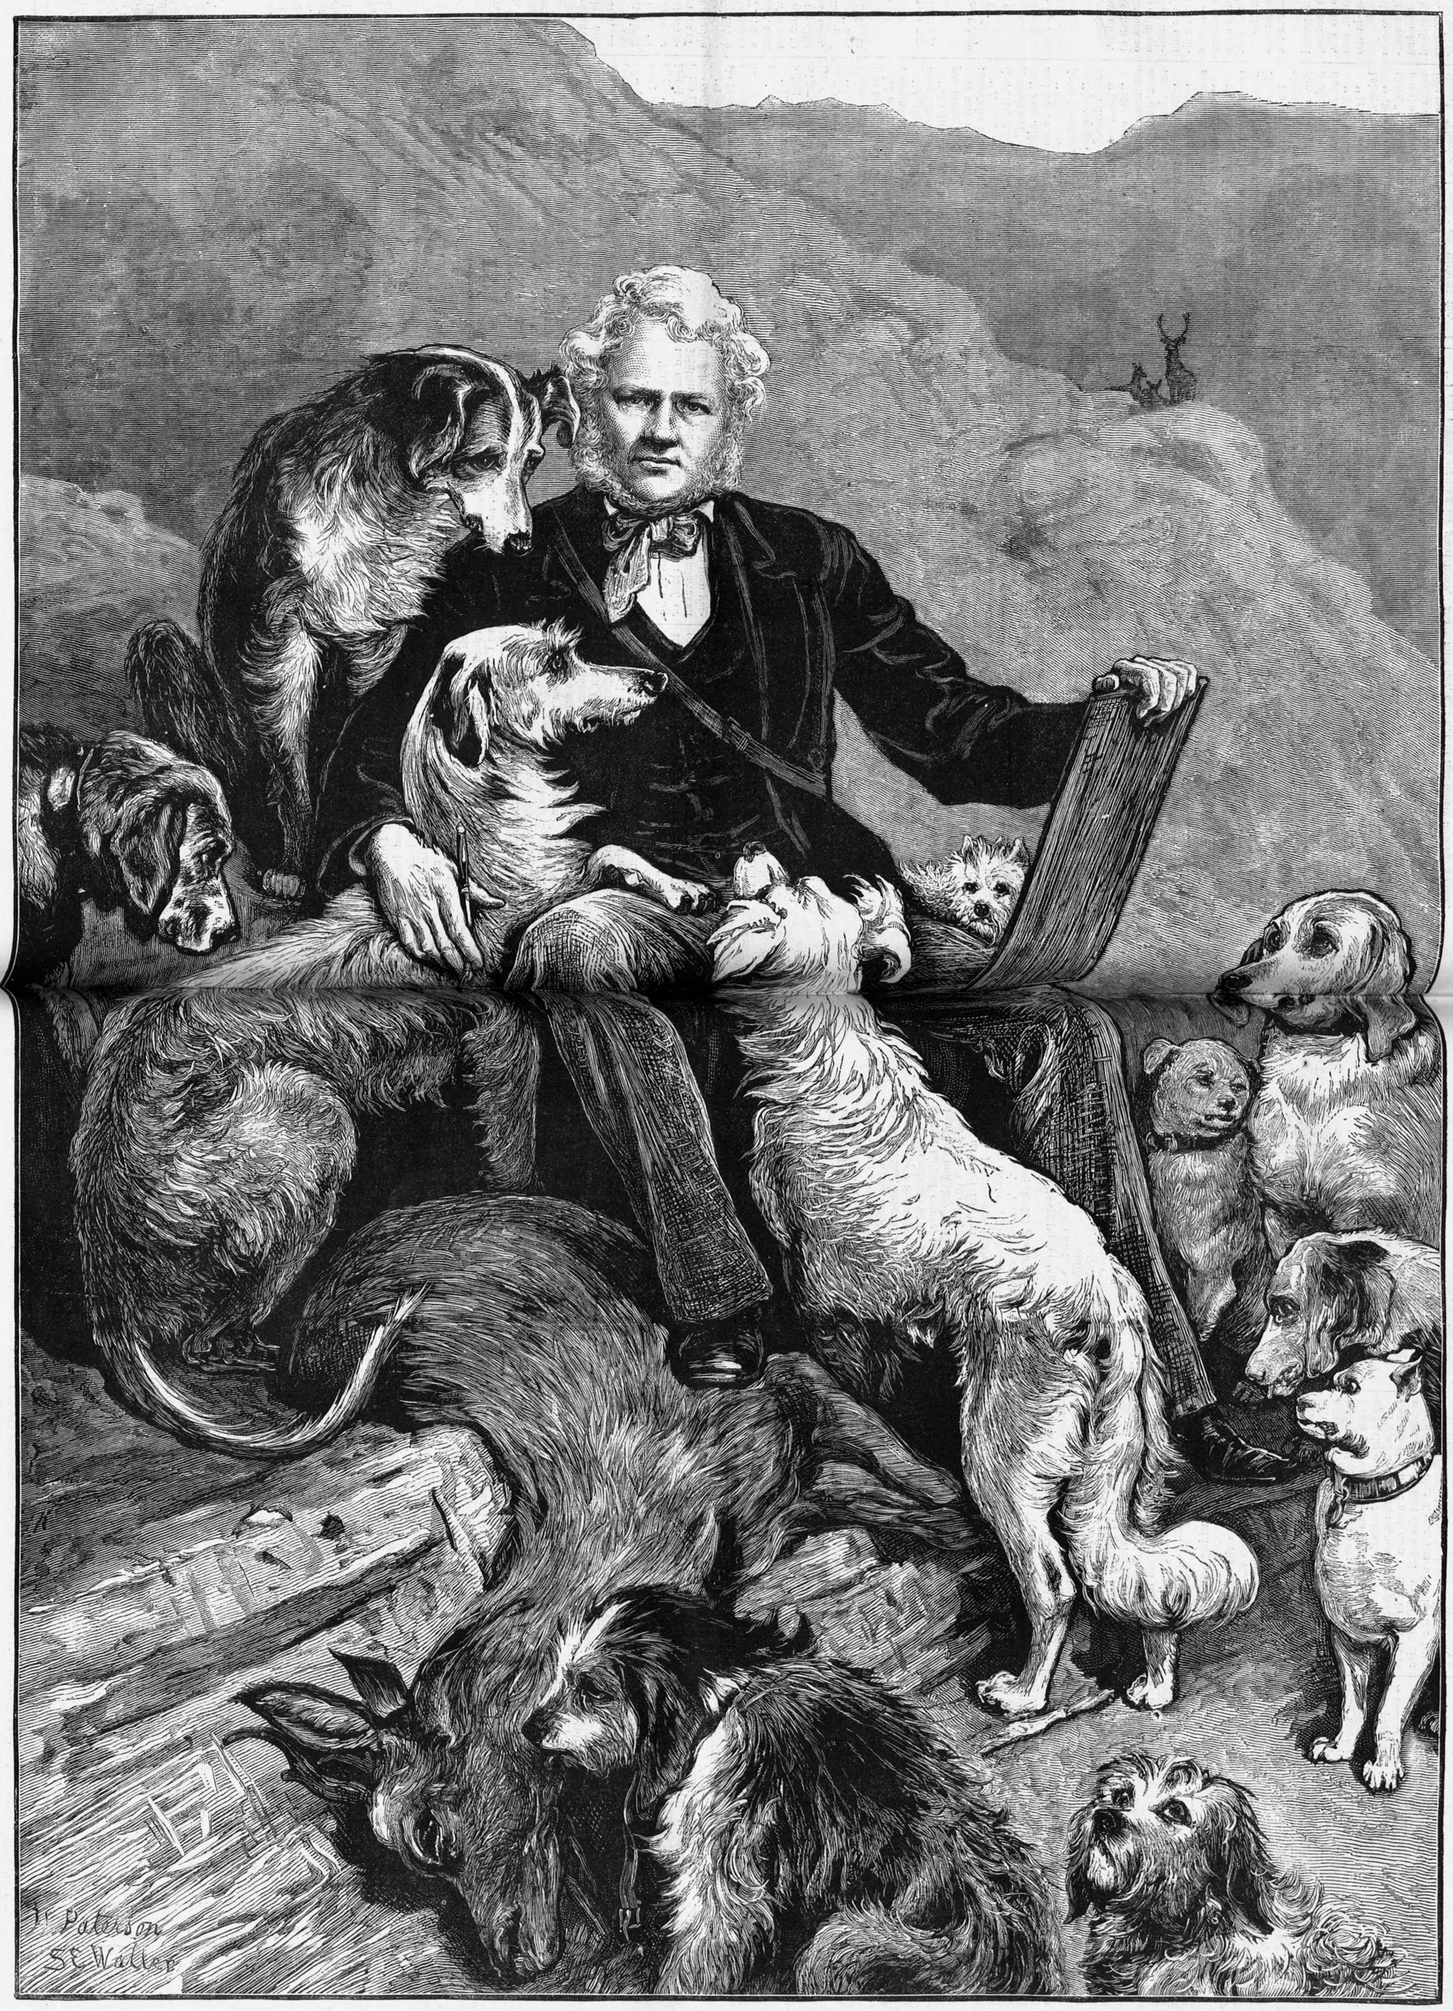
"FRESH POMATUM.—A few cases of fresh pomatum just arrived from Italy will be sold very low, wholesale or retail, at Fowl & Cushman's, No. 17 Newbury Street. Likewise a quantity of patent cotton night-caps, at a reduced price. Ladies' wigs and bands of long hair, of complections and prices as usual."

We notice also that the "price of stocks" is quoted in a prominent part of the sheet, and that the "Board of Health" announce the names of their "committee for the week."

A man, undoubtedly insane, recently entered a telegraph office in Detroit, and wrote the following message: "To the Lord in Heaven.—Where shall I go next? The world is growing worse every day. There is not an honest Christian in America." He was informed that the Western Union lines didn't connect with the other world, and he went to see about mailing a letter.

In France hop stalks have been successfully used for manufacturing paper. And in England newspapers have been printed on jute paper. Jute seems adapted for all but the finer kinds of paper.

Digitized by Google



LANDSEER AND HIS FRIENDS.—[See Page 746.]

Hosted by Google

LANDSEER AND HIS FRIENDS.

See illustration on double page.

THIS allegorical picture represents Sir Edwin Landseer surrounded by a number of his four-footed favorites, some of them representative dogs, others the most popular creations of his brush. For example, the dog with his head close to Sir Edwin's was his favorite colly, a deer-hound has his paw on the artist's knee, and a setter is looking up in his face. Behind the deer-hound is "Suspense," on the right hand is "Dignity," and peeping from the sketching-block is "Impudence." Below "Dignity" are two dogs from the picture of "Jack in Office." One of these, it will be remembered, is in charge of the barrow, while the other regards its savory contents with watery mouth. Beneath them again is "Alexander," from the picture of "Alexander and Diogenes." At the bottom is the belated dog, whose piteous face says as plainly as possible, "No place like home," and in the foreground is a dead roebuck and a rough hound. Landseer's own portrait, as seen in the picture, is reputed a good likeness.

Although Landseer was also an admirable landscape and portrait painter, it is from his pictures of animals that he has probably won the most enduring fame. It is a rather singular fact that the wealth which he accumulated during his lifetime was due rather to the engravings from his pictures than to the pictures themselves. His fashionable patrons, as a rule, were poor paymasters, beginning with Prince Albert, who was habitually so niggardly in his self-imposed prices for pictures that artists not unfrequently returned the checks he sent them. Sir Edwin was, however, always held in high esteem by the royal family. The Queen knighted him in 1850, and always continued his firm friend. During his illness she made constant inquiries after him, and her carriage headed the funeral procession which conveyed his remains to St. Paul's Cathedral, where they were laid to rest side by side with those of Sir Joshua Reynolds, Benjamin West, Lawrence, Turner, and the other artists to whom the venerable edifice serves as a mausoleum. Landseer was never married, but lived with his sisters nearly all his life at St. John's Wood, where his originally simple cottage grew with years to a luxurious mansion, as his wants and wealth increased. He was luxurious in his habits, and loved to lie in bed late, composing his pictures, as Scott did his novels, between sleeping and waking. When he once began, however, he painted rapidly and with great industry.

Many amusing anecdotes are current about the great animal painter. For instance, it is said that in one of his early visits to Scotland he stopped at a village, and took a great deal of notice of the dogs, jotting down rapid sketches of them on a bit of paper. Next day, resuming his journey, he was horrified to find dogs suspended in all directions from the trees, or drowning in the rivers with stones round their necks. He stopped a weeping urchin who was hurrying off with a pup in his arms, and learned, to his dismay, that he was supposed to be an excise officer, who was taking notes of all the dogs he saw in order to prosecute the owners for unpaid taxes; so the people were all anxious to get rid of their dogs. Another time he went to Portugal, and the King sent for him to express his admiration. "Ah, Sir Edwin," said the King, "I am so glad to see you! I'm so fond of beasts!"

SECOND-COUSIN SARAH.

By F. W. ROBINSON,

Author of "Little Kate Kirby," "For Her Sake," "A Bridge of Glass," "Mattie: A Stray," "No Man's Friend," etc., etc.

Book the First.

REUBEN CULWICK.

CHAPTER XI.

THE SAXE-GOTHA GARDENS.

REUBEN CULWICK lost time at the pay-office. He had no small change, and the sandy man in the cupboard on the right of the entrance took so extraordinarily long a time in finding two shillings in exchange for the half crown that he had tendered him, and in testing the quality of the coin before passing over the change, that Reuben almost imagined that he was in a plot to impede his progress. Reuben did not know that shillings were as scarce at the Saxe-Gotha as orders were plentiful, and that five per cent. of the half crowns offered the proprietor—who took his own money at the door, like a careful man as he was—were made from the pewter pots stolen at the "publics" in the Walworth Road.

He received his change at last, and passed along an avenue of stunted trees into the gardens, which he entered for the first time in his life, despite his proximity to the establishment, and the free admissions which were floating in the neighborhood.

He looked round very keenly, but there was no trace of Second-cousin Sarah, or of the woman whom he had taken for her, and who had run away from him. The black and white striped cotton dress had faded into thin air, or was merged in the miserable crowd that was taking its amusement moodily.

The Saxe-Gotha was not an extensive garden, but it was easy to lose sight of any one who had made up his or her mind to be concealed. The place was shady; there were dark and circuitous paths between thick lilac bushes, at the back of a mouldy quadrangle of arbors, and the oil lamps were burning dimly, and not too numerous. There was an effort to brighten up an orchestra, where four old fiddlers and one man with a flute were playing a waltz to funereal time, while a spangled mountebank was twirling on a slack rope for the edification of the public below him; but the place was full of shadow, befitting the strange folk who had congregated there.

Reuben was amazed at the poverty—at the squalid forms and stunted growth of the habitués—at the boys and girls with faces that belonged to people twice their age—at the obtrusive coarseness and ribaldry of their remarks—at the hoarse laugh of the men, the shrill falsetto of the women—at the unmistakable viciousness stamped upon three-fourths of the hideous crew about him. He had known something of poverty, and he had seen, amidst the poverty which had confronted him, temptation and crime following upon hunger and distress; he had written more than one leader for the Trumpet on the question, but he was taken off his guard by this assemblage of the vices in the dull and dirty gardens of the Saxe-Gotha. His own appearance was an attraction, respectability came so seldom, and a face with an honest outlook upon it was so great a curiosity. There were human lynxes prowling about who scented prey, and some who scented danger; and he had not stood there two minutes before as many eyes were fixed on him as on the acrobat, swinging round and round to the monotonous waltz music of the band.

The white faces and the glittering eyes seemed to close round him by slow but perceptible degrees; he was a thing of wonder worthy of grave contemplation. Reuben was not alarmed, though the public curiosity was objectionable. He looked at the orchestra; he glanced up at the acrobat, who glared down at him as at a new patron of the arts, lured to the gardens by the report of the performer's abilities, perhaps; he lighted a cigar coolly and complacently, an operation which appeared to satisfy the curiosity of a few, who moved away; he strolled from the crowd to a little grass-plot, where was a time-stained fountain—a stone boy with a broken nose squirting a jet of water from a shell, with a row of paper lanterns within the basin, where some dips were flaring; and he passed from the grass-plot to the extremity of the garden, where were John Jennings's fire-works, a scanty collection of malformed objects reared upon high poles to give an idea of importance and magnitude, and waiting John Jennings's pleasure to burst into smoke and flame. There was a figure crouching by the principal set piece, and Reuben went toward it, and discovered his landlord in lieu of his cousin. He would have backed away, but John had recognized him.

"Why, Mr. Reuben! what can you possibly want here?" he exclaimed, scrambling to his feet. "Is any thing wrong at home? Have you heard any thing about—about the Gotha—and come to tell me?"

"No; what should I hear?"

"I was afraid—he! he!—that you'd got the tip that they were going to shut up, or suspend payment," said John, with a weak little laugh: "you gentlemen of the press get news early sometimes."

"Have you heard any thing like that, then?" asked Reuben, anxious for John Jennings, notwithstanding that he was still looking right and left for Sarah Eastbell.

"N—no; not exactly, but—"

"John, they're letting you in again," cried Reuben, as he took him by the arm and walked him toward the light; "this comes of your never showing the blackguards that contract which I wrote out for you."

"I should have offended them—I should have lost the work," said John, feebly.

"All the better, I should say, for they owe you money."

It was a fact easily guessed; but John was taken aback, and gasped for breath.

"A little—a few pounds. For goodness' sake don't let Lucy know any thing about it—she goes on so!"

"Yes, and you go off so, without her advice, and trust even these people."

"What are you looking round for?" asked John Jennings.

"For a girl in a black shawl and a striped cotton dress."

"Good gracious!" exclaimed John.

"She came in here, and I followed her," continued Reuben—"a pale-faced girl, with big dark staring eyes. Have you seen a girl like that about?"

"Hundreds—poor wretches!"

"Not a girl with a white, sorrowful face such as she has. I am sure it was she."

"She—who?"

"Oh, never mind," said Reuben, put on his guard at last; "this is the business of your first floor, private and confidential, and momentous. Not a word of this to Lucy."

He had suddenly remembered that Lucy Jennings would be prejudiced still further against Sarah Eastbell, if she had an inkling of the doubts which had beset him, and it was as well that Lucy should not know at present.

"Yes, but—"

"If you say a word I'll tell Lucy how you're being done by the Saxe-Gotha."

"They'll not do me much longer, I can tell them," said John, excited by this warning. "I'm not the man to be imposed upon, or let my fireworks off much longer for nothing; that's not like me; that's not the style of— Hallo! look there! They're all going off without me. I thought they'd set 'em alight if I left them for a moment—they always do."

There was a fizzing and cracking and spluttering from the fire-work ground, and much noisy laughter from the audience. The fire-works had been discovered in an unguarded position, and sportive youths had lighted them with bowls of pipes and ends of penny pickwicks, and a spontaneous combustion was the result.

John Jennings darted away, and Reuben Culwick moved restlessly about the gardens, scanning the pleasure-seekers, glaring into the arbors, looking down the dark avenues, and into the refreshment saloon—a long wooden shed, where no spirits were for sale, but where bottled beer and cider, apples, nuts, whelks, hot potatoes, fried fish, and stewed eels constituted the principal stock in trade of the purveyors.

But there was no sign of Sarah Eastbell—no black and white striped dress even to identify its wearer by. He lingered till the last—till the crowd streamed out in hot haste, fearful of the public-houses shutting up, and the sandy-haired proprietor had left his box, and was helping to blow out the oil lamps in the flower beds and round the deserted orchestra.

He left John Jennings and the proprietor talking together of a speedy settlement of accounts; he even heard John Jennings say that he was in no particular hurry for a day or two, and that he was sorry to hear that the gardens were so bolstered up with orders that no one thought of paying at the doors; and then Reuben went moodily back to his lodgings, certain in his own mind that Sarah Eastbell had seen him and avoided him.

There was another Sarah Eastbell on his mind too—the old woman at St. Oswald's, down in Worcestershire. What was she doing, prostrate and blind, without her nurse and without a friend?—his father's sister, lying in the darkness of her malady, helpless and deserted—the old woman who had been kind to him when he was a boy, and when the Culwicks were all poor. What of her?—and why had the girl run away from her? Well, well!—he was poor himself; he could not allow these people to oppress him in this fashion. He must mind his own business, and let the mystery die out. It concerned him not—it lay apart from his pursuits and life.

He took up the current number of the Penny Trumpet, to refresh himself with an article of his own composition, and there an advertisement stared him in the face. "Cheap Excursion to Worcester, Malvern, and Gloucester." A club association to start one day, and return late the same evening or early the next, for eight shillings, and no luggage allowed. Reuben counted his shillings carefully, looked up at the ceiling, and went into an elaborate mental calculation on the spot. Yes, he would go away again.

The next day he was in Worcester, walking up the Tithing as if the place belonged to him.

CHAPTER XII.

AUNT EASTBELL IS STILL CONTENT.

THE ties of kindred were evidently strong with the man from whom all kindred held aloof, or Reuben Culwick would have never undertaken that journey to Worcester. He was a man perplexed by a mystery, and he hated a mystery which he had no power to solve. He was a charitable man, it may be added, and the forlorn condition of old Sarah Eastbell impressed his mind more than he could account for. Hence he had darted off at a tangent, without any great regard to his ease or his savings, in the direction of Worcester, just as he had put himself out to visit the city some weeks since, and lodged at a principal hotel for the credit of the family name. That he was a prudent man was a matter of doubt.

He passed through the gateway, and entered the square court-yard, where he stood looking round him as if for his second-cousin Sarah, whose appearance seemed wanting to complete the picture. He would have been scarcely surprised to see her emerge from the door of her aunt's room, and he would have been glad, despite the wild-goose expedition which he had undertaken. The sun was bright in Worcester at last, and the quadrangle was full of light. The morning was not quite gone, for the excursion train had started early from London, traveled rapidly, and, strange to record, had not run into any thing en route.

The door of his aunt's room was open, and he walked toward it, and entered the apartment, where all was as he had expected to find it. The old woman lay in her bed as he had seen her last, a quiet, patient, watchful woman, and there was no one with her. Surely it was only yesterday since he had called at St. Oswald's.

"Who's there?" said Sarah Eastbell, sharply, as he entered.

"Your nephew," he answered, walking to the bedside.

"From Hope Lodge, Hope Street, Camberwell?—Reuben Culwick?" she inquired, as the sealed-up eyes began to roll beneath the lids in their old fashion.

"Yes. What a memory you have!" he replied.

She stretched her hand from the bed in the direction of the voice, and Reuben took the old woman's thin hand in his.

"You bring me good news," she said, "and I have been waiting for it. I am glad that you have come!"

"I have brought no news, either good or bad, Aunt Eastbell," he hastened to assure her, as he sat down at her bedside.

"Oh! how's that?"

"What good news did you expect?" he asked, curiously; and the old woman was a long while in replying.

"I am always waiting for good news," she said at last; "didn't I tell you so when you were here in May? Good news of your father, for instance; of his becoming better friends with you; of his coming to this place to see the only sister he has left. Poor fellow, he must be dreadfully dull in that big house of his."

"You received my letter about Sarah?"

"Yes. It was kind of you to think of her."

"Where is she?" said Reuben Culwick, sharply.

Aunt Eastbell was endeavoring to deceive him, and he had not come more than a hundred and twenty miles to be hoodwinked by a blind woman.

"Well," replied Mrs. Eastbell, after another pause for consideration, "she has gone away for a little change. She will be back soon."

"Is she in London?"

"Yes."

"Then who wrote me that letter leading me to believe that she was with you still?"

"Why, Reuben boy, you are cross about it! How's this?" and the thin hand groped its way toward him again. He rested his own upon it, and said,

"There was an effort made to mislead me. Why?"

"Well, it saved a fuss," Mrs. Eastbell confessed at last, "and as Sarah did not come back to answer your letter for herself, I got Mrs. Muggeridge next door to write a line or two. But they were all our dear Sarah's sentiments—Sally said, after you had gone, that she should never think of leaving me or getting a place till after I was dead. And as I mayn't die for many years, what's the use of worriting?"

"Ay, what's the use?" said Reuben, dreamily.

"It's worrit that walks off with half of us. It's a great mercy that I have never had any thing to worrit me, but have been easy and comfortable all my precious life."

"What made Sarah leave you?"

"Why, Tom came back from sea."

"Her brother?"

"Yes, her brother—a fine, strapping young fellow, who has got on in the world—that's the first Eastbell who has done that, Reuben. He came here to see me at once, the Lord bless him!" the old lady continued, "and insisted upon giving Sally a bit of a change before he went away on board ship again; and the child wanted change, and they said looked ill, and so I persuaded her to go. I should have gone myself for a bit of a holiday with them, only I haven't been able lately to get about so briskly as I could wish. I'm not always flopping in bed like this, you know."

"Ah—and she went away with her dear brother Tom?" said Reuben.

"Yes."

"Has she written to you since?"

"To be sure. There's a letter of hers on the mantel-piece now."

Reuben Culwick walked across to the high mantel-piece, and took down a letter therefrom.

"May I read it?" he asked, when the letter was in his hand, and the instinct of a gentleman had asserted itself suddenly.

"To be sure," was the reply. "Read it out, Reuben. I love to hear my Sally's letters read over and over to me, till I get 'em by heart like. There's a great deal of sense in Sally's letters, and she's a very clever gal."

The old lady crossed her hands over her chest in a monumental-effigy style, and lay there almost as rigid and grim, until a fly settled on her face, when she made an impatient claw at it, before reassuming her position of attention.

Reuben Culwick was in no hurry to read the letter aloud. To his surprise it was a letter addressed to two persons, the second one being communicated with in lead-pencil at the top of the paper. Sarah Eastbell wrote a good hand; at one time or another there had been some education given and made use of; the old woman had seen after her grand-daughter when the father who had seen after nobody, not even himself, had been called to his account.

"Don't read this to grandmother," was written in lead-pencil, and in a fair flowing hand—quite a lady's hand. "Keep her as cheerful as you can without me. Let her think that I am coming back soon—that I am happy with Tom, and that he is very kind. I can't think of breaking the truth to her yet that I can never come back any more.—S. E."

"Who reads the letters to you, aunt?" he asked, curiously.

"Mrs. Muggeridge, or Mrs. Muggeridge's niece—the niece generally, because the old lady stammers dreadful, and puts me out in trying to listen to her. She's a great age, and can't help stammering, poor body!" she added, reflectively. "I ought not to be snappish with her. I shall be as old myself some day, and have a mouth as full of plums, perhaps."

"Now why are all these people humbugging this poor woman?" muttered Reuben, as he took a great handful of his beard into consideration with him.

He had spoken very low, but Mrs. Eastbell had quick ears, and had heard something.

"We haven't a bug in the place, Reuben; but oh, the flies—they're awful!"

Reuben read aloud Sarah's epistle to her grandmother. It was a long letter, and full of a fancy picture of how she was enjoying herself with Tom, what a holiday hers was, and how kind her brother was to her. She concluded with a promise of being back in Worcester shortly, and a hope that her grandmother was not dull without her, and she was always her affectionate and loving granddaughter, Sarah Eastbell.

"There, don't you call that a nice letter?" said the old lady, admiringly, when he had concluded.

"A very nice letter indeed."

"Ah! and she's a nice gal too. I try not to miss her, and not to feel lonely now she's gone, but it won't do quite. Will you just read that letter again, Reuben, if you don't mind? I can almost fancy that she is here, and that she speaks to me with the old gentleness I know so well, and—love so much! So soothing like."

Reuben Culwick read the letter again, and it was sufficiently soothing in this instance to send his aunt to sleep. He was sure that she was asleep by her regular breathing, and the silence which followed the conclusion of his reading.

Digitized by Google

Reuben Culwick stood by the mantel-piece, letter in hand, endeavoring to read the story for himself, and to understand the character of his second cousin more clearly by its lines. Sarah was away with Tom Eastbell, her promising brother, who was getting on so well toward the gallows, she had said herself, bitterly and scornfully. She had deceived the grandmother all her life, for the sake of the old woman's peace of mind, and then she had deserted her. That last step was incomprehensible to him. Would old mother Muggeridge solve it, or old mother Muggeridge's niece?

While he meditated, a very sallow face, chiseled deeply with ridges, peered round the room door, and two greenish eyes blinked at him through spectacles with wide horn rims.

"Oh! I beg your pardon—are you the new doctor?" said the head.

The voice did not arouse Mrs. Eastbell, and Reuben crossed the room cautiously, and backed this new old lady into the quadrangle.

"How do you find yourself this morning, Mrs. Muggeridge?" he said.

"Terribly badly, thank you, Sir," said the lady—as thin and small a woman as could possibly live, but evidently as agile as a grasshopper—"and how's that poor old soul to-day?"

"Cheerful—hopeful."

"Ah! it's a wonder how she does it," said Mrs. Muggeridge, speaking so thickly that Reuben remembered all about the plums at once; "but then she hasn't got my spasms. Your worthy predecessor," she said, shaking her head so energetically that Reuben stood on guard, perfectly prepared to catch it, if she shook it off along with her spectacles, "said I must bear them as well as I could. That's very fine advice from a man who has never had spasms inside him—which I trust may not be your case either, Sir."

"Thank you."

"For these awful spasms of mine—"

"One moment, Mrs. Muggeridge," Reuben hastened to explain: "I am not the new doctor—but a friend of Mrs. Eastbell's."

"Oh! indeed."

"And I want you or your niece to tell me about Mrs. Eastbell's granddaughter—where she has gone, and why she has gone."

"My niece!" said Mrs. Muggeridge, shaking her head again, "ah! that's a little trick to keep that poor old soul going a bit till we take her off to the cemetery—which can't be very long now. The young lady thought it would be the better plan not to tell her any thing."

"What young lady?"

"She who comes once or twice a day now—just to see her. Why, here she is, to be sure!"

Reuben turned and looked toward the gateway, where from the shadows into the warm sunshine beyond stepped the young lady whom he had seen first in his father's house.

CHAPTER XIII.

SARAH'S ABSENCE IS EXPLAINED.

REUBEN CULWICK'S astonishment was great, but the young lady's surprise was still more strongly marked, upon perceiving who it was standing in the court-yard of St. Oswald's. She stopped, clasped her hands together, and then came on again, with two large clear eyes distended.

"Mr. Culwick!" she exclaimed; "you in Worcester!"

"Yes—it is remarkable."

"You have repented—you are going to your father?"

Reuben shook his head, and smiled a little.

"I told my father that I would not come again to Sedge Hill until he sent for me, and I shall never break my word."

"Yes, you are a foolish fellow," she said, looking at him, "and almost as strange a man as your father is. Are you still living down that wretched street in Camberwell?"

"I can only afford to live in wretched streets," was the reply.

"What has brought you to Worcester?"

"An excursion train."

"You know what I mean," she said, techily—"what errand?"

"To see Aunt Eastbell," he replied, "and to discover, if possible, the mystery of my second-cousin Sarah."

"What has Aunt Eastbell or your second cousin to do with you?" she asked.

"They are my relatives—I am more interested in them than I can explain. May I ask in return what Aunt Eastbell and my second cousin have to do with you?"

"I am interested in them more than I can explain," was the arch answer—"that's all."

"I wish to Heaven you would explain something. Who are you, to begin with?"

"Ah! that's not worth elucidation," she said, after a moment's silence. "If I tell you that my name is Holland, will that make the position any clearer?"

"It might," said Reuben, quickly. "My father wished me to marry a Miss Holland once, a young lady whom I had never seen, and whom I was to take upon trust. Are you the lady?"

"Yes, Sir."

She dropped one of those odd little ironical courtesies which had bewildered him before that day, and he regarded her with great attention. This was the lady, then, on whom he had turned his back, about whom he had quarreled with his father, and to avoid whom he had gone to his mother's home, and the poverty on which that mother had prided herself. Why had the mother forbidden the match in eager haste?

"And have you married my father instead of me?" he asked, satirically.

"I would not marry either of you for twice your father's money," she said, frankly, rather pertly, Reuben considered. "I am simply his housekeeper, at a housekeeper's wage. My father was his best friend, and your father has been kind to me, in his odd way, since my father's death."

She would come into all his father's money, he was sure. Well, it was probably in good hands, he thought; and the expression on his face must have been somewhat peculiar, for she read part of it at least.

"But he will not leave me any of his fortune. I am not to build upon that in any way."

"He has told you so?"

"Yes."

"You will be thrown on the world without any compunction, for Simon Culwick has a bad habit of keeping his word, Miss Holland."

"Yes, that's the worst of it."

He thought that she was returning sarcasm for sarcasm, but he was not quite certain, she kept so demure and grave a countenance.

It was a singular position—those two whom the father had wanted to bring together, and whom his own stubbornness had set asunder.

"And now," said Reuben, returning suddenly to the object which had brought him to Worcester thus early, "will you try and explain why you are interested in Aunt Eastbell, to begin with?—why the girl who has deserted her corresponds with you?—why you pass yourself off as the niece of that old woman who has left us?"

"I'll work backward, if you will allow me," she said. "I call myself Miss Muggeridge because the name of Holland is familiar to your aunt, and I don't want more explanations than I can help in this place; the girl corresponds with me because she knows that I read her letters to her grandmother, and that I am the grandmother's friend while she is away; I am interested in Mrs. Eastbell, and feel for the utter loneliness in which she is left by her friends. I have been interested in Mrs. Eastbell for some years now, for the matter of that."

"Indeed! and her granddaughter, Sarah Eastbell, also?"

"Of late days—a little. She was not very gracious to me—she never cared to see me here. When she got into trouble, she thought that she would make me her confidante, but it was too late."

"When she got into trouble!" echoed Reuben; "what trouble was that?"

"Come with me, and I'll show you."

She led the way out of St. Oswald's into the Tithing, crossed the road to the corner of the street leading to the prison, and pointed to the wall, on which several bills were posted. One was to the effect that a reward of five pounds was offered for the apprehension of Sarah Eastbell, late of Worcester, who had conspired with others for the unlawful issue of spurious coin, and who was last seen in the town at the end of May of that present year.

Reuben stared with amazement at the placard.

"It is well that the old woman is blind," he murmured. "I did not think it was so bad as this."

"Neither is it."

"You mean that—"

"That her brother is at the bottom of it. You don't know what a scamp he is, I suppose?"

"I have had my suspicions."

"This Tom Eastbell gave her the money, I believe. She offered a sovereign in all good faith; it was detected as false coin; she was asked where she lived, and how she became possessed of it; and she took fright and ran away. They found out presently her name and address, but she had left Worcester."

"Is she with her brother?"

"Yes."

"That's bad."

"She wrote to me, without giving her address, stating that she must remain with her brother Thomas for a while. He was in business, and was taking care of her. She left Grandmother Eastbell in my charge, she said. It's a responsibility," she added, "but I have accepted it."

"You are very kind."

They walked back together to the almshouses. When they were in the court-yard she said,

"Have you come all the way to Worcester to find out the truth of this?"

"Yes."

"Your second cousin must have interested you very strangely."

"Yes," he responded. "I saw, as I thought, a strong, self-reliant, earnest nature by the side of that old woman's. I saw much sacrifice of self in one who might have grown up very selfish, and it was a character that deeply interested me."

"There were good points in Sarah Eastbell—there are now, for that matter. But she is in bad hands."

"I fear so."

"If you could find out where she is, it might be possible to save her."

"I saw her last night."

"Where?"

Reuben related the story of his discovery of Sarah Eastbell, of her flight from him, and the way in which he had lost her in the gardens of Saxe-Gotha. Miss Holland reflected for a few moments; then she said,

"I wonder if her brother performs there?"

"Is he a performer, then?"

"An acrobat at times. When he was first in Worcester prison, he was arrested in his tumbler's dress."

"In prison—an acrobat!"

Reuben Culwick remembered at once the tumbler who had been spinning round on the slack rope at the Saxe-Gotha when he had first entered the gardens. Could that be Tom Eastbell, the scamp who had brought his sister into difficulties, who had caused her to fly from Worcester in order to escape the charge of uttering base coin—in all probability to escape the jail?

"If that's Thomas Eastbell, Sarah is easily found."

"But not easily rescued."

"I will make the attempt," said Reuben.

On the following evening Reuben Culwick was in the Saxe-Gotha Gardens again, waiting patiently for the appearance of Signor Vizzobini, who had postponed his departure for Turin for six nights, by special request of the nobility, gentry, and public in general, and who was announced to appear every evening at half past nine, in his highly graceful and artistic entertainment, as performed before all the crowned heads of Europe, to the immense delight and manifest satisfaction of every crowned head among them.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

A good Child.—Two Pearls of the Antilles.—Nice Kings.—A Dilemma for a Witness.

WHAT the "intelligent foreigner" used to be in this country (the man, that is, who could appreciate us, and whom we therefore forgave for being an alien) the "cultivated American" is fast becoming among us. Even the more insular of our countrymen, who still hold out against "the Yankees," confess that when "an American is nice, he is very nice," which for them, let me tell you, is admitting a good deal. If Mr. G. W. Childs, of Philadelphia, is not nice, as to which I know nothing, he is certainly generous, for he has requested Dean Stanley to let him bear the sole expense of putting up the memorial windows to George Herbert and William Cowper in Westminster Abbey, to defray the expenses of which the hat was about to be sent round among our patrons of literature. Mr. Childs doubtless calls to mind that Herbert and Cowper were both his fellow-countrymen, and has listened to the suggestion of a noble heart. But it is curious that a window should be put up to Cowper as a Westminster scholar, since he notoriously hated that respectable seminary, and, indeed, in his Tirocinium has dealt a very swashing blow both at it and all schools. The poem is less known even than the rest of Cowper's works, which are now but little read, but it has some fine lines in it and much good sense. There would be no fear, we suspect, of any other gentleman writing a poem called Tirocinium, but it has nowadays become a difficult matter to give a title to one's book which some scribbler or other may not have appropriated earlier. Some of our small but enterprising publishers, indeed, get quite a little income by coming down upon young authors with, "Sir, you have stolen the title of Mrs. Jones's novel, published by our house in the year one," and extracting black-mail from the innocent offender. As a matter of fact, where it is obvious no filching was intended, our law courts would never award a sixpence of damages for such an unfortunate coincidence; and, indeed, if the book is unknown whose title is taken, what advantage can be gained by taking it? There is a theory that all titles of books should be entered at Stationers' Hall, but as no alphabetical or other list of the entered works is kept there, it is impossible to discover whether one has been anticipated or not. I mention this curiosity of literary law because two books upon Cuba have been recently published here, each entitled The Pearl of the Antilles, and though one was entered at Stationers' Hall, it seems to be unable to snuff out the other. The first is written by a Mr. Goodman, an artist; the second by M. Gallenga (better known as Mariotti), once a member of the Piedmontese Parliament, and for many years principal leader writer upon Continental affairs in the Times newspaper. He is perhaps the best writer of English—for a foreigner—that ever wielded pen. In his youth he was a wild revolutionist, and had not so very long ago to give up his seat in the House of Deputies because of an accusation which laid to his charge that a quarter of a century ago he had dwelt for weeks in the old king's (Charles Albert's) palace with the intention of slaying him with a dagger given to him by Mazzini. It was a very sensational parliamentary incident, and one was astounded to find that the man who had given to us Country Life in Piedmont, and been so long a special correspondent in the leading journal, had been ever a fanatic. Perhaps a man is none the worse off for a little enthusiasm at one-and-twenty, and it might take a worse direction than that of intending to kill kings.

This last rather truculent sentiment perhaps suggests itself to me from hearing the latest news of Johanni II., Emperor of Abyssinia (thanks to the late interference of Great Britain with the affairs of that country), and a professingly Christian monarch. Having caught one Abba Kassai, a pretender to his throne, he put cotton into his ears, and then reprimanded him—that is, he put gun-cotton into them, and then blew him up! That was rather a strong measure, the report of which (very loud) would not have prejudiced us in favor of Johanni II. But what think you he did then? He caused the right hands and the left legs of no less than twenty-seven of the insurgents to be cut off in his imperial presence, and then abandoned his mutilated victims to be preyed upon by lions. This is a nice, quiet, gentlemanly person to have raised to the throne of Abyssinia, is it not? On the other hand, our late friend the Shah has thought better of commanding his late Vizier to be bled to death in a bath, and has restored him to power, and banished his enemies from court. There are still people among us, strange as it may seem to you, who admire these crowned monkeys simply because they are crowned.

A street crier goes howling by my windows to-night that Arthur Orton has turned up in the flesh, and been recognized at Wapping. If this be really so, I will eat my hat, although it is not a nice one, and has an ugly turn in the brim. Great things were last week expected by some people of the claimant's chief witness, one "Captain Brown;" and he certainly swore very hard. Among other things, he swore that he was in the service of one Mr. Hobb, at Rio, in 1853. But it afterward turned out that in his application for a master's certificate he had handed in testimonials stating he was on board ship throughout that year. Being in this dilemma, he elected to admit the older perjury instead of the later, and he did so. "I had to make up a certain amount of time to obtain my certificate," confessed he, coolly, "and all the returns before 1856 are false."

There has been a great Church Congress at Bath, at which the agricultural strike movement was one of the leading topics. The bishop of the diocese and the clerical swells generally declared that it was not the business of the clergy to interfere with political or social matters, while Canon Girdlestone, Charles Kingsley (also now a canon by favor of the court), and Mr. Thomas Hughes ("Tom Brown") asserted that it was the business of the clergy, etc., etc. Both parties ignored the fact, which is really the point at issue, that the clergy have interfered, and almost without exception in favor of the stronger and richer side. But the humor of the affair culminated in the evening at the Congress dinner. The election for Bath had taken place that very day, and news was brought to the feast that the conservative candidate had been elected, whereupon the clergy, "who had no business to interfere in politics," led by their bishop, gave three hearty cheers. This is, of course, a considerable scandal, and all, as it turned out, incurred for nothing, since, as a matter of fact, the news of the conservative victory was false, the liberal candidate having been returned by a considerable majority. For all that, I believe a conservative government will come in for a few months. "Society" generally is furious against Mr. Gladstone, mainly because he has done away with purchase in the army, and rendered it no longer a three or four years' "lounge" for men of family and fortune.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

PERSIAN PUNISHMENTS.

THE old saw, "Unalterable as the laws of the Medes and Persians," would seem to have some foundation in fact, since we find a mode of capital punishment still in vogue in Persia that we read of as having been employed upon Bessus, the murderer of King Darius, though certainly many, if not most, of the laws of the present day are of considerably more recent origin.

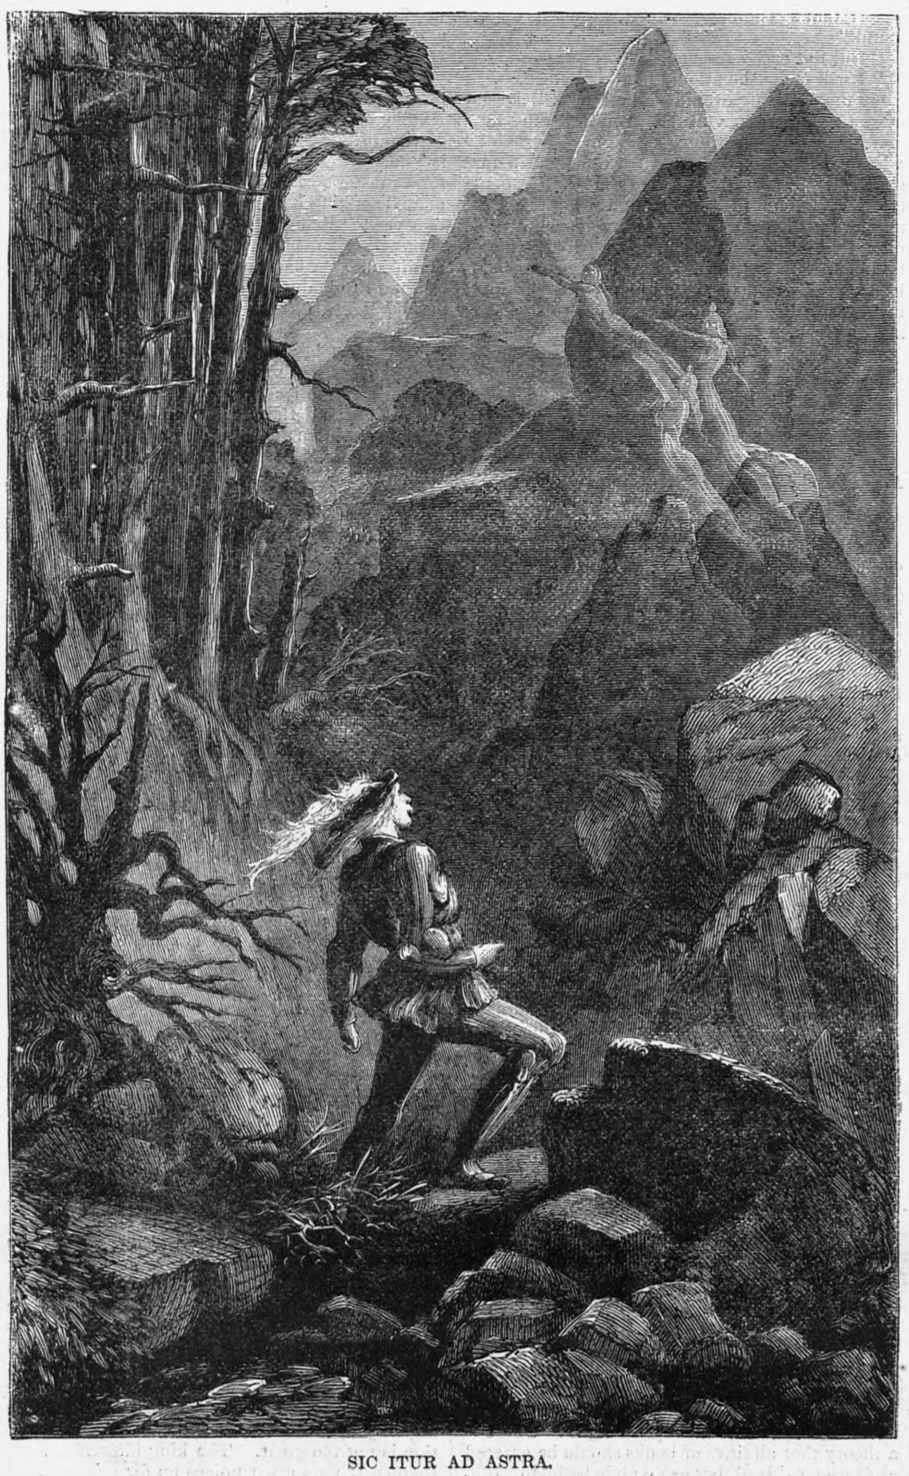
It may be at once stated that bribery and corruption of the very worst description are of the most common occurrence, while the difficulty, on the other hand, would be to find an honest judge, or perhaps it would be more strictly true to say a man who had not got his price; for the higher judges are honest so long as the temptation is not too great. The king himself not unfrequently puts great nobles up for sale, who, if they succeed in buying themselves in, are restored to favor, but, if overbid, lose their commands and honors to the successful bidder. The following story, which we take from Fraser's Persia, gives a good idea of the oppressions which take place:

"An acquaintance of the writer of these pages, while he lodged in a certain town, was alarmed by hearing in a neighboring house a sort of periodical punishment going on daily. Heavy blows were given, and a person was continually crying out 'Amaun! amaun! [Mercy, mercy]—I have nothing! Heaven is my witness, I have nothing!' Upon inquiry, he learned that the sufferer was a merchant reputed to be very rich, who afterward confessed to him that having understood the governor of the place was determined to have a share in his wealth, and expecting to be put to the torture, he had resolved to habituate himself to the endurance of pain, in order to be able to resist the threatened demands. He had brought himself to bear one thousand strokes of the stick, and, as he was able to counterfeit exhaustion, he hoped to be able to bear as many blows as they would venture to inflict, short of death, without conceding any of his money."

The king usually does his share of duty as a judge in a business-like manner, holding two courts daily for the redress of grievances, when any one can have access to him, though, perhaps, the European listener would be somewhat surprised at hearing such summary judgments as "Off with his head," and "Cut out his tongue;" or, should one of the parties be considered too argumentative, at the order, "Give him the shoe," which means the instant application of a heavy blow on the mouth from an iron-heeled slipper, which, says Fowler, "is pretty effective, and frequently ends the assize; but 'Turn up his heels' is deemed a still sounder argument," as we need hardly doubt it would be.

As there is no system of convict labor, the government can not afford to keep men in confinement, and so capital and corporeal punishments, with fines, are all that offenders have to dread. Murder and high-handed robbery are generally punished by death; but, as the former is commutable to the heir of the deceased, who has the privilege of doing as he chooses with the murderer, a premium is offered on this species of crime, impatient heirs not unfrequently getting their relation put out of the way, and then, by this law, shielding their tool from any but nominal punishment. Either highway robbery or simple theft is to be compromised by a fine, though, by the law of the Koran, a thief is subjected to amputation of an arm, hand, ear, or nose; and as the trunk of a limb thus muti-

Digitized by Google



SIC ITUR AD ASTRA.

SIC ITUR AD ASTRA.

(Æneidos, lib. ix. 641.)

Appetit aëriis contingere montibus astra.
P. Virgilii Maronis Culex, 137.

SIC itur ad astra! How glorious
To gaze on Earth's luminous dome,
And think that, o'er sorrow victorious,
We shall find 'mid the planets a home!
To wing through the blue empyrean
A radiant and rapturous flight,
Still discoursing in jubilant pæan
Of all that is joyous and bright;
High, high o'er this sphere of delusion,
Far, far from life's rancorous wars,
Where strife may not come nor confusion—
Oh! how shall we go to the stars?

Through gardens enameled with flowers,
Embosomed 'mid comeliest trees,
Where fragrance from asphodel bowers
Sheds perfume on every breeze?—
Through meads, amaranthine in gladness,
Where fadeless felicity blooms,
And no phantom of danger or sadness
In awful proximity looms;
Where care is unknown, and no cavil
The sense of serenity mars?—
Oh! think not 'tis thus that we travel—
Not thus do we go to the stars.

'Mid woods through whose mazy recesses
No joy-giving sunbeam may dart;
'Mid deserts whose solitude presses
With silent dismay on the heart;
Through valleys, bewild'ring and dreary;
O'er mountains bleak, barren, and steep,
Where travelers foot-sore and weary
A desolate pilgrimage keep;
Through scenes of terrific commotion,
Like mariners clinging to spars,
'Mid the wild disarray of the ocean—
THUS, THUS do we go to the stars!

"HERO HOLDING THE BEACON TO LEANDER."

See illustration on page 749.

THIS exquisite engraving from Armitage's beautiful picture illustrates the classic story of Hero and Leander—that favorite theme for both poet and painter. Both ancients and moderns, from Ovid to Leigh Hunt, have united in singing the loves of this hapless pair, until the tale has grown so familiar that it seems a work of supererogation to repeat even its barest outlines. All will remember how Leander, the adventurous youth of Abydos, used to swim nightly across the Hellespont to visit his beloved Hero, the beautiful priestess of Venus at Sestos, guided by a burning torch which she held from the top of a high tower. He was drowned on his return one stormy night. In the morning the waves washed his body to the feet of Hero, who in despair threw herself from the top of her tower into the sea, and perished with him. The straits of the Hellespont, known in modern times as the Dardanelles, separate Europe and Asia, and form the connecting link between the Archipelago and the Sea of Marmora. The ancient name was derived from Helle, the daughter of Athamas, King of Thebes, and the goddess Nephele, who fled from home with her brother Phryxus on the back of a golden-fleeced ram, which transported them through the air, to avoid the persecution of a cruel step-mother. In crossing the strait Helle fell into the water and was drowned, whence it was afterward called in her honor Hellespontus, or Hellespont, the sea of Helle. The name of Dardanelles is derived from the neighboring Dardania of the ancients. It was across this channel that Xerxes built his celebrated bridge of boats. The strait between Sestos and Abydos is about a mile and a half wide, but the strength of the current would oblige a swimmer to make a circuitous course of at least four miles.

lated is at once dipped into boiling oil, mortification rarely follows, and the wound soon heals. For other offenses, such as assault, or any injury to the person, etc., the old Jewish lex talionis is enforced, unless, indeed, a pecuniary equivalent is given to the prosecutor, or a sufficiently large bribe to the judge, either of which will always prevent any other punishment from being inflicted.

As for the forms of capital punishment in Persia, some of them are too horrible to mention—strangulation or suffocation being among the least offensive methods employed. Sometimes, though rarely, in the case of relations, one life, when offered, is accepted in lieu of the one forfeited. When the king decides on the death of any of the great nobles or rulers, a special messenger is at once started off with the warrant. He rides night and day until he reaches his destination, when he at once goes to the man, is admitted as coming from the king, and drawing the warrant with one hand, and his cimeter with the other, he then and there kills him.

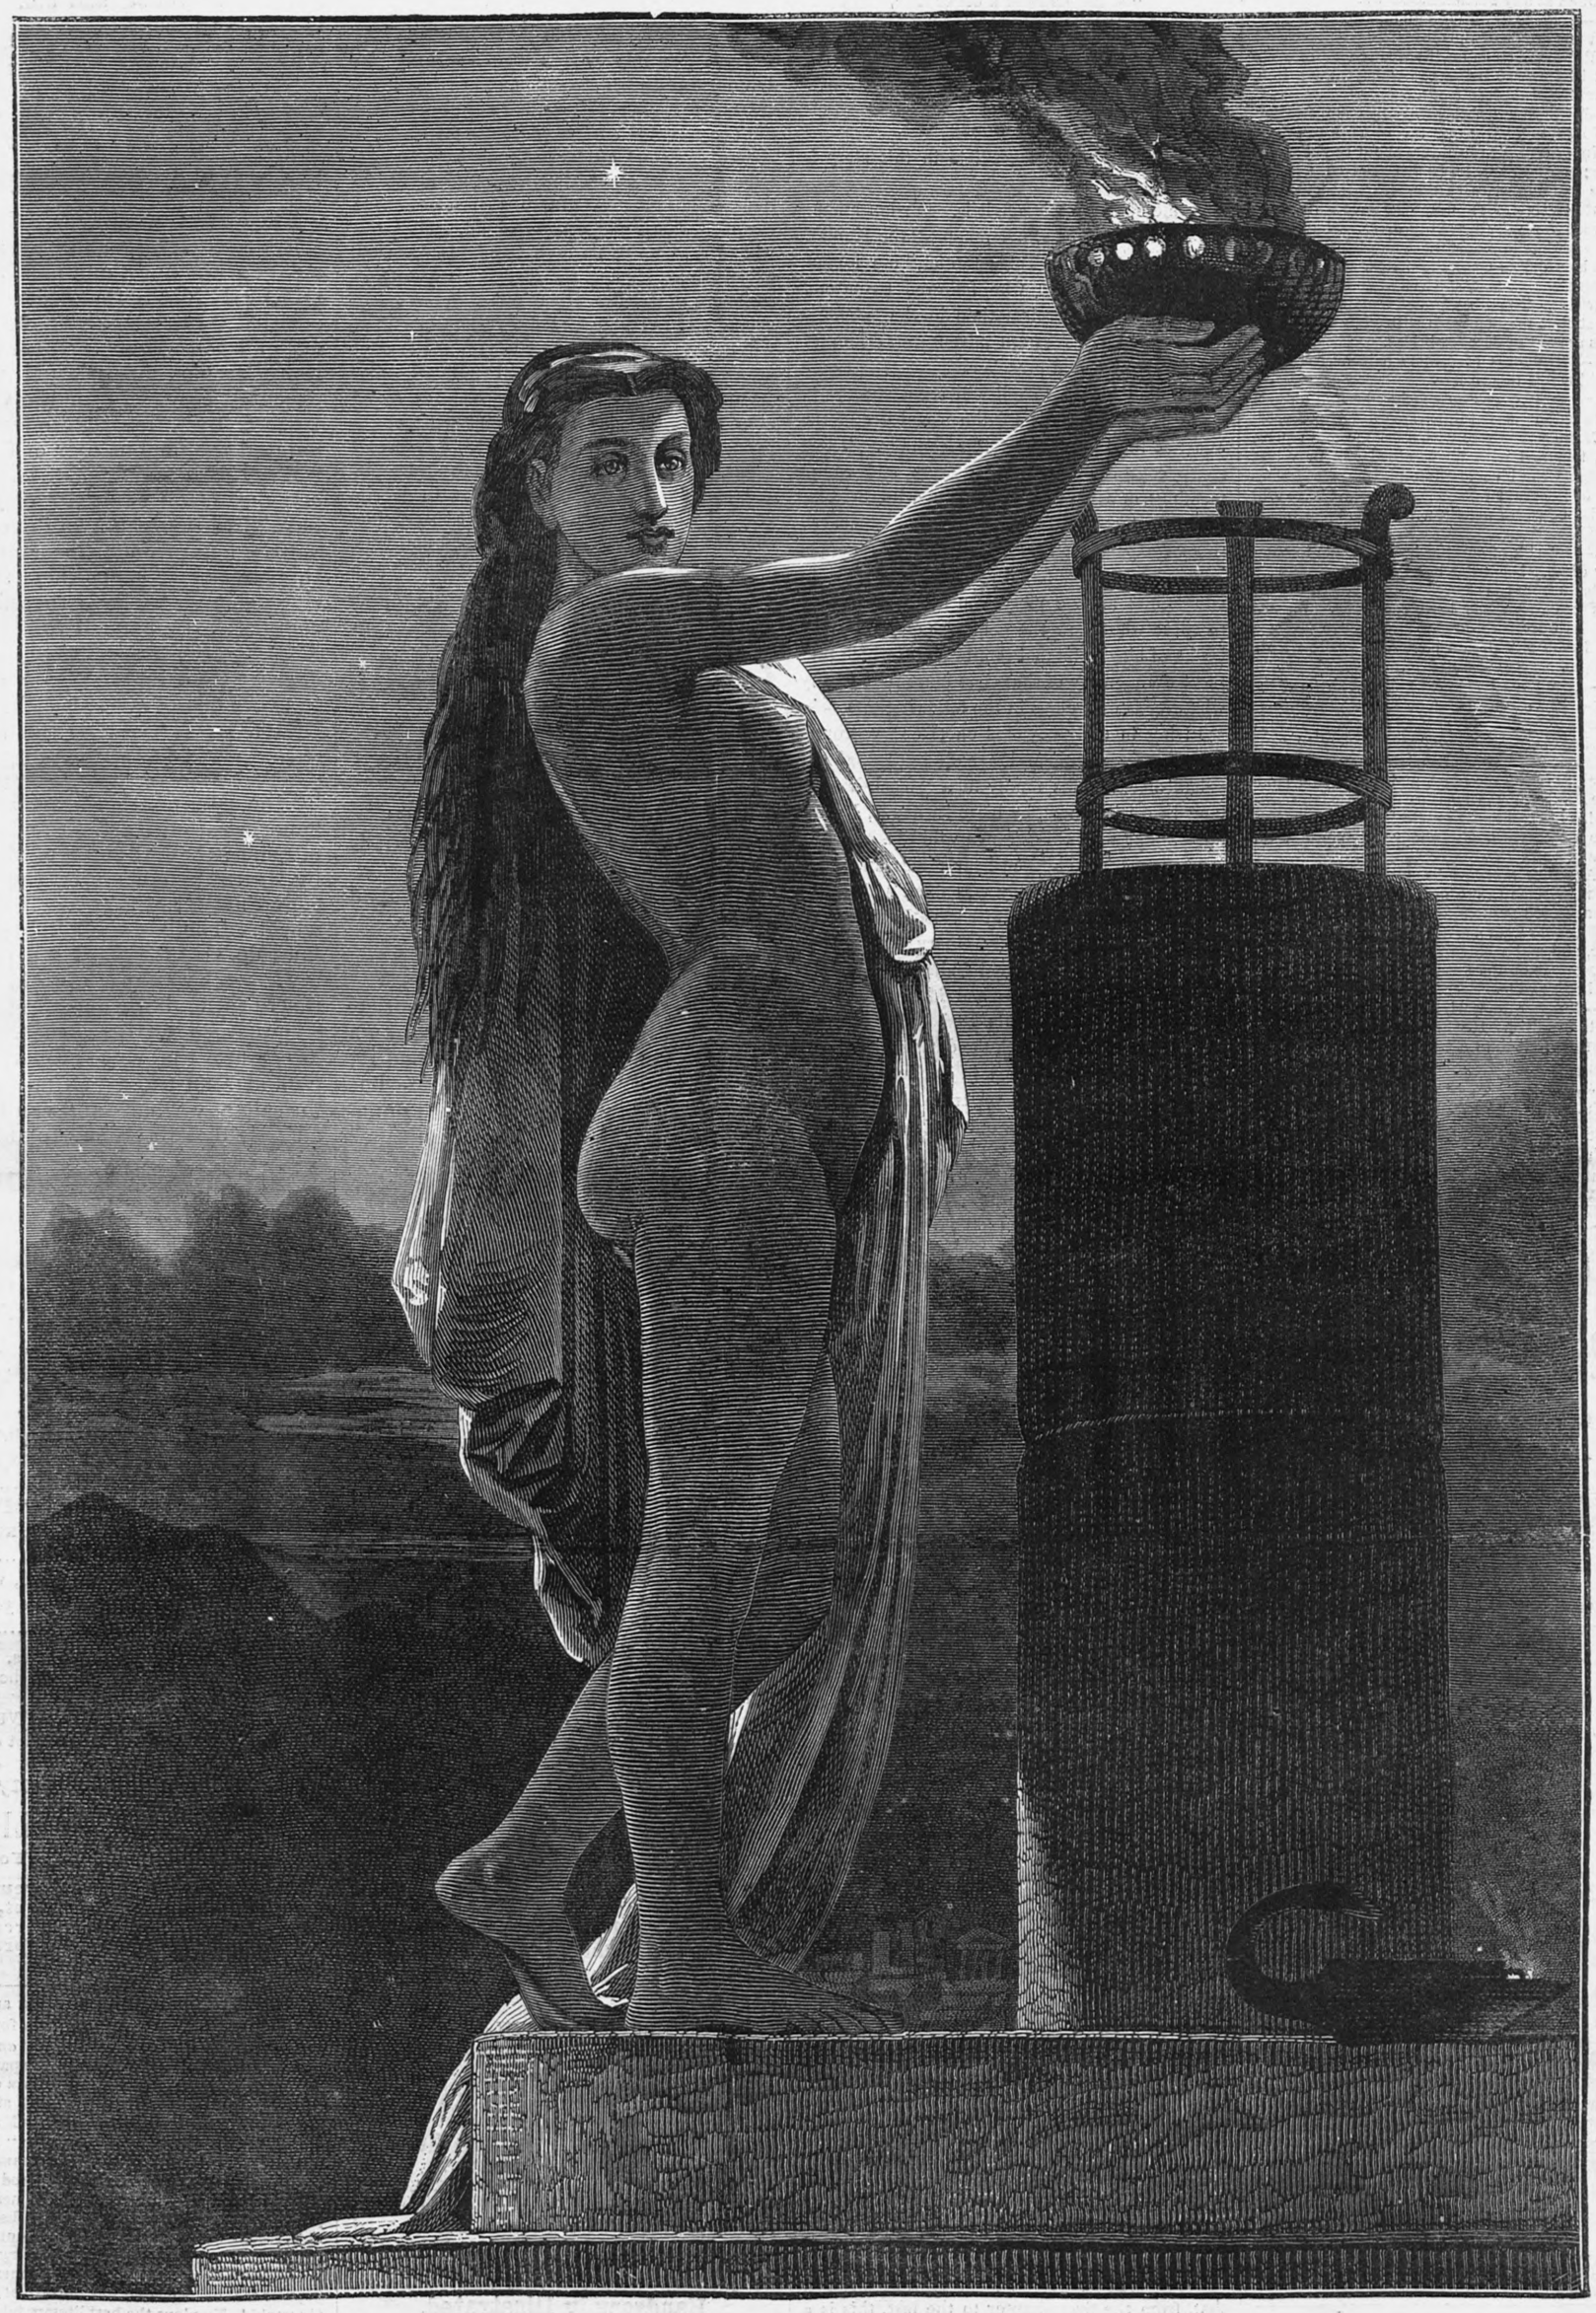
In conclusion, we must mention the place of refuge or sanctuary, in which offenders of any dye, even the deepest, such as murderers, or those guilty of high treason, are perfectly secure, though the locality is a somewhat peculiar one, being no other than the royal stables. Here any criminal may remain indefinitely, being fed the while at the royal expense, until he either secures a pardon or is induced by some other means to desert his haven of refuge. It is not long ago since a Persian noble of the highest rank, who had himself aspired to the throne, escaped to this place, and staid there until pardoned for his offense. Some few of the mosques are endowed with the same privilege, though to a less degree.

DINNER DRESS.

THIS elegant toilette for dinners and receptions is of rosy gray silk, with an under-petticoat of pink silk. The pink front is of puffs and kilt pleats, with gray velvet bands and Valenciennes lace between. The gray skirt is trimmed with velvet, lace, and rosettes down each side, and has two wide, long, flat sashes, edged with velvet and lace. The basque is shorter behind, and finished by a short pink sash. The heart-shaped neck has a velvet revers and pleating lined with pink, and edged on either side with lace. Pink puff, rosette, and lace on the sleeves. Pink rosette and white daisy in the hair. Coral ball ear-rings, and coral balls on a velvet necklace. Feather fan and tinted gloves.

DINNER DRESS.

Digitized by Google



"HERO HOLDING THE BEACON TO LEANDER."—FROM A PAINTING BY EDWARD ARMITAGE, R.A.—[SEE PAGE 748.]

Hosted by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. L. D.—Mohair is not heavy enough for a traveling dress in October. Trim your black silk with jet galloon and fringe. There is no choice between the two wraps—both are worn, but the Dolman is most dressy. The ends of a silk sash are straight. Watered ribbons are more dressy than gros grain.

WRITER.—The Pompadour bustle is the kind alluded to by Madame Raymond. It is very long, with flexible half-circular springs, and is arranged for the back only. It is now found at any French modiste's.

O. E. W.—Crape is never used on alpaca. It should be trimmed with folds of the alpaca.

ALICE.—Put small rings on the wrong side of your dress skirt half a yard below the waist, draw a tape through them, and tie it in front.

SALLIE.—Make your wedding-dress by an illustration in Bazar No. 36, Vol. VI. Consult New York Fashions of Bazar No. 42, Vol. VI., for hints about the blue and black silks; the latter must be trimmed with jet on the basque and tablier, with flounces behind. Sage green is out of fashion. You should have slate-color or dark green for your traveling dress. Make with long square-cornered polonaise. The cashmere wrapper should be a simple Gabrielle belted. The hat for traveling must be of silk, and velvet and feathers to match your suit. The dress bonnet should be blue or black velvet that may be worn with your best suits. White hats are out of date for brides.

ELLA H.—Redingotes of camel's-hair or cashmere will be fashionable this winter.

SPARKLING RUBY.—The only jockey basque pattern we can furnish you is that illustrated in Bazar No. 32, Vol. VI. Make your dress with a basque and square over-skirt, trimmed with black piped silk or velvet bands. Then wear blue or pink pleated silk fraises inside one of the gray or else black silk, and have still a third fraise of white muslin with a lace edge inside the silk ruffs.

M. D. C.—Get silk of another brown shade to complete your dress. Have the basque and over-skirt a different shade from the sleeves and lower skirt.

J. M.—The pattern has been sent you. Pleated waists will be worn for morning and négligé dresses; but a handsome silk poplin should be made with a jockey basque.

HARRY.—Trim your dress with a darker shade of the same color—not with black. A close-fitting polonaise and skirt is the best plan for you, as the polonaise may be worn with other skirts, and give variety to your wardrobe. Put five bias bands of the material or else trimming silk around the skirt, and one on the polonaise. The Demi-Polonaise pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 43, Vol. VI., requires less material than any other, and is also very stylish. It is especially suitable for entire suits of one color.

F. W.—A pretty half-low basque, an apron over-skirt, and many bias ruffles on the lower skirt is the design for a striped grenadine for a young girl's evening dress. Let her wear a belt of pink folded silk with her basque, and add a bow of gros grain ribbon and long flowing ends on the left side; the ribbon is two and a half inches wide.

S. L. G.—Moisten the wart, and touch very carefully with nitrate of silver. It will not injure the eye if it touches nothing but the wart.

TAKE your Dyeing and Cleaning to the New York Dyeing and Printing Establishment, Staten Island, 98 Duane Street, 752 Broadway, and 610 Sixth Avenue, New York, and 166 & 168 Pierrepont Street, Brooklyn.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS

502-504 Broadway,

Offer for the Season their entire Stock of

Ladies' Furs,

including a Very Extensive and Elegant Assortment of

Seal-Skin Furs,

in all Styles and Qualities, at greatly

Reduced Prices.

502-504 Broadway.

DEAFNESS AND CATARRH.—A Lady who had suffered for years from Deafness and Catarrh was cured by a simple Indian Remedy. Her sympathy and gratitude prompt her to send the recipe, free of charge, to any one similarly afflicted. Address MRS. M. CLARA LEGGETT, Jersey City, N. J.

SHOPPING

Of every description for Ladies promptly executed by Mrs. C. G. PARKER, 151 East 44th St., N.Y. City. Send for circular containing reference and particulars (free). Dress-goods samples sent for 25 cents.

PARIS NOVELTIES ☞ JUST RECEIVED.

The Elegant "PANSY" Corset, the GRACEFUL Corset, NEW BUSTLES, Embroidered Underwear, Undressed Kid Gloves, Fine Fans, and Gift Goods.

J. C. DEVIN,
Under Sturtevant House, 1192 Broadway.

THE CIRCUIT RIDER:

A TALE OF THE HEROIC AGE.

BY EDWARD EGGLESTON,

Author of "The Hoosier Schoolmaster," "The End of the World," etc.

"The voice of one crying in the wilderness."
Isaiah.

"— Beginners of a better time,
And glorying in their vows."
Tennyson's "Idyls of the King."

"Nec propter vitam vivendi perdere causas."
Regimental motto: Cromwell's Army.

THE MAN ON HORSEBACK.

WHATEVER is incredible in this story is true.

A tale of the heroic age it is. For not among the Hebrew prophets, nor among "the Knights that sat at Arthur's Table Round," nor among the rugged ironsides who followed Cromwell, was there truer heroism than in the romantic life of the early Western adventurers; hunter, warrior, settler, and preacher.

The tale I have to tell will seem strange to those who know little of the social life of the West at the beginning of this century. These sharp contrasts of corn-shuckings and camp-meetings, of wild revels followed by wild revivals; these contacts of highwayman and preacher; this mélange of picturesque simplicity, grotesque humor, and savage ferocity, of abandoned wickedness and austere piety, can hardly seem real to those who know the country now. But the books of biography and reminiscence which preserve the memory of that time more than justify whatever is marvelous in the following tale.

Living in early boyhood on the very ground where my grandfather—brave old Indian fighter!—had defended his family in a "block-house" built in a wilderness, by his own hands, I grew up, familiar with this strange wild life. At the age when other children hear fables and fairy stories, my childish fancy was filled with traditions of conflicts with wild beasts, Indians, and highwaymen. Instead of imaginary giant-killers, children then heard of real Indian-slayers; instead of Blue-beards, we had Murrell and his robbers; instead of Little Red Riding Hood's wolf, we were regaled with the daring adventures of the generation before us, in conflict with wild beasts, on the very road we traveled to school. In many households the old customs still held sway; the wool was carded, spun, dyed, woven, cut, and made up in the house; the corn-shucking, wood-chopping, quilting, apple-peeling, and country "hoe-down" had not yet fallen into disuse.

In a true picture of this life, neither the Indian nor the hunter is the centre-piece, but the circuit-rider. More than any one else, the early circuit preachers brought order out of this chaos. In no other class was the real heroic element so finely displayed. How do I remember the forms and weather-beaten visages of the old preachers, whose constitutions had conquered starvation and exposure—who had survived swamps, alligators, Indians, highway robbers, and bilious fevers! How was my boyish soul tickled with their funny anecdotes of rude experience—how was my imagination wrought upon by the recital of their hair-breadth escapes! How was my heart set afire by their contagious religious enthusiasm, so that at eighteen years of age I bestrode the saddle-bags myself, and laid upon a feeble frame the heavy burden of emulating their toils! Surely I have a right to celebrate them, since they came so near being the death of me.

It is not possible to write of this heroic race of men without enthusiasm. But nothing has been further from my mind than the glorifying of a sect. If I were capable of sectarian pride, I should not come upon the platform of CHRISTIAN UNION to display it. Much as I have laughed at every sort of grotesquerie, I could not treat the early religious life of the West otherwise than with the most cordial sympathy and admiration. And yet this is not a "religious novel" in the ordinary sense—one in which all the bad people are as bad as they can be, and all the good people a little better than they can be. I have not even asked myself what may be the "moral." The story of any true life is healthful if only the writer will tell it simply, keeping impertinent preachment of his own out of the way.

Doubtless I shall hopelessly damage myself with some good people by confessing in the start that, from the first chapter to the last, this is a love-story. But it is not my fault. It was God who made love so universal that no picture of human life can be complete where love is left out.

The above is Dr. Eggleston's Introduction to his brilliant Serial Story, just commenced in Henry Ward Beecher's weekly family journal, the CHRISTIAN UNION, and will be continued only in that paper. Its opening chapters show the merry side of the period of which it treats, and the reader is soon drawn into deep sympathy with the characters. The scenes are drawn with graphic power and irresistible humor. Back chapters supplied to subscribers up to January 1st.

After this story follows Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe's new tale, "WE AND OUR NEIGHBORS," the long-expected sequel to "My Wife and I." It needs only this simple announcement to give assurance of a great attraction. Thus the CHRISTIAN UNION offers, this coming year, works from the two foremost writers of wholesome fiction in America! The CHRISTIAN UNION contains contributions from eminent writers of all denominations, and has matters of interest for every member of the household, young and old. The paper will be kept up to its high standard of general excellence. Having the largest circulation in the world of its class, it can afford to buy for its columns the very best talent. Moreover, there will be given to each subscriber for the ensuing year a PAIR of new French Oil Chromos, called "OUR BOYS; or, The Dinner and the Nap," after paintings by Mrs. Anderson, artist of the famous pair, "OUR GIRLS; or, Wide Awake and Fast Asleep." Either pair of these choice pictures will be presented to every annual subscriber. Price of subscription, $3 00. Subscriptions should be sent to J. B. Ford & Co., Publishers, 27 Park Place, New York. For particulars concerning the paper, pictures, prices, &c., see next column.

Largest Circulation

IN THE WORLD!

A Paper for all Families.

If there is any one thing that "no family can afford to be without," it is an interesting, comprehensive, trustworthy, unsectarian newspaper. And that is what the Publishers of the herewith bring again to public notice. The effort has been to keep it what an eminent literary journal has called it: "not only the ablest and best, but also, as we suppose, the the most popular, of American religious periodicals." Under

CHRISTIAN UNION

Henry Ward Beecher,

EDITOR,

the paper has won for itself the distinction of having (of its class) the largest circulation in the world. It has strong and independent but courteous Editorials, interesting Contributed Articles on timely topics, critical Book Reviews, attractive Tales, original Poems, editorial answers to "Inquiring Friends," stories and puzzles for Little Folks, information for Housekeepers, fresh Sanitary and Scientific notes. It contains the secular and religious News; has a Sunday-School department; treats of Science, Music, Art, Agriculture, Finance, Trade, and pretty much every thing for pretty much every body. In religious matters, the CHRISTIAN UNION is purely unsectarian, claiming brotherhood with every man who evinces a Christ-like spirit. It seeks the union of good men, not by a compromise of convictions, but by making the spirit of religion more powerful than the letter. It aims to carry light, comfort, good nature, sympathy, Christian love, patience, hopefulness, and a spirit of equity, into every family which it enters.

The CHRISTIAN UNION employs the best literary talent to be found.

SERIAL STORIES

By Distinguished American Authors

will be given this coming year. Edward Eggleston's new and brilliant serial story, "The Circuit Rider: A Tale of the Heroic Age," the opening chapters of which are

Handsomely Illustrated,

is just beginning. An Illustrated Supplement containing back chapters presented free to each subscriber up to Jan. 1st. Mrs. Stowe's long expected sequel to "My Wife and I," entitled "We and our Neighbors," begins in the new year. Here are the two fore most writers of wholesome fiction in America. Other attractive Tales, &c., by favorite authors will be given from time to time. The Best Writers contribute to it.

In a word, the CHRISTIAN UNION is a FAMILY JOURNAL for the entire household—young and old. Nothing is spared to make it

The Best Family Paper Published.

GIVEN AWAY

A PAIR OF OIL PICTURES!!

The PREMIUMS are especially notable this year. Every subscriber receives a PAIR of the finest and most attractive OIL CHROMOS, that "take" on sight, entitled "Our Boys; or, The Dinner and The Nap." These are exact reproductions of original paintings, executed expressly for the CHRISTIAN UNION, by Mrs. S. Anderson, who painted the famous pair of Girl-heads, "Wide Awake and Fast Asleep" (now called "Our Girls," of which we have already given away over 150,000 pair. The wonderful popularity of this latter pair keeps them still in active demand, we have, therefore, made complete arrangement to

Present Either Pair

to every one of our subscribers for the CHRISTIAN UNION this next year.

"Our Boys," and "Our Girls,"

by the same mother-heart and artist-hand, are at once artistic and popularly pleasing; they are chromo-lithographed by JEHENNE, of Paris, the acknowledged master of that art in the whole world. The "Girls" always sold (and do yet) for $10 the pair. The "Boys" would readily bring $12, if sold through the art-stores, being 20 square inches larger, each. But the Boys are the sole property of the CHRISTIAN UNION, will not be offered for sale any where, and can be obtained only by subscribers to this paper.

Price, $3 per Annum.

☞ Three years' experience proves that 999 out of every 1000 subscribers, after much correspondence, order their pictures MOUNTED AND DELIVERED. We shall therefore issue NO UNMOUNTED PICTURES, but make a uniform charge of 50 cents for DELIVERING the Premium Pictures, all MOUNTED, SIZED, AND VARNISHED, ready for immediate framing.

TERMS.

1. EITHER pair delivered, mounted, with the CHRISTIAN UNION for one year..... $3 50
2. EITHER pair delivered in the "POPULAR GILT FRAMES," with CHRISTIAN UNION for one year at..... $4 60
3. BOTH pairs delivered, mounted, with the CHRISTIAN UNION for two years at..... $6 75

Send money by Postal Orders, Check, or Registered Letter. Currency at the risk of the sender.

☞ FIRST COME, FIRST SERVED.

SPECIMEN COPIES mailed free on receipt of 6 cents.

Good Agents Wanted Every Where.

J. B. FORD & CO., PUBLISHERS,

27 Park Place, New York.

☞ State plainly which Premium Picture is desired, or, better yet, send for both. They will be delivered to you, free, either by mail, by express, or by our Agent.

TAKES on sight.—The last and best combination for Canvassers. Agents, and Salesmen!

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S family newspaper starts its fall campaign, giving subscribers a PAIR of the largest and finest OLEOGRAPHS—two most attractive subjects that "take" on sight—painted by Mrs. Anderson, as contrasts and companions for her "Wide Awake" and "Fast Asleep." Agents have immense success; call it the "best business ever offered canvassers." We furnish the lightest and handsomest outfit, and pay very high commissions. Each subscriber, old or new, receives WITHOUT DELAY two beautiful pictures, full supply ready for immediate delivery. The paper itself stands peerless among family journals, being so popular that of its class it has the largest circulation in the world! Employs the best literary talent. Edward Eggleston's serial story is just beginning; back chapters supplied to each subscriber. Mrs. Stowe's long-expected sequel to "My Wife and I" begins in the new year. Any one wishing a good salary or an independent business should send for circulars and terms to J. B. FORD & CO., New York, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, or San Francisco.

AGENTS WANTED.

Hosted by Google

GRANDEST SCHEME EVER KNOWN.

4th Grand Gift Concert

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE

PUBLIC LIBRARY OF KENTUCKY.

12,000 CASH GIFTS, $1,500,000.

$250,000 FOR $50.

The Fourth Grand Gift Concert, authorized by special act of the Legislature, for the benefit of the Public Library of Kentucky, will take place in Public Library Hall, at Louisville, Ky.,

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1873.

Only Sixty thousand tickets will be sold. The tickets are divided into ten coupons or parts.

At this Concert, which will be the grandest musical display ever witnessed in this country, the unprecedented sum of

$1,500,000

divided into 12,000 cash gifts, will be distributed by lot among the ticket-holders.

LIST OF GIFTS.

ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		$250,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		100,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		50,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		25,000
ONE GRAND CASH GIFT		17,500
10 CASH GIFTS	$10,000 each	100,000
30 CASH GIFTS	5,000 each	150,000
50 CASH GIFTS	1,000 each	50,000
80 CASH GIFTS	500 each	40,000
100 CASH GIFTS	400 each	40,000
150 CASH GIFTS	300 each	45,000
250 CASH GIFTS	200 each	50,000
325 CASH GIFTS	100 each	32,500
11,000 CASH GIFTS	50 each	550,000
TOTAL, 12,000 GIFTS, ALL CASH, amounting to		$1,500,000

The distribution will be positive, whether all the tickets are sold or not, and the 12,000 gifts all paid in proportion to the tickets sold.

PRICE OF TICKETS:

Whole tickets, $50; Halves, $25; Tenths, or each coupon, $5; Eleven Whole Tickets for $500; 22⅔ Tickets for $1,000; 113 Whole Tickets for $5,000; 227 Whole Tickets for $10,000. No discount on less than $500 worth of Tickets at a time.

The time for the drawing is near at hand, and persons intending to purchase tickets have no time to loose.

THOS. E. BRAMLETTE,

Agent Public Library Ky., and Manager Gift Concert, Public Library Building, Louisville, Ky.

Or THOS. H. HAYS & CO.,

609 BROADWAY, New York.

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, cor. 4th St., N. Y.

The largest stock of Human Hair goods in the city. Wigs made to order by the best artists. A perfect fit guaranteed. The invisible wig a specialty. No. 1, round the head; No. 2, from forehead to nape of neck; No. 3, from ear to ear across crown; No. 4, from ear to ear across forehead. Goods sent C.O.D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P.O. Order, free of charge.

A. SELIG,

(SUCCESSOR TO S. M. PEYSER),

No. 813 Broadway, New York,

Is daily receiving new importations of rich DRESS TRIMMINGS, such as beaded LACES, GIMPS, FRINGES, BUTTONS, and ORNAMENTS of the latest styles. Also a full assortment of BERLIN ZEPHYRS, Filling, Floss and Embroidery SILKS, CHENILLES, Worsted and Silk EMBROIDERIES of every description, as STRIPS for Chairs, SLIPPERS, Footrests, Towel-racks, Fire and Light SCREENS, LAMBREQUINS and CUSHIONS in GOBLIN and any other style of EMBROIDERY. GUIPURE and POINT LACE work and materials for making the same. Particular attention paid to orders.

Designing and Embroidering of every description done at the lowest possible prices.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS.

ELEGANT IN DESIGN. FAULTLESS IN FIT.

AGENTS WANTED.

SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

Domestic Sewing-Machine Co., N. Y.

THREE PAIR Best 2-Button Kid Gloves, $2 75; single pair sent, postpaid, $1. Also, a well-selected stock of Millinery Goods, Laces, and Dress-Trimmings, together with a choice assortment of

FINE FURS

at less than manufacturers' prices. Send for Price-List of Furs, and all kinds of Millinery Goods and Dress Trimmings. All orders filled with care, and sent C. O. D., with the privilege of examination.

J. TAYLOR'S BAZAR, 353 8th Ave., N. Y. City.

THE PATENT BUCKSKIN Dress Shields will absorb moisture and protect the Dress thoroughly. The Perforated Premium Buckskin Undergarments are recommended by all Physicians. Send for circulars. D. C. HALL & Co., 44 West Broadway, N.Y., Sole Agents and Manufacturers.

MRS. C. C. THOMSON

Continues to purchase upon her usual terms. Send for Circular of References. If samples are wanted, inclose 25c. Mrs. C. C. THOMSON, 39 East 33d St., N. Y.

A. HARAUX'S STAMPING AND Embroidering Establishment is at No. 90 FOURTH AVENUE, a few doors above A. T. Stewart & Co.

MME. BURLETON, 21 Clinton Place, near B'way, Eighth St., West. The latest style of Fall Bonnets and Round Hats: also, Mourning Bonnets.

FRENCH STAMPING MATERIALS, IN ANY quantity. Complete working samples sent free. W. J. CURRIER, Park Hotel, New York City.

$425 A MONTH! Horse and Carriage furnished. Expenses paid. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

REDUCED.

Union Adams & Co.

ARE OFFERING AT VERY LOW PRICES

HOSIERY AND GLOVES,

UNDERWEAR,

Shirts & Collars,

HANDKERCHIEFS,

SUSPENDERS,

ROBES, JACKETS, &c.

637 BROADWAY.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION

A WEEKLY PAPER FOR

YOUNG PEOPLE AND THE FAMILY

THE COMPANION aims to be a favorite in every family—looked for eagerly by the young folks, and read with interest by the older. Its purpose is to interest while it amuses; to be judicious, practical, sensible; and to have really permanent worth, while it attracts for the hour.

It is handsomely illustrated, and has for contributors some of the most attractive writers in the country. Among these are

Edward Eggleston, Dr. I. I. Hayes,
Prof. Jas. DeMille, Louise C. Moulton,
Louisa M. Alcott, "Sophia May,"
Rebecca H. Davis, C. A. Stephens,
C. W. Flanders, Ruth Chesterfield,
S. S. Robbins, M. A. Denison.

Its reading is adapted to the old and young; is very varied in its character; sprightly and entertaining. It gives

Stories of Adventure, Stories of Home and School Life,
Letters of Travel,
Editorials upon Current Topics, Tales, Poetry,
Historical Articles, Selections for Declamation,
Biographical Sketches, Anecdotes, Puzzles,
Religious Articles, Facts & Incidents.

☞ Subscription Price, $1 50. Specimen copies sent free. Address,

Perry Mason & Co.,

41 Temple Place, Boston, Mass.

$20 SAVED!

To meet the urgent demand of the times the FLORENCE SEWING-MACHINE CO. have determined to

REDUCE PRICES,

and will hereafter sell their $65 Machine for $45, and other styles in proportion.

THE FLORENCE

is the ONLY Sewing-Machine that feeds the work backward and forward, or to right and left, as the purchaser may prefer. It has been greatly IMPROVED AND SIMPLIFIED, and is far better than any other machine in the market.

IT IS NOW THE CHEAPEST.

FLORENCE, Mass, Nov. 1, '73. AGENTS WANTED.

For Marking Clothing.

Lottie Lane

A Stencil Plate, like cut, with brush and indelible ink, post-paid, for 50c. Umbrella Plate, with name and address, ready to attach, 35c. Circulars free. J. F. MARSH, S. E. cor. Second and Dock, Phila., Pa.

MADAME A. MICHEL, formerly with MAIE GALOUPEAU, 423 Sixth Avenue, has just returned from Paris with the richest assortment of Bonnets and Round Hats from all the leading houses of Paris and London.

FRENCH STAMPING.—The newly invented Transparent Linen Perforated Patterns, warranted not to tear, are sold only by the NEW YORK EMBROIDERY Co., 697 Broadway, Room 8. Wholesale and Retail Designing, Stamping, Braiding, Embroidering, Pinking, &c. Send stamp for circular.

HAIR!!!

L. SHAW, 364 Bowery, corner Fourth Street,

Branch Store, 345 Sixth Avenue,

Between 21st & 22d Streets, begs leave to call the attention of the ladies to his complete and superb stock of Human Hair Goods for the Fall, comprising all the Latest Styles, manufactured of the best quality of French hair only, without any intermixing whatsoever, of his own importation and manufacture.

The Largest Stock of HUMAN HAIR GOODS in the City.

RETAILED AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

☞ I can offer to the Public inducements which can not be superseded by any of my competitors. All goods WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

PRICE-LIST.

Short Hair Switches.....$1 and upward.
Finest Quality Hair Switches, solid, not dyed,
18 inches long, 4 ounces weight.....$5 00
22 inches long, 4 ounces weight..... 6 00
26 inches long, 4 ounces weight..... 8 00
32 inches long, 4 ounces weight.....10 00

Shaw's Patent Hair Switches, 50c.

Long Single Curls, naturally Curly—
22-inch, $2 00. 24-inch, $2 50. 26-inch, $4 00.
Frisets, 25 cents per yard.
Ladies' own Hair made over in latest styles.
Combings made up 50 cents per ounce.
Goods sent C. O. D. by express, or on receipt of color and money in registered letters or P. O. Order, free of charge.

FALL IMPORTATIONS!!!

Miller & Grant,

No. 879 Broadway,

Are offering Worsted Embroidery in colors. Also, Worsted Fringes and Gimp, to match. Smoked Pearl Buttons and Slides. ☞ The most desirable Articles in Market.

ALUMINOUS AND ORNAMENTAL

BUILDING PAPER

Paper Carpeting and Oil Cloth.

Send for Samples and Price-List.

W. H. H. ROGERS & CO., 2 & 3 College Place, N. Y. F. N. DAVIS & CO., Beloit, Wis.

EVERYBODY LIKES a beautiful complexion, and a soft, smooth skin; both are obtained by using 'Wright's Alconated Glycerine Tablet of Solidified Glycerine,' fragrant, transparent, and incomparable as a Toilet Soap. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Toilet Articles.

Novelties in Laces.

SHAW & EATON, 1105 Broadway,

Three doors above Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Have on exhibition all the LATEST NOVELTIES in Lace Capes, Collarettes, Fichus, Lace Bows, Ties, Scarfs, French Embroidered Breakfast Sets, &c., &c.

Every baby must have it. IS THOROUGHLY WATER-PROOF, protects clothing, retains linen diaper, avoids pins, permits circulation of air. Recommended by physicians and all mothers whose children have worn them. Made in 4 sizes—1, smallest; 4 largest—exclusively by EUREKA DIAPER CO., 539 Broadway, N. Y. Sample mailed on receipt of $1. Sold also by Stewart, Claflin, Lord & Taylor, Arnold & Constable and first-class Infants' Clothing, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA DIAPER; see they bear stamp of EUREKA PATENT DIAPER CO. Take no other. Agents wanted.

Pat. Indispensable Skirt Elevator.

Instantly changing Skirt from Train to Walking, and Walking to Train.

Price 35c. each. Three free by mail for $1. Free by mail, 40c. each. 1 doz. free by mail for $3, with full directions. Call or send to W. H. JOHNSTON, 267 Broadway, N. Y. Agents wanted.

CLARKE'S NEW METHOD PIANO-FORTE.

HAS NEVER BEEN EQUALED.

Teaches practical piano playing and theoretical music thoroughly.

Clarke's New Method for the PIANO-FORTE carries the pupil by easy gradations to the highest practical results.

Sent by Mail, Price $3.75

LEE & WALKER, Philadelphia.

EMBROIDERIES and Lingerie. V. VIGOUROUX, 122 4th Ave., N. Y. Stamping, embroidering lingerie establishment; ladies' and baby's trousseau. Specialty of initial monograms for handkerchiefs, table and bed cloths. Wholesale department, 69 East Twelfth Street. Machine and perforated patterns.

You ask WHY we can sell First Class 7 Octave Pianos for $290? We answer—It costs less than $300 to make any $600 Piano sold through Agents, all of whom make 100 per ct. profit. We have no Agents, but ship direct to families at Factory price, and warrant 5 Years. Send for illustrated circular, in which we refer to over 500 Bankers, Merchants, &c. (some of whom you may know), using our Pianos, in 44 States and Territories. Please state where you saw this notice.

U. S. Piano Co., 810 Broadway, N. Y.

SAMPLES FREE!!—The Saturday Evening Post, 319 Walnut St., Philadelphia, gives a beautiful Chromo or large Steel Engraving to every yearly subscriber! Samples free!

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS, in any quantities. Send for Circular. MME. L. CENDRIER, 636 Broadway, N. Y.

---

12 BEAUTIFUL OIL CHROMOS and a book of forty pages mailed for FIFTY CENTS, by C. S. RILEY, Holland, N. Y.

FRENCH STAMPING PATTERNS.—M'me BADOUREAU & Co., 125 Fourth Ave. Send for circular.

WORKING CLASS Male or Female, $30 a week employment at home, day or evening; no capital; instructions & valuable package of goods sent free by mail. Address, with 6-c. return stamp, M. YOUNG & Co., 173 Greenwich St., N. Y.

YAK LACES.

REAL YAK LACES

at less than the bare duty on the goods.

We have purchased for cash from a panic-stricken importer 3,675 yards of real black Yak Lace at 33⅓c. on the dollar, and will offer them at 25 per cent. less than the goods daily bring in the auction-rooms. Dealers will please take notice that we shall allow no discount on our prices, and will not sell these Yak Laces in quantities exceeding 24 yards.

We have bought them for our own trade.

Real Yak Laces at 18c., same as sold last week at 33c.
Real Yak Laces, fully 1¾ inches wide, at 23c. and 24c., same as sold last week at 47c.
Real Yak Laces, fully 3½ inches wide, at 43c., same as sold last week at 85c.
Real Yak Laces, at 45c., 47c., 55c., 65c., 79c., and 81c.

All guaranteed to be of the very finest quality and choicest designs, and worth more than double our prices.

☞ CALL AND EXAMINE. CALL AND EXAMINE.

BARGAINS

IN REAL GUIPURE LACES,
REAL THREAD LACES,
REAL VALENCIENNES LACES,
REAL POINT AND POINT APPLIQUE LACES.

Black Silk Gimps, Fringes, and Ornaments at unheard of reductions.

SPECIAL INDUCEMENTS

IN BLACK DRESS SILKS,
BLACK ALPACAS,
CLOAK AND TRIMMING VELVETS.

Furs our own Manufacture,

&c., &c., &c.

☞ The "REBECCA" Kid Glove, manufactured expressly for us, in all shades, 2-buttons, at $1 00 pair; three pair for $2 75. A pair of Gloves returned for every pair that rip or tear when first tried on the hand.

Send Stamp for our

96 page FALL CATALOGUE

The most complete Price-List of Millinery, Fancy, and Furnishing Goods ever issued.

☞ Goods shipped C.O.D., to any part of the country, with full power of examination before acceptance. ☜

EHRICH & CO.,

287 & 289 8th AVE., Near 24th ST., New York.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,

BROADWAY, COR. 19TH ST., N. Y.

The largest and best selected stock in the city of STAPLE AND FANCY DRY GOODS, At Greatly Reduced Prices.

SILKS.
DRESS GOODS.
VELVETS.
LACES.
EMBROIDERIES.
INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS.
WOOLEN SHAWLS.
FALL AND WINTER GARMENTS.
MISSES' WORSTED & POPLIN SUITS & SACQUES.
LADIES' CASHMERE & SILK MORNING DRESSES.
SILK AND SATIN QUILTED SKIRTS.
FURS AND FUR TRIMMINGS.
MOURNING DRESS GOODS.
GENTLEMEN'S & YOUTH'S FURNISHING GOODS.
HOSIERY AND UNDERWEAR.
CLOTHS, CASSIMERES, AND COATINGS.
GLOVES AND GAUNTLETS.
WHITE GOODS.
BLANKETS AND FLANNELS.

Broadway, cor. Nineteenth Street, N. Y.

FROM AUCTION.

A GREAT SLAUGHTER!

MERINOS,	BLACK CASHMERES,
EMPRESS CLOTH,	BOMBAZINES,
HENRIETTA CLOTH,	TAMISE CLOTH,
BLACK SILKS,	ROYAL SERGE,
ALPACAS,	SHAWLS, &c., &c.

One Case 5-4 PRINCESS CLOTH, 50c., WORTH 80c.

EVERY THING IN PROPORTION.

JACKSON'S,

BROADWAY & WAVERLEY PLACE.

CURL YOUR HAIR.—A new Scientific Discovery. It can be done in 5 minutes. Particulars free. Address SOUTHWESTERN AGENCY, Carthage, Mo.

$5 to $20 per day! Agents wanted! All classes of working people, of either sex, young or old, make more money at work for us in their spare moments, or all the time, than at anything else. Particulars free. Address G. Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

$10 to $20 per day. Agents wanted every where. Particulars free. A. H. BLAIR & CO., St. Louis, Mo.

MONEY MADE RAPIDLY with Stencil and Key Check Outfits. Catalogues, samples, and full particulars FREE. S. M. SPENCER, Boston, Mass.

$475 A MONTH and expenses to good Canvassers. Articles new and staple as flour. Samples free. C. M. LININGTON, Chicago.

$375 A MONTH to Male or Female Agents. NOVELTY COMPANY, Biddeford, Me.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

One copy of either will be sent for one year, POSTAGE PREPAID, to any Subscriber in the United States, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00; postage payable by the Subscriber at the office where received.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY AND HARPER'S BAZAR.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $2 00 per Line; Outside Page, $4 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

KNABE

Grand, Square, & Upright Pianos,

New York House, No. 112 5th Ave.

WM. KNABE & CO., Baltimore and New York.

Hosted by Google

FACETIÆ.

A LADY who, on the death of her first husband, married his brother, has a portrait of the former hanging in her dining-room. One day a visitor, remarking the painting, asked, "Is that a member of your family?" "Oh, that's my poor brother-in-law," was the ingenious reply.

"IN THE LONG-RUN."

TOWN GENT. "Now do you find keeping poultry answers?"

COUNTRY GENT (lately retired). "Oh yes, s'posed to answer. You see, there's the original cost of the fowls. Of course the food goes down to me, you know. Well, then I purchase the eggs from the children; and they eat them."

"POOTY MANNERS."

MOTHER. "General, let me introduce my little boy, who has often heard of you from my dear husband, and longs to know you."

SON. "My mother speaks no more than the truth, general! I can assure you it affords me the highest possible gratification to make the acquaintance of so esteemed a friend of my excellent father!"

"Nothing in the world beats a good wife," said Jones, the newly married. "Yes," answered Smith, the long married, "a bad husband does."

"Professor, will you have a cigar?" said a man in the office of a Boston hotel; and nineteen men stood up and replied, "Thank ye—don't care if I do."

ALL ABROAD.

Mrs. Malaprop has a nephew who is a great traveler, and is now at Rome. His aunt informs us that when last she heard from him he was shooting in the Tontine Marshes.

BRIGHAM. "Next!"

AN "EXPERT" NURSE.

COACHMAN. "Get the Carriage ready for you! Did the Mistress say so?"

NURSE. "I want you to understand that when the Baby needs a ride in the Park, I am the responsible one! I'm not employed to take Advice from the Mistress."

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.—Is kissing a pretty girl a capital offense?

It is said that Barnum has several sick bears and toothless lions trained to escape from their keepers, and roam at large for advertising purposes. The wild beasts return to the menagerie fold in season for dinner daily.

A TABLE OF INTEREST—The dinner-table.

Once a careless man went to the cellar, and stuck the candle into what he thought was a keg of black sand. He sat near it drinking wine until the candle burned low. Nearer and nearer it got to the black sand, nearer and nearer, until the blaze reached the black sand, and as it was sand, nothing happened.

The witches of Macbeth could not have been experienced real-estate dealers, or they never would have acknowledged a deed without a name.

Darwin says that infants do not know how to weep until they are several days old. We do not know whether he can prove the statement or not; but there are a good many happy fathers who will give him all they possess in the world if he will prove that infants do not know how to howl.

THAT BONNET.

SUBMISSIVELY DEDICATED TO ITS WEARER'S MILLINER.

Going along the other day
I saw—how ever could she don it?—
A woman only five feet four,
And one foot six of that was—bonnet!

Her head had been a tidy head
But for the big chignon upon it;
Yet all was foiled, disfigured, spoiled,
And swamped by said chignon and—bonnet.

On Sunday last she went to church,
And took her book, as if to con it;
But all the time that she was there
She thought of little save her—bonnet.

The parson took a winning text,
And tried to fix attention on it;
But all in vain, for naught she cared,
Except "the end of all"—the bonnet!

Yet stay! there is just one thing more
I must include in this sad sonnet:
She sometimes thought of women there
Who envied her her mortal bonnet.

The luckless sermon, psalm, and prayer
All went for nothing—out upon it!—
For every other woman there
Was lost in hatred of—"that bonnet!"

That morn her husband was non est—
His shirt neck had no button on it;
For him she had no time to spare,
Intent alone upon her—bonnet.

Now mark me well, whom it concerns,
And think ye humanly upon it:
How could ye make her such a "guy,"
By recommending such a bonnet?

It is suggested that the immense door-plates worn by the ladies on their belts might be utilized by engraving thereon the wearer's name, age, residence, fortune or expectation, and stating whether heart is free or engaged.

THE LARGEST GROUND-RENT ON RECORD—The earthquake.

"Press on, young man, though you be poor." We knew a youth who with only his two hands and a crow-bar opened a jewelry store, and now he is living in a fine stone residence in Sing Sing.

The proprietor of a young ladies' academy in Illinois has utterly ruined his business by causing to be inserted in a large number of papers a picture of the building with two girls standing on the balcony with last year's hats on their heads.

A charitable Cincinnati man keeps a pair of dogs chained at his front-door, so that poor people who "stop to get a bite" can be accommodated without taking the trouble to go into the house.

PAT. "Arrah, luk in me Eyes, and behold the Gurrel I love."

FRANÇOIS. "If you r-r-refuse me, I shall blow out mine Feet out at your Brains, aha!"

HANS. "If you marry me, you can have dem Music oël de times."

JONATHAN. "Naow, look-a-here, Jerush, let's Speculate on this 'ere matter."

PROPOSALS FOR ALL NATIONS.

VOICES OF THE NIGHT.—THE SERENADE.—MIDNIGHT.

SERVANT. "Mrs. De Mortimer says that that last Air was beautiful, only a little too fast, and wants to know if you will Tone down the Brass Horn a little, and let them play it again."

MANRICO. "Yes, certainly; but is Miss—Miss De Mortimer awake—the young lady, you know?"

SERVANT. "Oh, she is not at Home; been away more'n a week."

A PERPLEXING PREDICAMENT.

MINNIE. "I'm in such a Quandary, love. If I turn my Back on Charley, he becomes offended at once; and if I don't, he can't see my new Buckles. What shall I do?"

Hosted by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. VI.—No. 48.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1873. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1873, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

DOLMAN DEMI-TRAINED SUIT.—FRONT AND BACK.—WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD, 839 BROADWAY, N. Y.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

[Cut Paper Patterns of the Dolman Demi-trained Suit, in nine Sizes, even Numbers, from 30 to 46 Inches Bust Measure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents.]

Hosted by Google

QUEEN CATHERINE'S ROSE.

BY ELIZABETH AKERS ALLEN.

IN a Russian meadow a wild rose fair
Bloomed sweet in the olden days,
And proud Queen Catherine, passing there,
Beheld, admiring its beauty rare,
And crowned it with royal praise.

"This rose is worthy," she, smiling, said,
"To bloom in our garden bowers;
And hence transferred to a nobler bed,
Its boughs shall flourish, its blossoms spread,
In the shade of our palace towers."

She posted a soldier to guard its bloom,
And shield it from chance of harm:
So, in its circle of sweet perfume,
The sentinel waited, in light and gloom,
With musket across his arm.

The brief bright summer went swiftly by,
And the autumn reached its close,
Then winter frowned from the sullen sky;
But the guard still tended patiently
The Queen's forgotten rose.

And when the sentinel's term was done,
Another assumed his place,
And up and down, like the former one,
He walked his beat, in the rain and sun,
With steady and measured pace.

And the shrub grew old as the swift years sped,
And flower and leaf were gone;
But though its beauty and life were fled,
No royal edict pronounced it dead,
And the sentinel still paced on.

The dry stalk, mouldering in its place,
Went back to its native mould,
And fed the grasses, and left no trace;
But still the sentry, with tireless pace,
Kept watch as in days of old.

Time passed, and the Queen's proud heart grew chill,
And she slept with her royal line;
But yet, obeying her regal will,
The silent sentinel guarded still
The long-dead rose's shrine.

And seasons vanished, and men forgot
The tale of the guarded rose,
Yet still did the soldier watch the spot—
Vain vigil!—though rose and Queen were not,
And none could the truth disclose.

A hundred summers, with breathings sweet,
And a hundred winters' snows
Have passed; yet, slowly along his beat
The sentry, pacing in sun or sleet,
Still guards the ghost of the rose.

Dolman Demi-trained Suit.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

See illustration on first page.

THIS handsome suit is copied from an elegant Paris model furnished us by the courtesy of Messrs. Arnold, Constable, & Co. The stylish Dolman, which this season shares the popular favor with the English walking jacket as an independent wrap, is of black diagonal cloth, edged with black marten fur. The dress is of maroon silk, trimmed with flounces of the material and wide strips of maroon cut velvet, on which are set black marten fur bands. The long over-skirt is trimmed with a flounce, velvet, and a band of fur, to match the skirt.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit comprises three articles—Dolman, over-skirt, and demi-trained skirt.

DOLMAN.—This pattern is in three pieces—front, back, and sleeve. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes in putting together. A quarter of an inch seam is allowed on all the parts. This garment is fitted to the figure in the back by a seam in the middle, and on the shoulders by short seams. It is adjusted at the waist by an elastic about seven inches long, fastened at the single holes each side of the sleeve on the under side, and holding the sleeve in place. The front of the Dolman is rounded up to the point where the sleeve is sewed in to allow the free use of the arms. The sleeves are large, and square on the bottom. Close the seam on the shoulders, then place the notch on the top part of the sleeve to the shoulder seam, and hold the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. The elastic across the under part of the sleeve forms the large armhole. The middle seam in the back is left open to the notch below the waist. The notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back for the hem in front. Be very particular to put the pattern together by the notches.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 4 yards.
Fur for trimming, 7½ yards.

OVER-SKIRT.—This pattern is in one piece. Cut two pieces like the pattern given. Join the seam in the middle of the back down to the notch. Cut two tapes thirteen inches long, sew one end of each on the belt about three inches each side of the middle, and tack the lower end on the single hole nearest the bottom of the skirt. Place the hole nearest the top on the tape about four inches from the lower end of the tape, forming the double fold. Gather the top of the two breadths the width of your back from the under-arm seams, and sew to the belt. A band of velvet, about three inches wide, trims the front edge of the skirt; the lower edge is finished with a ruffle of the material headed with fur. A quarter of an inch seam is allowed in this pattern.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 3 yards.
Velvet for band, 2 yards.
Fur for trimming, 4 yards.

DEMI-TRAINED SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, two side gores, and back breadth. Cut the front and back with the longest straight edges laid on the fold of the goods to avoid seams. Cut two pieces each of the patterns given for the side gores. The notches at the top of the two side gores show where to lay the side pleat, which turns toward the back. Gather the back breadth, and sew to the belt. A quarter of an inch is allowed for seams. Put the pattern together by the notches, and pay no attention to the grain of the paper.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 9 yards.
Fur for two rows of trimming, 7 yards.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, or HARPER'S BAZAR will be sent for one year to any Subscriber in the United States, POSTAGE PREPAID, on receipt of Four Dollars by the Publishers.

☞ A Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains more reading matter than an average octavo volume. The most popular authors of England and America write constantly for the WEEKLY; and as a journal of choice reading, combined with pictorial embellishments of the very highest order, it leaves every competitor in the distance.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1873.

"GOLDEN GRAIN."

In HARPER'S WEEKLY for November 29 will be commenced an intensely interesting CHRISTMAS STORY, under the above title, by B. L. FARJEON, author of "Blade-o'-Grass, "Bread-and-Cheese and Kisses," "Joshua Marvel," and other popular tales. Those whose sympathies were so warmly stirred by the sorrows and sufferings of that poor waif of society, Blade-o'-Grass, will be glad to learn that she bears a prominent part in the present story. "GOLDEN GRAIN" is profusely and beautifully illustrated, and will unquestionably prove one of the most acceptable contributions to the holiday literature of the year.

☞ With the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for November 22 was sent out gratuitously an illustrated

EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT,

containing another installment of "PHINEAS REDUX," and a rich variety of other interesting reading.

Another illustrated EIGHT-PAGE SUPPLEMENT will be sent out gratuitously with the Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY for November 29.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the Dolman Demi-trained Suit, illustrated on the first page of the present Number, are now ready, and will be sent by the Publishers, prepaid, by Mail, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement on page 767.

☞ Our next Number will contain an extra-sized Pattern Sheet, with numerous full-sized patterns, illustrations, and descriptions of Ladies' House and Street Dresses; Children's Suits; Girls' Water-proof Cloaks; Ladies' and Children's Knitted and Crochet Hoods, Shawls, etc.; Ladies' Under-Vests; Rugs; Embroidery Patterns, etc., etc.; with choice literary and pictorial attractions.

THE VARYING MODES.

THE word fashionable is one that has undergone a great change from its original meaning, and has come to signify almost entirely that to which its adapters have applied it. In its first form it intended by no means to express peculiar conformance with the varying modes of dress, nor had it any more to do with dress than with dwellings, or with manners and habits. It seems to have had reference in the beginning simply to the fit and becoming fashion in which superior people lived, and to be fashionable was to be merely all that one ought to be—well made, well behaved, well housed and clothed and fed and served. Later it was naturally applied to the excellences of the aristocracy, and presently it was borrowed by the French, who had no word exactly corresponding to it. From them we have received it again, and with so French a comprehension of its meaning that it has become to many well-intentioned people a windmill against which they are always running a tilt. But why such a contest as that against the windmill should be continually kept up is something not easy to understand. Surely there must have been fashions, as we now call them, as soon as the first wild beast skin wore out, for the natural and praiseworthy love of change inherent in the race would have formed the next one on a slightly different plan, if not with improvements, and it would seem to be useless to fight forever against a natural instinct.

We do not at all declare, of course, that in the perpetual round of the modes each new one is more desirable than the last, but we contend that the round is inevitable till some radical alteration of the human constitution takes place, that one change is frequently the consequence of the other, that a subtle philosophy runs through them all, and that in feeling our way among them we come upon those really fine and valuable features of dress which we have, and which, once obtained, are not to be relinquished.

One would suppose, to listen to these cavilers, that fineries and fripperies were a thing of to-day, and deserving of reprobation with most of the other things of to-day. We wonder that they never take to heart ISAIAH'S description of the decoration of the daughters of Zion—"their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires like the moon, the chains, and the bracelets, and the mufflers, the bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the head-bands, and the tablets, and the ear-rings, the rings, and nose jewels, the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crisping-pins, the glasses, and the fine linen, and the hoods, and the veils." How many centuries ago was that! And yet it reads much like the description some puritanical critic might give of the modern lady's paraphernalia, even to the crisping-pin. It has taken, we see, all these years to abolish the tinkling ornaments about their feet and the nose jewels alone; but they are abolished, and in all the rest that has been retained there is doubtless some show of reason, or it would have followed the fate of the nose jewels, or else it will follow them; for we have that optimist trust in the wise government of the world to believe that we shall certainly come out upon the right dress at last, and to believe, moreover, that as it is not likely to be miraculously revealed, we can come out upon it only through all these successive changes and choosings.

The modes, it is to be admitted, changed more slowly in the old days. Now we have hundreds of fabrics to one in the elder periods. The world ran in slow currents then; now its movement is as swift as electricity and steam and machinery can make it, and of course the modes of dress move with their opportunities. In those old days, with less chance for display, with simpler materials, with more unquiet times, there was little stimulus to change. Sometimes the conquest of a new people brought in new methods, sometimes the discovery of another fabric. The Coan gauzes must have caused a revolution in summer apparel, and the accessibility of silk suggested countless ideas impossible under the régime of the linen and woolen stuffs of previous wear. The Hebrew women, who went from the nomadic life of tents to the Egyptian cities, must have carried away with them many a custom of the people whom they left behind when they again took up their march; and the Greeks, we know, brought eagerly adopted novelties to Rome. Yet in choosing from the customs of others it seems to have been a rule, with but few exceptions, to choose only those which agree with the climate and are not hostile to the national temperament of those who are at liberty to make the choice. The English, for instance, would never adopt the East Indian head-gear, since their sun forbids it; and though they seize the Oriental shawl, they reject the Oriental trowser.

The modes, indeed, have changed slowly, but that they have changed, and that significantly, is to be seen in the fact that the ancient flowing robes, the dress of the harem, the dress of the life when barbaric rudeness without and barbaric restraint within made the wives of princes as much slaves as the women who carded their wool for them, has been abandoned for to-day's dress of comparative freedom. Gropings after this lighter and freer dress we see in the sleeve and corset, in the steel and buckram, of the mediæval costume. Use of the term freedom in connection with that fearful structure seems at first glance to be an impossible absurdity, but such was its ultimate purpose. It was an attempt to adapt the dress to the figure, and that it should have completely succeeded at first was not to be expected. Nobody knows what gibes the brutal barons threw at their dames on the first sight of these hideous styles, though doubtless their introduction was by gradual degrees; but we may be sure that if they thought their superiors wore them, they would not have suffered their wives to lag behind. Nor would the court of Britain be outdone by France; and France, we know, has always been the mother of ideas, at least in this direction. But out of this attempt has proceeded all that is of most importance in dress in our own day. Artistic sense has shaped it into beauty, and an increasing intelligence has modified it into practical use. Indeed, this very corset, which is so much an object of malediction, and abused, as it certainly has been, was one of our earliest benefactors in this line. Doubtless its first appropriators lay awake nights with the startling effect upon the nerves occasioned by the contemplation of such a daring innovation. They had seen the armor of the knights fitting closely to the contour of the form, the rings and plates falling into place till all the beauty and strength of the figure found full play, and it had occurred to them that the advantages in freedom and comeliness of such dress were worth having. Something of the sort there had previously been in a mild way. Under all their draperies the Roman women wore long, many-folded bandages, sustaining and compressing the figure, and probably the Grecian cestus was not always a mere narrow girdle. But the effect of this steel and buckram arrangement was in open sight, and must have aroused a whirlwind of contumely at first as a downright encroachment upon masculine array; and the wearing of it was probably considered as bold an immodesty as the wearing of "plain waists" was considered not thirty years ago, and as unblushing an effrontery as the appropriation of paletots and jackets and outside pockets and big buttons and jockey hats was pronounced to be but yesterday. It was, to be sure, an atrocious thing at first, little better than an iron cage, but it had a great endeavor in it, as its final success has proved; for, bad as it was, it was our emancipator, and unquestionably we owe to it to-day our release from the enslaving and weakening draperies of past eras, our health, our liberty to walk the streets alone, and some of our ability to defend ourselves. If this statement seems extravagant, we need but a moment's thought to convince us how much change has resulted from this single cause. Now when the day of tight-lacing is over, when sculptors and painters have succeeded in teaching us the absolute lines of unalterable beauty in the female form, forever forbidding the wasp-like waist, the corset has become a comfortable garment, allowing every muscle liberty, relieving the shoulders of the weight of flowing ells of cloth, displaying the figure in the proportions in which God made it, suffering abuse from none but fools; and if not perfection itself, it is probably paving the way for more thorough simplicity and freedom yet.

In fact, it is evident that the modes must change till out of all their multitude we attain at last the complete and suitable dress. And even when that is attained, it must be varied for the various seasons and weathers, while then the style of its ornamentation will have to be occasionally renewed to prevent mere weariness of the flesh; for the pride of the eyes—that is, the love of color, outline, beauty—is something that we can not imagine ourselves dispensing with, even in the beatific state of angelhood itself!

OUR FACES.

WE may pretend that it is otherwise, but we are all interested in our own faces; and yet we treat them as badly as we do many other things in which we are deeply but ignorantly interested. The countenances of a nation define the characteristics of its people. Every human face indicates the moral training as well as the temperament and the ruling traits of its owner, just as much as every human form indicates the quality and amount of its physical exercise. This is proved by the varieties of human faces every where visible. Those whose whole lives have been given to physical labor, unbrightened by an education of ideas, have always a stolid, stupid expression, even while their limbs and muscles are splendidly developed. The more savage a people, the uglier they are in facial development. The very features of their faces are disfigured by violent and ungoverned passions. People whose employments are intellectual invariably have a large, clear gaze, a bright, out-raying expression, as if from inward light shining through a vase. Where a fine organization and deep sensibility accompany the practice of intellectual pursuits, often the features take on a transparent, luminous look. Persons endowed with powerful sensibility, however plain their features, always have moments of absolute beauty. "My sister-in-law is plain," said one lady of another, who possessed such a countenance, "but I have seen her so absolutely beautiful at times that she drew every body in the room toward her. When she is very happy, her face kindles with an absolute radiance." The refining effects of high culture, added to deep religious feelings, not only subdue evil passions, but beautify and elevate the entire expression and bearing of an individual. Thus it is a physical as well as moral fact that it is in the power of every person to improve his own beauty as well as bearing by a constant control of passion and temper, and a deep and constant cultivation of the intellectual faculties, pure affections, and the moral nature.

Hosted by Google

It is a physical as well as spiritual fact that the concentration of desire upon one object of thought, upon a single subject, shows itself in some feature of the face as distinctly as it stamps its effect upon the character. This is why we see so many distorted and almost deformed faces, so few symmetrical and spiritually beautiful ones. Comparatively few have the desire, and fewer still have the leisure, to cultivate that harmony of thought and temper which is sure to shine forth from within, and harmonize every feature. Work and struggle, care and fret, bustle, hurry, and wearing-out ambition, make the law of average American life. It all shows in our poor faces—in our sharp, eager, restless, weary, unhappy faces. Look about you on a ferry-boat crossing the river near the standard dinner hour. It is more than the want of dinner that gives that hungry look to eleven out of every twelve mortals that you see homeward-bound. It is the consuming care, the ever-repeated, never-ending daily care; it is the struggle to live, the curse of the want of money, and the curse of ever-craving, unsatisfied wants—physical, affectional, spiritual—which have seamed and scarred those faces, and made those sunken eye-sockets the craters of burned-out fires. Don't say, "Never mind about the face!" We all mind about our faces, and we mind very much about the faces that we see. It may be too late to make our own very beautiful, though never too late to beautify them; but it is not too late to serve the next generation through the souls and faces of our children.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

DOLMAN DEMI-TRAINED SUIT.

SINCE the introduction of fur sacques, cloaks of cloth and similar fabrics have been very little worn; besides, all large wraps have been considered incongruous with the short walking suits; hence there has been little novelty and variety in such garments. There is, however, always a desire for some dressy over-garment of velvet, cashmere, or cloth, to complete midwinter costumes, and at the present moment this want is met in the ample and simple-shaped Dolman, which is at once a comfortable and stylish cloak. An illustration on our first page represents a gracefully shaped Dolman, of which a cut paper pattern is published. This model has popularized the Dolman, as its simple shape obviates all the old objections to this wrap; it does not draw across the back, fits well on the tournure, and is easily put on, requiring as little adjustment as the plainest circular cloak. The back is a loose sacque shape, with a seam down the middle, left open below the waist, and without the troublesome postilion pleats formerly used. The ample side pieces are warm, and, to be stylish, must be very long, and square-cornered below, while their upper part is set in just above the point of the shoulder to give a short shoulder seam. The fronts fall well below the waist, like the round points of a mantilla, and may be fastened, at the throat only, by a silver clasp, as in the illustration, or, if preferred, can be buttoned their entire length. To hold the winged side pieces in proper shape, making them form the Dolman sleeve, an elastic band or tape is sewed to each front seam, passed under the arm, and tacked to the back seam of the wing; this adjusts the cloak properly, making the back hang loosely, and merely outlining the figure. This graceful effect would be spoiled by putting a belt underneath to confine the back to the waist, as was formerly done.

The Dolman from which our illustration is taken is of black diagonal cloth, with the twill conspicuously wide in the present fashion, and is bordered with black marten (Alaska sable) fur. A band of passementerie in which jet is introduced is sewed on each seam. The lining is of thin black silk slightly wadded. In selecting materials for this cloak avoid all stiff unyielding cloths, such as the beavers and tricots used for jackets, choosing instead soft pliable cloths in the new diagonal, armure, or basket-woven designs. Such cloths cost $6 50 or $7 a yard. The band of fur is the most appropriate trimming, but there are also less expensive garnitures of yak braid and heavy fringes. For velvet Dolmans choose Lyons velvet three-quarters of a yard wide, and trim with a band of silver-fox or else fisher-tail fur, or, for more dressy cloaks, use wide jet galloon and lace, with a fringe entirely of jet underneath the lace. Camel's-hair and cashmere Dolmans of black or of dark colors are especially useful, because, though exceedingly warm-looking for midwinter, their flannel linings may be removed, and they will serve for the demi-seasons also; for this reason they are not usually trimmed with fur, but are braided elaborately, sometimes all over the garment, and again merely in set figures or a border, and are edged with thick fringe of curled or crimped tape. The fashion of making the wrap of the suit material is now seldom followed, except for those wearing mourning. It is far better economy to have an independent wrap of the Dolman shape made of black or some dark neutral color that will serve with all dresses. Gray and brown cashmere Dolmans, braided all over with silk soutache, or else with rough woolen braid of the same shade, are worn with black dresses, and are especially popular with stylish young ladies. For opera wraps, and as sorties du bal, the Dolman is made of white cashmere, or else of some pale tint, such as pearl, sky blue, or pink, and is embroidered or braided with white, and also ornamented with "white jet" beads; a border of white-fox fur and fringe edges the garment.

Short suits and demi-train carriage costumes are both worn with Dolmans. That shown in the illustration is of maroon-colored silk, trimmed with velvet of the same shade, bands of fur, and pleated ruffles of silk. The three front breadths have a flat tablier, while the back has a long over-skirt, tastefully draped, and open below the drapery. This over-skirt is not made separate from the lower skirt, but is gathered to the same belt, and the lower parts are tacked to the demi-train to keep them in position. A basque of any simple stylish shape completes the dress.

FUR BORDERS.

Fur trimmings are exceedingly popular this winter, and, as they are very expensive, it is fortunate that a narrow border of two and a half or three inches is considered more stylish than wider ones. The fine dark fisher-tail borders that resemble Russian sable are especially elegant for trimming velvet Dolmans. A band of this fur an inch wide on the pelt spreads out its long fleece to two inches and a half on the right side, and costs $12 a yard. The beautiful silver-fox fur of silvery hue, with white tips, is another favorite trimming for velvet, and costs from $10 to $15 a yard. The pretty gray chinchilla borders are in greater favor this year than they have been of late, and cost from $6 to $8 a yard; fine Arica chinchilla is even more costly. The most popular dark fur for trimming cloth, cashmere, and, indeed, velvet cloaks, is the inexpensive black marten, which is sold in the stylish trimming width, in its various qualities, for from $2 to $4 a yard. The white-fox fur, used on evening Dolmans and for trimming children's cloaks, costs from $1 50 to $2 50. Otter, seal, and beaver borders are also worn. The pretty bands of grayish white grebe are $6 a yard.

GENTLEMEN'S FASHIONS.

There is no change in the full-dress suits worn by gentlemen at evening receptions, dinners, and the opera. The swallow-tail coat, low vest, and pantaloons are made from the same piece of fine black cloth. The narrow folded neck-tie is of white muslin, or perhaps of silk, and the ample shirt front is of doubled linen very lightly embroidered, or else merely corded on the edges. Fanciful pleats, tucks, hem-stitching, and elaborate needle-worked bosoms are not worn. The standing English collar and the turned-over collar are both worn.

The suit for general use when making calls, at church, at home, the theatre, and for promenading, is a double-breasted Prince Albert frock-coat of fancy check and line goods, or else of plain blue or black cloths. The vest is of the same material. The pantaloons are light gray or lavender. Coat sleeves are cut very full. Pantaloons are worn larger in the limbs. White fustian double-breasted vests are also worn with walking suits.

For business and traveling suits the entire suit is made of English materials of plaid or checks of very dark colors. The coat is either a double-breasted reefing sack or else the Newmarket double-breasted coat, made with flaps at the waist and pockets. An extra pair of gray pantaloons makes variety with these suits.

Overcoats are in various shapes. The fine fur beavers and Elysians are used for overcoats to be worn on most occasions. These may be made up either in fitted surtouts or in looser sacks. The long Ulster overcoat for traveling is made of Irish frieze, or else of heavy Scotch goods, and costs from $35 to $60. Cape overcoats are also stylish, and are affected by slender young gentlemen. The King William overcoat of smooth or ribbed cloth is buttoned in front like a sack, and has a cape all around. The Glengarry has a cape in front only, and is made either with or without sleeves.

SHIRTS, COLLARS, ETC.

Shirt bosoms are of plain doubled linen, stitched or corded near the edge; pleated bosoms are seldom seen. The most stylish standing collar, called the Creedmoor, has the fronts carelessly broken over, and almost meeting. Turned-down collars are narrower than the Byron shape, and are pointed in front. Cuffs are wide and flaring.

Figured silk neck-ties rival those of plain colors. The ground is black, or else very dark, with a white ring, dot, or tiny Japanese figure. The bias Windsor scarf, to be tied in a bow, is the first choice. Made-up neck-ties are large and flat in the English style; they are folded so broadly that they almost conceal the shirt bosom. High vests are worn with such neck-ties, giving an appearance of warmth and comfort in cold weather. Fancy scarf rings and pins are of oxidized silver mixed with French gilt.

HATS.

The silk hat for dressy wear is of the glossiest black. It has a heavy yeoman bell crown, from six to eight inches deep, with a brim one and seven-eighths inches broad, made with a round open D'Orsay curve. The band is wide, and the price is $9. A new opera turban of felt has a round soft crown with wide flaring brim turned up all around. The crown may be indented in Alpine fashion. Price $5. Another pocket hat, suitable for the street, has an Alpine crown and flat brim, all of soft black felt. This is shapely and stylish when worn, but may be folded away in the pocket without injuring it. Price $5; the same style for boys costs $4. For business and general wear are felt hats with high square or round crowns and D'Orsay brims like those on silk hats: price $5. For midwinter are turbans of Shetland seal, made with double bands that are alike on both sides, and may be worn turned up or down as one fancies. They cost from $15 to $30.

SHOES.

Boots are very little worn. Gentlemen prefer the wide English shoe of calf-skin, made with the projecting soles called by dealers "broad welts," and with very low heels. These are comfortable to walk in, and make the foot look symmetrical though not small. The shoe is buttoned on the side for general wear, and costs $19. Fine kid boots with elastic sides are chosen for full-dress.

For information received thanks are due, for dress materials, to Messrs. ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and A. T. STEWART & Co.; for furs, to C. G. GUNTHER'S SONS; and for gentlemen's clothing, to BROOKS BROTHERS; W. R. BOWNE; D. D. YOUMANS; UNION ADAMS; and GLAZE & SON.

PERSONAL.

RICHARD BAXTER is finally to have a statue to his memory by the inhabitants of Kidderminster, to cost $3500. He was born in 1618, and although laborious and very popular as a preacher, he held an uncertain and fluctuating position between the conflicting parties in the civil war. He was present at several sieges, and was several times the victim of the persecuting enactments of the time. The bad JEFFREYS once sent him to prison when he was seventy years old. He was a prolific writer, but his works being mostly polemical, are now little read. His most popular book is the Saints' Everlasting Rest.

—Dr. HAROLD BROWNE, Bishop of Winchester, remarked at a recent clerical Conference at Ely that he was afraid that in all Protestant countries not the Church only, but religion, was losing its hold upon the poor, and that of the two the Church of England "had far better lose the rich. The minister of God is the natural defender of the poor, and he had better err by defending him too much than by deserting him when he needs defense."

—Of MAZZINI a curious anecdote is related, as showing the tendency of great minds on solemn occasions. At the time of his death he reopened his will and wrote in it: "I open once more my will to order that when they burn me they keep my ashes at home. By all the supernal and infernal gods, my skin shall not serve the charlatan Moderates for a drum to beat at fair-time."

—TOURGUENEFF, the famous Russian novelist, is said to be quite broken down by recent misfortunes. Within a year his wife and only daughter have died; by the failure of his Parisian banker most of his earnings have been swept away; and a nephew to whom he was greatly attached has been sent to prison for outrageous felonies. The poor novelist writes very little now, as he says his stories, reflecting his own heart, are too sombre.

—To show, probably, that "the pen is mightier than the sword," Mr. W. D. WILSON, of Odell, Illinois, has written 1170 words—a large part of the Gospel of St. Matthew—on one side of a postal card. As a dissemination of that portion of St. Matthew, it will probably be regarded as a failure, the penmanship being too absurdly small for popular perusal.

—Miss EMMA ABBOTT, formerly the soprano of Rev. Dr. CHAPIN'S choir, is in Europe pursuing her musical studies, and has received an offer from PATTI to sing in Mr. MAPLESON'S London season. The success of Miss ABBOTT has been predicted by KELLOGG, NILSSON, PAREPA-ROSA, SANTLEY, and others.

—Mr. HEPWORTH DIXON has enrolled himself in the noble order of lecturers, and will embark for this republic in January to tell us from the platform what his notions are about "German Imperialism" and "Spanish Republicanism." Colonel JOHN HAY has a few short contracts out on the latter, which he is taking in as rapidly as the panic will permit.

—Prince METTERNICH has just sold the largest and finest cask of wine in his cellars at the Castle of Johannisberg at an enormous figure—the highest ever paid in the Rheingau. It is the only remaining cask of the famous vintage of 1861. The purchaser is Mr. Consul BAUER, at Moscow, and the price paid for the cask, containing 1400 bottles, was about $8 33 per bottle.

—Mr. FORSTER, a man of some eminence in the public affairs of England, remarked recently in reference to that country, that "it is not true that the poor are getting poorer, but it is true that all classes aspire to live on a higher scale of comfort than sufficed to content the last generation, and that inasmuch as there is far more of absolute enjoyment, the battle of life, the stretching of ways and means, continues to be as intense as heretofore."

—The late A. H. DAVENPORT, a member of the respectable family of HOYTS, of Connecticut, was not only an excellent actor and kind-hearted man, but had a keen sense of the ludicrous. During the prevalence of yellow fever in New Orleans, in 1867, he was manager of the Academy of Music in that city. Another actor of the same name, playing at the St. Charles, died, and the report went North that it was "Dolly." His mother sent a dispatch to the proprietor of the Academy of Music, saying, "Please send on my son's remains." The dispatch being turned over to him, he repaired to the telegraph office and penned the following reply: "Dear mother, I shall bring on my remains in about two weeks. 'DOLLY.'"

—"Mark Twain" has made a decided hit in London with his lecture on the Sandwich Islands. The Examiner says his "dry manner, his admirable self-possession, and perfectly grave countenance formed a background that made the humorous portion of the lecture irresistible." The Spectator remarks, "He began on one of the evenings with referring to the complaints that he had not been well heard throughout the hall, and threw a tone of high moral ardor and resolve into his promise to make himself adequately heard, which, delivered as it was, with the utmost immobility and gravity of demeanor, was irresistibly humorous. And then he glided off into a candid avowal of his wish to gratify the violent temporary and momentary hunger for information about the Sandwich Islands, with as serious an air as if the fame of the Sandwich Islands was really in every mouth, and anxiety about them the ruling passion of every heart. The humor in all this was the anxious travesty of the intellectual assumptions of the easy man of the world which it suggested. The ease and frankness of the speaker impressed you with his complete command of all the social currents of the day; and then the oddity of the false notes, touched so easily and in such apparent good faith—the virtuous ardor about making himself heard—the resolve either to appease or to stimulate to a still higher level of enthusiasm the assumed thirst for knowledge about the Sandwich Isles—became in the highest degree grotesque. It was the same when he confessed casually to the audience the kind of problem which had exercised his mind most in connection with this subject; and his belief that it belonged to that region of the unknown and unknowable which it is the mere knight-errantry of reason to attempt to explore. This problem was 'why the Sandwich Islands should have been put away out there in the middle of the Pacific Ocean'—a point which he declared to be not really 'open to criticism,' so that it would not be 'graceful to dwell upon it.'"

—President GRANT has indicated his acceptance of the invitation of the trustees of the American Museum of Natural History in Central Park to lay the corner-stone of the noble edifice now in process of erection by the Department of Parks for the permanent occupation of the museum. The ceremony will take place early in the coming spring.

—The Emperor WILLIAM having ascertained that a granddaughter of BEETHOVEN is at present living in Vienna in great destitution, generously ordered that during her lifetime five per cent. of the proceeds from the performance of BEETHOVEN'S opera of Fidelio at the Royal Opera at Berlin shall be regularly assigned to her.

—King WILLIAM LUNALILO of the Sandwich Islands has shown himself a great tactician. A mutiny having lately taken place in his household troops, he disbanded the entire corps of fifty-four rank and file. He maintains the position that the Sandwich Islands need no standing army, and the people are with him.

—A private letter recently received from London describes "George Eliot" as having an expression of countenance quite handsome when animated by conversation. "Her figure is good, her bearing graceful, and her manners elegant. Her friends, those on familiar terms with her, speak of her as charming. Some of her admirers think that her speech is even superior to her written thought. On her manuscript she toils tremendously, working on an average six hours a day, and rarely accomplishing in that time more than 300 or 400 words. Her labors are so exhaustive that she devotes all the remainder of the time to recreation and rest. She has been urged to abandon literary labors for the benefit of her health; but she is unwilling to do so, declaring she could not live without writing; that writing, more than aught else, constitutes her truest life. She is exceedingly ambitious; and, conscious that she has a vast reputation to sustain, she is constantly striving to surpass her previous efforts. Eminent as she is as a novelist, her dearest desire is to be a great poet, and she is said to regard the Spanish Gypsy as her best production. The great success of Middlemarch delights her, for she admits that it is her best prose work." That seems to be the general judgment in this country.

—The funeral of LOUISA MUHLBACH was attended by the most distinguished people in Berlin—a city rich in every sort of talent and culture. Near her are the graves of her husband, HEGEL, the philosopher, and IFFLAND, the actor. The Rev. Dr. SYDON delivered the funeral oration, and closed with this tribute: "It has been said that she whose death we mourn was a disbeliever in the immortality of the soul. I know it is a calumny, and I will repeat here what I heard her exclaim eleven years ago, at this very grave, at the moment when her husband's coffin was lowered into it, and she stood here, frantic with grief, with her two little daughters. 'No!' she cried, in a voice choked by tears—'no: a mind that has created so many original works, in which it will live here on earth, can not sink back into nothing.'" CARL GUTZKOW laid a laurel wreath on the coffin, saying only, "Adieu, dear, gifted, faithful friend." On the following day a slab was placed on the mound, bearing the inscription, "CLARA MUNDT, aged fifty-nine, the historical novelist of Germany."

—Dr. ADLER, the learned rabbi, has in press, in England, a Commentary on the Targum Onkelos," the celebrated verson of the Pentateuch.

—A Philadelphia writer communicates to the Franklin (Pennsylvania) Repository a pen sketch of Mr. ANTHONY J. DREXEL, the head of the eminent banking house bearing his name. He says: "I see very often passing my window in the early evenings of these pleasant autumn days, mounted on a handsome bay horse, a gentleman who at first sight would strike one as being a comfortable, intelligent country squire, coming into town to discuss markets, crops, or stocks. He is a man approaching middle life, of medium height, rather stout, with a finely developed head, quite bald on the top, ruddy complexion, keen, dark, expressive eyes, a very handsome nose, with delicately chiseled nostrils, a kindly but firm mouth shaded by a heavy brown mustache, and a chin decidedly double. His manner and expression (except the eyes, which might have belonged to the jolly friar in Robin Hood) are rather grave, the result probably of that severe discipline that belongs to those who successfully wrestle with the money-changers of the world. There is, however, a geniality that betrays itself in spite of the rigid lines about the mouth, and that shows noble impulses and good purposes behind the artificial fortifications which the ways of the world have made necessary. The ensemble indicates health, manliness, strong common-sense, with refinement and artistic tastes." The correspondent concludes his interesting sketch by stating, what every intelligent person in Philadelphia knows, that Mr. DREXEL is an earnest Christian gentleman, a man of large charities unostentatiously given, and one of the most modest and unassuming of men.

Hosted by Google

Sofa-Pillow.—Raised and Application Embroidery.—Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS sofa-pillow is worked on cloth in raised and application embroidery, and is edged with twisted silk cord, and trimmed on the corners with loops of similar cord and tassels. For the cover of the sofa-pillow, of which Fig. 2 shows a full-sized section, use dark brown cloth, on which light brown and gray cloth is applied. On the gray cloth work a bouquet in raised embroidery. The flowers are cut of purple and the leaves of green cloth in several shades. The veins, stems, and vines are worked with green and brown saddler's silk in half-polka stitch, and the calyxes of the flowers are worked in knotted stitch with yellow silk. The seam made by setting on the light brown cloth is covered with silk cord in three shades of brown, which is stitched on with silk of the same color. On the dark cloth apply leaves of green cloth in several shades. The veins of these leaves and the stems and vines are worked in half-polka stitch with green and brown silk. The piece of light cloth is also embroidered in half-polka stitch, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 1.—SOFA-PILLOW.—RAISED AND APPLICATION EMBROIDERY. [See Fig. 2.]

Châtelaine Spectacle Case, Figs. 1–3.

THIS spectacle case of card-board, which is designed to be suspended from the belt, is covered on the outside with maroon moiré, and on the inside with maroon velvet, and is bound on the edge with a strip of Russia leather, which is ornamented with an inlaid gold border. The case is six inches and a half long and an inch and seven-eighths wide. The upper half is embroidered. The embroidery is worked on maroon velvet with gold thread and maroon silk in point Russe and knotted stitch, and is button-hole stitched on with maroon silk. Fig. 2, page 757, shows the embroidery design in full size. At the top of the case are fastened two chains of gilt bronze, each five inches and three-quarters long, which are joined at the free ends with a shield. The latter is covered with maroon moiré, on which a monogram is worked with gold thread. On the under side of the shield set a bow of maroon moiré ribbon and a metal hook. Instead of the design shown by Fig. 2, that shown by Fig. 3, page 757, may be used for ornamenting the spectacle case. For this design take velvet or cloth, cut it out as shown by the illustration, and underlay it with satin. Then work the embroidery in point Russe with saddler's silk.

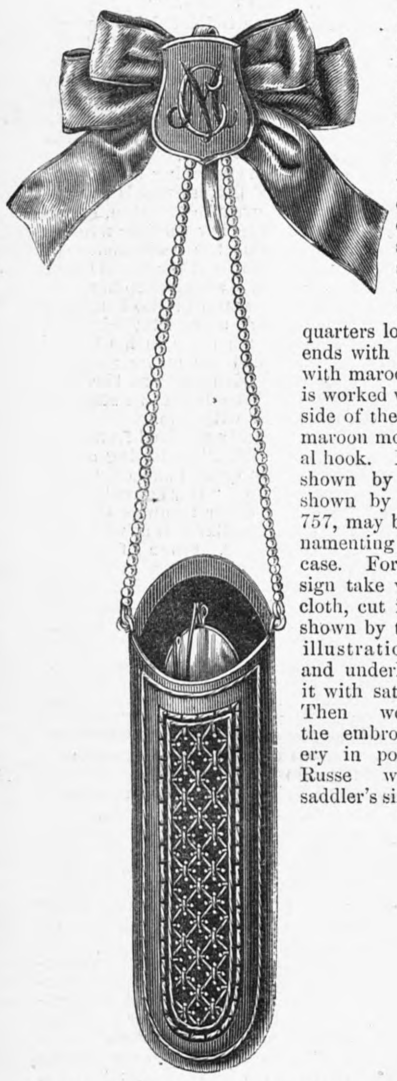

Fig. 1.—CHÂTELAINE SPECTACLE CASE.—[See Figs. 2 and 3, Page 757.]

Châtelaine Vinaigrette Case.

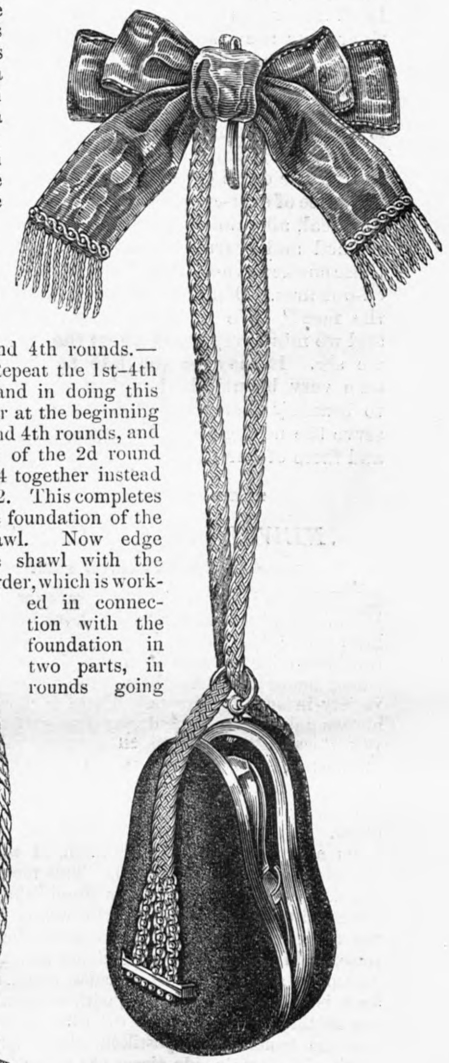
THIS case, which is designed to hold a cut crystal vinaigrette, consists of two parts of equal size, which are covered on the outside with violet velvet, and on the inside with faille of the same color, and are edged with a French gilt hoop. These hoops are joined with a hinge, and furnished with a French gilt lock. On the outside of the case are set French gilt bands, on which are fastened the strings, worked in knotting and braid-work. For each string take six pieces of gold cord of the requisite length, take up a gold bead on each piece, double it so that the bead comes in the middle, and then slip the ends through the band. Take always four ends together, take up seven gold beads on every two middle ends, and with the free ends work the braid-work (see Fig. 2, page 189, Harper's Bazar, No. 11, Vol. V., and the accompanying description). Care should be taken, however, that one bead always comes between two double knots. When the beads are used up, take always two gold threads together, and with these work a six-strand braid. Run the strings crosswise through the ring, fasten the ends together, and cover the seam with a violet moiré bow. The ends of the bow are trimmed with gold cord, gold beads, and fringe, as shown by the illustration. For each fringe strand run the gold thread through the ribbon from the back to the front, crochet six chain stitches, and fasten the thread. Finally, fasten a French gilt hook on the wrong side of the bow.

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF SOFA-PILLOW, FIG. 1.—RAISED AND APPLICATION EMBROIDERY.—FULL SIZE.

Knitted Three-cornered Shawl worn as a Hood.

See illustration on page 757.

THIS shawl is worn as a hood by arranging the middle corner on the head and tying the ends together in front. It is worked with black split zephyr worsted and coarse steel knitting-needles. The original consists of a foundation sixty-four inches long on the side, and twenty-five inches and a quarter wide from the middle of the side to the middle corner. This foundation is edged with a border seven inches and a quarter wide, and on both ends of the shawl are fastened tassels. To make the shawl (the border on the edge is worked after finishing the foundation) make a foundation of 296 st. (stitch), and going back and forth on this, work as follows: 1st round.—All purled. 2d round (right side of the work).—Always alternately t. t. o. (thread thrown over), k. (knit) 2 together. 3d and 4th rounds.—All knit plain. Repeat the 1st–4th rounds 74 times, and in doing this always k. 2 together at the beginning of the 2d and 4th rounds, and at the end of the 2d round always k. 4 together instead of the last 2. This completes the foundation of the shawl. Now edge the shawl with the border, which is worked in connection with the foundation in two parts, in rounds going back and forth, in an à jour design. To do this first make a foundation of 10 st., then knit off the edge st. of the long side of the foundation of the shawl, and finish the round with a foundation of 10 st. Going back on the foundation, knit the 1st round.—All knit plain. 2d round.—Always alternately t. t. o., k. 2 together; at the end of the round widen 2 st. To do this work on the last st. 1 k. (knit plain), 1 p. (purled), 1 k. 3d–20th rounds.—Like the 2d round; at the end of each of these rounds always widen 2 st. It is to be observed that the st. is always knit off together with the t. t. o. lying back of it. Knit four rounds more all plain, and then chain off the st. loose-



CHÂTELAINE VINAIGRETTE CASE.

Hosted by Google

ly. The other part of the border is worked in a similar manner, with this difference only, that the edge st. of two sides are taken up together on needles. Having also finished the second part of the border, sew the edge st. of both parts together from the wrong side, and then finish the border on the outer edge with fringe, as shown by the illustration. For this fringe take a strand of black split zephyr worsted of the requisite length and fourteen threads thick, and tie it together with yellow filling silk at intervals of seven-eighths of an inch each. Cut the worsted strand through between every two knots, which forms the balls or tassels seen in the illustration. Embroider dots with yellow silk on the foundation, and on the ends of the shawl fasten black Angora tassels trimmed with yellow silk.

KNITTED THREE-CORNERED SHAWL, WORN AS A HOOD.

Black Gros Grain and Gray Poplin Dress.

THE skirt of black gros grain is trimmed with puffs and kilt-pleated ruffles of the material. The over-skirt and waist are of gray Irish poplin; the over-skirt is trimmed with a ruffle of the material. The waist is furnished with a binding, revers, and rolls of black gros grain. The vests are also of gros grain. Lace fraise and under-sleeves.

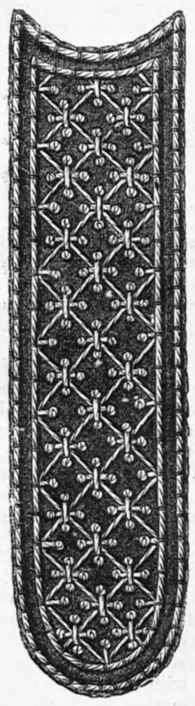


Fig. 2.—POINT RUSSE EMBROIDERY FOR SPECTACLE CASE. [See Fig. 1, Page 756.]

Pearl Gray Poult de Soie Dress.

THIS dress is made of pearl gray poult de soie; the trimming consists of ruffles and folds of the material, white lace, and bows of pink gros grain ribbon. Fraise of pleated crêpe lisse, and lace under-sleeves.

ENGLISH GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Anecdotes of Landseer.—An unjust Steward.—Young Brown.

I TOLD you in my last letter that Sir Edwin Landseer would be found to have died richer than any of his brethren of the brush save Turner. He has left no less than a hundred and eighty thousand pounds. Curiously enough, though so rich, and very genial in disposition, he never entertained under his own roof. His dinner-parties were given at a friend's house—that of the well-known Jacob Bell, the chemist, and, after his death, at that of Mr. Hills, his successor. He was a master of that sort of conversation, if it can be called so, which consists in anecdotes, and if those generally concerned himself, they were not the less interesting on that account. Egotism is only repulsive when the Ego himself is not worth hearing about.

Enormous as were the sums given for Landseer's pictures in later years, they sold at first, even the best of them, for comparatively small sums. Brunel, the great engineer, when entertaining a party of artists (among whom was Landseer) in his new house, expressed a wish that each of his guests should paint for a particular room a picture on panel, the price to be £500 apiece. And hence came Sir Edwin's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Only a few years before his death, the great animal painter was taking some friends over the South Kensington gallery, and while explaining to them some peculiarity in his own "Jack in Office"—the dog, you know, in charge of the barrow, who looks down with such contempt upon the hungry curs—he happened to touch the picture. The policeman saw him, and hurried up.

"You must not touch the pictures, Sir. Don't you know that it is forbidden?" said he, severely.

"But, my good fellow, I have touched this picture a hundred times," said Sir Edwin.

"Then all I can say is, you ought to be ashamed of yourself, at your time of life, to say so."

The claimant and his friends have sprung a mine upon the prosecution. They have suddenly produced a very "straight" witness, who professes to be the steward of the Osprey, and to have picked up the defendant after the wreck of the Bella. There is no more doubt of his being perjured than of his friend "Sir Roger" being above the average weight of mankind, but he has been kept so "dark" that none of his antecedents can be got at, even by Mr. Hawkins. The prosecution have "wired" to New York, from which he hails, for personal particulars, and the Lord Chief Justice has forbidden Mr. Jean Luie, who had urgent private affairs in America, it seems, requiring his presence immediately after he had given his evidence, to leave the country in the mean time. No notice whatever was given to the prosecution that this man would be called, though it is proved Kenealy had got possession of him so early as July, and it is only natural that we should wish to have an "account of his stewardship" from other lips besides his own. To call such a witness as Mr. Jean Luie—so self-possessed, so well-informed, so perfectly unknown to every human being, and so very anxious to return to New York on Saturday — shows that the game of the defense has become desperate indeed. Of course Kenealy's object has been to rebut the tattooing evidence, and Mr. Jean Luie deposes to having washed Sir Roger very often, and found him without tattoo marks. This interesting young man, according to the steward's account, passed his days on board ship in being washed, in getting drunk, in picking oakum for amusement (absit omen, for oakum is what they pick in jails), and in reading The Garden of the Soul.

We have had your Mark Twain lecturing upon the Sandwich Islands in our Hanover Square Rooms to crowded audiences. Upon the whole, he has "taken," but he has yet not a little to learn. His dryness is so excessive that one feels inclined to resent it as too gross an affectation, and his "leading up" to his points is too obvious. Moreover, he has not taken to heart Lord Chesterfield's advice about leaving a room. Instead of ending his lecture with a pyrotechnic display, one doesn't know when he has got through it. I should not mention these blemishes but that he has good stuff in him, and is evidently capable of much better things. His extravagancies of humor are really excellent. One of them made me laugh "consumedly" last night. An amalgamated company of mean men had a servant in their employ whose duty was to manage certain blasting operations. In using the crow-bar too vigorously the powder exploded and blew him up in the air. You saw him first a man, then a dog, then a bird, then a bee, then nothing; then a bee again, then a bird, then a dog, then a man, and so he came down, exactly into the very hole he had been working at. He had been away (up in the air) only a quarter of an hour, and, as it were, upon his masters' business, yet that amalgamated company of mean men deducted those fifteen minutes when they paid him his wages.

Fig. 3.—POINT RUSSE EMBROIDERY FOR SPECTACLE CASE. [See Fig. 1, Page 756.]

Have you read Young Brown, now coming out in the Cornhill? It is not a good novel, as such; but it has some very wonderful writing in it. It is as wise as Fielding (and almost as coarse), and it depicts the British aristocracy in a manner that shows the author knows them to the backbone. Every body is asking who is the writer. I only know one man in England—no, he is not in England; he is unhappily an outlaw, and obliged to live in France—I only know one Englishman, I say, capable of writing it, namely, Mr. Grenville Murray, a natural son of the late Duke of Buckingham, and whilom in the Foreign Office, the author of the Roving Englishman, and the late editor (which was his ruin) of the Queen's Messenger. Time will show. A greater contrast to Old Kensington than its successor, Young Brown, it is impossible to imagine.

The story I sent you some weeks ago about the wolf-boy of Oude appears to have received confirmation. This young Romulus has been "interviewed" by the Indian newspaper report-

BLACK GROS GRAIN AND GRAY POPLIN DRESS.

PEARL GRAY POULT DE SOIE DRESS.

Hosted by Google

ers, and is described to be very wolf-like in his habits. He sleeps all day, but is awake at night, and answers the howl of the jackals with sympathetic vigor. His appetite is enormous, and he likes his food uncooked. His chief amusement is to "chop at flies," and swallow them.

R. KEMBLE, of London.

(Continued from No. 46, page 727.)

LADY ANNA.

BY ANTHONY TROLLOPE,

Author of "The Warden," "The Small House at Allington," "Barchester Towers," "The Golden Lion of Granpere," "Orley Farm," "The Eustace Diamonds," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

DANIEL THWAITE RECEIVES HIS MONEY.

THERE was of course much commotion among all circles of society in London as soon as it was known to have been decided that the Countess Lovel was the Countess Lovel, and that Lady Anna was the heiress of the late Earl. Bets were paid—and bets, no doubt, were left unpaid—to a great amount. Men at the clubs talked more about the Lovels than they had done even during the month preceding the trial. The Countess became on a sudden very popular. Exaggerated stories were told of the romance of her past life—though it would have been well-nigh impossible to exaggerate her sufferings. Her patience, her long endurance and persistency, were extolled by all. The wealth that would accrue to her and to her daughter was of course doubled. Had any body seen her? Did any body know her? Even the Murrays began to be proud of her, and old Lady Jemima Magtaggart, who had been a Murray before she married General Mag, as he was called, went at once and called upon the Countess in Keppel Street. Being the first that did so, before the Countess had suspected any invasion, she was admitted—and came away declaring that sorrow must have driven the Countess mad. The Countess, no doubt, did not receive her distant relative with any gentle courtesy. She had sworn to herself often that, come what come might, she would never cross the threshold of a Murray. Old Lord Swanage, who had married some very distant Lovel, wrote to her a letter full of very proper feeling. It had been, he said, quite impossible for him to know the truth before the truth had come to light, and therefore he made no apology for not having before this made overtures of friendship to his connection. He now begged to express his great delight that she who had so well deserved success had been successful, and to offer her his hand in friendship, should she be inclined to accept it. The Countess answered him in a strain which certainly showed that she was not mad. It was not her policy to quarrel with any Lovel, and her letter was very courteous. She was greatly obliged to him for his kindness, and had felt as strongly as he could do that she could have no claim on her husband's relations till she should succeed in establishing her rights. She accepted his hand in the spirit in which it had been offered, and hoped that his lordship might yet become a friend of her daughter. For herself—she feared that all that she had suffered had made her unfit for much social intercourse. Her strength, she said, had been sufficient to carry her thus far, but was now failing her.

Then, too, there came to her that great glory of which the lawyer had given her a hint. She received a letter from the private secretary of his Majesty the King, telling her that his Majesty had heard her story with great interest, and now congratulated her heartily on the re-establishment of her rank and position. She wrote a very curt note, begging that her thanks might be given to his Majesty—and then she burned the private secretary's letter. No congratulations were any thing to her till she should see her daughter freed from the debasement of her engagement to the tailor.

Speculation was rife as to the kind of life which the Countess would lead. That she would have wealth sufficient to blaze forth in London with all the glories of countess-ship there was no doubt. Her own share of the estate was put down as worth at least ten thousand a year for her life, and this she would enjoy without deductions, and with no other expenditure than that needed for herself. Her age was ascertained to a day, and it was known that she was as yet only forty-five. Was it not probable that some happy man might share her wealth with her? What an excellent thing it would be for old Lundy—the Marquis of Lundy—who had run through every shilling of his own property! Before a week was over the suggestion had been made to old Lundy. "They say she is mad, but she can't be mad enough for that," said the Marquis.

The rector hurried home full of indignation, but he had a word or two with his nephew before he started. "What do you mean to do now, Frederic?" asked the rector, with a very grave demeanor.

"Do? I don't know that I shall do any thing."

"You give up the girl, then?"

"My dear uncle, that is a sort of question that I don't think a man ever likes to be asked."

"But I suppose I may ask how you intend to live?"

"I trust, Uncle Charles, that I shall not, at any rate, be a burden to my relatives."

"Oh, very well, very well. Of course I have nothing more to say. I think it right, all the same, to express my opinion that you have been grossly misused by Sir William Patterson. Of course what I say will have no weight with you; but that is my opinion."

"I do not agree with you, Uncle Charles."

"Very well; I have nothing more to say. It is right that I should let you know that I do not believe that this woman was ever Lord Lovel's wife. I never did believe it, and I never will believe it. All that about marrying the girl has been a take-in from beginning to end—all planned to induce you to do just what you have done. No word in courtesy should ever have been spoken to either of them."

"I am as sure that she is the Countess as I am that I am the Earl."

"Very well. It costs me nothing, but it costs you thirty thousand a year. Do you mean to come down to Yoxham this winter?"

"No."

"Are the horses to be kept there?" Now hitherto the rich rector had kept the poor lord's hunters without charging his nephew aught for their expense. He was a man so constituted that it would have been a misery to him that the head of his family should not have horses to ride. But now he could not but remember all that he had done, all that he was doing, and the return that was made to him. Nevertheless he could have bit the tongue out of his mouth for asking the question as soon as the words were spoken.

"I will have them sold immediately," said the Earl. "They shall come up to Tattersall's before the week is over."

"I didn't mean that."

"I am glad that you thought of it, Uncle Charles. They shall be taken away at once."

"They are quite welcome to remain at Yoxham."

"They shall be removed—and sold," said the Earl. "Remember me to my aunts. Good-by." Then the rector went down to Yoxham an angry and a miserable man.

There were very many who still agreed with the rector in thinking that the Earl's case had been mismanaged. There was surely enough of ground for a prolonged fight to have enabled the Lovel party to have driven their opponents to a compromise. There was a feeling that the Solicitor-General had been carried away by some romantic idea of abstract right, and had acted in direct opposition to all the usages of forensic advocacy as established in England. What was it to him whether the Countess were or were not a real Countess? It had been his duty to get what he could for the Earl, his client. There had been much to get, and, with patience, no doubt something might have been got. But he had gotten nothing. Many thought that he had altogether cut his own throat, and that he would have to take the first "puny" judgeship vacant. "He is a great man—a very great man indeed," said the Attorney-General, in answer to some one who was abusing Sir William. "There is not one of us can hold a candle to him. But then, as I have always said, he ought to have been a poet!"

In discussing the Solicitor-General's conduct men thought more of Lady Anna than her mother. The truth about Lady Anna and her engagement was generally known in a misty, hazy, half-truthful manner. That she was engaged to marry Daniel Thwaite, who was now becoming famous, and the cause of a greatly increased business in Wigmore Street, was certain. It was certain also that the Earl had desired to marry her. But as to the condition in which the matter stood at present there was a very divided opinion. Not a few were positive that a written engagement had been given to the Earl that he should have the heiress before the Solicitor-General had made his speech—but, according to these, the tailor's hold over the young lady was so strong that she now refused to abide by her own compact. She was in the tailor's hands, and the tailor could do what he liked with her. It was known that Lady Anna was in Bedford Square, and not a few walked before the Sergeant's house in the hopes of seeing her. The romance, at any rate, was not over, and possibly there might even yet be a compromise. If the Earl could get even five thousand a year out of the property, it was thought that the Solicitor-General might hold his own, and in due time become at any rate a Chief Baron.

In the mean time Daniel Thwaite remained in moody silence among the workmen in Wigmore Street, unseen of any of those who rushed there for new liveries in order that they might catch a glimpse of the successful hero—till one morning, about five days after the trial was over, when he received a letter from Messrs. Goffe and Goffe. Messrs. Goffe and Goffe had the pleasure of informing him that an accurate account of all money transactions between Countess Lovel and his father had been kept by the Countess; that the Countess on behalf of herself and Lady Anna Lovel acknowledged a debt due to the estate of the late Mr. Thomas Thwaite, amounting to £9109 3*s.* 4*d.*, and that a check to that amount should be at once handed to him—Daniel Thwaite the son—if he would call at the chambers of Messrs. Goffe and Goffe, with a certified copy of the probate of the will of Thomas Thwaite the father.

Nine thousand pounds—and that to be paid to him immediately—on that very day if he chose to call for it! The copy of the probate of the will he had in his pocket at that moment. But he worked out his day's work without going near Messrs. Goffe and Goffe. And yet he thought much of his money; and once, when one of his employers spoke to him somewhat roughly, he remembered that he was probably a better man than his master. What should he now do with himself and his money—how bestow himself—how use it so that he might be of service to the world? He would go, no doubt, to some country in which there were no earls and no countesses; but he could go nowhere till he should know what might be his fate with the Earl's daughter, who at present was his destiny. His mind was absolutely divided. In one hour he would say to himself that the poet was certainly right, and in the next he was sure that the poet must have been wrong. As regarded money, nine thousand pounds was as good to him as any sum that could be named. He could do with that all that he required that money should do for him. Could he at this time have had his own way absolutely, he would have left all the remainder of the wealth behind him, to be shared as they pleased to share it between the Earl and the Countess, and he would have gone at once, taking with him the girl whom he loved. He would have reveled in the pride of thinking that all of them should say that he had wanted and had won the girl only—and not the wealth of the Lovels; that he had taken only what was his own, and that his wife would be dependent on him, not he on her. But this was not possible. It was now months since he had heard the girl's voice, or had received any assurance from her that she was still true to him. But, in lieu of this, he had the assurance that she was in possession of enormous wealth, and that she was the recognized cousin of lords and ladies by the dozen.

When the evening came he saw one of his employers, and told the man that he wished that his place might be filled. Why was he going? Did he expect to better himself? When was he going? Was he in earnest? Daniel told the truth at once as far as the payment of the money was concerned. He was to receive on the following day a sum of money which had been due to his father, and, when that should have been paid him, it would not suit him to work longer for weekly wages. The tailor grumbled, but there was nothing else to be said. Thwaite might leave them to-morrow if he wished. Thwaite took him at his word, and never returned to the shop in Wigmore Street after that night.

On reaching his lodgings he found another letter—from Sergeant Bluestone. The Countess had so far given way as to accede to the proposition that there should be a meeting between her daughter and the tailor, and then there had arisen the question as to the manner in which this meeting should be arranged. The Countess would not write herself, nor would she allow her daughter to do so. It was desirable, she thought, that as few people should know of the meeting as possible, and at last, most unwillingly, the Sergeant undertook the task of arranging it. He wrote, therefore, as follows:

"Mr. Sergeant Bluestone presents his compliments to Mr. Daniel Thwaite. Mr. Thwaite has no doubt heard of the result of the trial by which the Countess Lovel and her daughter have succeeded in obtaining the recognition of their rank. It is in contemplation with the Countess and Lady Anna Lovel to go abroad, but Lady Anna is desirous before she goes of seeing the son of the man who was her mother's stanch friend during many years of suffering. Lady Anna will be at home, at No. —— Keppel Street, at eleven o'clock on Monday, 23d instant, if Mr. Thwaite can make it convenient to call then and there.

"BEDFORD SQUARE, November 17, 18—.

"If Mr. Thwaite could call on the Sergeant before that date, either early in the morning at his house, or on Saturday at his chambers, —— ——, Inner Temple, it might perhaps be serviceable."

The postscript had not been added without much consideration. What would the tailor think of this invitation? Would he not be disposed to take it as encouragement in his pernicious suit? Would he not go to Keppel Street with a determination to insist upon the girl's promise? The Sergeant had thought that it would be best to let the thing take its chance. But the Sergeant's wife and the Sergeant's daughters, and the Countess too, had all agreed that something if possible should be said to him to disabuse him of this idea. He was to have nine thousand pounds paid to him. Surely that might be sufficient. But, if he was greedy and wanted more money, more money should be given to him. Only he must be made to understand that the marriage was out of the question. So the Sergeant again gave way, and proposed the interview. Daniel sent back his compliments to the Sergeant, and begged to say he would do as he was bid. He would call at the Sergeant's chambers on the Saturday, and in Keppel Street on the following Monday, at the hours named.

On the next morning—the first morning of his freedom from the servitude of Wigmore Street—he went to Messrs. Goffe and Goffe. He got up late, and breakfasted late, in order that he might feel what it was to be an idle man. "I might now be as idle as the young Earl," he said to himself; "but were I to attempt it, what should I do with myself? How should I make the hours pass by?" He felt that he was lauding himself as the idea passed through his mind, and he struggled to quench his own pride. "And yet," said he in his thoughts, "is it not fit that I should know myself to be better than he is? If I have no self-confidence, how can I be bold to persevere? The man that works is to him that is idle as light is to darkness."

He was admitted at once to Mr. Goffe's private room, and was received with a smiling welcome and an outstretched hand. "I am delighted, Mr. Thwaite, to be able to settle your claim on Lady Lovel with so little delay. I hope you were satisfied with her ladyship's statement of the account."

"Much more than satisfied with the amount. It appeared to me that I had no legal claim for more than a few hundred pounds."

"We knew better than that, Mr. Thwaite. We should have seen that no great injury was done. But luckily the Countess has been careful, and has put down each sum advanced, item by item. Full interest has been allowed at five per cent.—as is quite proper. The Countess is an excellent woman of business."

"No doubt, Mr. Goffe. I could have wished that she would have condescended to honor me with a line—but that is a matter of feeling."

"Oh, Mr. Thwaite, there are reasons—you must know that there are reasons."

"There may be good reasons or bad reasons."

"And there may be good judgment in such matters and bad judgment. But, however—You will like to have this money by a check, no doubt. There it is, £9109 3*s.* 4*d.* It is not often that we write one check for a bigger sum than that, Mr. Thwaite. Shall I cross it on your bankers? No bankers! With such a sum as that, let me recommend you to open an account at once." And Mr. Goffe absolutely walked down to Fleet Street with Daniel Thwaite the tailor, and introduced him at his own bank. The business was soon transacted, and Daniel Thwaite went away westward, a capitalist, with a check-book in his pocket. What was he to do with himself? He walked east again before the day was over, and made inquiries at various offices as to vessels sailing for Boston, New York, Baltimore, and Quebec. Or how would it be with him if he should be minded to go East instead of West? So he supplied himself also with information as to vessels for Sydney. And what should he do when he got to the new country? He did not mean to be a tailor. He was astonished to find how little he had as yet realized in his mind the details of the exodus which he had proposed to himself.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

I WILL TAKE YOUR WORD FOR NOTHING.

ON the Saturday Daniel was at the Sergeant's chambers early in the morning—long before the hour at which the Sergeant himself was wont to attend. No time had, in fact, been named, and the tailor had chosen to suppose that as he had been desired to be early in Bedford Square, so had it also been intended that he should be early in the Temple. For two hours he walked about the passages and the courts, thinking ill of the lawyer for being so late at his business, and endeavoring to determine what he would do with himself. He had not a friend in the world, unless Lady Anna were a friend—hardly an acquaintance. And yet, remembering what his father had done, what he himself had helped to do, he thought that he ought to have had many friends. Those very persons who were now his bitterest enemies, the Countess and all they who had supported her, should have been bound to him by close ties. Yet he knew that it was impossible that they should not hate him. He could understand their feeling with reference to their own rank, though to him that rank was contemptible. Of course he was alone. Of course he would fail. He was almost prepared to acknowledge as much to the Sergeant. He had heard of a certain vessel that would start in three days for the rising colony called New South Wales, and he almost wished that he had taken his passage in her.

At ten o'clock he had been desired to call at eleven, and as the clock struck eleven he knocked at the Sergeant's door. "Sergeant Bluestone is not here yet," said the clerk, who was disposed to be annoyed by the man's pertinacity.

"He told me to come early in the morning, and this is not early."

"He is not here yet, Sir."

"You told me to come at eleven, and it is past eleven."

"It is one minute past, and you can sit down and wait for him if you please." Daniel refused to wait, and was again about to depart in his wrath, when the Sergeant appeared upon the stairs. He introduced himself, and expressed regret that he should have found his visitor there before him. Daniel, muttering something, followed the lawyer into his room, and then the door was closed. He stood till he was invited to sit, and was determined to make himself disagreeable. This man was one of his enemies—was one who, no doubt, thought little of him because he was a tailor, who suspected his motives, and was anxious to rob him of his bride. The Sergeant retired for a moment to an inner room, while the tailor girded up his loins and prepared himself for battle.

"Mr. Thwaite," said the Sergeant, as he re-entered the room, "you probably know that I have been counsel for Lady Lovel and her daughter in the late trial." Daniel assented by a nod of his head. "My connection with the Countess would naturally have been then closed. We have gained our cause, and there would be an end of it. But, as things have turned out, it has been otherwise. Lady Anna Lovel has been staying with Mrs. Bluestone."

"In Bedford Square?"

"Yes, at my house."

"I did not know. The Countess told me she was not in Keppel Street, but refused to inform me where she was staying. I should not have interfered with her ladyship's plans had she been less secret with me."

"Surely it was unnecessary that she should tell you."

"Quite unnecessary—but hardly natural, after all that has occurred. As the Countess is with you only a friend of late date, you are probably unaware of the former friendship which existed between us. There was a time in which I certainly did not think that Lady Lovel would ever decline to speak to me about her daughter. But all this is nothing to you, Sergeant Bluestone."

"It is something to me, Mr. Thwaite, as her friend. Is there no reason why she should have treated you thus? Ask your own conscience."

"My conscience is clear in the matter."

"I have sent for you here, Mr. Thwaite, to ask you whether you can not yourself understand that this which you have proposed to do must make you an enemy, and annul and set aside all that kindness which you have shown her? I put it to your own reason. Do you think it possible that the Countess should be otherwise than outraged at the proposition you have made to her?"

Hosted by Google

"I have made no proposition to her ladyship."

"Have you made none to her daughter?"

"Certainly I have. I have asked her to be my wife."

"Come, Mr. Thwaite, do not palter with me."

"Palter with you! Who dares to say that I palter? I have never paltered. Paltering is—lying, as I take it. Let the Countess be my enemy. I have not said that she should not be so. She might have answered my letter, I think, when the old man died. In our rank of life we should have done so. It may be different with lords and titled ladies. Let it pass, however. I did not mean to make any complaint. I came here because you sent for me."

"Yes, I did send for you," said the Sergeant, wishing with all his heart that he had never been persuaded to take a step which imposed upon him so great a difficulty. "I did send for you. Lady Anna Lovel has expressed a wish to see you before she leaves London."

"I will wait upon Lady Anna Lovel."

"I need hardly tell you that her wish has been opposed by her friends."

"No doubt it was."

"But she has said with so much earnestness that she can not consider herself to be absolved from the promise which she made to you when she was a child—"

"She was no child when she made it."

"It does not signify. She can not be absolved from the promise which I suppose she did make—"

"She certainly made it, Sergeant Bluestone."

"Will you allow me to continue my statement? It will not occupy you long. She assures her mother that she can not consider herself to be absolved from that promise without your sanction. She has been living in my house for some weeks, and I do not myself doubt in the least that were she thus freed, an alliance would soon be arranged between her and her cousin."

"I have heard of that—alliance."

"It would be in every respect a most satisfactory and happy marriage. The young Earl has behaved with great consideration and forbearance in abstaining from pushing his claims."

"In abstaining from asking for that which he did not believe to be his own."

"You had better hear me to the end, Mr. Thwaite. All the friends of the two young people desire it. The Earl himself is warmly attached to his cousin."

"So am I—and have been for many years."

"We all believe that she loves him."

"Let her say so to me, Sergeant Bluestone, and there shall be an end of it all. It seems to me that Lord Lovel and I have different ideas about a woman. I would not take the hand of a girl who told me that she loved another man, even though she was as dear to me as—as Lady Anna is dear to me now. And as for what she might have in her hand, it would go for naught with me, though I might have to face beggary without her. It seems to me that Lord Lovel is less particular in this matter."

"I do not see that you and I have any thing to do with that," replied the Sergeant, hardly knowing what to say.

"I have nothing to do with Lord Lovel, certainly—nor has he with me. As to his cousin—it is for her to choose."

"We think—I am only telling you what we think—but we think, Mr. Thwaite, that the young lady's affections are fixed on her cousin. It is natural that they should be so; and watching her as closely as we can, we believe such to be the case. I will be quite on the square with you, Mr. Thwaite."

"With me and with every body else, I hope, Sergeant Bluestone."

"I hope so," said the Sergeant, laughing; "but at any rate I will be so with you now. We have been unable to get from Lady Anna any certain reply—any assurance of her own wishes. She has told her mother that she can not accept Lord Lovel's addresses till she has seen you." The Sergeant in this was not quite on the square, as Lady Anna had never said so. "We believe that she considers it necessary to her conscience to be made free by your permission before she can follow her own inclinations and accede to those of all her friends."

"She shall have my permission in a moment—if she will ask for it."

"Could you not be more generous even than that?"

"How more generous, Sergeant Bluestone?"

"Offer it to her unasked. You have already said that you would not accept her hand if you did not believe that you had her heart also, and the sentiment did you honor. Think of her condition, and be generous to her."

"Generous to her! You mean generous to Lady Lovel, generous to Lord Lovel, generous to all the Lovels except her. It seems to me that all the generosity is to be on one side."

"By no means. We can be generous too."

"If that be generosity, I will be generous. I will offer her that permission. I will not wait till she asks for it. I will beg her to tell me if it be true that she loves this cousin, and if she can say that it is true, she shall want no permission from me to be free. She shall be free."

"It is not a question, you see, between yourself and Lord Lovel. It is quite out of the question that she should in any event become your wife. Even had she power to do it—"

"She has the power."

"Practically she has no such power, Mr. Thwaite. A young person such as Lady Anna Lovel is and must be under the control of her natural guardian. She is so altogether. Her mother could not, and would not, constrain her to any marriage; but has quite sufficient power over her to prevent any marriage. Lady Anna has never for a moment supposed that she could become your wife since she learned what were the feelings of her mother and her family." The Sergeant certainly did not keep his promise of being on the square. "But your generosity is necessary to enable Lady Lovel to bring to a happy termination all those sufferings with which her life has been afflicted."

"I do not owe much to the Countess; but if it be generous to do as I have said I would do, I will be generous. I will tell her daughter, without any question asked from her, that she is free to marry her cousin if she wishes."

So far the Sergeant, though he had not been altogether as truthful as he had promised, had been discreet. He had said nothing to set the tailor vehemently against the Lovel interest, and had succeeded in obtaining a useful pledge. But, in his next attempt, he was less wise. "I think, you know, Mr. Thwaite, that the Countess also has been generous."

"As how?"

"You have received £9000 already, I believe."

"I have received what I presume to be my own. If I have had more, it shall be refunded."

"No, no; by no means. Taking a liberal view of the matter, as the Countess was bound to do in honor, she was, I think, right in paying you what she has paid."

"I want nothing from her in what you call honor. I want nothing liberal. If the money be not mine in common honesty, she shall have it back again. I want nothing but my own."

"I think you are a little high flown, Mr. Thwaite."

"I dare say I may be—to the thinking of a lawyer."

"The Countess, who is in truth your friend, and will always be your friend if you will only be amenable to reason, has been delighted to think that you are now in possession of a sum of money which will place you above want."

"The Countess is very kind."

"And I can say more than that. She and all her friends are aware how much is due to your father's son. If you will only aid us in our present project, if you will enable Lady Anna to become the wife of her cousin the Earl, much more shall be done than the mere payment of the debt which was due to you. It has been proposed to settle on you for life an annuity of four hundred pounds a year. To this the Countess, Earl Lovel, and Lady Anna will all agree."

"Has the consent of Lady Anna been asked?" demanded the tailor, in a voice which was low, but which the Sergeant felt at the moment to be dangerous.

"You may take my word that it shall be forth-coming," said the Sergeant.

"I will take your word for nothing, Sergeant Bluestone. I do not think that among you all you would dare to make such a proposition to Lady Anna Lovel, and I wonder that you should dare to make it to me. What have you seen in me to lead you to suppose that I would sell myself for a bribe? And how can you have been so unwise as to offer it after I have told you that she shall be free—if she chooses to be free? But it is all one. You deal in subterfuges, till you think it impossible that a man should be honest. You mine under-ground, till your eyes see nothing in the open daylight. You walk crookedly, till a straight path is an abomination to you. Four hundred a year is nothing to me for such a purpose as this—would have been nothing to me even though no penny had been paid to me of the money which is my own. I can easily understand what it is that makes the Earl so devoted a lover. His devotion began when he had been told that the money was hers and not his, and that in no other way could he get it. Mine began when no one believed that she would ever have a shilling for her fortune, when all who bore her name and her mother's ridiculed their claim. Mine was growing when my father first asked me whether I grudged that he should spend all that he had in their behalf. Mine came from giving. His springs from the desire to get. Make the four hundred four thousand, make it eight thousand, Sergeant Bluestone, and offer it to him. I also will agree. With him you may succeed. Good-morning, Sergeant Bluestone. On Monday next I will not be worse than my word, even though you have offered me a bribe."

The Sergeant let the tailor go without a word further—not, indeed, having a word to say. He had been insulted in his own chambers—told that his word was worthless, and his honesty questionable. But he had been so told that at the moment he had been unable to stop the speaker. He had sat and smiled and stroked his chin and looked at the tailor as though he had been endeavoring to comfort himself with the idea that the man addressing him was merely an ignorant, half-mad, enthusiastic tailor, from whom decent conduct could not be expected. He was still smiling when Daniel Thwaite closed the door, and he almost laughed as he asked his clerk whether that energetic gentleman had taken himself down stairs. "Oh yes, Sir; he glared at me when I opened the door, and rushed down four steps at a time." But, on the whole, the Sergeant was contented with the interview. It would, no doubt, have been better had he said nothing of the four hundred a year. But in the offering of bribes there is always that danger. One can never be sure who will swallow his douceur at an easy gulp, so as hardly to betray an effort, and who will refuse even to open his lips. And then the latter man has the briber so much at advantage. When the luscious morsel has been refused, it is so easy to be indignant, so pleasant to be enthusiastically virtuous! The bribe had been refused, and so far the Sergeant had failed—but the desired promise had been made, and the Sergeant felt certain that it would be kept. He did not doubt but that Daniel Thwaite would himself offer the girl her freedom. But there was something in the man, though he was a tailor. He had an eye and a voice, and it might be that freedom offered, as he could offer it, would not be accepted.

Daniel, as he went out into the court from the lawyer's presence, was less satisfied than the lawyer. He had told the lawyer that his word was worth nothing, and yet he had believed much that the lawyer had said to him. The lawyer had told him that the girl loved her cousin, and only wanted his permission to be free that she might give her hand and her heart together to the young lord. Was it not natural that she should wish to do so? Within each hour, almost within each minute, he regarded the matter in lights that were perfectly antagonistic to each other. It was natural that she should wish to be a countess, and that she should love a young lord who was gentle and beautiful—and she should have his permission accorded freely. But then, again, it was most unnatural, bestial, and almost monstrous, that a girl should change her love for a man, going from one man to another, simply because the latter man was gilt with gold and decked with jewels and sweet with perfume from a hair-dresser's. The poet must have been wrong there. If love be any thing but a dream, surely it must adhere to the person, and not be liable to change at every offered vantage of name or birth, of rank or wealth.

But she should have the offer. She should certainly have the offer.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

NEVER were the cold, frosty days of late autumn more gladly welcomed than when, after being long desired, they recently came to the plague-stricken cities of the South. The ravages of the yellow fever, particularly in Shreveport and Memphis, have been fearful, and the suffering resulting from the scourge can scarcely be conceived by those who have not been eye-witnesses of it. The light frosts which came early in the season, and from which so much was hoped, failed to check the disease in any marked degree, and the warm damp days that followed added new victims to the appalling list of the dead. From various parts of the country warm expressions of sympathy and substantial aid have been sent to the sick, the suffering, and the orphaned in these cities. Men and women have left their comfortable homes, and boldly gone to the most infectious sections of Memphis and Shreveport to nurse the sick. Many instances of faithful devotion are mentioned, where those who were ministering to the wants of the suffering and dying remained at their posts until they themselves were stricken down by the terrible plague. The Howard Association of New Orleans, with an earnestness and patience worthy of all praise, has labored from the commencement of the epidemic. Clergymen united in giving consolation and sympathy until they were prostrated in the midst of their labors. Physicians worked ceaselessly, and died in the harness. Telegraph operators remained at their posts, sending to the outside world dispatches concerning the sufferers, and dropped, as it were, with the instrument in their hands. Sisters of Charity, with their usual unselfishness, watched beside the sick and ministered to the dying, fearless of death, though death spared them not. There are many who have little faith in the unselfish goodness of men and women, who are skeptical concerning benevolence which hopes for no pecuniary reward: and it is a pity that so many dark phases of human life and so many deeds of selfishness give some warrant to such opinions. But there is another and a brighter side to human nature; and the benevolence, untiring devotion, and heroism of those who have voluntarily exposed themselves to a terrible disease that they might give needful ministrations to the sick and dying will ever be remembered as a testimony to the unselfishness and sincerity of true Christian charity.

A new coining press, made in Philadelphia for the especial purpose of coining the new silver trade dollar, is to be put in operation at San Francisco. The trade dollar is heavier than the ordinary silver dollar, and is intended for use in our foreign commerce with countries which make the silver dollar the standard of commercial value. China, Japan, and the East Indies, for example, make this coin the standard in their commerce. The United States, by coining a silver trade dollar of a weight and fineness which will be recognized by commercial nations as a standard of value, will assume a leading place in commerce.

We might have had a portrait of Turner by Landseer had it not been for a luckless accident. One day, so it is related, Landseer caught sight of Turner in the exhibition-room of the Academy, and made a sketch of him, which he took to a dinner-party of artists that evening. The likeness was pronounced excellent, and one of Landseer's particular friends insisted on taking it home with him. Strange to say, he put it into his hat—a singular receptacle for a freshly painted picture. When he reached home it was adhering to his hair, and the portrait was utterly ruined.

In 1702 the Daily Courant was published in London by one Elizabeth Mallet. It was not designed as a "woman's rights" paper, but professed to be conducted on principles that would "spare the public at least half the impertinences which the ordinary papers contain."

Poongavana Ummall, the daughter of C. Angoo Moodeliar, of Chintaudrepettah, was recently married at Madras to Viohoor Soobramania Moodeliar. The bride was a gay widow of thirteen years old, and is said to be the first Hindoo widow who has been married in Madras.

A touching incident is related in the Memphis Ledger: A little package was sent to the Mayor's office one morning by a merchant who had been active in obtaining contributions for those who had been stricken with fever. It was tightly rolled up in not very white letter-paper, and contained five dollars and five cents, nearly all in one, two, and three cent pieces and nickels; also two faded pieces of paper currency of the old five and ten cents issue. Evidently this was some child's treasure, the accumulation of months or years. On the inner wrapping was written, "Little Lilly's money, to go to a poor child." On the outer paper, written in a different hand, "From little Lilly, for the Memphis sufferers—a dying bequest." No other explanation was given.

The Boston Flower Mission has just closed its fifth season. During the summer months, when demands for food and shelter are comparatively few, timely gifts of fruit and flowers are particularly cheering to the poor and sick, who, confined in crowded tenements, seldom or never see the pleasant country. This mission is in charge of benevolent and refined ladies, who distribute the fruit and flowers contributed from various places around Boston during five months of the year, beginning with May. During the past season there have been over thirteen thousand distributions of flowers, and fifteen hundred of fruit. One contributor from the suburbs has brought in more than six thousand pansies to gladden tired eyes. Expressmen and railroad officials have given gratuitous services, and many others have willingly given aid in this good and pleasant charity.

Howard Glyndon thus expresses her views upon a subject of present interest in the Evening Mail:

"There is no purpose in the world for which a material should be more carefully chosen than that out of which is to be manufactured a legal tender for gold and silver; and never, I think, was any material for an important purpose worse chosen. It should be indestructible, as nearly as possible, and about the most destructible thing is used, the frailest, the least able to bear the constant wear and tear of passing from hand to hand and pocket to pocket. How long can we expect even the strongest paper to last which is being constantly handled and creased? How long does it take a new greenback to become a pulpy rag of the most disgusting description? The material which represents specie should be as non-absorbent as possible; but these bits of paper absorb every odor and every species of filth with which they come in contact. I regard them as excellent conductors of contagious diseases, especially small-pox, and to be preferred to any other for that purpose in point of convenience."

Louisville came nobly to the help of the sufferers in Memphis and Shreveport, having contributed nearly twenty thousand dollars, exclusive of many thousands forwarded by private individuals.

Sewing-machines have been sold in Vienna, it is said, as American which were never made in this country. This indicates, at least, that American machines bear a good reputation abroad, or the name would not be stolen for purposes of sale.

Victory is not always to the strong in the battle of life. The gift from Nature of great strength and endurance is of little value if abused, while a moderate amount, if carefully and rightly expended, will serve well through a long life. At the age of forty the noted pugilist, John C. Heenan, died of consumption. Yet originally he possessed a powerful frame, and his constitution might have lasted a century. But the Creator never adapted the human body for prize-fighting; and the injuries received by Heenan in various conflicts, and his irregular habits in various respects, utterly destroyed a constitution of extraordinary strength and vigor. Nature will not be defied with impunity. Those who persistently violate her well-known rules must suffer the penalty, which comes sometimes in speedy death, but often in wretchedness which is worse than death.

Kensington Palace has been recently set apart as the abode of the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne. South of the palace is the mansion designed for the Duke of Edinburgh and his bride, but it will not be ready for occupation for two or three years. Meanwhile Clarence House, formerly the residence of the Duchess of Kent, is being enlarged and adapted to the more immediate wants of the illustrious pair, whose marriage will probably soon be celebrated.

Among the most efficient workers during the yellow fever in Memphis was one old man of seventy-six years, familiarly known as "Square Richards." He was so crippled as to be compelled to use crutches, yet he would not leave his neighbors in the dire extremity of a terrible epidemic. From the very first breaking out of the pestilence he daily visited the infected districts, carrying to one and another of the sick help and comfort. In his good work he never faltered, until, at length, the pitiless disease struck the brave hero down in the very midst of his labors.

We quote the following bit of good advice from one of our exchanges:

"In view of the existing monetary stringency, every true woman should endeavor this fall, by the grace and simplicity of her attire, to show that her husband has neither robbed a bank nor been the leader of a thieving ring."

An elegant and tasteful villa in Newport is the summer home of Miss Charlotte Cushman, who, with a well-won fortune, has now almost wholly withdrawn from her professional labors. Her hair is white, but her heart is young, her mind bright, and her hospitable courtesy seldom equaled. In the home circle she is said to be even more charming than on the stage, ever winning affectionate admiration from those who share her friendship.

Some of the ancient laws of Massachusetts are worthy of consideration at the present day. In 1642 there was a law providing that "those who do not teach, by themselves or others, their children or apprentices, so much learning as may enable them perfectly to read the English tongue, and knowledge of the capital laws, shall be fined twenty shillings for each neglect therein." In those days it was also thought proper that no interference should prevent suitable marriages. A law of 1641 reads that "if any person shall willfully and unreasonably deny any child timely or convenient marriage, or shall exercise any unnatural severity toward them, such children shall have liberty to complain to authority for redress in such cases."

Hosted by Google

"JACK IN OFFICE."—From the Painting by the late Sir Edwin Landseer, R.A.—[See Page 762.]

Hosted by Google

"JACK IN OFFICE."

See illustration on double page.

THIS, which is one of the most popular of the late Sir Edwin Landseer's many popular pictures, was painted by him in 1833, and is now included in the Sheepshanks and Vernon collections at South Kensington. As in many of the dog pictures of this great animal master, an almost human expression is imparted to the faces of the four-footed dramatis personæ. Observe the poor hungry creature in the foreground, with her cowering haunches and staring ribs. Her aspect recalls that of some shabby starveling woman, who may be seen hungrily inhaling the savory odors of a cook-shop. As for Jack himself, who presides over the dainty contents of the barrow, is he not the very impersonation of a self-sufficient, low-bred, insolent subordinate? It is this parable-like character which adds so much to the charm of many of Landseer's pictures. We gaze at exquisitely painted portraits of the brute creation, but behind the dogs and horses and monkeys we seem to see ourselves, and each picture appears to say to the spectator, "De te fabula narratur."

SOME NEW BOOKS.

IN compliance with numerous requests from distant readers, who are at a loss to know what books they may safely choose for family reading, we propose to make occasional mention of new publications that may be commended for the home circle. Books of pernicious tendency will be passed by in silence, as we do not care to further their notoriety even by censure, or to pander to that morbid curiosity which is always ready to seek what is deemed objectionable by others under the pretext of judging for itself. The usefulness of discriminating criticism to persons in the country, who are unable to examine the contents of bookstores, and who see few papers, is illustrated by an anecdote told by a publisher of judgment and taste, who received an order by mail for a hundred dollars' worth of books for a village library, among which were specified the works of a fourth-rate sensational novelist. As these numbered over forty volumes, and would consume half the money sent, he wrote suggesting the substitution for this trash of the writings of George Eliot, Dickens, Thackeray, Hawthorne, or some other standard novelist. The trustee who had ordered the books returned a grateful reply, accepting his amendment, and saying that he had never read a novel in his life, but finding that some light reading was required, he had mentioned the only writer of fiction whose name he chanced to remember.

One of the most fascinating wonder-books since the famous Swiss Family Robinson is Twenty Thousand Leagues under the Sea, by JULES VERNE (Scribner, Armstrong, & Co.). The reader is transported by a sort of marine Monte Cristo through a thousand breathless adventures, and meanwhile gains a good deal of useful information about the wonders of the deep. The story is so plausible, even in its wildest details, that one hardly realizes where fact begins and fancy ends—a fault that is common to this kind of literature, which is apt to confuse truth with error. To be safe, it should be followed by ELISÉE RÉCLUS's great work on The Ocean (Harper & Brothers), which is both readable and true, and which is well calculated to satisfy the curiosity aroused by Verne's extravaganza. This book is one of the most valuable contributions to popular science that we have seen, and is an exhaustive history of the sea in all its phases, its currents, tides, storms, winds, climates, and inhabitants, from the huge sea-monsters to the industrious zoophytes that spend millions of years in the building up of continents, and that are continually changing the face of the globe by their persevering labor. RÉCLUS's Earth, and FLAMMARION'S Atmosphere, both published by Harper & Brothers, and all sumptuously illustrated, complete the story of the entire globe. The latter, which has been much improved by the careful editing of the distinguished meteorologist, Mr. Glaisher, and which is enriched with a number of fine chromo-lithographs, is full of curious details concerning the air we breathe, but of which beyond this we know comparatively little. It is an interesting fact that the highest altitude yet reached by man—in Thibet, by the brothers Schlagintweit—is 24,339 feet. The highest inhabited spot in the world is the Buddhist cloister of Hanle, in Thibet, where a score of priests live at the great height of 16,500 feet; while the monastery of St. Bernard, at the height of 8117 feet, is the loftiest dwelling-place in Europe. The subject is treated in a popular and singularly comprehensive manner, embracing the most recent discoveries and theories respecting the atmosphere and its phenomena—mirages, borealises, meteors, and those marvelous showers of blood, earth, plants, frogs, fish, and animals, which were wont of old to fill populations with dismay, but which science has resolved into purely natural occurrences.

The Story of the Earth and Man, by J. W. DAWSON (Harper & Brothers), is a simple and lucid treatise on the geologic history of the earth, and the changes which its structure has undergone, from the time that it emerged from chaos until it became a fit habitation for man. The author is a resident of Canada, and has given special attention to the geology of North America. He is conservative in his tendencies, opposes Darwinism, and makes it his aim to let science go hand in hand with revelation.

We are glad to see a new edition of The Girlhood of Shakspeare's Heroines, by MARY COWDEN CLARKE (G. P. Putnam's Sons), which was published a score of years ago, but which has long been out of print. This reconstruction of the girl from the pen portrait of the woman is a curious process of the imagination, which reminds us of the complete fossils that naturalists build up from a few bones of extinct animals. But Mrs. Clarke is a specialist in the Shakspearean domain, and her youthful Isabella, Katherine and Bianca, Ophelia, Rosalind and Celia, and Juliet, are certainly very plausible psychological creations.

Outlines of Men, Women, and Things, by MARY CLEMMER AMES (Hurd & Houghton), is a collection of breezy articles which have appeared in the Independent, and are now published in book form. Mrs. Ames is a fresh, graphic writer, whose pen is generally just, and always pure. Her "Memorial" and "Last Poems" of Alice and Phœbe Cary are sure to keep green the memory of these poet sisters and friends, who loved in their lives, and in their deaths were not divided, and whose story is a parallel to the ladies of Llangollen. Several of the poems thus collected were first printed in the Bazar.

Health and its Conditions, by JAMES HINTON (G. P. Putnam's Sons), is a rather didactic treatise on physiological laws. A more readable book on the subject is the Bazar Book of Health (Harper & Brothers), which is a collection of papers, by an able physician, that have appeared from time to time in the Bazar.

The Best Reading (G. P. Putnam's Sons) is an admirable analytical catalogue of standard works, with the size and price appended, which will be of real service to book-buyers. We note some trifling errors, but not of importance enough to impair its utility.

Sub-Tropical Rambles in the Land of the Aphanapteryx, by NICHOLAS PIKE (Harper & Brothers), seems like a conundrum at first sight to the unscientific reader, who may not chance to remember that this gigantic but now extinct bird, coeval with the more famed but not less remarkable dodo, roamed the island of Mauritius in the prehistoric ages. He would sooner recognize it as the land of Paul and Virginia, for it is through the idyl of Bernardin St. Pierre that the picturesque African island is best known to the public at large. It is true that the bird had a veritable existence, while the story of the lovers is based on the slender foundation of the betrothed pair who were washed ashore in each other's arms from the wreck of the St. Geran, in 1744. Few lands have remained more entirely unwritten than the Mauritius, rich as it is in every thing that could interest the geologist and naturalist. Though it is but a speck on the chart, its surface is diversified with high mountains and deep valleys, cataracts, extinct volcanoes, rock spouts, and natural bridges; its coasts swarm with curious fish and corals, and its soil teems with rare tropical flowers and plants. It has, however, been little visited, and, strange to say, during the last century not a book has appeared concerning it until the present volume. It is therefore a matter of congratulation that Mr. Pike should have employed his leisure while consul there in making extensive explorations, and giving the result to the public. It is true that he does not tell us much about the aphanapteryx after the title-page, reserving the description of the bird for a future volume; but by way of compensation he furnishes interesting details concerning the existing fauna and flora, and the history of the island. The book is written in an unpretending, colloquial style, and is full of really interesting information concerning a country which piques our curiosity.

The Land of Moab, by H. B. TRISTRAM (Harper & Brothers), is a graphic narrative of an expedition undertaken last year, under the auspices of the British Association, for the purpose of exploring a comparatively unknown region, concerning which curiosity had been aroused by the discovery of the Moabitish Stone. This country of the Gentiles, of which mention is so often made in Scripture history, is inhabited only by a few wandering and hostile tribes of Arabs, who prey on travelers, and oppose their progress in every way. The expedition accomplished its object successfully, through many obstacles, and not only made a topographical survey of the country, but also discovered many curious sites, among others the scene of John the Baptist's imprisonment and martyrdom, the city of Zoar, a palace of Chosroes, and many other antiquities calculated to cast light on Scriptural narrative. The book is handsomely illustrated, and its descriptions of Eastern manners and customs are particularly interesting.

The new novels are numerous and interesting. Quixstar (G. P. Putnam's Sons) will disappoint those who remember Blindpits by the same author. It has some well-drawn characters, however, though the plot is deficient in interest.—The Cross of Berny (Porter & Coates), a composite novel by Madame DE GIRARDIN, THÉOPHILE GAUTIER, JULES SANDEAU, and MÉRY, is one of those psychological studies in which the French delight, though the plot resembles Ernani too much to be original, the main difference being that while in the latter the hero is slain on his wedding-day by his rival, in the former he is allowed a week of felicity before falling a prey to revenge.—Miss Dorothy's Charge, by FRANK LEE BENEDICT (Harper & Brothers), is a capital novel by a favorite writer. The plot is highly dramatic, and the Yankee maid-of-all-work, Hetty, who dreams over her dish-washing of being a duchess, and succeeds in her aim, is a truly original character.—Strangers and Pilgrims (Harper & Brothers) is one of Miss BRADDON's highest-toned works. This favorite novelist has of late abandoned the melodrama which characterized her earlier writings, without losing the dramatic power to which she owes her popularity.—Innocent, by Mrs. OLIPHANT (Harper & Brothers), is a singular story of one of those dwellers in the border land between wisdom and folly whom savages reverence and civilized men scorn. Without being one of the author's best works, it is decidedly above the average novel, and possesses a quiet interest that keeps the reader's attention keenly alive to the last page.—Little Dorrit, the ninth volume of the cheap illustrated edition of DICKENS's works, in course of publication by Harper & Brothers, has just appeared. All enterprises should be commended that tend to place the best literature within reach of every purse; and this is one of them. Harper & Brothers are also issuing a library edition of WILKIE COLLINS's novels, in eleven volumes, with a dedication by the author to the American people in memory of his visit to this country.

Matt's Follies (J. R. Osgood & Co.) is an amusing record of the adventures of a "glorious human boy," which will be relished by those who have any knowledge of the genus. The book is completed by several sprightly short stories, one of the best of which, "Tad's Mince-Pie," originally appeared in the Bazar.—The Boy with an Idea, by Mrs. EILOART (G. P. Putnam's Sons), is another entertaining book of the same class, and serves to show what wholly disguised blessings inventors must be to the companions of their youth. We have always thought that the young Watts and Arkwrights must have been torments to their friends and neighbors.

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. XXI.

THE Lady's-maid, for thirty years employed in the highest circles of nobility in England and on the Continent, advises the world that she is prepared to give directions for getting up the face in unrivaled fashion. Of course conditions referring to "stamps" are intimated; but I fancy no amount of "stamps" would be considered by the eager inquirer, dissatisfied with her own face, and bent on seeing it at least in a different mask. No woman can be repulsive who has a good complexion, and it is to acquiring this chief quality of beauty that most anxious efforts and inquiries are bent. If she could once secure that creamy face, that skin of imperceptible grain with tint of lilies and roses, or of lily without the rose, as many ardent admirers of pale faces prefer, young Fausta thinks that the glances of gallants might linger not ill pleased upon her, and that they might stay near her long enough to know the charms of her good temper and abundant hair, which, as it is, are quite negatived by rough cheeks and a nose with holes all over its skin. I would not take the wager against the chance of there being women ready to flay themselves, provided they could come to life with a matchless complexion thereby. I am quite certain there are some who would flay other women to gain themselves smooth, snowy flesh. Remember the cruel Queen of Hungary—was it not?—by whose order maidens were enticed to her castle and slain, that she might bathe in their blood, which was said to be a specific for renewing one's youth and fairness. She gained the sobriquet of the White Queen by those terrible baths, till a lover, turning horror-stricken from her deadly beauty, gave her a harsher and a truer name, so that she went down with Victoria Colonna to history—white devils both, whose names and whose fames men spat out of their mouths. As cruel work is done to-day by the white hands of beauty, insolent in its strength. When a successful woman wins the lover from another for the moment's triumph, not because she cares for him, and inflicts perhaps a life-long wound on both—certainly on her rival—the cruelty is the same in kind, and less excusable in its degree than the crime of the mad queen.

I thought Emilia one of the most high-minded, as she was the most fascinating, of her sex, till I heard that she had been guilty of the meanness of winning another woman's lover by deliberately setting herself to captivate him. He would have made the happiness of a tender-natured, solitary girl, and have found the peace of his life in her absorbing devotion, if that fatal wily face had not too persistently wiled him to itself. When the yellow leaves fell, and there was a woman weeping hot tears of desertion in her solitary chamber, and a man balancing his world against one smile of the brown-eyed enchantress, and finding it lost without gaining the smile, Emilia counted her work well done. Too well; for before the next autumn Nemesis was upon her. The cheated lover was a friend of the man to win whom Emilia would have sacrificed every other admiration. In the single confidence he allowed himself this man took part, and the heartlessness revealed lost her a prize she had well-nigh won with her sweetest flatteries. There is, or should be, conscience even in the coquetries of women, and there is no gainsaying the retribution that follows them. And if this page helps any Emilia to another charm, I write it willingly, knowing she will forge of it only a weapon for her own wounding at last. Was there ever a coquette who was a happy woman?

But the Lady's-maid, priestess of the rites before conquest, sends a harmless, closely written missive on primrose-tinted paper, written in a hand that is no bad specimen of the fashionable angular writing supposed to belong to the Cholmondelys and Villarses of those highest circles round which is drawn the cordon of the Morning Post. Composition and spelling are correct, and it was doubtful if the letter was the genuine production of the Lady's-maid till it developed a powerful odor of musk, which astonished the owner on opening the drawer where it was kept. Nevertheless, she gives very good advice for making the skin smooth, soft, and white. Attention, ladies:

Take two table-spoonfuls of fine oatmeal, boil it in sufficient soft water to make a thin gruel, and strain. When cold, add the juice of a lemon, with a dessert-spoonful of wine. Keep this for use, making it fresh once in about ten days. Wash the face with it every night on going to bed. Do not wipe the lotion entirely off, but leave the face quite damp. In the morning wash it in tepid water, with a little oatmeal stirred in, about a table-spoonful to the quart. When dry, put thinly on a little glycerine cold-cream; let it remain on a few minutes, then wash off in the oatmeal and water, well dry the face, and rub on the Lady's-maid's incomparable white tablet, prepared from a prescription procured in Paris, perfectly pleasant, harmless, and beautiful, which, as it is inexpensive, will be sent in quantity for a twelvemonth's use for something like four dollars.

This is the way such mysterious directions for getting up the face invariably end. But premising that the incomparable tablets can be nothing but very fine prepared chalk, which can be had at lower rates than those mentioned, we will read farther, and lending ourselves to the delusion for once, learn the skillful way of applying powder:

Rub the white tablet on the face, says this authority, as much as you please with a piece of short swan's-down, which is better to keep for the purpose; nicely rub it in, which will be done in a minute or two. The face will then look lovely white, and the neck and hands may be made white in exactly the same way. To tint the cheek, use the pure extract of China rose leaf, in powder. This will produce a pretty pink and natural bloom which nothing else will equal. In making it up, with the finger put a very little on the cheek; then, with a small camel's-hair brush cut short and stumpy, brush gently over the cheek to blend the color and set it fast. When nicely done, it will surpass any thing of the kind ever used; the shade is not deep, but is natural and beautiful. It will be as fresh and nice at the end of twenty-four hours as when first done. A warm or crowded assembly will have no effect upon the face. Nothing but soap and water will remove it. She strongly advises palm soap for washing, there being no other kind to equal it. The powder should be washed off every night, and the oatmeal used. By the regular application of this wash for a little while, say from two to six weeks, the face will become soft and smooth, and keep free from peeling, or any unpleasant roughness caused by sun and wind. Washing the hands at night in the oatmeal lotion, and sleeping in dog-skin gloves, is a very good thing for making them elastic, soft, and white. If the hands are inclined to redness, this will wonderfully improve them.

Now for the farther mysteries of the toilette which this Lady's-maid has to communicate: For the eyes, take a very fine hair-pencil, and apply to the upper and under eyelash a little belladonna. This, in the course of an hour, will cause the pupil of the eye to look large and very brilliant. It is the only thing that will really embellish the eye, and the smallest drop will give the most clear and sparkling brightness. And, it may be added, an overdose or too large a drop of belladonna will not only cause the pupil of the eye to look large and brilliant, but will leave it so—with the sight gone forever. But let us listen to the particularly considerate peroration of the Lady's-maid's letter:

